But all theſe efforts were not only fruſtrated, but proved ſubverſive of the very deſigns they were intended to accompliſh, and eventually terminated in the miſery and death of the unfortunate Mary, through the politic conduct of queen Elizabeth, who, from the experienced fallacy of foreign allies, deemed it moſt eſſential to the intereſt of the nation, to ſelect, as miniſters at home, men of the moſt approved integrity as well as abilities. The ambaſſador to the court of Spain met with a very cold reception from Philip, who, being highly averſe to the eſtabliſhment of the reformation in England, reſtored the collar of the order of the garter, and declined renewing the alliance with the Engliſh queen.

To try the effect of lenient meaſures, the pope diſpatched certain inſtructions ſpecified in a brief to be delivered in form to the queen by his nuncio, who, to the exhortations therein contained reſpecting her conformity to the catholic religion, is ſaid, as a lure, to have promiſed, that the pope would annul the ſentence of divorce between Henry VIII. and Anne Boleyn, confirm the Engliſh liturgy, and allow the people to communicate in both kinds at the ſacrament. Theſe propoſals were, however, rejected, as vague, temporizing and deluſive.

A. D. 1560. The reformation in England inſtigated the reſentment and cruel perſecution of the Proteſtants, (commonly called Hugonots) in France, until they formed a conſpiracy againſt the duke of Guiſe, and the cardinal of Lorraine, who were their inveterate enemies. The prince of Condé was ſuppoſed to favour them in private, and a ſcheme was formed, for ſurprizing the duke and cardinal at the court of Amboiſe. This deſign being diſcovered, was conſtrued into a conſpiracy againſt the king, and twelve hundred perſons were executed, for having been privy to the plot.

The preſence of the king of Navarre and the prince of Condé at the general aſſembly had well nigh proved fatal to them both; the former was ſo narrowly obſerved that he could not eſcape; the prince was committed to priſon, and afterwards condemned to the block; but the death of Francis II. ſaved him from that ignominious fate. The queen-mother was appointed regent, during the minority of her ſon Charles IX. who ſucceeded his father; the king of Navarre was conſtituted lieutenant-general of the kingdom; the ſentence againſt Condé was reverſed; and the authority of the princes of Lorraine greatly diminiſhed.

A. D. 1561. In conſequence of theſe fortunate events in France, Elizabeth peremptorily demanded of Mary, by her ambaſſador, an immediate ratification of the treaty of Edinburgh; but Mary evaded compliance, by informing the ambaſſador, that ſhe would wait the arrival of ſome Scottiſh noblemen, whom ſhe expected in France, and with their concurrence ſatisfy the queen of England. However, to ward off the reſentment ſhe had reaſon to expect from her non-compliance, ſhe ſet out for Calais, where ſhe embarked with a ſplendid retinue, but was greatly affected at leaving that kingdom, as appeared by her exclaiming, "Fare-"well France, farewell beloved country, which I "ſhall never more behold."

An Engliſh fleet was ordered out to intercept her in the paſſage, which, through favour of a fog, ſhe fortunately eſcaped, and arrived in her native kingdom, after having been abſent for the ſpace of thirteen years. She was received by her ſubjects with the greateſt acclamations of joy; but had the mortification to find ſuch ſevere laws in force againſt her, that it was with difficulty ſhe was permitted to celebrate maſs in her own private chapel.

As the flame of religious diſſentions now raged in Scotland with unabating fury, and the ſpirit of perſecution equally poſſeſſed the proteſtants and papiſts, Mary, at this ſo critical a juncture, wiſely affected a partiality for the proteſtants, and committed to leading men of that party the adminiſtration of affairs. Her favourite miniſters were the prior of St. Andrew's, and Maitland of Lethington, by whoſe prudent advice ſhe regulated her conduct in ſuch a manner, as conciliated the affections of her ſubjects. With the advice of her council ſhe diſpatched ſecretary Maitland to London, to inform Elizabeth of her happy arrival in her own dominions, and to ſolicit her friendſhip.

Soothed by theſe conciliatory meaſures on the part of Mary, the queen of England agreed to maintain a proper correſpondence with her, and many letters paſſed between them, abounding with expreſſions of the moſt unreſerved friendſhip, while, according to the mode of courts, their words ſpoke a language foreign to their hearts.

Having received, at divers times, intimations from the Roman pontiff of his perſiſting in his claim to eccleſiaſtical ſupremacy even in England, the queen laudably reſolved entirely to throw off the yoke of papal tyranny. She therefore denied the nuncio admittance into her preſence, declaring, that ſhe would never acknowledge a council ſummoned by the biſhop of Rome, and acting under his direction. In conſequence of this behaviour, Philip ſolicited the pope to denounce ſentence of excommunication againſt her; he treated her ambaſſadors with contempt, and permitted the officers of the inquiſition to proſecute the Engliſh traders in his dominions. Elizabeth, therefore, apprehending a ſtorm from this quarter, equipped a powerful fleet, which ſecured the empire of the ſea; ſhe augmented the garriſons, and repaired the fortifications of Berwick, trained the militia, encouraged trade, and, by her wiſe and prudent meaſures gained abſolute dominion over the hearts of her ſubjects.

A.D. 1562--3. The propriety of her general conduct was ſoon rendered evident, as the catholics began to cabal in private, and form ſchemes for the re-eſtabliſhment of their religion. Divers ſchemes were alſo concerted againſt her by the earl and counteſs of Lenox, Arthur Pole, nephew to the late cardinal, with his brother Edmund, and Anthony Forteſcue.

The ſuſpected perſons were ſoon apprehended, and, upon examination, confeſſed that they had entertained a deſign of repairing to France, where they were promiſed a ſupply of men, who were to be tranſported into Wales, where they propoſed to proclaim Mary queen of England, while Pole ſhould be declared duke of Clarence. They ſtood, indeed, ſelf-convicted, but from motives either of policy or humanity, the royal clemency was extended towards them in a full and free pardon.

On the meeting of parliament this year, the life of the queen being greatly endangered from the ſmall-pox, the commons preſented an addreſs to her majeſty, entreating her to fix the ſucceſſion in an explicit manner, in order to avoid the calamities which a competition might produce. But ſhe equivocally evaded a direct compliance with the prayer of the addreſs, aſſuring them, ſhe would ever be attentive to the true intereſt and happineſs of her people. The parliament granted, however, the neceſſary ſupplies, and paſſed many wholeſome laws for the relief of the poor, and the encouragement of commerce and agriculture. Some religious improvements were alſo made during the courſe of this ſeſſion, upon the plan eſtabliſhed in the reign of Edward VI. and the tenor of their proceedings might be deemed worthy the auguſt aſſembly of a nation. At the cloſe of the parliament a peace was concluded with France; the conditions ſpecified, that two hundred thouſand crowns ſhould be paid to the queen for reſtoration of hoſtages, and confirmed the former claims and pretenſions of both parties.

A. D. 1564. Animoſities between the rival queens were apparently ſubſided; an amicable and affectionate literary intercourſe took place, the ſcene of diſſention and diſquiet was totally reverſed. This agreeable pauſe, however, from ſtrife and contention, was but of ſhort duration, ſuch was the mutual and unconquerable antipathy of the parties. Elizabeth was averſe to the very thoughts of a competitor, as well as fearful of her marrying ſome Catholic prince, who might be able to aſſert her pretenſions. Mary, on the other hand, had been taught to conſider Elizabeth as illegitimate, an heretic and uſurper, who had intercepted her right to one of the moſt honourable ſcepters in Europe, and fomented rebellions in the heart of her kingdom. Thus operated the reſpective opinions and prejudices on the minds and conduct of the reſpective queens.

A. D. 1565. After a ſeries of viſſicitudes, religious and political, it was deemed expedient that Mary ſhould form a matrimonial alliance, and lord Darnley was the object of that queen's choice, and the approbation of the counſellors; it being by them premiſed, that this young nobleman being deſcended from the ſame family with herſelf would, by ſuch an alliance, preſerve the royal dignity in the houſe of Stuart. As he was an Engliſhman by birth, and could not by his power or connections, give any cauſe of ſuſpicions to Elizabeth, it was preſumed that the purpoſe of this marriage would not be diſagreeable to that jealous princeſs. Elizabeth appeared, indeed, at firſt, moſt cordially to acquieſce with the propoſed match, and apprehending that the treaty was verging towards an iſſue, permitted Darnley, on his firſt application, to follow his father into Scotland; but no ſooner did ſhe hear, that preparations were making for celebrating the nuptials, than ſhe exclaimed againſt the marriage; ſent Throgmorton to Scotland to command Darnley, upon his allegiance, immediately to return to England; committed the counteſs of Lenox, and her ſecond ſon, to the Tower; confiſcated all Lenox's Engliſh eſtates; and though it was impoſſible for her to aſſign one plauſible pretence for her diſpleaſure, ſhe threatened, proteſted, and complained, with all the vehemence of rancour, ſuſpicion, and jealouſy, as if ſhe had been injured in the niceſt point.

The pen of candour muſt hand down to poſterity the whole of her tranſactions with, and reſpecting, Mary queen of Scotland, as equivocal, deſigning and malicious: if there can be any palliation admiſſible, it muſt be, the calling to remembrance, that ſhe was but mortal, conſequently frail, and that it was the lot of humanity to err. However, notwithſtanding all her machinations, the propoſed nuptials were at length conſummated on the twenty-ninth day of July.

The adherents to the proteſtant cauſe, apprehenſive for the fate of the reformation in conſequence of this alliance, aſſembled at Stirling, affected an extreme concern for the intereſt of religion, engaged in an aſſociation for their mutual defence, and applied to Elizabeth for her aſſiſtance. That princeſs, having publicly declared her diſapprobation of the match, ſent an ambaſſador to the queen of Scots, demanding that the lord Darnley ſhould be delivered into her hands, according to the ſtipulations of the late treaty, by which the two queens obliged themſelves to give up the rebellious ſubjects of each other. The Scottiſh queen, in reply, aſſured Elizabeth that ſhe would prefer no claim during her life, provided ſhe might be pronounced by parliament preſumptive heir to the crown of England.

The late marriage was not ſucceeded by any happy events, either to the parties in particular, or the Scottiſh nation in general. Darnley's perfections centered ſolely in his perſon; his mind was low and ſordid, his temper impetuous and open to the adulation of ſycophants, and his behaviour to his conſort, by whom he had been ſo much aggrandized, and even courted to teſtify his affection, was ſullen, reſerved, and diſguſting. This of courſe produced a coldneſs on her part, and at length furniſhed cauſe for ſuſpicion of an illicit commerce between the queen and one Rizzio, an Italian muſician, which terminated in his death, from the hands of aſſaſſins ſuborned for that purpoſe by her huſband, the lord Darnley.

A. D. 1566—7. On the nineteenth of June, Mary was delivered of a ſon at the caſtle of Edinburgh, which being announced by Sir John Melville (an eminent hiſtorian) in quality of ambaſſador to the Engliſh court, exceedingly diſturbed the mind of Elizabeth; however, ſhe diſguiſed her concern by affecting all the compliments and parade of ceremony uſual upon ſuch occaſions at courts, and the reſorts of the great; and ſent the earl of Bedford to aſſiſt at the baptiſm of the young prince James; the ceremony being performed in Stirling caſtle, in the preſence of the ambaſſadors of England, France and Savoy.

The queen of England, being the patron of literature, and encourager of the liberal arts, in the ſummer of this year, honoured the univerſity of Oxford with her royal preſence, and eminently diſplayed her own genius and learning. She anſwered a Greek oration in the ſame language, and in a Latin ſpeech aſſured the univerſity of her favour and protection. On her return to London, the parliament was aſſembled, and a motion made in the lower houſe, for petitioning her majeſty to marry, and ſettle the ſucceſſion to the crown. This motion was ſuggeſted by the earls of Pembroke and Leiceſter, but vehemently oppoſed by Cecil, who was, therefore, reviled without doors, in lampoons, and libels. The addreſs being preſented, ſhe ſignified her intention to marry, but obſerved, ſhe could not declare her ſucceſſor, without expoſing her own perſon to danger. The commons, diſſatisfied with her anſwer, repeated their importunity; and the queen, at length, remitted the third part of the ſubſidy they had granted, and diſmiſſed them with a ſpeech, not the moſt conciliatory or popular.

The period of Mary's diſgrace and humiliation now approached. Lord Darnley, after the moſt unworthy degradations, being taken off by means unknown, earl Bothwell, a man of diſſolute morals, who was ſuſpected of being acceſſary to the inſidious tranſaction, was admitted to the utmoſt familiarity with the queen, and determining thereupon to obtain her hand at all events, he raiſed a body of eight hundred horſe, and interrupting her in her return from Stirling, conveyed her to his caſtle at Dunbar, in order to effect his purpoſe. Having obtained a divorce from his wife, he conducted the queen to the caſtle of Edinburgh, where ſhe created him duke of Orkney, and finally married him on the fifteenth of May. Theſe circumſtances not only diſgraced Mary in the eyes of all Europe, but rendered the character of Bothwell odious to the whole Scottiſh nation; and as he was ſtrongly ſuſpected of having been acceſſary to the death of Mary's former conſort, the earl of Murray thought it high time to cruſh the power of that ambitious and turbulent nobleman.

The principal nobility formed a confederacy at Stirling, and had reſolved to protect the young prince, and avenge themſelves of the murderers of lord Darnley. The confederate lords, at length, appointed their grand rendezvous at Edinburgh; Bothwell made ſome faint oppoſition, and the queen, conſcious of the weakneſs of her cauſe, and the inefficacy of reſiſting ſo powerful a combination, propoſed a conference, and ſurrendered herſelf into the hands of the confederates, who conducted her to Edinburgh amidſt the moſt palpable inſults of the populace.

Bothwell, in conſequence of the queen's ſurrender, eſcaped to Dunbar, and finding means to elude the ſearch of his purſuers, procured a paſ-

ſage to Denmark, where he died in indigence and obſcurity. The unhappy Mary was conveyed by order of the confederates under a ſtrong guard to Lochleven, with orders to the governor to take her under his cuſtody.

The queen of England affected to exert her authority very ſtrenuouſly in behalf of the unfortunate Mary. She diſpatched Sir Nicholas Throgmorton to mediate between her and the confederate lords, and to expreſs her diſpleaſure at Mary's confinement. He was inſtructed to threaten, in her name, that ſhe would releaſe the queen by force, ſhould they refuſe to ſet her at liberty on reaſonable conditions. He was furniſhed with a plan of accommodation between their ſovereign and them; and directed to propoſe, that the young prince ſhould be educated in England. But as he was debarred all acceſs to the queen, his deſign, together with that of his royal miſtreſs, was totally defeated.

A. D. 1568. To obviate the ſuppoſed political intentions of Elizabeth, the confederate lords, after much debate on the affairs of the nation, came to a reſolution of tranſmitting three inſtruments to her, to which ſhe was to affix her ſign manual. Theſe imported Mary's reſignation of the crown to her infant ſon; a commiſſion appointing the earl of Murray regent during his minority; and another, nominating a council to govern the realm, in caſe of that nobleman's death, or his declining the office of regent. Theſe deeds, through compulſion, ſhe ſubſcribed; and Morton accepted her reſignation, in the name of the three eſtates of Scotland, though he was veſted with no ſuch power by the aſſembly. They then proceeded to crown the young prince, who was only thirteen months old, and the ceremony was performed at Stirling by Adam Bothwell, biſhop of Orkney; but Throgmorton refuſed, by order of Elizabeth, to aſſiſt at this ceremony, and was ſoon after recalled.

During her connection with the infamous Bothwell, Mary found but few friends amongſt the Scottiſh nobility; but the pity and compaſſion of many were excited towards her, after his expulſion; particularly ſuch as were attached to the catholic religion, who, lamenting her ill fortunes, and piqued at her rigorous treatment, aſſembled at Hamilton, in order to concert meaſures for ſupporting the cauſe of their unfortunate ſovereign. The recovery of her liberty was, in an eſſential degree, owing to the ſtrenuous exertions of George Douglas, who put her into a boat, cauſed her to be rowed to ſhore, and afterwards conveyed to Hamilton, where ſhe found herſelf at the head of ſix thouſand men, aſſembled by the different lords in her intereſt, who aſſerted her claim to the crown, and contended for the invalidity of her reſignation, as extorted by the moſt cruel and rigorous proceedings.

Notwithſtanding the ſuperiority of the queen's party in point of numbers, the regent, at the head of the oppoſition, having drawn together his forces, boldly confronted, and totally vanquiſhed them in a pitched battle at Langſide near Glaſgow, after the field had been ſtrewed with blood and carnage. The queen fled with the utmoſt precipitation, and, embarking with the lord Herries, and a train of ſixteen perſons, landed at Workington in Cumberland, from whence ſhe was conducted to the caſtle of Carliſle.

Flattering herſelf with expectation of friendly aid from Elizabeth, immediately on her landing ſhe diſpatched a meſſenger to the court of London, ſoliciting her protection at this critical juncture. But the reply which ſhe obtained from the queen of England, with the advice of the council, equally ſurpriſed and alarmed her. She was given to underſtand, that ſhe muſt remain a priſoner, till ſhe ſhould renounce her claim to the crown of England; and vindicate herſelf from the charge of being acceſſary to the murder of lord Darnley, who was a natural ſubject of England, and therefore came under the ſanction of its laws.

The unfortunate Mary was exceedingly affected at this unexpected incident, and as the only means of palliating her conduct, aſſured Elizabeth of her deſire to ſubmit her cauſe to the deciſion of ſo good a friend, and diſpatched lord Herries to London, with a letter to the ſame purpoſe. This conceſſion was the very point, to which Elizabeth laboured to bring the matter, and ſhe inſtantly ſent to the regent, requiring him to ſend ſome perſons to London, to aſſign the cauſe of his uſurpation, and mal-treatment of his lawful queen.

Murray, with all ſubmiſſion, replied, that he would himſelf repair to England, accompanied by other commiſſioners, and ſubmit his cauſe to her arbitration. The perſons appointed by the Engliſh council, for the examination of this important affair, were the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Suſſex, and Sir Ralph Sadler; and York was fixed as the place of conference.

The commiſſioners appointed on the part of the Scottiſh queen were, Leſley, biſhop of Roſs, the lords Herries, Levingſton, and Boyd, with five perſons more. Thoſe deputed by the kingdom, were, the earl of Murray, regent, the biſhop of Orkney, the lord Lindſay, the abbot of Dumferling, George Buchanan, the celebrated poet and hiſtorian, and ſome others.

The queen's commiſſioners having preſented a paper, exhibiting a detail of the crimes alledged to the charge of the regent, he related, with great preciſion, the particulars of his late proceedings; affirming, that the lords had taken arms to revenge the death of lord Darnley, upon Bothwell; that the queen had voluntarily reſigned the crown to her ſon, and appointed the earl of Murray regent of the kingdom during his minority. Mary's commiſſioners refuted theſe allegations; and requeſted that the queen of England would aſſiſt their miſtreſs in the recovery of her crown, and the ſuppreſſion of ſuch rebellious attempts; they alſo preſented an atteſted copy of the proteſtation made by the earls of Huntley and Argyle, charging Murray and Morton, as the contrivers of Darnley's murder, and affording a juſt plea for their oppoſition to the regent, as principal abettor of that atrocious crime.

The queen of England, apprehending from the ſtate of enquiry, that further inveſtigation would fully criminate the regent, commanded the commiſſioners to repair to London, and as ſoon as they arrived, joined with them ſome of the principal members of her council. Murray was then ſummoned before the Engliſh commiſſioners, reprimanded by them for the odious aſperſions he had thrown on the character of his ſovereign, and at length, aſked what he could alledge in his own vindication. Matters being now brought almoſt to a criſis, the regent made no ſcruple to produce the proofs of his charge againſt the queen of Scots, and among the reſt, ſome letters and ſonnets all written with her own hand to Bothwell, together with a paper containing a promiſe of of marriage with that nobleman. These papers had been most carefully preserved, as some affirm, by the favourite in a silver casket; nor could he be persuaded, by the most pressing entreaties of the unfortunate queen, to destroy them; but had, to gratify his own vanity, deposited them in the hands of the governor of Edinburgh castle.

There is not a point in the annals of history, concerning which writers, through prejudice or partiality, are more divided in their opinions than as to the ground of charge exhibited on this occasion, against the unfortunate princess. Some affirm, that these letters and verses were forged, for the purposes of the regent and confederates, and that the accusation of the queen's conduct, contained in the paper written by Buchanan, is founded on false and malicious representations; others as explicitly assert, that these papers have been since proved, that the objections made to their authenticity are frivolous and absurd, and have been fully refuted by several writers. Upon an impartial survey of the whole, the conduct of the queen of England exhibits the most glaring proofs of jealousy, ambiguity, and duplicity; and she evidently appears to have amused her rival with flattering hopes and expectations, in order to protract the time of her imprisonment, till she might find a convenient opportunity of taking her off.

A. D. 1569. Elizabeth now turned her attention from domestic concerns to those of a foreign nature; and the term stipulated in the treaty with France, for the restitution of Calais being long expired, she dispatched ambassadors to require the performance of that article. The chancellor d'l'Hopital made use of various equivocations, to evade an immediate answer to their demand; however, Elizabeth thought it more prudent to submit to the loss of that place, than engage in a dangerous and expensive war, in order to maintain a doubtful title, and hazard fresh dangers and difficulties.

Such was the fury of persecutions in the Low Countries, that the prince of Orange was obliged to take refuge among the French Hugonots, whom Elizabeth had succoured with a considerable supply of men and money. This interposition of the queen interrupted all commerce between England and the Low Countries; and Philip, king of Spain, prohibited the exportation of oil, sugar, and spices, from his dominions.

The inconvenience and hazard of detaining queen Mary a prisoner must, doubtless, have occurred to the discerning mind of Elizabeth, of which time gave eventual proof. The duke of Norfolk was the peer who possessed the highest title of nobility, and as there were no princes of the blood, the antiquity of the family, the greatness of his estate, and the extent of his influence, had rendered him indisputably the first subject in England. Nor were the qualities of his mind unworthy of his elevated station; humane, generous, and affable, he had engaged the affections of the people; prudent, moderate, and loyal, he enjoyed unenvied the favour of his sovereign.

The duke was at this time in the single state, and being almost coeval with the queen of Scots, it was suggested that a match would be at once agreeable to themselves, and conducive to the honor and interest of the nation. The scheme met with the concurrence of their friends in general, insomuch, that it was first intimated to the duke by secretary Maitland, and next by the regent of Scotland, previous to his departure from England; so that proper steps being taken, the earl of Murray, through the medium of Sir Robert Melville, communicated the proposal to Mary, who replied, that as she esteemed it her duty to sacrifice her inclinations to the welfare of the public, she would, as soon as she could be divorced from Bothwell, follow the advice of her nobility and people, in the chioce of another husband. Norfolk, persuaded from the jealous disposition of Elizabeth, of the impossibility of procuring her consent to the marriage by methods of duty, determined to form such a powerful combination, as should intimidate her into compliance.

Though Norfolk was a professed Catholic, such was his popularity, that it proved no barrier to the proposed match, which met with the hearty concurrence of the earls of Pembroke, Arundel, Derby, Bedford, Shrewsbury, Northumberland, Westmoreland, and Sussex; the lord Lumley, and Sir Nicholas Throgmorton embraced the scheme with great cordiality; and even the earl of Leicester, Elizabeth's declared favourite, zealously promoted the interest of Norfolk. These proceedings equally chagrined and perplexed Elizabeth. She wished that Mary was removed from her dominions, where she daily acquired new interest; at the same time she dreaded the thoughts of her enlargement, lest it might afford opportunity of strengthening her interest, and reviving the detested competition for regal sway.

Notwithstanding all her art, finesses, and duplicity, Elizabeth could not suppress the violence of her emotion, on Leicester's explicit declaration of the intended marriage; on the contrary, she gave proofs of the most malicious resentment both by words and actions.

The earl, however, apprehensive of the fatal consequences of persisting in the design, set out on his return to court, resolving to exert his utmost endeavours in order to recover the confidence of Elizabeth; but he had proceeded no farther than St. Alban's, when he was intercepted by an armed body, who conducted him to the court near Windsor, and soon after he was committed prisoner to the Tower, under the custody of Sir Henry Nevil. Lesley, bishop of Ross, the queen of Scots ambassador, was examined, and confronted with Norfolk before the council; Pembroke was confined to his own house, and Arundel, Lumley, and Throgmorton, were delivered up in charge to proper officers.

The unfortunate Mary was treated with the utmost rigor. She was conveyed to Coventry, a place of greater strength, where no person, for some time, was allowed to visit her; and the lord viscount Hereford was joined to the earls of Shrewsbury and Huntingdon, in the office of her keepers.

Intelligence having been received at court of an intended insurrection in the north, Northumberland and Westmoreland were cited before the great officers of state; but in being interrogated, and no proof appearing against them, they were dismissed. The report, however, daily gained ground, and the queen summoned these two noblemen to answer to the charge exhibited against them. This summons induced them to take arms, but before they were fully prepared and Northumberland was hesitating between opposite dangers, he received intelligence, that some of his enemies were on the way with a commission to seize him; he therefore instantly repaired to his associate Weſtmoreland, and with him entered into a reſolution of joining their intereſts; ſo that from their attachment to the popiſh religion, they drew to their ſtandard immenſe numbers of people.

Thus prepared for their deſign, they iſſued a manifeſto, declaring that their ſole intention was to re-eſtabliſh the religion of their anceſtors, to puniſh evil counſellors, to ſettle the ſucceſſion to the crown, and to reſtore the duke of Norfolk, and other faithful peers, to the enjoyment of their liberty, and the favour of their ſovereign. Their army amounted to four thouſand foot, and ſixteen hundred horſe, and they hoped to be joined by all the Catholics in England. Suſſex, accompanied by ſome other lords, marched againſt them, at the head of ſeven thouſand men, and found them already advanced to the biſhopric of Durham, of which they had made themſelves maſters. They fled before him to Hexham, and underſtanding that the earl of Warwick and lord Clinton were coming againſt them with greater force, they diſperſed in the greateſt conſternation, without making a ſingle effort in ſupport of the cauſe they affected to eſpouſe. The inferior claſs retreated to their reſpective habitations, and the leaders eſcaped into Scotland, where Northumberland was apprehended by the regent, and ſent priſoner to the caſtle of Lochlevin; but Weſtmoreland eſcaped to Flanders.

There ſeemed to prevail at this time a moſt abſurd and ridiculous diſpoſition in the people to rebel; an inſurrection was attempted by ſome obſcure zealots for the popiſh cauſe, but they were ſoon apprehended and treated with the utmoſt rigour. Sixty petty conſtables were condemned to the gibbet, and no leſs than eight hundred perſon are ſaid, on the whole, to have fallen by the common executioner. Norfolk found means ſo far to inſinuate himſelf into the favor of the queen, that ſhe releaſed him from the Tower, and on his engaging to abandon all thoughts of the Scottiſh alliance, permitted him to retire to his ſeat in the country, and paſs his time in eaſe and tranquillity.

Intimations have been given by ſome writers, that the regent of Scotland had perfidiouſly engaged with Elizabeth, to have Mary conveyed into the North, and delivered up to him; but while they heſitated on the conſequences of ſuch a ſcheme, the fate of Murray, who was ſlain in the revenge of a private injury, by the party aggrieved, prevented the execution of their deſign.

A. D. 1570. The fury of party zeal was now revived with greater violence, and the kingdom of Scotland exhibited one ſcene of anarchy and confuſion. The partizans of Mary took up arms, and made themſelves maſters of Edinburgh. Elizabeth ordered the earl of Suſſex to raiſe an army to retaliate this injury. Accordingly, he invaded Scotland, and committed hoſtilities on all Mary's adherents, on pretence, that they aided and abetted the rebellion againſt the queen of England.

But, in proceſs of time, on agreement that the rebels ſhould be ſurrendered to Elizabeth, her army evacuated Scotland, and the ambaſſadors of Mary, France, and Spain, continuing their importunity with Elizabeth, on the ſcore of the treaty for the releaſe of the queen of Scots, ſhe appointed Cecil, and Sir Walter Mildmay, chancellor of the exchequer, her commiſſioners to treat on this affair; in conſequence of which, the following propoſitions were offered for effecting a laſting peace between the two kingdoms; that the queen of Scots, beſides relinquiſhing all claim to the Engliſh crown, during the life of Elizabeth, ſhould agree to a perpetual league offenſive and defenſive, between the two kingdoms; that ſhe ſhould eſpouſe no Engliſhman without Elizabeth's conſent, nor any other perſon, without the conſent of the ſtates of Scotland; that reparation ſhould be made for the damage which the Engliſh had ſuffered in the late incurſions of the Scots; that the aſſaſſins of the late king ſhould be brought to condign puniſhment; that the young king ſhould be ſent into England to be educated; that ſix hoſtages, all of them noblemen, ſhould be delivered to the queen of England, together with the caſtle of Hume, and ſome other fortreſs for the performance of theſe articles.

Upon theſe conditions the queen of England ſtipulated to exert her power in reſtoring Mary to the crown of Scotland. Her commiſſioners alſo propoſed to the depoſed queen a plan of accommodation with her ſubjects in Scotland, and after reaſoning on that ſubject, it was reſolved, that Elizabeth ſhould deſire Lenox, the regent, to ſend commiſſioners to negotiate a peace under her mediation. After the point had been debated twenty days, the Engliſh commiſſioners returned, and made ſuch a report to their miſtreſs, that ſhe declared her ſatisfaction with the negotiation, and ſaid ſhe did not doubt but the only difference remaining would be removed on the arrival of the commiſſioners from the regent of Scotland, without whoſe conſent the young prince could not be conveyed to England. In the mean time, propoſals and anſwers were, by Mary, communicated to the kings of France and Spain, intimating the neceſſity ſhe was under of ſubmitting to the conditions, unleſs they would ſuccour her friends in Scotland. Thoſe potentates, however, paid very little attention to her repreſentation; the French monarch, indeed, was never favourably diſpoſed towards Mary, and he was now wholly employed in deviſing means for cruſhing the Proteſtants throughout his kingdom.

At length, in direct repugnance to an article of the late treaty, the Scottiſh commiſſioners arrived in London, and refuſed to deliver up the young prince on any terms, deſiring, at the ſame time, that the treaty might be rendered null and void. The negotiation, therefore, ceaſed, and the biſhop of Roſs was ordered to depart; but the regent countermanded the order, and inſiſted on his reſidence in England in order to ſuperintend the conduct of Elizabeth relative to the Scottiſh nation.

A. D. 1571. On the firſt meeting of the new parliament at Weſtminſter in the month of April, ſeveral laws were enacted to maintain the right of the queen of England, as well as that of the ſucceſſion. It was declared treaſon to affirm, during the life of the queen, that ſhe was not the lawful ſovereign; that any other poſſeſſed a better title; that ſhe was an heretic, a ſchiſmatic, or infidel, or that the could not determine the ſucceſſion of the crown: whoever ſhould aſſert in writing or printing, that any perſon, except the iſſue of her body, is or ought to be the queen's heir, or ſucceſſor, was, for the firſt offence, to be impriſoned during a year; and for the ſecond, they were to incur the penalty of a premunire.

From the tenor of the laſt clauſe, it evidently appeared that Elizabeth intimated her reſolution of excluding the Scottiſh queen from all pretence of ſucceeding to the throne of England. Several wholeſome ſtatutes paſſed for the ſuppreſſion of popiſh piſh ſuperſtition and idolatry; it being decreed, that whoever ſhould publiſh bulls or mandates of the pope, or ſhould, by means of theſe, reconcile any man to the church of Rome, ſhould themſelves, as well as thoſe who were ſo reconciled, be guilty of treaſon. Whoever imported any Agnus Dei, crucifixes, beads, or ſuch other implements of ſuperſtition, was ſubjected to the penalties of præmunire. The former laws againſt taking intereſt, which was called uſury, were enforced by a new ſtatute; and a ſupply of one ſubſidy, and two fifteenths, were granted to her majeſty.

Norfolk, in direct oppoſition to reaſon and common ſenſe, was fool-hardy enough to revive his former deſpicable plan of rebellion, and for which he had been ſome time impriſoned in the Tower. There was one Rodolphi, a Florentine, who had long reſided in London, and acted privately as an agent for the court of Rome. This man projected a ſcheme, in concert with the Spaniſh ambaſſador, for the releaſe of Mary, by means of a domeſtic inſurrection and foreign invaſion. When their intention was communicated to Norfolk, the duke told Rodolphi, that he would do every thing in his power to relieve the Scottiſh queen; and that his project was feaſible. On Norfolk's approbation of the plan, three letters were wrote in his name, by Rodolphi, to the duke of Alva, the pope, and the king of Spain; but the duke refuſed to ſign them. Rodolphi repairing to Bruſſels, communicated the ſcheme to the duke of Alva, who readily came into it, and aſſured him that he would employ his beſt endeavours to obtain the concurrence of the Spaniſh monarch.

This project had not yet reached the knowledge of the queen of England, nor of her ſecretary Cecil, lately advanced to the peerage by the title of lord Burleigh. The firſt ground of ſuſpicion was from an effort of Norfolk, which led to a full diſcovery, from the following circumſtance. Mary propoſing to ſend a ſum of money to her partizans in Scotland, it was entruſted to the care of one Brown, a domeſtic to the duke of Norfolk, in order to be forwarded to the frontiers. This perſon, either ignorant of the ſcheme, or employed as a ſpy in the family, delivered the money to Burleigh, who immediately cauſed Brown, and Hickford the duke's ſecretary, to be apprehended, and to undergo a ſevere trial. Being threatened with torture, Hickford confeſſed that he had ſecreted ſome papers under the matts of the duke's bed; which being found, full evidence appeared againſt his maſter.

Norfolk being apprehended, previous to his knowledge of the confeſſion extorted from his ſecretary, peremptorily denied the charge; but the queen ordered him to the Tower in order to be brought to immediate trial. The biſhop of Roſs had, on ſome ſuſpicion, been taken into cuſtody, before the detection of Norfolk's guilt; and every method was uſed to extort from him what he knew relative to the conſpiracy. He at firſt alledged, in vindication of his non-compliance, the dignity of his character; but, on being told that, as his miſtreſs was no longer a ſovereign, he could not be conſidered as an ambaſſador, and that a diſcovery had been made by Norfolk's ſervants, he revealed the whole plot, and, by his evidence, fully convicted the duke of the charges alledged againſt him.

The diſcovery made by the biſhop corroborated the other circumſtances adduced in proof of Norfolk's guilt, ſo that his trial was fixed for the 12th day of January, and he was condemned by the ſentence of twenty-five peers. But the queen, notwithſtanding his guilt was greatly enhanced by a repetition of the crime, relented much at the iſſue of his trial; and though her miniſters enforced the neceſſity of his being made a public example, to deter others from diſloyal practices, ſhe heſitated, from time to time, putting her hand to the warrant, and thereby protracted the execution of the ſentence.

So deſirous were both the miniſtry in particular, and the parliament in general, for bringing the condemned culprit to condign puniſhment, that the commons preſented an addreſs to her majeſty, praying her to proceed to the execution of the duke, as the moſt neceſſary ſtep for her own preſervation, and the peace of the kingdom; and this ſanction ſhe imagined, when joined to the greatneſs of his guilt, would, in the eyes of the impartial world, juſtify her ſeverity towards that unfortunate nobleman. He ſubmitted to his fate with great courage and reſolution, and though he ſolemnly denied, that he had ever entertained any diſloyal thoughts againſt the queen's authority or perſon, he frankly owned the juſtice of the ſentence by which he ſuffered. His particular friend the earl of Shrewſbury was much affected by his fate, and great part of the populace, who attended his execution, teſtified the utmoſt concern.

In order to quell the tumults and riots which ſtill diſturbed the tranquillity of the kingdom, the queen gave orders for the reparation of the works at the different ſea-ports, keeping the military in train, and having a naval armament ready for immediate ſervice. Nevertheleſs, inſurrections ſtill prevailed in Scotland, and the regent dying ſuddenly about this time, was ſucceeded by the earl of Hertford.

The diſturbances in France, and the rigour and cruelty there exerciſed towards the Hugonots, greatly affected the queen ſo that ſhe was induced to furniſh them ſecretly with ſome aſſiſtance. Beſides employing her influence with the German princes, ſhe permitted a perſon, called Henry Champernon, to raiſe and carry into France, a regiment of gentlemen volunteers, among whom Sir Walter Raleigh, then a young man, began to diſcover the firſt ſpecimen of his military genius.

So powerful was the oppoſition of the proteſtant party, that the French monarch, notwithſtanding the prevalence of his bigotry and prejudice, from motives of convenience, relaxed in his operations, and, by way of temporizing, indulged them with liberty of conſcience in matters of religion. The event, however, proved the fallacy and perfidy of the late proceedings on the part of France, which were deſigned to effect the total extermination of the Hugonots. In order to deceive and decoy their leaders into the ſnare laid for them, Charles offered his ſiſter Margaret in marriage to the prince of Navarre; and the admiral de Chatillon, with all the moſt conſiderable Proteſtants, had repaired to Paris, in order to attend the celebration of the nuptials, which they hoped, would allay the violent animoſities of the two parties. The queen of Navarre was poiſoned by orders from the court; and the admiral was dangerouſly wounded by an aſſaſſin; yet the treacherous monarch artfully protracted the departure of the Hugonots till the eve of St. Bartholomew, the period fixed upon for the perpetration of his bloody deſign.

A. D. 1572. The horror and conſternation excited by the maſſacre of that day are beyond all deſcriptions. Preparation being made for the execution of that infernal project, the ſignal was the ſound of the palace clock at the dead of night; the executioners were the Catholic ſoldiers, headed by the duke of Guiſe, who, like a blood-thirſty fiend, with his rueful band, broke into the receſſes of unſuſpecting innocence, and murdered every Proteſtant that fell in his way, without regard to age, ſex, or condition. The enſuing dawn diſcloſed the ſhocking ſcene: rivers of blood overwhelmed the ſtreeets; the cruel and bigoted king enjoyed the ghaſtly ſight, and the more barbarous queen-mother drove over the bodies of the ſlain, and, with her chariot wheels, daſhed about their blood and brains. Upon this melancholy and memorable occaſion, it was computed, that near ten thouſand Proteſtants fell victims to the diabolical influence of popiſh ſuperſtition and cruelty, which alſo extended to the provinces in general; for, having received the dreadful mandate, they imitated the example of the Pariſians, and with them concurred in the extirpation of the wretched Hugonots.

A. D. 1573. Walſingham, the Engliſh ambaſſador remonſtrated with Charles on the perfidy and cruelty of his late proceedings as repugnant to the laws of God and of nations; but that blood-thirſty monarch endeavoured to apologize, by alledging that the admiral had formed a conſpiracy to aſſaſſinate him, and adding, that he, as well as the whole royal family of France were diſpoſed to live on terms of the ſtricteſt amity with her majeſty of England. Elizabeth affected complacency with this temporizing declaration, admitted the apology, and aſſured him of the continuance of her friendſhip; conſented to a treaty propoſed for a marriage between her, and the duke of Alençon; and the queen of France being delivered of a daughter, Elizabeth ſtood god-mother to the infant, who was baptized by the name of Mary Elizabeth, in the preſence of the earl of Worceſter, as proxy for the queen of England.

But the ſubjects of England could not be ſo eaſily appeaſed, or ſo readily prevailed on to ſtifle their reſentment, as their ſovereign. They propoſed to raiſe a formidable army, to tranſport them into France, and to maintain them ſix months at their own expence; but Elizabeth, fearful of widening the breach between the two parties, refuſed her conſent, and by reſtraining the laudable zeal of her ſubjects, defeated their deſign.

In Scotland diſſentions ſo univerſally prevailed, that the friends of the depoſed queen were compelled to ſubmit to Morton the regent. In the mean time Sir W. Drury marched from Berwick with a reinforcement, and a train of artillery, to aſſiſt the regent in reducing the caſtle of Edinburgh, then in a very defenceleſs ſtate; the governor, with a handful of men, being an officer of long experience and approved valour, made a vigorous defence for three and thirty days; but at length was obliged to ſurrender, though on honourable terms. The queen of England denying to protect him and his adherents as her priſoner, they were delivered up to the mercy of the regent, who ordered the brave governor and his brother to be publickly executed.

A. D. 1574. This year was marked by the death of Charles IX. of France, a monſter of perfidy, cruelty and tyranny, who had glutted his inſatiate thirſt for blood, by the horrid maſſacre of thouſands, and died at the age of 35 years as he lived, execrated by all who were ſuſceptible of the leaſt impreſſions of humanity. The queen-mother aſſumed the regency by virtue of a will, and governed the kingdom, till his brother, the king of Poland, arrived, and ſucceeded him on the throne of France, by the title of Henry III. By this event, Mary loſt the ſupport ſhe had experienced, during the life of Charles. The people of France were divided into two religious factions, actuated by the moſt implacable fury, nor could any means, coercive or perſuaſive, reſtrain their zeal, or introduce a degree of moderation amongſt the inflamed and violent parties.

A. D. 1575. On the acceſſion of Henry III. to the regal dignity of the French dominions, Elizabeth diſpatched an ambaſſador, with congratulatory compliments, and to obtain his aſſent to the articles of the treaty of Troyes, to all of which he immediately acceded. But as he proceeded with rigour towards the Proteſtants, ſhe furniſhed John Caſimer, ſon to the elector Palatine, with a ſum of money to levy a body of German auxiliaries, for the ſervice of the duke of Alençon, who had joined that party.

A. D. 1576. This reinforcement terrified the new king into lenient meaſures, inſomuch that he indulged the Hugonots with a peace on the moſt favourable terms; an accommodation, which though as deceitful on the part of the court as any of the former, gave the higheſt offence to the Catholics; ſo that the duke of Guiſe, without regarding the royal authority, aimed at the total extirpation of the Proteſtants, which muſt naturally have incurred the reſentment of queen Elizabeth.

A. D. 1577. As a proof of approbation of the general conduct of Elizabeth, ſhe obtained a voluntary grant from parliament of a conſiderable ſubſidy, and to gratify this inſtance of loyalty, ſhe renewed the treaty of commerce with Portugal, by which her ſubjects were permitted to trade to Madeira, and the Azores. Martin Forbiſher, an eminent navigator, ſailed this year from Harwich with five ſhips, in order to diſcover a North-weſt paſſage to the Eaſt-Indies, though his laudable efforts were not crowned with the deſired ſucceſs.

The king of France, from a well-grounded perſuaſion of the bigotted attachment of his ſubjects to the popiſh religion, was under a political neceſſity of eſpouſing their cauſe; but being naturally indolent and irreſolute, after ſome ineffectual attempts, he agreed to a new peace, which, like the former, gave no ſatisfaction to the Romaniſts. Each faction, however, continued to prepare for that rupture, which they were ſenſible muſt ſoon happen; and religious diſputes univerſally prevailing, private animoſity produced public diſſention.

An abſurd project was formed by Don John of Auſtria, of firſt ſubduing the Low Countries, and then ſubjecting Great Britain, through a marriage with Mary queen of Scots; but his towering views were ſoon fruſtrated by being compelled to ſign the treaty of Ghent; in conſequence of which the Spaniſh troops were ſent into Italy, and the ſtates were confirmed in the poſſeſſion of their dominions. But the queen of England, apprized of the deſign of the Spaniſh monarch, warmly eſpouſed the proteſtant intereſt, and demanded a particular account of the reſolution of the ſtates-general.

The conduct of Elizabeth was, upon the whole, ſo wiſe and pacific, that it was attended with the bleſſings of peace and plenty to her kingdom in general, though, during the courſe of this year, the nation was alarmed with the fear of a contagion, from an incident at the ſummer aſſizes at Oxford, where where the ſtench brought from the gaol by the priſoners affected the bench, juries, and audience in ſuch a manner, that three hundred perſons died of the infection.

The regent of Scotland having rendered himſelf obnoxious to the people by his tyranny and oppreſſion, it was deemed a matter of ſerious import to the intereſts of England; the queen therefore ſent Randolph into Scotland, on pretence of congratulating the young king on the progreſs he made in his ſtudies; but, in reality, in order to remonſtrate with the regent. But this was far from having the intended effect: he perſiſted in his arrogant and oppreſſive courſe, till Erſkine, the king's governor, and his four preceptors, repreſented his conduct in ſuch a light, as incurred the diſpleaſure of his ſovereign; ſo that to avoid any dangerous conſequences that might enſue, he dropt ſome hints of an inclination to retire, of which the oppoſite party availing themſelves, demanded that diſmiſſion, which he ſeemed ſo readily to offer. James was only in the twelfth year of his age, yet Morton reſigned his authority into the hands of the king, and withdrew from the government. But, diſguſted with an inactive life, he ſoon returned to court, and, though he reſumed not his former title, carried the ſame ſway in all councils of ſtate.

A.D. 1578-9. To avoid the deſigns of the Spaniſh monarch, Elizabeth deemed it expedient to form an alliance with the king of France, and in furtherance of the ſame, affected to approve of the propoſals of marriage that were made her by the duke of Anjou. The French king had ſome time ſince ſent over two ambaſſadors to obviate ſome difficulties that attended the match; and now added a third, one Semier, a man of the moſt inſinuating addreſs and keen penetration. This gentleman ſo wrought on the paſſions of the queen, that ſhe ſeemed to have conceived a warm affection for the perſon of the duke of Anjou, ſo that the earl of Leiceſter, and others, affirmed, ſhe was infatuated by the arts of incantation. Semier, in revenge, endeavoured to ruin Leiceſter in the opinion of the queen; and was the firſt who informed her of his marriage with the widow of the earl of Eſſex.

Elizabeth, who with all her ſagacity, was not exempt from the foibles of woman, was ſo affected by this intimation, that (from motives, whether of jealouſy or reſentment, cannot be aſcertained,) ſhe committed the earl of Leiceſter priſoner to the caſtle of Greenwich, and would have removed him thence to the Tower, had not the earl of Suſſex, though his enemy, generouſly interpoſed in his behalf, and repreſented the injuſtice of puniſhing a ſubject for contracting a lawful marriage. Leiceſter, enraged to find himſelf ſupplanted by an obſcure ſtranger, is ſaid to have employed one Tudor, a life-guard-man, to aſſaſſinate Semier, and the queen, apprized of his reſentment, took the foreign envoy under her immediate protection, and iſſued her royal mandate to ſecure him and his attendants from every kind of perſonal inſult or injury. This extraordinary attention to Semier induced the duke of Anjou to pay a viſit to the queen, but, after a ſhort interview, he abruptly returned to France. The viſit, however, occaſioned ſome literary ſpeculation, and one Stubbs, a ſtudent of Lincoln's-inn, acquired much popularity by a treatiſe he wrote, entitled, "The gulph in "which England will be ſwallowed up by the "French marriage." But the author was ſentenced to loſe his right hand, and undergo a long impriſonment.

About this time there happened ſeveral remarkable events, one Matthew Hammond was executed for blaſphemy at Norwich; the Turky company was eſtabliſhed, by virtue of a treaty with Amurath, ſultan of the Turks; and Sir Nicholas Bacon, keeper of the great ſeal, paid the debt of nature, and was ſucceeded by Thomas Bromley, appointed lord chancellor of England. About the ſame time, died Sir Thomas Greſham, who built the Royal Exchange, and dedicated a large building to the purpoſes of learning, and the encouragement of arts, where he founded lectures on the ſciences of theology, the civil law, medicine, geometry, rhetoric and muſic.

A.D. 1580-1. Elizabeth's eſpouſal of the reformation in the Low Countries produced the reſentment of the Spaniſh monarch, who ſent, under the ſanction of the pope, a body of ſeven hundred Spaniards and Italians into Ireland, where the inhabitants, always mutinous and averſe to the Engliſh government, were now more alienated by religious prejudices, and ready to take up arms on the firſt encouragement. The inſurgents excited ſome diſturbances on their firſt riſing up in arms; but were ſoon quelled by the earl of Ormond, in conjunction with others of her majeſty's officers both naval and military, who, by their vigorous efforts, reduced the mal-contents to their former obedience.

Apprehenſions of commotions were ſoon after raiſed in England, through the inſidious arts of ſome foreign eccleſiaſtics who endeavoured to alienate the affections of the people from their lawful ſovereign. Four of theſe emiſſaries were executed, for publicly aſſerting that the queen had been lawfully depoſed by the pope. To prevent the progreſs of their pernicious doctrines, a proclamation was iſſued, enjoining all perſons, who had children, wards, or relations, in foreign ſeminaries, to deliver their names to the ordinary in ten days; to bring them home in four months; to certify the ordinary of their return; or, in caſe of their refuſing to come home, to withhold from them all ſupplies of money; to forbear relieving, or lodging any prieſt or jeſuit, on pain of being reputed, and puniſhed as favourers of rebels and ſedition. Amongſt thoſe who ſignalized themſelves in the popiſh cauſe, were Edmund Campian, and Robert Parſons; the former publiſhed a treatiſe called the Ten Reaſons, in favour of the church of Rome, and being taken, was executed; but the latter eſcaped to the continent.

To add to the memorable occurrences at this period, Sir Francis Drake returned to his native country, after having circumnavigated the terreſtrial globe. He had amaſſed a large fortune amongſt the Spaniards in the Iſthmus of Panama, and having there got a view of the Pacific ocean, engaged to employ his whole ſubſtance in a new adventure through thoſe ſeas ſo little known at that time to any of the European nations. By the intereſt of Sir Chriſtopher Hatton, a great ſtateſman and favourite of the queen, he procured her conſent and approbation, and ſailed from Plymouth in 1577, with four ſhips well manned and ſtored with proviſions. Sir Francis, in this extraordinary exploit, diſcovered much nautical knowledge and experience; for, having entered the South-ſea by the ſtraits of Magellan, and fearing, if he took the ſame courſe homewards, he might be intercepted cepted by the enemy, he endeavoured to find a paſſage by the north of California, but failing in that attempt, directed his courſe towards the Eaſt-Indies, and doubling the Cape of Good Hope, made good his paſſage to England.

When the king of Spain, by his ambaſſador, demanded reſtitution of the captures, which he alledged were made in a manner contrary to the law of nations, Elizabeth vindicated the conduct of her admiral, by retorting on that monarch, his fomenting rebellions among her ſubjects in Ireland. The treaſure was, however, ſequeſtered, and large ſums paid to a Spaniſh merchant, empowered, by letters of attorney, to ſue for the prizes which Drake had taken without a commiſſion. Philip, however, ſullied his honour, by withholding from the proprietors, that right for which he had contended, and appropriating the whole of what he obtained in reſtitution, to public purpoſes.

The authority of Morton, the late Scottiſh regent, ſoon ceaſed together with his life; for, a charge being preferred againſt him of compaſſing the death of his ſovereign, he was apprehended and impriſoned in the caſtle of Dumbarton, and, notwithſtanding Elizabeth's interceſſion in his behalf, was beheaded at Edinburgh the very day after his conviction. He died unlamented, and ſo little regarded, that after his execution, the populace paſſed the ſcaffold without diſcovering the leaſt tokens of regret.

As a proof that the court of France regarded the projected marriage in a very ſerious light, they diſpatched an embaſſy with the following terms: that in caſe the king of France ſhould die without male iſſue, and the duke of Anjou ſhould have two ſons by this marriage, the eldeſt ſhould ſucceed to the crown of France, and the other aſcend the throne of England; that in caſe of one ſon only, he ſhould inherit both realms, and of every two years reſide eight months in England; that the duke ſhould not fill up any poſt or office in England with a foreigner; that he ſhould not convey the queen out of the kingdom, without the expreſs conſent of the nobles; that he ſhould not tranſport the jewels of the crown to any other country, and that all the ſtrong holds in the kingdom ſhould be garriſoned by Engliſh troops, commanded by Engliſh governors. By a ſeparate article, both parties agreed, that the conſummation of the marriage ſhould be deferred, till ſome particular and private concerns were ſettled by conſent of parties, and with the concurrence of the French king.

A ſhort time after the duke of Anjou arrived at the court of London, and was received by the queen with demonſtrations of cordial affection. On the anniverſary of her coronation, ſhe, with her own hand, fixed a ring upon his finger, in token of pledging her troth, according to the contract. She even proceeded ſo far as to take up the pen to ſubſcribe the articles; but at this critical juncture, ſhe ſuddenly with-held the pen, and appealing to the lords of the council, demanded their opinion as to the conſequences of the intended marriage, which ſhe thought would terminate in her death, and afterwards prove a ſource of diſſention as to the ſucceſſion to the throne of England.

The diſappointed duke, after a private conference with his intended royal bride, retired with the moſt poignant mortification, and as a proof of his reſentment, daſhed the ring with violence on the ground, exclaiming againſt the fickleneſs of the queen and inconſtancy of the Engliſh people. To compenſate, however, the diſappointment in ſome degree, his grace was amuſed with divers public entertainments during a reſidence of about three months, and on his departure for Paris, liberally rewarded for the trouble of his viſit.

A. D. 1582. A ſtatute paſſed this ſeſſion of parliament, declaring all thoſe guilty of high treaſon, who ſhould attempt to alienate the ſubjects from their fidelity to the queen, or perſuade them to abandon the eſtabliſhed religion.

The young king of Scotland, through the undue influence of the earls of Lenox and Arran, who had inſtigated him to the moſt unpopular proceedings, incurred a general odium; ſo that on his return from Athol with but few attendants, he was ſeized by the earl of Marr, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, and conveyed to Ruthven caſtle, the reſidence of the earl of Gowry, who had taken part with the two earls from a miſrepreſentation of circumſtances.

A. D. 1583. As the moſt powerful means of affecting the releaſe of her captive ſon, the queen of Scots applied to Elizabeth, conjuring her in the moſt affecting terms to exert her influence in behalf of majeſty in diſtreſs. So pathetic was her expoſtulation, that the queen deſired her council to deliberate on the conditions, on which Mary ſhould be releaſed. They accordingly drew up ſeveral articles, which were preſented to the queen of Scotland; but this treaty, like all the former, proved abortive.

In the cloſe of this year, Elizabeth ſent Walſingham her ſecretary into Scotland, under pretence of eſtabliſhing a more intimate union between the two kingdoms; but in reality to ſtrengthen the Engliſh faction, and ſound the abilities of the young king, who being endowed with politeneſs and affability, ingratiated himſelf with the ſecretary; inſomuch, that from the favourable account he tranſmitted to his miſtreſs, James was enhanced in her regard, and afterwards treated in a manner more becoming his dignity.

A. D. 1584-5. The ſtates of Holland ſuſtained conſiderable loſs in the death of the prince of Orange, who was treacherouſly ſhot by an infamous Burgundian, and in conſequence thereof the duke of Parma obtained great advantage over them. His eldeſt ſon Philip being in the hands of the king of Spain, and educated in the Romiſh religion, the ſtates conferred the government of Holland and Zealand upon his ſecond ſon Maurice; and the prince of Parma, availing himſelf of this circumſtance, inveſted Antwerp; ſo that the ſtates, thus involved in complicated diſtreſs, as their laſt reſource, ſent embaſſadors to England, ſoliciting the protection of Elizabeth, and even offering to ſubmit themſelves to her diſpoſal; but Elizabeth prudently declined the offer, and promiſed to aſſiſt them with a very conſiderable body of forces, provided ſome towns were put into her hands by way of ſecurity for payment.

To perfect, if poſſible, the important and much deſired work of reformation, ſeveral ſtatutes were enacted in the month of November, againſt jeſuits and popiſh prieſts, which, though rigorous, were abſolutely neceſſary for the ſecurity of the proteſtant intereſt. William Parry, a Catholic, had obtained the queen's pardon for a capital crime, and having got leave to travel, withdrew to Milan, where he openly profeſſed his religion, which he had artfully concealed while he remained in England. On his return he was examined, when he confeſſed he had been perſuaded to aſſaſſinate the queen, by Morgan, an Engliſh refugee in France; that he had procured admittance into her majeſty's preſence, by diſcovering a feigned conſpiracy; but being ſtruck with remorſe, he laid aſide his dagger and treaſonable deſigns; till happening to read a book written by cardinal Allen, who affirmed it was laudable to kill excommunicated princes, he had reſolved to execute his former purpoſe. This fanatical regicide ſuffered the puniſhment due to his horrid intention, and was publicly executed as a traitor againſt his lawful ſovereign.

The Spaniſh monarch had proſecuted his military operations with ſuch ſucceſs againſt the United States, that Elizabeth, to curb his ambition by checking the progreſs of his conqueſts, engaged, by a treaty, to ſuccour them with five thouſand infantry, and one thouſand cavalry, under the command of an Engliſh general; and to pay theſe troops during the war, on condition of being reimburſed, after the peace ſhould be re-eſtabliſhed.

The ſame treaty alſo ſtipulated, that Elizabeth ſhould be put in poſſeſſion of Fluſhing, and the Brille, as ſecurity for the payment; that the Engliſh governors of thoſe places ſhould have no juriſdiction over the inhabitants; that the towns ſhould be reſtored to the eſtates on the payment of the money; that the Engliſh general, and two other perſons nominated by the queen, ſhould have places in the aſſembly of ſtates; and that neither peace nor truce ſhould be made without the mutual conſent of Elizabeth and the confederates; that in caſe of the queen's ſending a fleet to ſea, they ſhould join it with a like number of ſhips, to be commanded by the Engliſh admiral; and that a reciprocal commerce ſhould be maintained between the ſubjects of England, and the United States.

The queen having embarked thus far in her engagements, in oppoſition to the efforts of Philip of Spain, was determined to transfer the ſeat of war to America, the grand ſource of that monarch's wealth as well as power. Purſuant to that deſign, a fleet of twenty ſail was fitted out, and the command given to Sir Francis Drake, who, in his paſſage, took St. Jago, one of the Cape de Verde iſlands, and afterwards reduced Carthagena, and St. Domingo. In his return through the gulph of Florida, he burnt St. Auguſtine and St. Helena, and touching at Virginia, took on board a number of people, who, having been ſent by Sir Walter Raleigh to plant that colony, were greatly reduced in point of number, and in a ſtarving condition. Theſe coloniſts moſt chearfully embarked on board the Engliſh ſhips, and brought over with them a cargo of tobacco, a plant before unknown in this country.

So attached was the queen to the intereſt of the reformation, that ſhe not only eſpouſed the cauſe of the United States againſt the encroachments of the Spaniſh monarch; but alſo ſuccoured the Hugonots in France, headed by the prince of Condé, who, in conjunction with the king of Navarre, aſſembled his troops, in order to withſtand the aſſaults of the duke of Guiſe, who ſtrenuouſly eſpouſed the catholic cauſe, but without ſucceſs; on the contrary, he was ſuddenly ſurrounded by the enemy, and eſcaping with great difficulty, repaired to the court of England, where he was treated with all due honors.

A. D. 1586. The United States, to conciliate the eſteem of the queen of England, ſhewed very ſingular reſpect to the earl of Leiceſter, on his arrival in Holland in quality of commander in chief of the Engliſh auxiliaries. They not only honoured him with the moſt diſtinguiſhed titles, but even with tokens of royalty itſelf. Theſe proceedings, inſtead of meeting with the approbation of the queen excited her diſpleaſure, as ſhe conjectured their aim was to engage her further than ſhe choſe to embark in their intereſts. The States had promiſed themſelves important ſervices from the abilities of Leiceſter; but they were grievouſly diſappointed, their enemies extending their conqueſts, in ſpite of all his endeavours; and to add to their misfortunes, Sir Philip Sidney, his nephew, was ſlain in a ſkirmiſh between a party of the Spaniſh and Engliſh troops, to the regret not only of his uncle, but the whole army, by whom he was univerſally reſpected as a moſt amiable and exalted character. His name has been immortalized by the writings as well of cotemporary as of ſucceeding authors.

Having been baffled in all his attempts, the earl took leave of the United States and embarked for England. The queen, convinced of the neceſſity of being on friendly terms with her northern neighbours, diſpatched an ambaſſador to king James with propoſals for an offenſive and defenſive league between the two nations, as a mutual ſecurity againſt the devices of the catholic princes; and a treaty was concluded on the following terms: that both powers ſhould defend the proteſtant religion againſt all its enemies in either kingdom; that if either of the powers ſhould be attacked, the other ſhould give no aſſiſtance either directly or indirectly to the aggreſſor; that in caſe England ſhould be invaded at a diſtance from Scotland, James ſhould furniſh the queen with a thouſand cavalry and five thouſand infantry; and that in caſe Scotland ſhould be attacked in the ſame manner, the queen ſhould aſſiſt James with three thouſand horſe, and double that number of infantry; but in caſe of England's being invaded in any place within ſixty miles of the borders, the king of Scotland ſhould join Elizabeth's army with all his forces; that the two powers ſhould mutually deliver up, or at leaſt expel from their dominions, the rebellious ſubjects of each other; that neither party ſhould conclude any treaty to the prejudice of theſe articles, without the other's conſent; that this treaty ſhould be ratified on both ſides by letters patent; that it ſhould not derogate from former treaties made between the two crowns, or from thoſe made by either crown with other potentates, except in what concerned religion; with regard to which, this league, offenſive and defenſive, ſhould remain firm and inviolable; that this treaty ſhould be confirmed by the ſtates of Scotland, when the king ſhould have attained the age of five and twenty, and in like manner, it ſhould receive the ſanction of the Engliſh and Iriſh parliaments.

Notwithſtanding this very politic treaty with James of Scotland, and the ſecurity Elizabeth might hope to derive againſt the attempts of foreign enemies, ſhe was conſtantly annoyed by the machinations of domeſtic foes. Popiſh emiſſaries were continually plotting againſt her, and ſome bigotted devotees, at the inſtance of their prieſt, had actually engaged to take her off. A number of miſcreants were hired for this horrid purpoſe, by one Babington, a yeoman of Derbyſhire; but through the vigilance of ſecretary Walſingham, they were apprehended at Harrow in the diſguiſe of peaſants, and delivered up to the proper officers. They confeſſed the conſpiracy, pleaded guilty at their trials, and were executed to the number of fourteen teen in St. Giles's fields, the place of their rendezvous.

As the queen of Scots was ſuſpected by Elizabeth of privately abetting theſe inſidious attempts on her life, it was determined to bring her to immediate trial; but as Mary, through confinement, had received no intelligence of the diſcovery of Bablington's plot, it was with equal ſurprize and concern, that ſhe was conducted to Fotheringay caſtle in Northamptonſhire, which was to be the laſt ſtage of her mortal pilgrimage. Her two ſecretaries, Nau, a Frenchman, and Curle, a Scotchman, were arreſted and committed to priſon; and, on examination, are ſaid to have owned a correſpondence with Babington; that their miſtreſs dictated the letters in French, which Curle tranſlated into Engliſh, and then they were written in cyphers. Copies officially atteſted were tranſmitted to the French court, to criminate Mary on the one hand, and of courſe exculpate Elizabeth on the other.

A proviſional law having paſſed with immediate reference to this long determined event, it was deemed expedient to try Mary not on the common ſtatutes of treaſon, but by the preciſe letter of this proviſional law. Accordingly a commiſſion was iſſued to forty peers and five judges, or the major part of them, to try and paſs ſentence on Mary, daughter and heireſs of James V. king of Scots, commonly called queen of Scots. Thirty-ſix of theſe commiſſioners arriving at Fotheringay, preſented her with a letter from Elizabeth, commanding her to ſubmit to a trial. She peruſed the letter with great compoſure; but expreſſed ſurprize, that Elizabeth ſhould command her as a ſubject; ſhe declared that the laws of England were unknown to her; that ſhe was deſtitute of council; nor could ſhe conceive who were to be her peers; that ſhe was even robbed of her own papers, and no perſon permitted to plead her cauſe.

The commiſſioners would by no means admit of the plea drawn either from royalty, or captivity; Mary, therefore, incenſed at this derogation from her dignity, declared, that ſooner than bow the knee as a ſubject to any earthly potentate, ſhe would ſuffer a thouſand deaths; yet ſhe was ready to vindicate herſelf in a full and free parliament. She exhorted them to conſult their own conſciences, and remember, that the theatre of the world was far more extenſive than the kingdom of England. At length, wrought on by an obſervation, hinting the ſuſpicion ſhe would incur by avoiding a trial, ſhe agreed to appear, if they would diſpenſe with her non-admittance of ſubjection; till at length ſhe was conſtrained on terms of no effect and merely formal, to comply with the injunction of the commiſſioners.

After theſe preparatory meaſures, the ſolemn ſcene was began, and the council for the crown opened the charge againſt the arraigned queen; when, in order to aggravate her guilt, Babington's plot was adduced amongſt other circumſtances. She peremptorily denied that charge in particular, and, on his confeſſion being read, wherein mention was made of the earls of Arundel and Northumberland, ſhe ſhed a flood of tears, exclaiming, "Alas! what has the noble houſe of Howard ſuf-"fered for my ſake!"

She frankly acknowledged ſhe had exerted her utmoſt efforts to regain her liberty, but poſitively denied ſhe had ever harboured a thought againſt the life of Elizabeth. This, indeed, was the principal article of the impeachment, and the only one which could apologize for the violent meaſures that were taken againſt her: in order, therefore, to prove the point, the written evidence of her two ſecretaries were produced; but ſhe affirmed, they had been either intimidated or bribed into a confeſſion of what was abſolutely falſe; ſhe ſaid ſhe was not to be convicted but by her own words or hand writing; ſhe deſired ſhe might be confronted with her ſecretaries; demanded a copy of her proteſt, an advocate to plead her cauſe, and a fair hearing in full parliament.

But as it appeared from many caſes in point, that theſe demands in matters of high treaſon were inadmiſſible, they were urged in vain by the unfortunate royal culprit. The court, after having ſat ſeveral days, adjourned to the twenty-fifth of October, at the Star-chamber in Weſtminſter, when all the commiſſioners appeared except Shrewſbury and Warwick. The different papers and copies in ſupport of the reſpective charges being produced, and formally atteſted by the depoſitions of witneſſes in court, immediate reference was had to the affair of Babington, and ſentence was thereupon pronounced againſt the queen of Scots, for having been privy to Babington's plot; and imagined divers devices againſt the life of the queen, contrary to the form of a ſtatute ſpecified in the commiſſion.

To preclude the young king from any diſagreeable conſequences that might enſue from this tranſaction, a declaration was iſſued, importing, "that "the ſentence did not derogate from James, king "of Scotland, in his title and honour, but that "he was in the ſame rank and right, as if the ſaid "ſentence had never been pronounced."

The queen's moſt ſanguine wiſhes were now gratified in the conviction and ſentence of her unfortunate rival Mary queen of Scots; notwithſtanding which, with her uſual diſſimulation, ſhe affected to diſapprove of the meaſures adopted by parliament, ſo that when they addreſſed her that the ſentence might be put in execution, ſhe intreated them to wave a requeſt ſo repugnant to her inclination; and, on their renewing their inſtances, affected to amuſe them with ambiguous replies.

Averſe, however, as ſhe pretended to be to the execution, ſhe at length complied with the requeſt of parliament, to the publication of the ſentence pronounced againſt Mary; which being done according to uſual form, two perſons were ſent to notify it to that princeſs, and exhort her to prepare for approaching death. She received the meſſage without the leaſt ſign of emotion, and, with a chearful countenance, thanked God, that her toilſome pilgrimage would ſoon have an end. She was then diveſted of all badges of royalty, an indignity of which ſhe complained to Elizabeth; ſhe deſired ſhe might not be put to death in private; that her body, after her ſuffering, might be ſent to France; that her ſervants might enjoy the ſmall legacies ſhe ſhould bequeath, and be permitted to depart unmoleſted to their own country.

But the princes of Europe could not behold theſe tranſactions of the Engliſh parliament with an indifferent eye, and therefore united their reſpective intereſts in endeavouring to protract at leaſt the ſentence pronounced againſt the queen of Scots. Even Henry III. of France, notwithſtanding his known averſion to the houſe of Guiſe, took upon him to interpoſe in her behalf, and to appear in defence of the common rights of royalty. Bellievre, his ambaſſador, being admitted to the queen's queen's preſence, remonſtrated on the death of Mary, as an outrage againſt the law of nature, and the dictates of humanity, as well as a flagrant inſult to every ſovereign in particular. The peremptory behaviour of the French ambaſſador induced the queen to demand, if he was authorized by his maſter to uſe ſuch language. He replied in the affirmative, and avowed his aſſertion in writing. She then laconically told him, that ſhe ſhould tranſmit her reſolution by her own ambaſſador; and Bellievre departed without effecting the buſineſs on which he was ſent.

A. D. 1587. Neither was any great regard paid by Elizabeth to the entreaties or remonſtrances of James, who was no ſooner informed of the trial and condemnation of his mother, than he diſpatched Sir William Keith, gentleman of his bed-chamber, to London with a letter written with his own hand, conjuring Elizabeth to ſpare the life of a beloved parent; otherwiſe he ſhould think himſelf indiſpenſably bound, by every tie of duty and honour, to revenge her death; and intreating her to defer the execution of the ſentence, until he could ſend an ambaſſador with ſuch propoſals as he hoped might prove ſatisfactory. The execution was deferred with much reluctance on the part of Elizabeth, and the maſter of Gray, and Sir Robert Melville, arriving at length in London, propoſed that their king ſhould give the chief of his nobility, as hoſtages, for the future good behaviour of his mother, who ſhould reſign her right of ſucceſſion to her ſon, and this reſignation ſhould be guaranteed by foreign princes. The queen rejected theſe propoſals with the moſt ſcornful diſdain, and when the ambaſſadors importuned her to defer the execution for a week, ſhe vehemently replied, "No; not for an hour."

After theſe various applications, entreaties and remonſtrances had paſſed in all their different forms, Elizabeth ſent for Daviſon, who had lately been made ſecretary, and commanded him to draw out a warrant for the execution of Mary queen of Scots, which having ſigned, ſhe deſired it might be carried to the chancellor, in order to have the ſeal affixed to it. Next day ſhe ſent two meſſengers ſucceſſively to interdict the mandate of the preceding day, and when ſhe was told the warrant had already paſſed the great ſeal, ſhe affected the utmoſt concern, and aſked, what need there was for ſuch expedition? The order for the execution was directed to the earls of Shrewſbury, Derby, Kent, and Cumberland, who were ordered to have the queen of Scots beheaded in their preſence. Thoſe noblemen, therefore, repaired to Fotheringay caſtle, and, being introduced to Mary, acquainted her with the nature of their commiſſion, and required her to prepare for death the next morning.

Mary bore this alarming information with ſerenity and compoſure; ſhe declared that ſhe could not be induced to believe that Elizabeth would have conſented to her death; then laying her hand on a New Teſtament which happened to be on the table, ſhe ſolemnly proteſted, that ſhe had never deviſed, or conſented to any deſign againſt the perſon of Elizabeth. She deſired with peculiar earneſtneſs, that now, in her laſt moments, her confeſſor might be permitted to attend her, the denial of which argued an equal want both of religion and humanity, as ſuch indulgence is granted to the moſt infamous delinquents. Mention being made of Babington, ſhe ſolemnly diſclaimed all knowledge of the conſpiracy; and the revenge of her wrongs ſhe reſigned into the hands of the Almighty Judge of the world.

The buſineſs neceſſary previous to her diſſolution ſhe ſettled with deliberation and accuracy. She wrote her will with her own hand, diſtributing her money, jewels, and cloaths among her ſervants, according to their rank and merit. Early the next morning ſhe retired to her cloſet, and ſpent a conſiderable time in devotion. Her whole deportment, upon this affecting occaſion, was ſolemn, and becoming her exalted rank. When the high ſheriff entered her chamber and told her that her hour was come, ſhe replied, that ſhe was ready, and bidding adieu to her weeping ſervants, followed him with a ſerene and compoſed aſpect. She was attired in a mourning habit, but with an elegance and ſplendor which ſhe had long laid aſide. An Agnus Dei hung by a diamond chain at her neck, her beads at her girdle, and in her hand ſhe carried a crucifix of ivory. In paſſing through a hall adjoining to her apartments, Sir Andrew Melville, maſter of her houſhold, meeting her, fell on his knees, and ſhedding a flood of tears, lamented his misfortune, in being deſtined to carry the news of her unhappy fate to Scotland, "Weep "not, (ſaid the wretched queen) but rather rejoice, "that Mary Stuart will ſoon be freed from all her "cares. Tell my friends, that I die conſtant in "my religion, and firm in my fidelity towards "Scotland and France. God forgive them, who "have thirſted after my blood. Thou, O God! "who art truth itſelf, and perfectly underſtandeſt "the inward thoughts of my heart, knoweſt how "ſincerely I have deſired an union between the "realms of England and Scotland. Commend "me to my ſon, and aſſure him I have done no-"thing prejudicial to the ſtate or crown of Scot-"land. Admoniſh him to perſevere in amity "with the queen of England; and ſee that thou "do him faithful ſervice."

When ſhe ſurveyed the executioner and the implements of death, together with all the apparatus and appendages to the approaching ſcene, exhibiting a diſmal, melancholy view, ſhe gave evident proofs, by the ſerenity of her countenance, of compoſure and reſignation to her fate. The ſurrounding ſpectators could not refrain the tears of ſympathy, now compaſſionating the fate of a princeſs endowed with accompliſhments to adorn her dignified ſtation, and conciliate the affections of her ſubjects, and the regard of mankind in general. When her warrant was read, to which ſhe liſtened with a careleſs air, like one whoſe attention was engroſſed by thoughts of another nature, the dean of Peterborough repeated a long exhortation, which ſhe twice interrupted, deſiring him to forbear, as ſhe was firmly reſolved to die in the Roman catholic religion. When the dean ceaſed to exhort, ſhe prayed firſt in Latin, from the office of the Virgin Mary; and afterwards in Engliſh, fervently recommending the church, her ſon, and queen Elizabeth, to the protection of the Almighty. When her acts of devotion were finiſhed, ſhe gave the neceſſary orders for preparations to her female attendants, and chid them for want of reſolution upon that trying occaſion, bidding them ceaſe their womaniſh lamentations, for now the period of her ſorrows was come. To her male attendants ſhe exhibited the ſame proofs of courage and ſerenity, and bade them adieu with a placid countenance. With equal magnanimity ſhe cordially forgave all concerned in her death, and after ſolemnly declaring her innocence as to the crime of compaſſing the death of queen Elizabeth, either by direct or indirect means, gave the token to the executioner, who at one ſtroke put a period to her exiſtence.

Thus fell, by an untimely fate, Mary queen of Scots, in the forty-fifth year of her age, having paſſed almoſt nineteen of the ſame in a ſtate of captivity. Her perſon was attracting and her manners engaging; which cauſed her to be reſpected by the one ſex, and admired by the other. As it is the lot of humanity to err, and the beſt characters are not exempt from foibles, her womaniſh frailties in the inſtance of her paſſion for Darnley, in the judgment of candor, will be deemed venal. With reſpect to that part of her conduct, which was the effect of her attachment to the doctrines and principles of the Romiſh church, it muſt be imputed to the prejudices of education, and that unlimited ſway which furious zeal and blind bigotry have maintained over the moſt liberal and enlightened minds. Her crimes were more than compenſated by her ſufferings in this ſtate of exiſtence, which will ever ſully the character of queen Elizabeth. Succeeding monarchs will do well to ſhun her foibles, and imitate her virtues.

The queen of England was no ſooner informed of the death of Mary, than ſhe affected the utmoſt aſtoniſhment, and moſt extravagant ſorrow. She commanded the members of the council to quit her preſence, and Daviſon the ſecretary to be proſecuted in the Star-chamber. She diſpatched her relation Robert Cary with a letter to the king of Scotland, expreſſing her grief at the lamentable accident, which (ſhe ſaid) happened contrary to her intention; and profeſſing the warmeſt regard and affection for him and his concerns.

The young king, who was neither ſo ſhort-ſighted, nor untaught in the ſchool of human nature, as not to diſcern the egregious fallacy of Elizabeth's words and actions, diſcovered a juſt reſentment for a long oppreſſive and cruel treatment of his royal parent, and refuſed her ambaſſador acceſs to his perſon. The Scottiſh nation in general eſpouſed his cauſe, vowing vengeance againſt Elizabeth, and offering to ſtand by him at the hazard of their lives and fortunes. James alſo, to confirm his reſolution, ordered his ambaſſadors to be recalled; however, through the influence of ſome of his courtiers, he was diſſuaded from commencing hoſtilities. In the interim, Lord Hunſdon arrived with a commiſſion from the Engliſh court, and James, through his arts, relaxed both in his reſentment and military operations.

A. D. 1588. Philip of Spain, as was natural to ſuppoſe, availed himſelf of theſe commotions, and was preparing for an invaſion of England, of which the queen receiving intelligence, ſhe ſent Sir Francis Drake with a fleet of ſhips to deſtroy his veſſels, and intercept his proviſions. This active commander ſunk two gallies in the bay of Cadiz, took, burned, and deſtroyed an hundred veſſels loaded with proviſions and ammunition, together with a large galleon, loaded with merchandize. He then reduced three forts at Cape St. Vincent, and deſtroyed all the ſmall craft along the coaſt as far as Caſcaes at the mouth of the Tagus, where the marquis of Santa Cruz lay with his ſquadron; but he could not bring him to an engagement.

The Spaniſh monarch, determined to fulminate the anathemas of the church, as well as military thunder againſt the Engliſh queen, procured from the pope a conſecrated banner, with freſh bulls for excommunicating Elizabeth as an heretic, publiſhing a cruſade againſt her, and abſolving all her ſubjects from the oath of allegiance. He pretended to be the next catholic heir to the crown of England, as a deſcendant from the two daughters of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaſter, and determined to land his forces at the mouth of the Thames, in the neighbourhood of London.

Fired with religious as well as military enthuſiaſm, he equipped a moſt formidable armament, conſiſting of one hundred and thirty ſail of ſhips, manned with nineteen thouſand two hundred and ninety ſoldiers, eight thouſand two hundred and fifty ſeamen, and two hundred and eighty gallies, mounted with two thouſand three hundred and forty pieces of cannon.

The queen of England, apprized of this vigorous effort, ſtrenuouſly exerted herſelf in the equipment of an armament to ward off the fatal blow that was generally apprehended from the ſuperior force of this formidable armada. She made choice of officers of approved valour and experience. Lord Howard of Effingham was appointed lord high admiral of England, and ſent with a ſtrong ſquadron to the weſtward, where he was joined by Sir Francis Drake, now appointed vice admiral. She ordered lord Henry Seymour to cruize along the coaſt of Flanders, with forty Engliſh and Flemiſh ſhips, to prevent the prince of Parma from putting to ſea with the Spaniſh troops under his command.

Detached bodies were poſted along the different coaſts, to give alarm in caſe of an attempt of invaſion; while the main army, headed by lord Hunſdon, was appointed as a guard to the queen, who endeavoured to animate her troops by appearing perſonally on horſeback at Tilbury, and addreſſing herſelf to them in a ſpirited harangue.

In order the more effectually to fruſtrate the attempts of Philip, Elizabeth wiſely ſecured the friendſhip, and obtained the aſſiſtance of the neighbouring ſtates. With this view, ſhe ſent new inſtructions to her ſeveral ambaſſadors; and by her friends, wrought upon James to oppoſe the popiſh party, and the hoſtile intentions of the Spaniſh monarch, whoſe mighty armament was fully equipped for the important deſtination by the beginning of May; but fortunately for the Engliſh, the marquis of Santa Cruz, admiral and commander in chief, was ſuddenly taken off by a fever at the critical time on which they had received ſailing orders. Santa Cruz was ſucceeded in the command by the duke of Medina Sidonia, a nobleman of very high deſcent, but wholly inexperienced in maritime matters.

The Engliſh took care to avail themſelves of this fortuitous circumſtance in augmenting their armament; at length, however, the Spaniſh fleet, elated with aſſurance of victory, ſailed from Liſbon, but next day was encountered by a violent ſtorm, which diſperſed the ſhips, ſunk ſome of the ſmalleſt, and obliged the reſt to take ſhelter in the Groyne, where they put in to repair.

The Engliſh admiral, on receiving intelligence of this accident, gave the ſignal to the fleet for weighing, and immediately made for Spain, hoping from the loſs the enemy had ſuſtained through ſtreſs of weather, to annoy them in their harbours; but the wind ſhifting, he returned to Plymouth, on ſuſpicion that they might avail themſelves of this opportunity, to enter the Engliſh channel, while he was abſent. Grand VICTORY over the formidable SPANISH ARMADA, by Lord Howard, the Admirals Sr. Francis Drake, Forbisher &c. in the Year 1588.

to port, the Spaniſh fleet was ſeen off the Lizard on the coaſt of Cornwall.

Lord Howard had juſt cleared the harbour, when he obſerved the Spaniſh Armada advancing in full ſail towards him, drawn up in the line of battle. He ſtrictly enjoined his officers to avoid a cloſe engagement with the Spaniards, as the ſize of their ſhips and the number of their men would be a diſadvantage to the Engliſh; but ordered them to cannonade at a diſtance, and to watch every opportunity of intercepting any of their ſcattered veſſels. As the Armada proceeded up the channel, the Engliſh hung upon their rear, and annoyed them by an inceſſant firing. This manœuvre produced a very good effect on the part of the Engliſh, who, being animated by the proſpect of that honour, which they muſt receive from the conqueſt of this tremendous Armada, deemed invincible, ſeveral noblemen and perſons of fortune diſtinguiſhed themſelves by fitting out ſhips at their own expence, and engaging as volunteers in the ſervice of their country. Among theſe were the earls of Oxford, Northumberland, and Cumberland, Sir Thomas, and Sir Robert Cecil, and the famous Sir Walter Raleigh.

The Spaniſh admiral had by this time brought to an anchor off Calais, in order to obtain the aſſiſtance of the duke of Parma; but this deſign was happily defeated by means of a ſcheme concerted by lord Howard, in order to prevent the enemy's fleet from joining. He cauſed eight of his ſmaller ſhips to be filled with all kinds of combuſtible materials, and ſent them into the midſt of the Armada. The Spaniards immediately cut their cabels and put to ſea, and the Engliſh attacked them next morning while they were endeavouring to muſter off Gravelines. The engagement began at four in the morning, and laſted till ſix in the evening, during which the Engliſh, who had both wind and tide in their favour, ſunk and drove aſhore thirteen ſale of the line, took one of their galleons, and another fell into the hands of the Zealanders. The damages ſuſtained by ſtreſs of weather, as well as loſſes in the late action, together with want of proviſions, induced the Spaniards to make for their own coaſt; but as the winds were againſt them in the paſſage through the channel, they propoſed to ſail north about, and return to Spain by way of the Orkney Iſlands. The Engliſh chaced them during ſome time, and had not their ammunition fallen ſhort, they had compelled the whole Armada to ſurrender at diſcretion.

This concluſion of the enterprize would have been more advantageous to the Engliſh; but the event proved fatal to the Spaniards. A violent tempeſt overtook their fleet after it had paſſed the Orkney's; ſeventeen of their ſhips, having five thouſand men on board, were caſt away on the Weſtern-iſlands, and the coaſt of Ireland. The people of Spain were filled with conſternation at the loſs of upwards of half the fleet, and the advantages obtained by the Engliſh. Of the whole Armada, through various accidents, fifty-three ſhips only returned to Spain, and thoſe in a very ſhattered condition; ſo that through the diſadvantages of wind and tide, and the terrible loſs the Spaniards ſuſtained by diſtreſs of weather, their mighty hopes fell to the ground, and ſucceſs upon the whole declared in favour of the Engliſh.

Thus terminated this mighty enterprize, which had been preparing for three years, had exhauſted the revenues of Spain, filled the Catholics with the moſt ſanguine hopes, and the Proteſtants with the moſt terrible apprehenſions. A public thankſgiving on this occaſion was ordered by Elizabeth, who repaired, in great ſolemnity, to St. Paul's, to perform that ſacred duty; and eleven ſtandards taken from the enemy were hung up in the cathedral, as trophies of the ſucceſs of the Engliſh. The queen beſtowed rewards on many of her officers, who had ſo nobly exerted themſelves in defence of their country; and the whole kingdom was one continued ſcene of joy.

But amidſt theſe great and unexpected ſucceſſes, ſhe could not conceal an extreme concern for the loſs of her unworthy favourite Leiceſter, who died of a fever, at the very time in which the queen's patent was making out for appointing him her viceroy of the kingdom of Ireland. This nobleman poſſeſſed no merit political nor military, yet the queen, from private attachment, advanced him to ſuch points of government, as expoſed her own foibles, and might have proved deſtructive to the nation in general.

A. D. 1589. A political ſcheme was now diſcovered between ſome noblemen and the duke of Parma, who had ſupplied them with a ſum of money to excite commotions in Scotland; but the king immediately aſſembling a powerful army, they were obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion. In the mean time, the Scottiſh monarch had concluded a treaty of marriage with the princeſs Anne, daughter to the king of Denmark. James repaired thither in October, attended by a numerous retinue; the nuptials were ſolemnized at Upſlo, and they paſſed the winter in Denmark.

The ſucceſs obtained by the Engliſh, and the adverſe fate of Spain, in the defeat of their mighty armament, excited freſh commotions in that kingdom. Don Antonio, prior of Crato, a natural ſon of one of the royal family of Portugal, had trumped up a claim to the crown of that kingdom, and had ſolicited the aſſiſtance of Elizabeth in aſſerting his pretenſions. The queen gave her conſent, and Sir Francis Drake, and Sir John Norris, undertook to eſpouſe his cauſe as private adventurers. Thoſe officers having embarked about twelve thouſand ſailors and ſoldiers, ſailed from Plymouth in April, and landing near Ferrol, inveſted Corunna. They took the lower town by aſſault, but the upper part, ſituated on a rock, they could not reduce for want of artillery. The count d'Androda marching to its relief with a body of eight thouſand men, they raiſed the ſiege, and attacked him at the bridge of Brugas, where he was defeated. But theſe adventurers failed in their attempt, through an epidemical diſtemper, which obliged them to reimbark their forces and return to England.

Notwithſtanding this failure, the earl of Cumberland, the ſpring following, undertook another expedition, and ſailing to the Azores took and demoliſhed the caſtle of Fayal, and brought home a great number of valuable prizes.

At the end of the year died Sir Francis Walſingham, ſecretary of ſtate, a miniſter not more diſtinguiſhed by the abilities of his head than the virtues of his heart. Though he had paſſed through many great and lucrative employments, ſuch was his integrity and generoſity, that he died poor, and was interred in a private manner. He left only one daughter, firſt married to Philip Sidney, and afterwards to the earl of Eſſex. A kind of general mortality enſued amongſt the moſt able and faithful ſervants of the crown; the principal of theſe were, Ambroſe Dudley, earl of War-

Warwick, Sir Thomas Randolph, chancellor of the exchequer, Sir Thomas Crofts, comptroller of the houſehold, George Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury, and Thomas lord Wentworth, formerly governor of Calais, and laſt, though not leaſt either in ability and integrity, Sir Chriſtopher Hatton, chancellor of England, and of the univerſity of Oxford.

As the trade to the Eaſt Indies was juſtly deemed the ſource of Spaniſh wealth, Elizabeth determined to attack them in that quarter; for which purpoſe ſhe diſpatched a fleet of ſeven ſail of the line to intercept the India ſhips, but this ſcheme was fruſtrated by the precaution of the Spaniſh monarch, who had iſſued orders for a convoy of fifty ſail to protect them.

Lord Howard, in obedience to orders, ſtood out to ſea with five ſail, but the rear-admiral's ſhip being unfortunately ſurrounded by the enemy, he atchieved prodigies of valour in its defence, till being overpowered by numbers, and having himſelf received many wounds, he gave orders for blowing her up, to prevent her falling into the hands of the enemy: this raſh order was, however, countermanded, and the gallant admiral Grenville died of his wounds in a few days.

A. D. 1592. The queen, from her attachment to the proteſtant cauſe, ſtill continued to protect the Hugonots in France, where ſhe ſent them a conſiderable reinforcement, and iſſuing a proclamation, forbidding her ſubjects from aſſiſting the leaguers, or the king of Spain, with corn, ammunition, or naval ſtores. Fifteen ſhips of war were ſent to annoy the Spaniards in the Weſt Indies, under the commund of Sir Walter Raleigh; but his fleet being diſperſed in a ſtorm, the expedition was countermanded. She alſo diſpatched a ſmall ſquadron to cruize off the Azores; and Sir Martin Forbiſher, to the coaſt of Spain, in order to wait for the Spaniſh carracks from the Eaſt Indies. Burroughs, who commanded the firſt of theſe ſquadrons, burned one galleon, and took another very richly laden. Whether from Elizabeth's zealous attachment to the proteſtant intereſt both at home and abroad, or the ambition and jealouſy of her diſpoſition, ſhe was ſeldom free from numerous and frequently powerful enemies. Amongſt the reſt, Sir John Perrot, late lord deputy of Ireland, was ſuſpected of abetting inſurrections in that kingdom, and being brought to trial, was convicted, and committed to the Tower, where he ended his days after a long confinement.

A. D. 1593. Such was the rancour and animoſity between the proteſtant and popiſh parties, that the latter were ever deviſing means of harraſſing the former both at home and abroad. Hence political intrigues and hoſtile efforts never ceaſed; the court of Spain was neither idle in deviſing or executing projects. They excited new commotions in Scotland, which, together with the detection of a dangerous conſpiracy of ſome catholic noblemen, greatly alarmed the queen, who, fearful of the deſigns of James, ſent to congratulate him on the diſcovery of the plot; to aſſure him of her aſſiſtance, and preſſed him to puniſh the diſſaffected lords; at the ſame time requeſting Bothwell's pardon, who had twice attempted to ſeize the king's perſon, and fled to England, where he was protected by the queen, who refuſed to deliver him up to James according to treaty. But the Scottiſh king retorted on Elizabeth the very plea ſhe urged in favour of Bothwell, as the ground of his non-compliance; though, at the ſame time he promiſed to bring the heads of the inſurgents to ſevere trial, and, on conviction, to treat them with the utmoſt rigour.

The finances of James being nearly exhauſted, and the fitting out a force to quell the commotions in his kingdom requiring a ſupply, he ſent Sir Robert Melville to England to obtain the ſame. Melville did not ſucceed in his negotiation; and Bothwell returning privately into Scotland, ſo ingratiated himſelf with the nobility, that they introduced him into the king's bed-chamber, where imploring pardon on his knees, and ſeconded by the interceſſion of the Engliſh ambaſſador, he obtained forgiveneſs. But as the higheſt acts of clemency cannot influence abandoned minds, Bothwell, in violation of the laws of duty and gratitude, returned to his former infamous practices, was arreſted by the hand of juſtice, and ſuffered the puniſhment due to his atrocious crimes.

The parliament, this ſeſſion, voted her majeſty a ſupply adequate to the extraordinary demands of the ſtate; harraſſed by internal commotions, they enacted a ſevere law againſt ſeditious ſectaries, and diſloyal perſons; for theſe two kinds of criminals were always, in that age, confounded together, as equally dangerous to the peace of ſociety. This ſtatute bore as hard upon the puritans as the catholics, as by it all perſons above ſixteen years of age, abſenting themſelves from divine ſervice, as performed in the church of England, for the ſpace of one month, were ordered to be impriſoned.

The perfidy of the French nation ſoon became as apparent as that of the Spaniſh; for the former, inſtead of employing the Engliſh auxiliaries in the expulſion of the forces of the latter from Britany, uſed them only as a check upon the invaders; ſo that Elizabeth would have recalled her troops, had ſhe not been prevented by the marſhal d'Aumont, who aſſured her, in his maſter's name, that a vigorous attempt would ſoon be undertaken, for the entire reduction of Britany.

The French king being convinced, from the prevalence of popiſh bigotry and ſuperſtition in his kingdom, of the impoſſibility of obtaining the confidence of the people, while he was in any degree favourable to the contrary principles, ſolemnly renounced the reformed doctrines, and declared himſelf a convert to the church of Rome; which when Elizabeth was made acquainted with, ſhe ſeverely upbraided him with apoſtacy; which he frankly imputed to the indiſpenſable neceſſity of his circumſtances. However, ſhe diſpenſed with his conduct from political motives, and an affected friendſhip ſtill ſubſiſted between them.

The queen, having ſo effectually ſecured her crown and government by parliamentary ſanction, the attempts of her enemies were not only fruſtrated, but generally retorted on themſelves. Rodorigo Lopez, a Portugueſe Jew, domeſtic phyſician to the queen, being arreſted on ſuſpicion, acknowledged that he had been bribed to poiſon her, by Fuentes, and Ibani, who had ſucceeded the duke of Parma in the government of the Netherlands; but he declared that he had no other view, than to defraud them of their money, and never intended to perform his promiſe. But this ſubterfuge, in a matter of ſuch importance, could not avail; ſo that the doctor and two accomplices ſuffered as traitors, though the foreign noblemen were never brought to condign puniſhment.

A. D. 1594. As the moſt effectual method of avenging herſelf on her foreign enemies, Elizabeth beth afforded the French monarch very powerful assistance, and entered into a new treaty with him, that no peace should be made with the Spaniards, without the consent of both parties.

Such was the extraordinary valour of the English, in every action with the common enemy, that the queen, from motives of humanity, was frequently compelled to check the impetuous ardour of her commanders, both naval and military; to which she imputed the vast effusion of the blood of her loyal subjects. Sir Martin Forbisher, her brave admiral, lost his life with many others, before Brest. It had been stipulated in the late treaty, that Morlaix should be granted to the English as a place of retreat, but the French general evaded this agreement by causing it to be inserted in the articles, that none but catholics should be admitted into the city.

Bickerings had long prevailed between the French and Spanish monarchs, till at length they came to an open rupture; and the queen of England, leaving Henry to defend himself, thought it expedient to employ her armament in more important exploits. Nothwithstanding she had an irreconcileable antipathy to the Spaniards, as her most implacable enemies, she would not expend her subsidies in the maintenance of an offensive war; but annoyed her enemy by granting commissions to private adventurers, who acted against them at their own expence. Richard Hawkins, commander of a merchantman, authorized by letters of marque, sailed into the South sea, where he took several prizes; James Lancaster, on the coast of Brazil, took nine and thirty ships, and made himself master of Fernambuco, where he loaded fifteen vessels with sugar, and the cargo of a rich carrack, and returned to England with immense booty.

A. D. 1595. Sir Walter Raleigh sailed in the spring, on a voyage to the inland parts of South America, and having captured the city of St. Joseph from the Spaniards, took his course up the river Oroonoque, and returned to England, after a disappointment in search of gold mines, and the loss of half his crew by excessive heat of climate. This expedition was succeeded by another under the conduct of Sir Francis Drake and Sir Thomas Hawkins, who sailed in conjunction against the Spanish settlements in America. The land forces, which they embarked, were commanded by Sir Thomas Baskerville. They safely arrived at St. Domingo, but their design being discovered, the Spaniards fortified the place in such a manner, that when they attempted to force it, they were repulsed. After this miscarriage, Hawkins died, and the fleet sailed to the continent, where they burned Rio de la Hacha, Santa Martha, and Nombre de Dios, and resolved to attack Porto Bello; but this scheme was prevented by the death of that gallant and experienced commander Sir Francis Drake, who was carried off by the flux, a disorder very prevalent in those climates.

Baskerville, on the demise of the two admirals, was under the necessity of taking upon himself the naval as well as military command; but as he found, from the distempered state of the men in general, he could do nothing effectual, he returned to England; indeed, neither party derived any benefit from this expedition.

Philip of Spain, whose restless and vindictive spirit was ever plotting schemes against the queen of England, raised new commotions in Ireland, through the instigation of Macguire and Macmahon. The earl of Tyrone having been accused of maintaining a correspondence with the rebels, so forcibly vindicated his innocence before the governor, that he was dismissed as a loyal subject. But his fallacy became shortly notorious, by an open declaration for the rebel party, surprising the garrison of Blackwater in the absence of the governor, and committing acts of hostility against the loyalists, who were now opposed by a very powerful army, led on by commanders of approved valour, who had signalized themselves on the continent.

To suppress this alarming insurrection, before the rebels could be reinforced by a detachment of troops from the king of Spain, the queen ordered a body of men into Ireland, under the command of Sir John Norris, on whose approach to Armagh, Tyrone abandoned the fort of Blackwater, reduced the town of Dungannon, and the neighbouring villages to ashes; when the English general was compelled, for want of provisions, to retire, after leaving garrisons in Armagh and Monaghan, and agreeing with the insurgents for a truce till the beginning of the ensuing year.

A. D. 1596. In order to put a stop to the rebellion, without farther effusion of human blood, the queen offered a pardon to the insurgents on condition of their disbanding their troops, repairing the forts they had damaged, restoring the effects they had seized, and discovering their connections with foreign princes. These lenient measures were spurned at, though they agreed to protract the truce four months longer; during which the perfidious Tyrone privately corresponded with Philip, and at length, in order to make a shew of loyalty, transmitted to the queen's general letters he had received from Spain. But before the expiration of the truce, he capitulated with Norris, and delivered hostages in consequence of a pardon for himself and accomplices, though he would by no means make any profession of loyalty to the queen.

The English troops under Sir John Norris, having been recalled from Britany, in order to be sent into Ireland, the king of France was thereby much distressed, and under a necessity of applying to Elizabeth for a present supply for the relief of the province of Picardy. This was not granted, but the queen offered to send troops to garrison Calais, Boulogne, and Dieppe; but Henry did not think proper to trust her with the keeping those places. After this, the Spaniards invested Cambray, and Henry sent over Lommenie, his secretary of state, to press the queen of England for a speedy reinforcement; which being refused, the place was surrendered to the enemy. Elizabeth's neglect of compliance with so very important a request, at so critical a juncture, disgusted the king of France, and his council were desirous of making peace with the Spanish monarch.

The queen, at the instance of Burleigh, demanded of the United States, an immediate reimbursement of the sums she had advanced for their service; but as they were at that time incapable of raising the same, from the vast expence they had incurred in maintaining the war with Spain, they obtained a longer time, on condition of fitting out a fleet of four and twenty sail, to join the queen's navy against the Spaniards.

As their expeditions against the Spaniards in the East Indies had not proved the most successful, the English council determined to attack their dominions in Europe, where they were informed, Philip was making great preparations for an invaſion of England. A powerful fleet was, therefore, aſſembled at Plymouth; it carried ſix thouſand three hundred and ſixty ſoldiers, a thouſand volunteers, and ſix thouſand and ſeventy-two ſeamen. The land forces were commanded by the earl of Effingham, high admiral. The lord Thomas Howard, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Francis Vere, and others, had commands in this expedition.

This mighty armament, under commanders of the firſt eminence for courage and conduct, ſailed from England on the firſt of June, and being favoured with a fair wind, ſteered towards Cadiz, which was appointed as the place of general rendezvous. After having in vain attempted to land on the weſtern ſide of the iſland, it was propoſed, in a council of war, to attack the ſhips in the bay. The propoſal being approved, the attack was made with ſuch irreſiſtable fury, that the enemy were obliged to cut their cables, and ſtand farther into the bay, where many of their ſhips were bulged upon the ſhore. Eſſex then landed with eight hundred men at the Puntal, and marched to attack a body of five hundred Spaniards, when the latter retreated into Cadiz, and being ſo cloſely charged, and the inhabitants thrown into ſuch diſorder, no meaſures could be taken for the defence of the place. The Engliſh entered the city by violence, and poſſeſſing themſelves of the market-place, and the garriſon retiring into the caſtle, the inhabitants capitulated, on condition of being permitted to depart unmoleſted with their wearing apparel; but that all their other effects ſhould be diſtributed as booty among the ſoldiers; that they ſhould pay five hundred and twenty thouſand ducats for the ranſom of their lives, and ſend forty of their chief citizens to England, as hoſtages for the payment of the money.

But the grand object of this expedition, which was the capture of the enemy's ſhips, was defeated by the Spaniſh admiral's commanding them to be ſet on fire, to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy. It is ſuppoſed, that the loſs which the Spaniards ſuſtained in this enterprize amounted to no leſs than twenty millions of ducats, beſides the mortification which thoſe proud and haughty people ſuffered by ſeeing one of their chief cities taken, and a fleet of ſuch immenſe value deſtroyed in one of their own harbours.

The earl of Eſſex, emulous of fame, viewed this action as introductory to higher exploits, and therefore vehemently aſſerted the impropriety of giving up Cadiz, pledging himſelf to defend the place till ſuccours ſhould arrive from England; but the greateſt part of the officers being deſirous of returning with their booty, his motion was overruled, ſo that they returned to England, after having burned or plundered the adjoining villages.

Eſſex, who flattered himſelf that he had gained an abſolute aſcendancy over the mind of the queen, was highly chagrined to find that ſeveral offices of power and profit were diſpoſed of, in the conferment of many of which he thought himſelf ſecure. Amongſt theſe were Sir Robert Cecil, ſon to lord Burleigh, who was appointed ſecretary, a poſt to which he had ſtrongly recommended Sir Thomas Bodley: his diſpleaſure was ſtill augmented by the queen's appointing Sir Francis Vere governor of the Brille, a place he had long ſolicited for himſelf; the queen ſlighted his recommendations, becauſe oppoſed by old Cecil, a faithful ſervant, yet at the ſame time ſhe diſcovered viſible tokens of diſtinguiſhed reſpect for the earl.

Advice having been received that the Spaniſh monarch, notwithſtanding the loſs he had ſuſtained by the Engliſh in Cadiz, was making preparations at different ports for a deſcent upon Ireland, the queen was determined to defeat his deſign, and to deſtroy the ſhipping in thoſe harbours.

To this purpoſe, ſhe equipped a formidable armament, naval and military, and appointed the earl of Eſſex commander in chief of the whole; lord Thomas Howard, Sir Walter Raleigh, and lord Montjoy, were deputed to act in their reſpective ſtations under Eſſex. The earls of Rutland and Southampton, the lords Grey, Cromwell, and Rich, with ſeveral other noblemen, ſerved as volunteers. The commander's inſtructions were to deſtroy the Spaniſh fleets at Ferrol, and to proceed to the Azores. Eſſex ſailed from Plymouth on the ninth day of July, but the fleet was diſperſed by a violent ſtorm, and the ſhips obliged to put in at different ports of England. He again attempted to ſail about the latter end of Auguſt, but the fleet was damaged in ſuch a manner, that laying aſide all thoughts of aſſaulting Ferrol, he had no other object than that of laying in wait for the fleet on their homeward paſſage from India; he therefore made for the Azores, while Raleigh, being parted from the other admirals, arrived at Flores, and ſailing to Fayal, took that town before he joined the commander in chief, who ſuſpended him for proceeding without warrant from his ſuperior officer.

Raleigh, however, from motives of generoſity or expediency, was ſoon reſtored to the command of which he had been deprived for a time; though this circumſtance laid the foundation of that violent animoſity which afterwards prevailed between thoſe two gallant commanders. Eſſex propoſed to wait at the iſland of Gracioſa, for the India fleet, but was perſuaded by a pilot to ſail to the iſle of St. Michael, a ſafer harbour. At this iſland he met with three veſſels, which had ſtraggled from the fleet; theſe he brought with him, and made himſelf maſter of Villa Franca, where he found a conſiderable booty, and ſtore of refreſhment for his people. In the mean time, Sir Walter Raleigh deſtroyed an Indian carrack.

Notwithſtanding the extraordinary prudence and ſagacity of Elizabeth, an attachment to favourites frequently led her into meaſures which proved derogatory to her character, and ſubverſive of the intereſts of the nation. To this foible was imputed the failure of the late expedition; Eſſex, the commander in chief, being unacquainted with naval affairs. The council were divided in favour of the earl and Sir Walter Raleigh, but the queen, with her uſual policy, affected a neutrality in diſpenſing tokens of favour. The ambitious earl found that in his abſence the lord high admiral had been advanced to the title of earl of Nottingham, a circumſtance that gave him great offence; but was in ſome meaſure compenſated, by his being promoted to the honour of earl mareſchal of England.

The urgency of public demands compelled the queen to call the parliament together ſo early as the month of October, in order to repreſent the neceſſity of an immediate ſupply, the treaſury being exhauſted through the immenſe expences incurred from the Spaniſh war.

A.D. 1598. During theſe tranſactions, Philip, to detach the French king from all connections with Engngland, made propoſals for terms of accommo-ation, of which the queen obtaining intelligence, ent Sir Robert Carew to France, in order, if poſſible, o break off the treaty; but all her attempts were n vain, as the former was determined to give eace to his kingdom. The negotiations were arried on at Vervins; and on the twelfth of June, the truce was ratified by Henry, who recovered the poſſeſſion of all the places, which had been taken by Philip during the courſe of the wars, and afforded himſelf an opportunity of regulating the internal policy of the nation.

The queen being deprived of ſo powerful an ally as the king of France, thought it expedient to ſound the diſpoſition of the United States, as to the proſecution of the Spaniſh war. Though from her antipathy to king Philip, ſhe was diſpoſed to carry it on, ſhe affected a deſire of peace, alledging the heavy burthen it entailed on her ſubjects. The United States, ſenſible of the importance of her alliance, acceded to her propoſals, and readily ſubſcribed a treaty to the following import: That the ſtates ſhould give ſecurity for the payment of eight millions of florins, to which the queen limited her demands; that ſhe ſhould furniſh eleven hundred and fifty men to garriſon different fortreſſes, and to be paid by the ſtates; that for the future, ſhe ſhould be diſcharged from her engagement to furniſh any other auxiliary troops; that the power of the deputy of England, ſtipulated in the former treaty, ſhould be aboliſhed, though the queen reſerved to herſelf the liberty of ſending one perſon to ſit in their council; that the ſtates ſhould furniſh her with forty ſhips of war, five thouſand foot ſoldiers, and five hundred cavalry, to act offenſive or defenſive againſt her enemies in caſe of neceſſity.

Soon after the ſigning of this treaty, lord Burleigh, who directed the queen in all political concerns, quitted this ſcene of precarious exiſtence. He died in an advanced age, and as to his character, it may be ſaid in brief, that he poſſeſſed thoſe qualities which are neceſſary to form the courtier and the ſtateſman. Elizabeth was conſoled in ſome meaſure for the loſs of her miniſter Burleigh, by the news ſhe received of the death of her capital enemy, Philip, king of Spain, who was at length ſummoned to pay the debt of nature, in the ſixty-ſecond year of his age, after embroiling all Europe by his ambition during a reign of forty-two years.

The removal of an implacable foe afforded time for the council to attend to the commotions in Ireland, which now prevailed with greater ardour than ever. The earl of Tyrone had again rebelled, defeated and ſlain Sir Henry Bagnal, and reduced the fort of Blackwater. This renewal of the rebellion occaſioned a diſpute between the earls of Eſſex and Nottingham, about the nomination of a governor for Ireland; and the queen preferring the perſon recommended by the latter, Eſſex, tranſported by the violence of his paſſion, forgot the rules both of duty and civility, and turned his back upon her with contempt. Elizabeth, juſtly provoked at his behaviour, ſo derogatory to her dignity, retorted it with a blow, attended with language equally ſignificant of her diſpleaſure; and the haughty impetuous earl expreſſed tokens of reſentment as warm as thoſe he had received from his incenſed ſovereign. However, through the interpoſition of Egerton the chancellor, who was attached to the earl, and ſome private reaſons that might urge both parties, the matter ſubſided, and Eſſex was reſtored to the good graces of the queen.

The inſurrections in Ireland now threatening the moſt dangerous conſequences, it was determined in council to exert the moſt vigorous meaſures in order to effect their total ſuppreſſion. To this purpoſe, it was propoſed, with the concurrence of the queen, to appoint lord Montjoy to that office, though he was much more of the ſcholar than the ſoldier. But Eſſex, whoſe darling paſſion was ambition, ſolicited the office for himſelf, and the queen, influenced by her prevailing foible, appointed him governor of Ireland, under the title of lord lieutenant.

A. D. 1599. To extend his power and enforce his authority, the queen veſted him with a commiſſion more full and ample than any preceding governor had received. The earl left London in the month of March, attended by the acclamations of the populace, and accompanied by a numerous train of nobility and gentry, who, from an attachment to his perſon, had engaged in the ſervice, and propoſed to acquire fame, and military experience, under ſo celebrated a commander. The firſt inſtance of authority which he exerciſed, after his landing, though imprudent, was generous; and, in both reſpects, agreeable to his character. He appointed his intimate friend, the earl of Southampton, general of the horſe; a nobleman who had offended the queen, by marrying without her conſent; and whom ſhe had therefore prohibited Eſſex from employing in any command under him. The queen was no ſooner informed of this inſtance of diſobedience, than ſhe wrote him a ſevere letter, reprimanding him for his preſumption, and ordering him to recall his commiſſion to Southampton. But either from his attachment to his friend, or a conſciouſneſs of his influence with his royal miſtreſs, he did not attend to the order, till it was repeated with a degree of vehemence.

Eſſex, perſuaded of the neceſſity of vigorous efforts againſt the rebels without delay, determined to lead his army immediately into Ulſter, againſt Tyrone, the capital enemy; but the Iriſh counſellors aſſured him, that the ſeaſon was too early for ſuch an enterprize, and therefore adviſed him to employ the preſent time in an expedition to Munſter. In compliance with this advice, he compelled all the rebels of Munſter either to ſubmit or fly to the neighbouring provinces. But as the Iriſh were alarmed at theſe proceedings as preparatory to a deſign of total and abſolute ſubjection, they united in the common cauſe, and the inhabitants of Munſter not only revolted, but engaged in a deſign, with their countrymen in general, of detaching themſelves entirely from the Engliſh government.

The queen's army being greatly reduced in number, from the fatigue of long marches, and the effects of a climate to which they were unaccuſtomed, the earl of Eſſex on his return to Dublin, tranſmitted to the Engliſh council an account of his condition, and informed them that unleſs he immediately received a ſupply of two thouſand men, it would be impoſſible for him that ſeaſon, to undertake any enterprize againſt Tyrone. To obviate all pretence for farther delay, the queen immediately ſent over the number required; and Eſſex began to prepare for an expedition into Ulſter, where the rebels had commenced their ravages.

But a kind of averſion to the expedition againſt the Iriſh, who were conſidered as fellow ſubjects, together gether with the renown Tyrone had acquired, had ſuch an effect upon the Engliſh ſoldiery, that many affected ſickneſs, and ſome of them deſerted; ſo that Eſſex, after leaving the neceſſary garriſons, could hardly lead four thouſand men againſt the rebels. However, he marched with this ſmall army; but being ſoon ſenſible, that as the winter was now approaching it would be impoſſible for him to ſubdue an enemy, who though ſuperior in number was determined to avoid every opportunity of coming to a general engagement, he therefore acceded to a propoſal made by Tyrone for a ſuſpenſion of arms for three weeks, to be farther renewed as might afterwards be agreed upon. This circumſtance, however, raiſed ſuſpicions not the moſt honourable to the character of the lord lieutenant.

Nor could theſe proceedings be pleaſing to Elizabeth, or the nation; or fail of affording the enemies of Eſſex ground for cenſure, after ſuch mighty and formidable preparations. However, to anticipate any miſrepreſentations of his conduct that he foreſaw might enſue, he wrote a letter to the queen, inſinuating the advantages his enemies would take of the late event, to prejudice her againſt him, and beſeeching her not to liſten to their ſuggeſtions, till he ſhould arrive, and perſonally vindicate his conduct.

This precaution did not produce the deſired effect on the mind of his ſpirited miſtreſs, who with ſingular auſterity peremptorily enjoined him not to depart from Ireland, till he ſhould know her farther pleaſure. Eſſex, however, finding the queen extremely incenſed againſt him, and ſuſpicious of the efforts of his numerous foes, notwithſtanding the royal injunction, determined to ſet out for England, and as a pretence to palliate ſuch conduct, cauſed a report to be ſpread, that her majeſty was dangerouſly ill, and that her life was even deſpaired of by her phyſicians. Leaving, therefore, the government of Ireland in the hands of the lord chancellor Loftus, and Sir George Carew, he embarked on the twenty-fourth of September, and in four days reached the court of Elizabeth, proſtrated himſelf as an humble ſuppliant, and ſubmitted his caſe to her wiſdom, candor, and clemency.

A. D. 1600. In this tranſaction, as in all former ones with favorites, the queen was impelled by a kind of unavoidable neceſſity, to deſcend to the woman in ordinary with her ſex. The behaviour of Eſſex, at firſt, ſoothed her into an inſenſible complacency; but as, on reflection after his departure, ſhe was convinced of the cenſure which he had juſtly incurred from the people, as well as the council, from preſuming to act in affairs of the utmoſt importance to the nation, without the order or permiſſion of his ſovereign, when he waited on her a ſecond time, ſhe behaved towards him with great auſterity, and after upbraiding him with his unjuſtifiable conduct, commanded him to be confined to his own apartments, from whence he was committed to the cuſtody of the lord-keeper, nor was even his counteſs ſuffered to viſit him. This rigorous treatment, however juſt, ſo ſenſibly affected the mind of the earl, that it brought on him a very dangerous diſtemper, a circumſtance that proved inconteſtibly the paſſion of the queen for this favorite. However, as ſhe knew the cauſe, ſhe adopted proper remedies to his diſorder; ſo that through her aſſiduities, the earl was ſoon reſtored to perfect health.

The late impediments to military operations in Ireland favoured the efforts of the rebels, who proceeded in their ravages, and reduced the province of Ulſter; inſomuch, that Tyrone, encouraged by pope Clement VIII. aſpired at the dominion of Ireland, and would probably have ſucceeded, had not his deſigns been fruſtrated by the ſeaſonable appointment of lord Montjoy to the government of that kingdom, who not only ſtopped him in his career, but ſeverely chaſtiſed the inſolence of his adherents.

The pope, availing himſelf of the rebellion in Ireland, determined to revive the embers of diſloyalty in England; and with this view, he ſent two bulls into England, one addreſſed to the Romiſh clergy, the other to the people; in which both clergy and laity were forbidden, after Elizabeth's death, to acknowledge any ſovereign, who would not ſwear not only to tolerate the exerciſe of the Catholic religion, but even to promote and ſupport it by command and example. The ſame horrid practices were carried into execution in Scotland, where a plot was laid to murder king James, but timely prevented by the diſcovery and interpoſition of two loyal ſubjects, Sir Thomas Erſkine, and John Ramſay.

Lord Montjoy, by his vigorous and ſucceſsful exertions in quelling the rebellion in Ireland, had not only acquired the eſteem of his ſovereign, but eclipſed the fame of Eſſex, and afforded the queen an opportunity of ſtigmatizing the conduct of that nobleman with the ſevereſt reproaches. To expreſs her diſapprobation more fully, ſhe had taken a reſolution to have him examined in the Star-chamber, but at length according to uſual cuſtom, perſonal attachment overcame reſentment, and ſhe referred his conduct to the judgment of the privy council. Previous to his appearance at this auguſt board, the queen ſignified to them, that her royal will and pleaſure was not to have him condemned to any capital puniſhment, as guilty of treaſon; but merely to have him made ſenſible of his failure in point of allegiance, his neglect of her inſtructions, and diſobedience of her poſitive commands, through the exceſs of his vanity, and the impetuoſity of his temper; in this ſhe pretended to be influenced by the partiality of the people towards him, who repreſented him as abuſed by the aſperſions of many of his former rivals in power.

The charge was opened with all poſſible rigour againſt the earl, by Coke the attorney-general, who held forth his conduct in the moſt cenſurable point of view, alledging as the principal inſtances of conviction, his contempt of the queen's majeſty, in appointing the earl of Southampton general of the horſe, contrary to her injunction; his abandoning the enterprize againſt the rebel Tyrone; his conferring the order of knighthood, contrary to the expreſs letter of his patent; the indignity of the terms he had ſuffered the rebels to propoſe; and laſtly, the abandoning his government, not only without the queen's permiſſion, but in abſolute defiance of her poſitive orders. The ſolicitor-general confirmed the allegations of his brother Coke, repreſented the diſtreſſed ſtate of Ireland in conſequence of his default, and adduced other inſtances in conviction of the culprit.

Eſſex, in pleading for himſelf, artfully adopted the moſt ſubmiſſive and reſpectful language, declaring, that he determined on no account to contend with his ſovereign: he ſaid, that having retired from the world, and reſigned every aſpiring claim, he was ready ingenuouſly to confeſs every failing and error into which he might have been led by youthful folly, or an impetuous temper; that the concern of his mind for the offences againſt her majeſty majesty was infinitely more poignant, than all his outward calamities, nor did he decline making a public confession of whatever she had imputed to him; but that amidst all his acknowledgements, he must insist upon one reserve which he would maintain with his latest breath; namely, the assertion of a loyal and dutiful heart, an unfeigned affection for her majesty, and an absolute devotion to her service, as far as his contracted abilities would permit, adding, moreover, that if the council would admit as a confirmed truth his unfeigned loyalty, notwithstanding the errors into which he might have fallen, he would, with heart-felt satisfaction, submit to the severest decree.

Such were the grace, elegance, and pathos with which the earl acquitted himself upon this solemn occasion, that he not only fixed the attention, but penetrated the hearts of the audience. The council were so sensibly affected by the powers of his elocution, that they admitted his claim to loyalty, and Cecil his professed foe, abated of his rigour, and adopted terms of moderation, insomuch that the sentence, pronounced with the assent of the council, by the lord-keeper, was to the following effect: "If this cause had been heard in the star-"chamber, my sentence must have been for as "great a fine as was ever put upon any man in that "court, together with imprisonment for life in the "Tower. But as we are now in another place, "with a view to a less rigorous process, my sen-"tence is, that the earl of Essex be deprived of "the posts of privy-counsellor, earl marshal of "England, and master of the ordnance; that he "return to his own house, there to remain a pri-"soner, till it shall please her majesty to free him "from this and every other part of his sen-"tence."

This sentence was received by Essex with such graceful humility and winning complacency, as induced her majesty not only to testify the highest approbation of his behaviour upon the occasion, but further to convince him, that she still retained an assurance of his loyalty, by preventing his sentence from being recorded, and giving him his liberty, though she forbade him the court. In consequence of this indulgence, he prepared to retire into the country, but, previous to his departure, sent a letter to the queen, fraught with those flattering insinuations, which he knew were most prevalent with Elizabeth. Nor did they fail of effect on the present occasion; for though she returned for answer, that facts and not words, were the proofs of sincerity, she intimated the probability of retrieving his former character by his future conduct, and consequently of being restored to that rank and dignity which he had justly forfeited. But through a kind of fatality the event proved fatal to the unfortunate earl.

A. D. 1601. In consequence of the lenity of the late proceedings, it was the universal opinion that Essex would be restored to his former dignities; but the impetuosity of his temper urged him to such rash and precipitate measures, as frustrated the design he wished to accomplish. He was now grown so confident of his influence with the queen, that he applied to her for a renewal of his patent for a monopoly of sweet wines, which was near expiring, and regarded this event as the critical circumstance that would determine whether he could ever hope to recover his authority.

The enemies of the earl, who were numerous and potent, could not fail of embracing this favourable opportunity of representing his conduct to the queen upon the occasion as insolent and arrogant in the highest degree; so that his petition was rejected in such terms as the form and manner of it was thought to deserve. Essex, who had hitherto suppressed his resentment, now imagining that the queen was inexorable, broke through all the restraints of submission and prudence, and undertook a design to restore himself to favour by force, and to destroy all his enemies about the person of her majesty. He had ever been accustomed to carry matters with a high hand against his sovereign, but being now as it were reduced to despair, he gave full scope to the impetuosity of his disposition, and threw off all appearance of duty and respect.

To carry his purposes, as it were, by force, he pursued every measure to gain the good-will of the people, opened his house for the reception of all mal-contents, entered into a private correspondence with the king of Scots, (whose title to the crown of England he promised to support at the hazard of his life and fortune) and even prevailed on the lord Montjoy, lieutenant of Ireland, to engage to bring over part of his army into England to support his claim. He had formed a select council of mal-contents, consisting of the earl of Southampton, Sir Charles Danvers, Sir Ferdinando Gorges, Sir Christopher Blount, Sir John Davis, and Sir John Littleton.

Having engaged a number of frantic partizans in his interest, consisting of one hundred and twenty persons of the first rank in the kingdom, it was determined, in a council held at Drury-house, to proceed in their designs with the utmost vigour and resolution. Among other dangerous schemes, it was debated in this malecontent assembly, whether it was most expedient to begin their attack with the palace or the Tower, or whether they should engage in both enterprizes at one and the same time; and after much dispute, it was determined, that Essex should sound the disposition of the citizens of London in his favour.

But intelligence of the designs of this frantic cabal having reached the ear of the queen and council, orders were immediately issued for doubling the guard of soldiers; and a message was dispatched to the lord-mayor, commanding him to preserve the peace in the city. At the same time, she sent Sir Robert Sackville, the treasurer's son, to Essex-house, under pretence of a visit, but in reality, with a view of discovering whether there were any just grounds for suspicion of a combination there formed against the government. In a short time, Essex was summoned to appear before the council, assembled in the dwelling house of the treasurer, from which circumstance, together with the late visit from Sir Robert Sackville, he concluded that the conspiracy was either fully discovered or strongly suspected. To evade an immediate scrutiny into his treasonable proceedings, and to excuse his non-attendance at the council-board, he pleaded indisposition, and dispatched messengers to his firmest adherents, requesting their advice and concurrence in the present emergency. In consequence of these dispatches, there assembled at Essex house, the following day, a great number of the confederates, whom the earl acquainted with the particular situation of affairs. By some it was deemed most prudent to throw himself at the queen's feet, and implore her mercy and protection; he was by others advised to address the mayor and citizens of London, for their aid and assistance on the present occasion.

The latter propoſal being preferred to the former by the majority of the confederates, amongſt whom was the earl of Southampton, and many of the earl's warmeſt adherents, it was reſolved to carry it into execution as ſoon as poſſible. But Elizabeth, who by means of ſpies and agents obtained intelligence of the minuteſt tranſactions which paſſed in theſe rebellious councils, having commanded the magiſtrates of London to keep the citizens in readineſs, ſent the lord-keeper, the earl of Worceſter, Sir William Knollys, comptroller, with the lord chief juſtice Popham, to enquire into the deſign of theſe unuſual preparations.

Having at length got acceſs to the earl, and propoſed to him ſome interrogatories on the part of the queen, Eſſex briefly aſſigned (as the cauſe of the unuſual military preparations in the city, and elſewhere,) the neceſſity of protecting his life at all hazard againſt the combined efforts of his profeſſed enemies.

After much altercation, in which they commanded the earl and his adherents, upon their allegiance, to return to their duty, it was reſolved by the confederates to make them priſoners, and accordingly, Eſſex, turning from them ſuddenly into another room, that in which they were was immediately locked, and a guard appointed to watch over them. Such a flagrant indignity offered to the queen's majeſty in the perſons of her meſſengers, was adding crime to crime; ſo that Eſſex, ſeized as it were with a fit of deſpair, ſallied forth with about two hundred confuſed followers, armed only with ſwords, exclaiming, "For the "queen! for the queen! they ſeek my life, they "ſeek my life!" The citizens flocked about him in amazement, but none appeared ready to ſecond his attempt, and though he cried, "Arm, my "friends, or the opportunity of ſaving my life "will be loſt," they ſtill remained inactive, and even Sir Francis Smith, the ſheriff, from whoſe attachment he conceived mighty expectations of aſſiſtance, no ſooner ſaw him approach, than he haſtily withdrew, and repaired, with all poſſible ſpeed, to the reſidence of the lord-mayor.

In this confuſed ſtate of things, intelligence was ſent the unfortunate earl, that he had been officially proclaimed a traitor in all the public places of the city, by lord Burleigh, and the earl of Cumberland: he therefore, in a fit of deſpair, quitted the ſheriff's houſe, and exclaimed in the ſtreets, "that England was ſold to the Infanta of Spain," entreating the populace to take up arms immediately, as the only method of preventing ſo alarming a circumſtance. This frantic reſolution producing not a ſingle effort in his favour, he attempted to return to his own houſe as a temporary aſylum, but was intercepted by a party of citizens, under the command of Sir John Leviſon. In his attempt to force his way, Sir Chriſtopher Blount, a perſon for whom he had the higheſt eſteem, was taken priſoner, Tracy, a young gentleman, was ſlain, with ſome adherents of inferior note, and the earl, at length, after having been ſhot through the hat, found means to eſcape towards the river, where, taking a boat, he at laſt reached Eſſex-houſe. On his arrival, to add to his confuſion and deſpair, he was informed that Sir Ferdinando Gorges, one of his chief friends, had betrayed his truſt, and attended amongſt others at the court, as an evidence againſt him: at firſt he reſolved to hazard his life by fighting his way through his enemies, rather than ſubmit his neck to the ſtroke of the axe; but in cool deliberation, his reſolution failed, and he ſued for an impartial trial, in the humbleſt terms.

The queen, who affected the utmoſt coolneſs during the late tumults, preſerved the ſame temper, and, without any apparent emotion, gave orders for the trials of the moſt conſiderable of the accomplices. Eſſex and Southampton, who had been committed to the Tower, were arraigned before a jury of twenty-five peers, the lord treaſurer Buckhurſt acting as lord high ſteward. The charges, and particularly the treaſonable confederacy of Drury-houſe, with all the circumſtances relative to the plot, were proved by ſuch inconteſtible evidences, that nothing to the purpoſe could be offered in defence of the culprits. Conviction being ſo full and deciſive, the noble priſoners could not flatter themſelves with the leaſt hopes of mercy, as their crimes were ſo flagrant and palpable. Eſſex intimated, that as he could not ſpurn at pardon on the one hand, ſo neither could he degrade himſelf in begging it on the other. Southampton behaved with more ſubmiſſion; he implored the good offices of the peers in ſo affecting a manner, as drew tears from the ſpectators.

On a view of his approaching diſſolution, he ſeemed ſeriouſly anxious for the concerns of a future ſtate, and greatly affected at his general, and late conduct in particular. This induced him to diſcloſe to his chaplain the particulars of the whole treaſonable confederacy both in England and Scotland, in conſequence of which diſcovery, Sir Henry Neville, the queen's ambaſſador at the court of France, was remanded home and impriſoned; but lord Montjoy, though accuſed, was continued in his government of Ireland, as he had filled the important poſt of viceroy with the higheſt honor and dignity, as well as inviolable regard to the intereſts of the nation.

The mind of the queen was rent between the dictates of reſentment, and the ſuggeſtions of affection, in the caſe of her unhappy favourite, who approached the time of his removal from a precarious ſtate of temporary exiſtence. Such, indeed, was her ſtruggle between the oppoſite paſſions, that from her exceſſive feelings, her ſituation might have been more pitiful at this juncture, than that of the unhappy earl himſelf. At length, however, after the moſt reluctant ſtruggles, and the moſt ambiguous behaviour, regard to her own dignity and perſonal ſecurity prevailed, and ſhe ſent down a warrant by lord Darcy, ſignifying the time appointed for his execution; the chief cauſe that induced her to conſent to his death was his ſuppoſed obſtinacy in omitting to preſent, as ſhe had hourly, almoſt from the time of his ſentence, waited an addreſs from him, to implore her candour and clemency.

This unhappy nobleman ſubmitted to his fate with a degree of compoſure and reſignation becoming the ſolemn and awful occaſion, and which indicated a ſenſe of the juſtice of his ſentence. At his own particular requeſt he ſuffered in the court-yard of the Tower, attended by three divines, his particular friends.

Robert Devereux, earl of Eſſex, as memorable in the dramatic as the hiſtoric page, exhibited during life, a character contraſted by eminent virtues, and notorious foibles. If he was brave, generous, ſincere, he was alſo ambitious, jealous, and vindictive. If his virtues gained him popularity, his foibles brought him to an untimely end, and it may be ſaid of him in a word, that he fell a ſacrifice to his own ambition, foſtered and inflamed through the affection of his queen at the early period of thirty-ſix years.

Several of the unfortunate earl's aſſociates were tried tried and condemned; ſome were executed, but the queen, deſirous of ſhewing her clemency, pardoned the greater part; and indeed with much juſtice, as they were drawn in meerly from their attachment to Eſſex, and wholly unacquainted with the more criminal part of his intentions. The earl of Southampton was detained in the Tower till the acceſſion of king James, by whom he was ſet at liberty and reſtored to his former honours.

The king of Scots, deſirous of cultivating the favour and friendſhip of Elizabeth, diſpatched the earl of Marr, and the abbot of Kinloſs, to congratulate her majeſty on the detection and ſuppreſſion of the late conſpiracy. Theſe ambaſſadors were inſtructed to enquire, whether any meaſures had been taken by the queen to exclude their maſter from the throne, and they managed his affairs ſo dexterouſly, that not only Elizabeth, but the majority of the council, were won over to his intereſt, and among the reſt, ſecretary Cecil, whoſe authority after the fall of Eſſex was unlimited.

The parliament being convened at the uſual ſeaſon, the lord-keeper ſtated to them, that from the exigencies of the ſtate in contending with both foreign and domeſtic enemies, the public finances were greatly reduced; ſo that they granted her majeſty a very extraordinary ſupply, in conſideration of which, ſhe repealed ſeveral acts by which the manufacturing part of the people had been greatly diſtreſſed.

A. D. 1602. Inteſtine commotions having now ſubſided, attention was paid to the neceſſary preparations againſt the common enemy, and a ſquadron of nine ſhips was ſent under the command of Sir Richard Leviſon, in the ſpring, to annoy the trading veſſels of the Spaniards, who had fomented and aſſiſted the Iriſh rebellion. The admiral attacked the port of Seſimbria in Portugal, where they received intelligence that a very rich carrack had taken ſhelter. Though the harbour was defended by a caſtle, the Engliſh ſquadron broke in, took the carrack and brought her home, where ſhe was valued at a million of ducats.

Lord Montjoy, in the government of Ireland, exhibited ſuch proofs of his political talents, and general abilities, that if any partiality was ſhewn to him in the affair of the confederacy, it eventually tended to the intereſt of the nation. The Spaniards continuing their aid to the rebels, ſent them freſh ſuccours, which landing at Kinſale, inveſted and took the place; but after a ſhort ſiege by Montjoy, and having the mortification of ſeeing the rebel earl of Tyrone utterly routed, in attempting its defence, the Spaniſh general was glad to ſurrender, on condition that he might be permitted to re-embark with the remainder of his forces.

The defeat of Tyrone and other inſurgents, who were driven into Ulſter, afforded the pleaſing proſpect of putting a ſpeedy period to the rebellion in Ireland, which was greatly furthered by the expulſion of the Spaniards from that kingdom: Tyrone at length finding his parties unable to withſtand the vigorous efforts of the royal army, applied for pardon to lord Montjoy in the moſt ſubmiſſive terms; but the viceroy would comply on no other conditions than the abſolute ſurrender of his life and fortune to the queen's mercy. Compelled by neceſſity, Tyrone therefore came to Mellefont, preſented himſelf before the deputy, in a habit and poſture ſuitable to his then ſtate, and after acknowledging his offence in the moſt humble manner, was committed to Dublin caſtle. O'Rourk, another leader, ſurrendered ſoon after; and thus this dreadful rebellion, which had coſt the Engliſh nation much blood and treaſure, was entirely ſuppreſſed, and the whole kingdom reduced to a ſtate of ſubjection and tranquillity under the auſpicious government of the lord Montjoy.

A. D. 1603. The mind of the queen being at that time ſeized with a deep melancholy, ſhe was inſuſceptible of any ſatisfaction from ſo fortunate an event as that of the ſuppreſſion of the rebellion in Ireland. There are divers opinions concerning the cauſe of this melancholy; ſome aſcribe it to the aſſiduity with which ſome leading men paid their court to James, her preſumptive heir; but others, with much greater probability, impute it to her grief, for having conſented to the death of the unfortunate Eſſex, to whom ſhe had, on ſo many occaſions, diſcovered an irreſiſtible attachment.

It appeared after his demiſe, that the earl, on his return from Cadiz, had received from her majeſty the preſent of a ring, which ſhe deſired him to keep as a pledge of her affection, aſſuring him, that into whatever diſgrace he ſhould fall, or whatever prejudices ſhe might be induced to entertain againſt him, yet if he ſent her that ring, ſhe would immediately, upon ſight of it, recollect her former tenderneſs, afford him a gracious hearing, and lend a favourable ear to his apology. The earl, after his trial and condemnation, determined to try the experiment, and committed the invaluable gift to the counteſs of Nottingham, whom he deſired to deliver it to the queen. The counteſs was prevailed on by her huſband, who was Eſſex's mortal foe, not to execute the commiſſion; and Elizabeth, who ſtill expected that her favourite would make this laſt appeal to her tenderneſs, and who aſcribed the neglect to his invincible obſtinacy, was, after much delay and many ſtruggles in her own breaſt, impelled by policy and reſentment to ſign the warrant for his execution. The fatal ſecret was not diſcloſed to the queen, till a ſhort time before the death of the counteſs; when, ſtruck with the treachery of her conduct, and compelled by remorſe when too late, ſhe deſired acceſs to her majeſty, and, imploring pardon, confeſſed her guilt. Elizabeth, ſtruck with the dire relation, burſt into a moſt violent rage, and exclaiming, that God might for-"give her, but ſhe never could," ruſhed from her, and thenceforth reſigned herſelf to the deepeſt melancholy.

The fate of Eſſex was ſuppoſed to have brought on the melancholy which ſo apparently affected her after his demiſe; but the ſhock ſhe ſuſtained on the diſcovery of Nottingham's treachery, and the anxiety which enſued thereupon, were beyond all deſcription, and could only terminate with her life. The phyſicians giving no hopes of her recovery, the great officers of ſtate attended on her majeſty, entreating her to ſign her laſt will as to a ſucceſſor. She briefly returned for anſwer, "The throne of Eng-"land has always been filled by a ſucceſſion of "princes, nor do I deſire any other than a royal "ſucceſſor." On being requeſted to be more explicit in her declaration, ſhe added, "I deſire "that a king ſhould ſucceed me, and who ſhould "that king be, but the king of Scotland."

Secretary Cecil waited on her the day before her death, and finding that her ſpeech faultered, deſired that ſhe would by ſome ſign confirm the reſolution of the preceding day, if ſhe ſtill retained the ſame, upon which ſhe put her hand to her head, as a token of affirmation.

Notwithſtanding the nomination of James to the ſuc-ſucceſſion was approved in general, it was deemed expedient by the council to keep up a ſtrong force for the peace and good order of the nation. Accordingly fleets were ſtationed in the different harbours; all the peers were ſummoned to town, and if any commotion happened on the queen's death, it was determined to veſt the earl of Northumberland with the chief command of the forces.

During theſe neceſſary proceedings by way of caution, the queen's diſorder ſeemed to approach to a criſis; and when ſhe was attended by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſhe appeared fervent in devotional exerciſes preparatory to her final exit. At length the gradual ſymptoms of death came on, and ſhe expired without a groan in the ſeventieth year of her age, and forty-fifth of her reign. She was interred in a manner ſuitable to her dignity in Henry the Seventh's chapel, by the ſpecial mandate of king James, who affected to teſtify the higheſt regard for her memory.

Writers cotemporary and future univerſally agree in attributing to queen Elizabeth all the charms of feature, figure, elegance, and grace. They likewiſe acknowledge her extraordinary proficiency in the languages ancient and modern, as alſo in the different ſciences, and in univerſal hiſtory. Her political talents, upon a review of the tranſactions of her reign, appear to have been extenſive, and it muſt be confeſſed, upon the whole, that ſhe was formed by endowments, natural and acquired, to govern a great and powerful nation. Her conduct at times evinced great ambiguity and duplicity, though, from peculiar exigencies, it might admit of a candid palliation. Her prevailing foibles were, doubtleſs, ambition, avarice, and jealouſy. The latter muſt have ariſen from an extraordinary attachment to favorites; but if her foibles proved fatal to the peace and life of the unfortunate queen of Scots, they proved no leſs deſtructive to the queen of England, who fell a victim to their unconquerable predominance. Her reign is marked by a wiſe adminiſtration, and ſhe may be held up as a ſovereign worthy the admiration of ſucceeding monarchs; for though ſhe might have been a fallible woman, impartiality muſt admit that ſhe was a great queen.

Remarkable Occurrences during the Reign of Queen Elizabeth.

A. D.

1559 Apprentices of London obliged to wear blue cloaks in ſummer, and blue gowns in winter.

1560 The ſpire of St. Paul's (the timber part of which was 260 feet high, and the roof 720 feet long and 140 feet broad) burnt down by lightning.

1561 On the 16th of July there happened a violent ſtorm of thunder and hail, which deſtroyed 500 acres of corn at Chelmsford in Eſſex.
Gunpowder firſt made in England.

1563 The ſlave trade on the coaſt of Guinea begun by the Engliſh.

1565 Knives firſt made in London.
Tobacco firſt brought to England.

1566 The foundation of the Royal Exchange in London laid by Sir Thomas Greſham.
Needles firſt made in England.

1567 Two marſhals appointed by the citizens of London to clear the ſtreets of vagrants, and to ſend the ſick, lame and blind to the workhouſes and hoſpitals.
Upon an inquiſition taken by order of the queen, only 58 Scotchmen were found in London.

1569 On the 11th of January began drawing the firſt lottery mentioned in the Engliſh hiſtory. It was to produce money for the ſervice of government, and continued drawing, night and day, till the 6th of May.
Book-keeping firſt uſed after the Italian method in England.

1570 The art of gauging diſcovered.

1571 On the 17th of February there happened a great earthquake in Herefordſhire, when Marclay hill was removed from the place where it ſtood, and continued in motion two days: it carried along the trees, hedges and ſheep, overturned Kynaſton chapel, which ſtood in its way, left an opening forty feet in depth, and thirty-two in length, and at laſt ſettled and formed itſelf into an hill twelve fathoms high.
Diſſenters firſt ſeparated from the church of England.

1572 Maſks, muffs, fans, and horſe hair for the women, firſt uſed in England.
The firſt Preſbyterian meeting-houſe in England was built at Wandſworth in Surrey.

This year Sir Francis Drake made a voyage round the world.

1579 Linen-ſtaining firſt known in England.

1580 Cambricks and lawns firſt worn in England, and reckoned a great luxury in dreſs.

1582 Coaches firſt uſed in England.
Gregorian calendar firſt uſed in England.

1583 This year a very ſingular prodigy happened in Dorſetſhire. A field of three acres, with the trees and fences, at Black-moor, moved from thence, paſſed over another field, and ſettled in the highway to Hearn.

1587 Artichoaks firſt planted in England.

1588 Chatham cheſt founded for the relief of maimed and ſuperannuated Engliſh mariners.
Fire ſhips firſt uſed by the Engliſh navy in the general engagement with the Spaniſh armada.

1589 The art of knitting ſtockings firſt practiſed in England.

1590 The band of gentlemen penſioners eſtabliſhed.
Sail cloth firſt made in England.
Iron mills firſt erected in England for cutting iron into bars for the uſe of the ſmiths.
The firſt white paper made in England at Dartford in Kent.

The moſt diſtinguiſhed perſonages for learning, during the reign of Queen Elizabeth, were the following:

Richard Hooker, ſome time maſter of the Temple, was one of the moſt celebrated writers of the age in which he lived. His "Eccleſiaſtical Polity" is written with a claſſic ſimplicity, and eſteemed one of the completeſt works, both for ſtyle and argument, that ever appeared in the Engliſh language. Queen Elizabeth uſed to call him "The judicious Hooker." He died on the ſecond of November, 1600.

Sir Philip Sidney was the delight and admiration of the court of Elizabeth. He was the ornament of the univerſity, and appeared with equal advantage in a field of battle, at a tournament, in a private converſation among his friends, or in a public character as an ambaſſador. His talents were equally adapted to proſe or verſe, to original compoſition or tranſlation. He died the ſixteenth of October, 1586.

Sir Thomas Bodley was particularly diſtinguiſhed as a man of letters; but much more for the ample proviſion he made for literature, by the library he founded at Oxford. In 1599, he opened his library, a mauſoleum which will perpetuate his memory as long as books themſelves endure. He died the twenty-eight of January, 1612.

Edmund Spencer, the celebrated author of the "Fairy Queen," was the father of the Engliſh heroic poem, and of true paſtoral poetry in this iſland. He ſtands diſtinguiſhed from almoſt all other poets, by that faculty by which a poet is diſtinguiſhed from other writers, namely, invention; and excelled all his cotemporaries in harmonious verſification. The ſtanza of Spencer, and the old words which conſtantly occur, contribute to give that great poet an air of peculiarity; and hence all the imitations of him reſemble the original. After the death of Sir Philip Sidney, he languiſhed without a patron, and died in want of bread, in 1599.

Horrid maſſacre at Amboyna. An expedition is projected for the relief of the Palatinate, which miſcarries through the perfidy of the French. Death and character of James I.

A. D. 1603. JAMES of Scotland had the good fortune of ſucceeding to the crown of England at a time, when that kingdom had arrived at it's ſummit of glory. His right of acceſſion was confirmed by univerſal plaudits on his being proclaimed, according to cuſtom, at the moſt populace places in the metropolis. But he had no ſooner aſcended the throne, than he ſelected, as objects of his peculiar favour and attachment, thoſe of the nobility who had ſignalized themſelves in eſpouſing the cauſe of his mother. The earl of Northumberland, with the lords Thomas and Henry Howard, and the lord Montjoy, were made privy counſellors, notwithſtanding their being ſtrongly ſuſpected of popery; indeed, the Howard family in general were gratified with titles and preferments, by which it plainly appeared, that James highly diſapproved of the behaviour of Elizabeth towards the duke of Norfolk and his family. His diſapprobation of the principles and conduct of the late queen carried him indeed beyond the bounds of duty and decorum; for ſuch was the contempt with which, in reality, he treated her memory, that he neither went into mourning himſelf, nor would admit any perſon into his preſence in a mourning habit. Not an individual of any conſideration, who had ſuffered from their attachment to the unfortunate Mary, eſcaped his notice, for in ſix weeks after his arrival in England, he is ſuppoſed to have conferred the honour of knighthood on no leſs than two hundred and thirty-ſeven perſons. Nay, ſo far from following the example of his predeceſſor in the partial beſtowal of honors, James was ſo profuſe of honours and titles, as to occaſion a paſquinade's being affixed to one of the doors of St. Paul's, in which was propoſed, an art for aſſiſting frail memories in retaining the titles of the upſtart nobility.

This prepoſſeſſion in favour of particular perſons, not from any inherent merit or ſuperiority of character, but from mere caprice, or a caſual aſcendancy in point of birth, never prevailed more than throughout the whole reign of this prince, who appears to have been little actuated by the maxims of ſound policy, but wholly governed by fancy and inclination. By the very unpopular meaſure of importing great numbers of his northern friends, and advancing them to poſts of dignity and emolument about his perſon, he incurred the diſapprobation of many of the moſt powerful of his Engliſh ſubjects, which terminated at length in his own diſadvantage. Amongſt theſe the duke of Lenox, the earl of Marr, the lord Hume, the lord Kinloſs, Sir George Hume, and ſecretary Elphinſtone, were admitted into the Engliſh privy council; after which Sir George Hume was made earl of Dunbar; Hay was created firſt viſcount Doncaſter, and then dignified with the title of earl of Carliſle; and Ramſay was preferred to the earldom of Holderneſs.

At the inſtance of thoſe very perſons on whom the honors were conferred, theſe promotions were made preparatory to the coronation, which was ſolemnized at Weſtminſter on the twenty-fifth day of July, by Whitgift, archbiſhop of Canterbury; but as the king, though familiar with his friends and courtiers, hated the tumult of a mixed multitude, and was fond of tranquillity and eaſe, a proclamation was publiſhed, forbidding all perſons to reſort to the ceremony, except the nobility, the lord-mayor, aldermen, and common council of the city of London. Indeed, this proclamation was juſtifiable on the ſcore of prudent precaution, as the plague raged at this time with ſuch fury in London, that thirty thouſand died of it within the compaſs of a year.

To compenſate for the partiality evident in laviſhing honors and titles upon his countrymen,

James thought it expedient to continue the great officers of ſtate, on the late queen's demiſe, in their reſpective departments of government, ſo that the whole adminiſtration of affairs abroad and at home was veſted in the hands of Engliſh ſubjects. Among others, ſecretary Cecil, ſon of the famous Burleigh, was created lord Eſſendon, and afterwards earl of Saliſbury, and maintained an extraordinary influence both at court, and in the cabinet.

As Cecil muſt naturally have incurred the odium of James from the avowed part his father had taken in the perſecution of queen Mary, his continuance in office, notwithſtanding his political abilities were generally confeſſed, was matter of univerſal ſurprize. Beſides, Cecil himſelf had ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the power of the earl of Eſſex, whom James profeſſedly conſidered as a martyr to the Scotch ſucceſſion. The fact is this: Cecil who knew mankind, and was verſed in thoſe arts which generally prevail, had, on the firſt approach of Elizabeth's diſſolution, ingratiated himſelf with James, without the knowledge of the queen or any of her miniſters, and thereby paved the way for the continuance of his favours. Having once ingratiated himſelf, he obtained the entire confidence of his ſovereign, who being a weak as well as vain prince, was moulded at pleaſure by this ſubtle courtier.

The eyes of all the catholic princes in Europe were fixed upon James, as the ſon of a queen who died a martyr to their religion; and mighty expectations were formed of his reviving the ſupremacy of the holy ſee in England. Accordingly, ambaſſadors arrived from almoſt all the catholic princes and ſtates to congratulate the king on his acceſſion to the throne, and enter into new treaties, as well as form freſh alliances with him. Among the reſt, Henry IV. of France, willing to ſound his inclinations, ſent over the marquis of Roſne, afterwards created duke of Sully, the moſt celebrated politician in the French court.

This ambaſſador, whoſe conſequence was much raiſed by his own merit, and extenſive power and dominion over his maſter, propoſed a league with the king of England in conjunction with Venice, the United Provinces, and the northern potentates, to invade the Auſtrian dominions on all ſides, and humble the lawleſs ambition of that arrogant family. But as the penetration of the French ambaſſador ſoon diſcerned that James was averſe to the noiſe and tumult of war, he was obliged to deſiſt from his former propoſal, and to concert meaſures with the Engliſh miniſtry for the ſecurity of the United Provinces. It was therefore agreed between the powers of France and England, that James and Henry ſhould permit the Dutch to raiſe troops in their reſpective dominions; and ſhould ſupply the republic with the ſum of one million, four hundred thouſand livres a year, for the maintenance of their forces; that the whole ſum ſhould be advanced by Henry, but that the third part ſhould be deducted for a debt due by him to Elizabeth; and that if the Spaniards attacked either of the princes, they ſhould aſſiſt each other; Henry with an army of ten thouſand men, and James with an army of ſix thouſand.

A treaty founded on ſo ſolid a baſis, and confirmed by articles apparently advantageous to the reſpective parties concerned, ſeemed to promiſe a permanent peace, and the continuance of thoſe bleſſings with which it is generally attended. But as human affairs are ever fluctuating, amidſt a moſt profound tranquillity, both foreign and domeſtic, ſome noblemen about the perſon of the king received intelligence that a plot was formed to overturn the government, and to place upon the throne of England, lady Arabella Stuart, nearly allied to the king, and deſcended equally with him from Henry VII. But as there is no authentic account upon record, ſo the whole is merely conjectural, and founded only on what could be gathered from the report of the times. The principal perſons concerned in it, are ſaid to have been Watſon and Clarke, two popiſh prieſts, lord Grey, a puritan, lord Cobham, a man of a wavering and impetuous temper, together with Sir Walter Raleigh, and Sir Edward Parham. It appears very ſtrange, that Raleigh, who had ever ſtrenuouſly exerted himſelf againſt Spain, ſhould act in confederacy with papiſts; yet it is recorded, that he and Cobham were particularly charged with promoting the cauſe of popery, by diſtributing a very conſiderable ſum of money among the diſaffected in England. As Raleigh, Grey and Cobham, were generally believed, after the demiſe of Elizabeth, to have oppoſed the ſucceſſion of James, till conditions ſhould be ſettled with him, they were extremely obnoxious to the court and miniſtry; hence ſome have inferred, that this plot was merely a contrivance of Cecil, in order to rid himſelf of his old friends, who were now become his inveterate enemies. But in fact, nothing can be inferred with preciſion, or deduced with any reaſonable ground from the detail, either abſtractedly or generally conſidered; as for its motley repreſentation, and the jarring principles and intereſts of the parties ſuppoſed to be concerned, it bears very little ſemblance of truth.

The old diſputes between the proteſtant and popiſh parties, were now revived. The latter upon the acceſſion of James, flattered themſelves that the papal ſupremacy would be reſtored in England: but as he gave them to underſtand the contrary, which equally diſguſted the papiſts, as it gave encouragement to the proteſtants.

A. D. 1604. To adjuſt theſe matters in an amicable peaceable manner, the king appointed a meeting of the reſpective parties at Hampton-court, to proceed to a debate on the different topics. The conference was held in the beginning of this year, and the king, who took a conſiderable part in it, gave ſtrong proofs of his theological knowledge, and ſpoke with great preciſion and weight of argument on the ſubject. The puritans vainly imagined, that their ſovereign, who had been educated in Scotland, and profeſſed a ſincere attachment to the church there eſtabliſhed, would at leaſt mitigate the ſeverity of ſome laws enacted againſt them; but they were extremely miſtaken in their conjecture, for James, having obſerved in many of the puritanical clergy, a ſtrong republican ſpirit, and an averſion to monarchy as well as hierarchy, determined to prevent the ſpreading of that ſect.

The reſult of this debate after a variety of propoſitions were ſtated, arguments adduced, and inferences drawn, by the advocates for the hierarchy on the one part, and thoſe of the puritanical ſect on the other, it was the king's decided opinion in favour of the former, to the general diſguſt of the latter, which was not a little augmented by his majeſty's enforcing the cauſe of the hierarchy by citing one of his favourite maxims, "no biſhop, no king." The puritans petitioned titioned the king, notwithstanding his late rigorous behaviour towards them, for greater liberty and indulgencies; but as he was attached to the contrary principles, all their remonstrances and petitions were ineffectual.

However attached James might appear to the hierarchy, or even the papal supremacy, he could by no means admit of the jesuitical tenet of the pope's unlimited power over crowned heads. As he therefore deemed it necessary, for the number of his subjects who were zealously attached to the reformed religion, to proceed in some respect against the papists, a proclamation was published, commanding all jesuits and other catholics, having any orders from foreign powers, to depart the kingdom within a limited time. But as a kind of salvo for this rigorous edict, his subjects in other matters, were left to their own entire option as to the embracing or rejecting of any doctrine, tenet, or ceremony, from which his attachment to the popish religion was inferred by all dispassionate, thinking persons, who saw through his duplicity and ambiguity in the whole transaction. But the policy, ambiguity, fallacy and inconsistency of this monarch, may be best drawn from a due attention to the following speech delivered in parliament, and cited here as forcibly illustrative of his general character.

"When I have done all that I can for you, I do "nothing but that which I am bound to, and am "accountable to God should I do the contrary; "for I acknowledge, that the greatest and most "essential difference between a rightful king and "an usurping tyrant, is this; that whereas the "proud and ambitious tyrant doth think, that his "kingdom and people are only ordained for the "gratification of his desires and unreasonable ap-"petites; the righteous and just king doth, on the "contrary, acknowledge, that he himself is only "ordained for promoting the wealth of his people, "and that his greatest and principal happiness must "consist in their prosperity. If you be rich, I "cannot be poor; if you be happy, I cannot be "unfortunate; and I protest, that your welfare "shall be the constant object of my study and at-"tention. That I am a servant is most true, and "that as I am head and governor of all the people "in my dominions, considering them in number "and in different ranks; so if we will take the "people as one body and mass, then as the head is "ordained for the body, and not the body for the "head, so must a righteous king acknowledge "himself to be ordained for his people, and not "his people for him; for although a king and peo-"ple be relative, yet can he be no king if he want "people and subjects. But there be many people "in the world that want a king; wherefore, I will "never be ashamed to confess it my principal ho-"nour, to be the great servant of the common-"wealth, and ever think the prosperity thereof "my greatest felicity, as I have already ob-"served."

From this speech it is evident, that the principles of James concerning the duties of a rational being placed in authority, and entrusted with the government of mankind, were, upon the whole, justly founded; though they appear to have had very little or no influence over his general conduct and character. It affords, indeed, a lesson of instruction to the greatest monarch, who by following the same, must ensure renown and affection to themselves, and liberty and happiness to their subjects, which can never be more effectually promoted than by an equipoize of prerogative in the one scale, and privilege in the other.

Notwithstanding the excellent maxims inculcated in this speech, it was so far from answering the purpose of a general conciliation of parties, that it incurred the displeasure of all but the zealous partizans of the church of England, whose principal aim was to ruin the interest of the Puritans. Nor was it long before the practices of James, which, from their being diametrically opposite to those maxims of government he had laid down in his speech, proved the fallacy and duplicity of the royal author: nay, such was his conduct, that the Protestants in general began to suspect his attachment to popery. Indeed he soon began to aver his principles openly; for when he issued writs for summoning the parliament, he published a proclamation, enjoining his subjects not to chuse any outlaw for their representative, and added, "If "any person take upon him the place of a "knight, citizen, or burgess, not being duly "elected, according to the laws and statutes in "that case made and provided, he shall be fined "and imprisoned for the same."

Nothing could more effectually tend to sap the foundation of the liberty of the subject, than an edict, vesting the king's proclamation with the authority of a statute constitutionally passed throughout both houses of parliament, and stamped with the royal signets, and more especially, as, upon this occasion, touching the right of election. Sir Francis Goodwin being declared duly elected knight of the shire for the county of Bucks, after a full hearing of a petition of Sir John Fortescue, the king commanded the commons to re-consider the case, and to hold a conference with the judges, though they had refused to treat with the lords on the subject. He peremptorily enjoined this anti-constitutional conference, and in issuing his mandate, adopted the phrase "absolute king," which the commons very naturally construed as designed to introduce arbitrary and despotic measures, and, in fact, overturn the former system of government; however, for the present, to gratify the king, they appointed a committee to hold a conference with the judges on the subject of the legality of the late election. But James, to evade what he might deem inexpedient to enforce so suddenly, proposed to reject the petitions of the present claimants, and issue a writ for the choice of another representative.

The grand point agitated in this session was, the proposed union of the kingdoms of England and Scotland; but the late arbitrary and illegal proceedings so disgusted the members, that no remonstrances nor arguments could prevail upon them to agree to his favourite scheme, though he ordered himself to be proclaimed king of Great Britain, and quartered the cross of St. Andrew with that of St. George in the English flag. When the king, therefore, found he could not bring them to compliance, according to his usual custom, he exerted the royal prerogative, and having, in a sullen style, informed them that he stood in need of no pecuniary aid, gave orders to the chancellor for their prorogation.

A due attention to the general conduct of this prince respecting both his words and actions, cannot fail to discover a prevailing disposition, not only to the exertion of despotic power, but the revival of its detestable appendage, popish superstition.

This

This is evident not meerly from the treaty concluded and ſigned at London between England and Spain, but from the immediate recall, on his acceſſion, of all the letters of marque granted by queen Elizabeth, before terms of peace had been even propoſed on the part of Spain; as if, becauſe king of Scotland, he had finiſhed the war between the two kingdoms, without any articles of treaty or agreement. Unhappily for James, his puſillanimity, his indolence, and his love of amuſement, ever prevented him from making any progreſs in the knowledge or practice of foreign politics, and, in a ſhort time, leſſened that regard which the neighbouring nations had paid to his illuſtrious predeceſſor. Indeed, from the whole tenor of his proceedings, and particularly a partial attachment to adulatory ſycophants, now ſelected as objects of his favorable regard, he gave great diſguſt to his Engliſh ſubjects in general.

A. D. 1605. This year ſtands memorable in the annals of hiſtory, for a tranſaction that blots the principles which ſuggeſted it, and the characters of the miſcreants who undertook the plan and execution of it, with an indelible ſtigma. It was ſuggeſted by popiſh malice, and undertaken by popiſh bigots and deſperadoes by them ſuborned.

Many of the adherents to the Catholic cauſe, having been diſappointed in their expectations of favour and indulgence on the acceſſion of king James to the throne of England, entered into a confederacy for exterminating at one fatal ſtroke, the king, royal family, and the major part of the members of both houſes of parliament, by an exploſion of gunpowder, and this diabolical plan was from thence denominated, "The gun-powder plot."

Some of the conſpirators were men of birth and fortune; and one Cateſby, who had a large eſtate, had already expended a conſiderable ſum in ſeveral voyages to the court of Spain, in order to introduce an army of Spaniards into England, for overturning the then government, and introducing the Roman catholic religion; but being diſappointed in his deſign, he communicated this plan to Piercy, a deſcendant of the illuſtrious houſe of Northumberland, who, at firſt, propoſed in preference the aſſaſſination of the king, but was ſoon brought over to the more effectual ſcheme of the gun-powder plot, as comprizing the whole circle of their enemies.

The leaders of the confederacy having now unanimouſly agreed upon the means of executing their horrid deſign, imparted the ſame to the whole cabal, who were bound to ſecrecy by the moſt ſolemn oaths, regardleſs of the dire conſequences of ſo fatal a project.

Some indeed from a ſcrupulous regard for thoſe of the ſame perſuaſion, obſerved, that in the execution of the ſcheme, many Catholics muſt fall, either as members of parliament or belonging to the king's ſuite; but Teſmond, a jeſuit, and Garnet, ſuperior of that order in England, ſoon ſilenced their doubts, and convinced them that the ſacred cauſe required that the innocent muſt in this caſe be ſacrificed with the guilty. Theſe conſultations were held in the ſpring and ſummer of the preceeding year, and intended to have been carried into execution towards the cloſe of the preſent.

It had been determined by the confederates, that Piercy, who at that time belonged to the band of penſioners, ſhould hire a houſe contiguous to the ſpot, on which the grand aſſembly of the nation was to be convened; ſo that by means of communication, they might undermine that very place, and there lay the preparatory train of powder. Every art and ſtratagem was deviſed, that could prevent ſuſpicion, or expedite the work, in the proſecution of which they were ſo indefatigable, that in a ſhort time they had dug ſo far through the wall, as to be able to hear a noiſe on the other ſide.

For the neceſſary purpoſe of diſguiſe, Guy Fawkes, who had ſerved in the Spaniſh army, upon this occaſion perſonated Piercy's footman, and was diſpatched to make enquiry, and returned with the favourable report, that a noiſe proceeded from a vault below the houſe of lords; that a magazine of coals had been kept there, and that when the coals were ſold off, the vault would be let to the higheſt bidder. The opportunity was immediately ſeized; the place hired by Piercy; thirty-ſix barrels of gun-powder depoſited in it; the whole concealed with faggots and billets; the doors of the cellar boldly thrown open and every body allowed acceſs, as if it contained nothing dangerous or unuſual. In order to obviate effectually every barrier that might oppoſe their deſign of extirpating the whole royal family, it was reſolved to aſſaſſinate the young duke of York, and immediately to proclaim the infant princeſs Elizabeth queen of England. The period fixed upon for the perpetration of this horrid maſſacre, was the fifth of November, but the execution was prevented by a providential ſtroke unforeſeen by this accurſed cabal.

One of the conſpirators, deſirous of ſaving the life of lord Monteagle, a Catholic, ſon to lord Morley, wrote to him, warning him to avoid coming to the houſe. Struck with ſuch alarming information, lord Monteagle heſitated for ſome time, but at length deemed it moſt expedient to lay the matter before lord Saliſbury, ſecretary of ſtate, who was as much perplexed concerning it, as the nobleman from whom he had received the intelligence, till he came to a reſolution of laying it officially before the king. James, conceiving the import to bear too great a ſemblance of truth, laid the letter before the council, who unanimouſly concurring in the neceſſity of inveſtigating an affair ſo very momentous, on Monday the fourth of November, the earl of Suffolk, lord chamberlain, whoſe office it was to ſee all things prepared for the king's coming, taking lord Monteagle with him, entered the vault, where he obſerved great piles of wood and faggots. As there appeared a greater quantity than the landlord could poſſibly want for his own uſe, the chamberlain enquired of him, to whom all that wood belonged; and being informed that it was the property of one Mr. Piercy, he began to entertain ſuſpicions; knowing him to be a rigid papiſt, and further perſuaded, as that was not his reſidence, he could have no domeſtic uſe for ſo extraordinary a ſtock of wood.

To make trial, however, of the ground of their ſuſpicions, notice was ſent to Sir Thomas Knever, a neighbouring juſtice of the peace, who appointing a proper guard of ſoldiers to be ready, went with them to the ſpot at the dead of night, and at the entrance of the vault, met Fawkes juſt coming out, having completed all his preparations. The guard immediately ſeized him, and removing the faggots, diſcovered the powder. The matches and every thing neceſſary for firing the train, were found in the pockets of Fawkes; but the hardened and intrepid villain, conſcious that he had no hopes of mercy, daringly avowed his deſign, and expreſſed the the utmoſt regret that he had not carried it into execution. When brought before the council, he behaved in the ſame refractory manner, nor could promiſes or threats make him diſcover one of his aſſociates, declaring "he was ready to die, and "had rather ſuffer ten thouſand deaths, than wil-"lingly accuſe his maſter or any other." This obſtinacy continued for two or three days; but being impriſoned, his reſolution at length failed, and he revealed the whole plot. Lord Saliſbury, who left upon record a circumſtantial narrative of this infernal tranſaction, ſeems to give the earl of Suffolk, lord chamberlain, the whole merit of the diſcovery, frankly acknowledging for his own part, that he could not conceive it poſſible for ſo infernal a deſign to enter the heart of man.

Various was the fate of the miſcreant confederates. Cateſby, Piercy, and others, being informed of the diſcovery, fled into Warwickſhire; where Sir Everard Digby was already in arms, in order to ſeize the princeſs Elizabeth; but this deſign was prevented by her taking refuge in Coventry; and the whole body haſtily repaired to Holbeach, the ſeat of Sir Stephen Littleton, on the borders of Staffordſhire. Here they were beſet by the high ſheriff of the county at the head of a numerous guard; and their caſe being deſperate, they boldly determined to ſell their lives as dearly as poſſible to the aſſailants. Cateſby and Piercy fell upon the ſpot; Digby and ſeveral others of inferior note, were taken priſoners, conveyed to London, and after trial publicly executed. The earl of Northumberland was fined thirty thouſand pounds, becauſe among the grounds of ſuſpicion, he had admitted Piercy into the band of gentlemen penſioners, without tendering him the cuſtomary oaths. The lord Monteagle had a conſiderable penſion for life, as a reward for his diligence in tracing and finally diſcovering this horrid conſpiracy.

Such was the infatuated attachment of the king to popiſh principles, that in defiance of this flagrant evidence of the diabolic malignity of their influence, he ſtill entertained the ſtrongeſt prepoſſeſſion in their favour, as appeared by his ſpeech to the parliament on the 9th of November. On this occaſion he obſerved, that though the conſpirators had been induced to undertake the horrid attempt, it ſhould not be thence inferred that Catholics in general were capable of ſo atrocious and complicated a crime; adding, that while with one hand he chaſtized the guilty, with the other he would ſtill protect and ſupport the innocent. Though this declaration might argue an apparent liberality of ſentiment, common preſervation muſt have dictated the neceſſity of prudent caution at ſuch a juncture.

A. D. 1606. The prodigality of James was ſuch, added to his partiality for favorites, that notwithſtanding the continual grant of conſiderable ſupplies from his parliament, his finances were ever in a reduced ſtate.

The ſeſſion opened on the 22d of January, and the topic which principally engroſſed attention, was the propoſed union of the two kingdoms; but this could not be effected by the moſt preſſing inſtances of the king, enforced by an excellent ſpeech delivered by Sir Francis Bacon, ſolicitor-general; as the people continued to perſiſt in their prejudices, and avow their hatred to the Scottiſh nation. An act was then paſſed for a more ſtrict execution of the laws againſt popiſh recuſants, and a mitigation of thoſe enacted againſt the Proteſtants. The king, contrary to his inclination, was compelled to affix the royal ſignature to this act, to gratify the parliament for their generous ſupplies.

A. D. 1607. Commotions were excited this year in various parts of the kingdom, at the inſtance of one John Reynolds, and proclamations were iſſued, commanding the rebels to diſperſe; but, as they did not obey, a party was ſent to chaſtize them, which they effected with ſhedding as little blood as poſſible. At length, in conſequence of a promiſe that their grievances ſhould be redreſſed, they ſubmitted, and ſeveral of the ringleaders were convicted of high treaſon and executed.

Theſe commotions were however trifling in their nature and conſequences to the alarming inſurrections, which were revived in Ireland, where the earls of Tyrone and Tyrconnel had conſpired to ſeize the caſtle of Dublin, and to make a general maſſacre of the Engliſh families ſettled in that kingdom. Their deſign being diſcovered, a relation of Tyrone was inſtigated to commence a ſuit againſt him, for part of his eſtate; and the council of Ireland, pretending that the cauſe was too weighty for their deciſion, referred it to that of England, hoping that Tyrone might be brought thither and impriſoned in the Tower; but he excuſed himſelf from the journey, and offered to ſend over his papers, by a perſon who perfectly underſtood his concerns. This arch-rebel during the former as well as preſent reign, found means however to evade the ſtroke of juſtice, by flying to the ſanctuary of the papal ſee, in which aſylum, he ſoon after paid the debt of nature.

A. D. 1608. Nothing memorable occurred this year, except ſome inſtances of ſeverity exerciſed towards a few of the principals of the Romiſh church; and the death of Thomas Sackville, earl of Dorſet, who was ſucceeded in his poſt of lord treaſurer, by Robert Cecil, earl of Saliſbury, a convenient tool for ſupplying the king in immenſe ſums to proſtitute on his ſycophants and countrymen.

A. D. 1609. This year commenced with an event that affected the intereſts of the different potentates of Europe. This was the concluſion of a war which had been proſecuted between Spain and the United States, for a great courſe of years, and which was now terminated by means of the powers of England and France. It was an act not of choice, but compulſion on the part of the Spaniſh monarch, who, alarmed at the increaſe of the naval power of the Hollanders, reluctantly conſented to acknowledge their independence.

James now attempted to enforce the doctrine of paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance, by patronizing literary eſſays on that ſubject, and retaining ſome hirelings to propagate notions repugnant to the liberties of his Engliſh ſubjects.

A. D. 1610. The king was deſirous of obtaining a ſupply, and the commons were determined to circumſcribe his exorbitant prerogative. Saliſbury, who was lately advanced to the exalted ſtation of lord treaſurer, in order to enforce the grant of a ſupply, repreſented the king's gracious intention of redreſſing the grievances of his people, the vaſt ſums expended in keeping a formidable armament, and quelling the late rebellion in Ireland. To theſe arguments, he added the three numerous houſholds, which the king was obliged to maintain, for himſelf, for the queen, and for the prince of Wales; and affirmed, that Elizabeth, during her reign, had made great appropriations of the crown lands; an expedient, which though it ſupplied her preſent wants, without burthening her people, extremely increaſed the neceſſities of her ſucceſſor. Theſe, with many other inſtances, he cited, and from them inferred the indiſpenſable expediency of an immediate ſubſidy.

But this eloquent parade of a pliant miniſter by no means exempted his maſter from the cenſure of exceſſive prodigality; however, the parliament declined an abſolute refuſal, and voted him one ſubſidy and one fifteenth, which would hardly amount to one hundred thouſand pounds, and was not the ſixth part of what had been demanded on the preſent occaſion, wiſely arguing, that the nation being then in a ſtate of profound peace at home and abroad, its exigencies could neither be ſo numerous nor ſo preſſing, as they had neceſſarily been in times of war and inteſtine commotions. The king's deſire of creating his eldeſt ſon Henry, prince of Wales, gave riſe to warm parliamentary debates during the courſe of this ſeſſion. Several objections were ſtarted to this creation, as by the profuſions of late reigns, the revenues of that principality were greatly diminiſhed. The debts of the crown were urged as ſo many reaſons why the expences of the king ought not to be increaſed, and it was inſinuated to him, that the juriſdiction of a prince of Wales, when exerciſed by him in perſon, would claſh with that of the crown of England. But theſe arguments had no force with the king, who therefore peremptorily created his ſon prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Cheſter, and ſettled upon him an immenſe income to ſupport the dignity of his blood and titles.

The prince maintained an amiable character, poſſeſſing many accompliſhments mental and perſonal, and purſuing ſuch ſtudies and manly exerciſes, as were neceſſary to form him for the important and elevated rank, which he ſeemed by Providence deſigned to fill.

The attention of Europe was ſoon called to an extraordinary event that happened in France. This was the aſſaſſination of Henry IV. by the poniard of a fanatic named Ravaillac. This prince, who had acquired univerſal fame for his valour and wiſdom, was on the point of atchieving a grand exploit, which would have altered the face of things in Europe, when his noble deſign was prevented by a frantic enthuſiaſt, who ſacrificed his own life, and that of the prince, to his unbounded bigotry and unreaſonable prejudices. The villain, on his examination, boldly confeſſed aſſaſſinating the king, becauſe he did not take up arms againſt the Hugonots, and affirmed, that his making war againſt the pope, was the ſame as making war againſt God.

The king of England ſecretly approved the cauſe for which the aſſaſſin was executed; however, as the Jeſuits were univerſally ſuppoſed to be concerned in it, in order to remove ſo dangerous a ſet of men from his perſon, he iſſued a proclamation, commanding all Jeſuits to quit the kingdom, and all recuſants to keep themſelves at the diſtance of ten miles from the court. He then cauſed the juſtices of peace in all the counties to adminiſter the oath of allegiance which had paſſed in the third year of his reign, and which, without regard to any particular religion, eſtabliſhed the independency of the crown againſt the court of Rome, and all other powers whatever.

Though James, from his general conduct and adminiſtration of government was extremely cenſureable, he acquired much popularity this year by exerting a laudable care for the trade and navigation of the nation, encouraging ingenious men to make diſcoveries, erecting large ſtore-houſes, and, by his direction, bringing naval architecture into a greater perfection than it ever had been known in England, or perhaps in Europe. But after all theſe ſtrenuous endeavours to promote the opulence and dignity of the nation, ſo exceſſive had been his profuſion, that from the exigencies of the ſtate, it was found expedient to call the parliament together at a very early ſeaſon, and to ſtate the urgency of affairs as a plea for granting conſiderable and ſpeedy ſupplies. After long and tedious debates on that hackneyed and diſagreeable ſubject, it does not appear that any thing deciſive was reſolved upon; however, it may be inferred from the king's diſſolving it by poclamation, after a ſeſſion of about ten weeks, that their proceedings were not highly approved by the ſovereign.

A. D. 1611. A foreign incident occurred this year concerning ſome religious matters, which appeared greatly to intereſt king James, and rouzed him to the exertion of his utmoſt ability as well as reſolution. Indeed, it eventually proved of the utmoſt moment to the ſtates of Europe in general.

The famous theologiſt Arminius had been choſen divinity-profeſſor at Leyden, and had been accuſed by the diſciples of Calvin, with aſſerting the doctrine of free-will, and denying that of predeſtination.

The diſciples of Arminius before the death of their leader in 1608, ſeemed to have the beſt of the argument. He was ſucceeded by Vorſtius, who had publiſhed ſeveral treatiſes in defence of Arminian principles. But as he advanced ſome tenets repugnant to the opinion of king James, who was a mighty caſuiſt in theological matters, he officiouſly influenced the ſtates to deprive him of his profeſſorſhip, though he deſiſted from any further proſecution, charitably hinting "that he left the burning of Vorſtius for his blaſphemies and atheiſm "to their chriſtian wiſdom, though he was perſuaded that no heretic ever more deſerved the "flames." The States, however, had too much of the milk of humanity, as well as the genuine ſpirit of chriſtianity, to condemn a man for his private opinion, and therefore raiſed the profeſſor to a higher rank in another univerſity.

After the diſſolution of the laſt parliament, ſo obnoxious to the king, nothing prevailed at court, but hilarity, diſſipation, and profuſion. To gratify his majeſty, who had ever a propenſity to a favorite (from what motive we are not to determine) ſome ſycophants around his perſon introduced to him one Robert Carr, a young Scot of an ancient and honourable family. This youth attracted the notice of his majeſty, by happening to break his leg by a fall from his horſe in a tournament. James, ſtruck with the perſon of the unfortunate adventurer, paid him a viſit while he lay ill of the fracture, and ſo rapid was the progreſs of his regard, that, upon his recovery, he became the growing favourite at court. His perſon was handſome, his years not above twenty; he was extremely ambitious, but profoundly ignorant; in ſhort, he was a compound of every vice that can diſgrace human nature. Honours and riches were ſoon heaped upon this minion, and he quickly became the channel, through which all favours paſſed from the king to his ſubjects. On the ninth of April, he was advanced to the dignity of viſcount Rocheſter, and treaſurer of Scotland, and afterwards inſtalled knight of the garter.

But this ſeaſon of feſtivity, indolence, and the indulgence of the ignoble paſſions, was ſucceeded by an event, which will ever reflect honour on that part of the reign of this monarch at leaſt, in which it happened. This was the ſettlement of Ireland, in which he had been ſeriouſly engaged, ever ſince his acceſſion to the throne of England, to effect which he purſued a ſteady, regular, and uniform plan, inſomuch, that in the ſpace of nine years, he made greater progreſs in civilizing that kingdom, than had been made in all the time which had elapſed ſince the conqueſt had been firſt attempted. To conciliate the minds of the people to his perſon and government, he paſſed an act of oblivion as to former inſurrections and commotions, allowed them the ſame privileges as the ſubjects of England, and purſued ſuch a plan of ſound policy, as promoted a total reformation both in their manners and commerce, and thereby tended to the mutual advantage of both countries.

A. D. 1612. To this James added another inſtance of prudence and juſtice, that does honor to his character. Lord Sanquar, a Scottiſh nobleman, had baſely aſſaſſinated one Turner his fencing maſter; in conſequence of which, petitions were preferred to the king, to obtain his pardon. But James, ſenſible of the odium he had incurred from an evident partiality to his countrymen, determined not only to wipe off that ſtigma, but, by an act of juſtice in the execution of a murderer, evince his regard to thoſe laws which are the bulwark of government; ſo that he was deaf to all entreaty, and the delinquent was brought to condign puniſhment.

In the courſe of this year, Frederic V. elector palatine, in conſequence of a treaty of marriage negociating between him and the princeſs Elizabeth, James's daughter, arrived in England on the ſixteenth of October. He was magnificently entertained, but the ſolemnization of the nuptials was deferred, on account of the ſudden and unexpected death of Henry, prince of Wales, who, by his many excellent endowments, had engaged the eſteem of the whole nation. As a proof of his penetration to diſcern, and a diſpoſition to reward merit, he highly eſteemed Sir Walter Raleigh, and it was his common ſaying, "ſure no king but my father would keep ſuch a bird in the cage." James has been cenſured by ſome writers as acceſſary to the death of prince Henry, but ſuch opinion being merely conjectural, the charge is therefore without foundation. Indeed it might probably ariſe from the diſregard his father ſhewed to the memory of the deceaſed, by prohibiting even a court mourning upon ſo public and intereſting an occaſion as the demiſe of the heir apparent.

A. D. 1613. Early in the ſpring the marriage of the princeſs Elizabeth with Frederic V. was celebrated with the utmoſt pomp and magnificence, preparations having been made for the ſame during the courſe of ſome preceding months. The elector had been previouſly inſtalled knight of the garter and raiſed to other honours and dignities becoming his rank as united to a princeſs of England. But this marriage, though extremely agreeable to the nation, was productive of many calamities, both to the king and his ſon-in-law. As the elector, elated by ſo great an alliance, embarked in enterprizes beyond his ſtrength, and the king, deſirous of aſſiſting him in his diſtreſs, made ſuch unreaſonable demands, as incurred the univerſal diſpleaſure of his people.

While the attention of James was engroſſed by the nuptials of his daughter, a private ſcene was acting which occaſioned great clamour throughout the kingdom. To complete the happineſs of the minion Rocheſter, nothing ſeemed wanting but a female partner, and where high fortune concurred with all the graces of external form, ſuch an attainment was not eaſily to be accompliſhed. But this very circumſtance, inſtead of gratifying the vanity and ambition of the favourite, eventually baniſhed him the court, and conſigned him, during the remainder of his life, to that oblivion and penury from which he had been taken.

The king, compaſſionating the misfortunes of the noble families of Howard and Devereux, reſtored young Eſſex to his paternal honours and eſtates, and promoted the marriage of the earl with lady Frances Howard, daughter to the earl of Suffolk; but as they were too young for cohabitation, the earl was ſent on his travels, in order to finiſh his education. During his abſence, viſcount Rocheſter became enamoured of the lady, and had gained ſuch an aſcendancy over her, that, when on the earl's return, after an interval of four years, he claimed the privileges of a huſband with all the impatience of youthful ardour, ſhe treated him with the greateſt coldneſs and indifference.

With juſt reſentment at ſuch behaviour, the earl gave her up as a woman unworthy the honour of a conjugal alliance; indeed, the grand motive of his rejecting her was his diſcovery of her partiality for the deſpicable minion Rocheſter. The counteſs, not ſatisfied with being the miſtreſs of Rocheſter, eagerly wiſhed to be his wife, and being now loſt to all ſenſe of honour and virtue, ſhe prevailed on her paramour to uſe his influence with the king, in order to procure her divorce from Eſſex. An affair of ſuch importance could not be accompliſhed without conſulting Sir Thomas Overbury, a man of integrity, ſagacity, and experience, to whom Rocheſter was wont to communicate all his ſecrets. That faithful counſellor was alarmed at the propoſal, and employed every argument to divert his friend from ſo abſurd and baſe an attempt. Rocheſter had the weakneſs to report the converſation to the counteſs of Eſſex, who in the fury of her reſentment, wrought upon him to doom to deſtruction his worthy monitor, for this inſtance of his ſincere and cordial regard.

To carry this horrid deſign into execution, Rocheſter intimated to the king, that Overbury, by his blunt and peremptory manner of behaviour, had rendered himſelf obnoxious to him, and other favourites at court, and therefore, in order to remove him, propoſed that he might be ſent ambaſſador to Ruſſia. The king, not ſuſpecting the real deſign, immediately appointed Sir Thomas to the embaſſy; but the perfidious Rocheſter perſuaded him to reject the propoſal, under pretence of not being able to ſupport his abſence, and having ſucceeded in his deſign, repreſented the matter to the king in ſuch a light, that a warrant was granted for ſending him to the Tower, as a gentle puniſhment for his diſobedience. Sir Jervais Elwis, the lieutenant of the Tower, was one of Rocheſter's creatures, and therefore not only ſubjected Overbury to the moſt rigorous treatment, but after having almoſt reduced him to a ſtate of deſpair, by the moſt barbarous practices for ſix months together, ſuborned ſome villains to take him off by poiſon.

Having perpetrated this infernal deſign, and thereby obviated a barrier to the accompliſhment of of their desires, they determined to prosecute their designs, and the earl of Northampton, uncle to the countess, who had been prevailed on to further their impious purpose, sollicited the king in behalf of his neice, and at length, by the most scandalous means, obtained a divorce, on pretence of debility on the part of the earl of Essex, but, in reality, to gratify the lady and her infamous paramour.

As a token of the continuance of his attachment to Rochester, the king, immediately after the divorce, not only granted him his permission to espouse the countess; but also created him earl of Somerset, thereby adding royal sanction to the most flagitious proceedings.

James sustained a great loss in his councils and government in general, by the death of that able statesman, Cecil, earl of Salisbury, a man deeply versed in the genius, politics and constitution of the English nation, and consequently capable of admonishing and directing a prince constantly tossed about by impetuous passions.

The earl of Suffolk, his successor, was by no means adequate to the office of raising supplies for the exigencies of a profuse, voluptuous prince. The late treasurer had projected a scheme to raise money by the creation of baronets, and two hundred patents had been purchased by private gentlemen for so many thousand pounds. But as this project did not answer the purpose, recourse was had from necessity to the old expedient of application to parliament.

A. D. 1614. As the public finances were almost exhausted, the ministry were under a necessity of exerting their utmost efforts to procure a majority to vote the supplies for the ensuing year. But the people were in general so disgusted by the arbitrary, as well as dissolute measures of the king, that instead of granting a supply, they resumed the subject which had been canvassed in the last parliament, and exclaimed against the king's usurpation, in pretending to levy new customs by the meer authority of prerogative.

The period of retaliation on the head of the infamous favorite the earl of Somerset, now approached. He had indeed found means to avert the stroke of justice for the murder of his faithful counsellor Sir Thomas Overbury, but now began to feel the stings of remorse; those attractive qualities which captivated his royal patron were upon the decline, and when he could no longer contribute to his gratification, he was no longer the object of his regard.

A. D. 1615. As enemies and ambition are mischievous fiends, which incessantly infest the purlieus of courts, it is not to be wondered that the enemies of Somerset, who, of course must have been numerous, availed themselves of this declension of the royal favour, and introduced a new object in order to supplant the present minion. With this view, they fixed upon George Villiers, a youth possessed of a fine person, improved by a genteel air and fashionable apparel. The glaring object was placed, at a comedy which was performed at Cambridge, full in the view of the king, and immediately engaged his attention, and most profound regard. The junto, perceiving that James was touched, pursued their success, and even prevailed upon the queen, and Abbot, archbishop of Canterbury, to recommend the youth to the king's farther notice, who, embracing this sanction to his wishes, no longer restrained the visible tokens of his regard, but sent for him to court, and there retained him as one of his cup-bearers. In this situation he daily grew in the esteem of the courtiers, and the king's attachment to him was carried to a degree of folly, though he still thought it requisite to keep up a shew of regard for his old favourite Somerset, who, being assured that he must be supplanted in the royal favour by the introduction of a youth of elegant form and engaging mien and behaviour, wisely anticipated the probable consequences of his dismission by imploring at the hands of the king, a general pardon for his past conduct. His majesty immediately complied with the petition, and signed the pardon, but the lord chancellor, averse to so infamous a character, refused to pass it, and informed the queen of the contents. Upon this refusal, the whole party against Somerset concluded they must make their last effort, and the discovery of his guilt in the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury, soon involved him in all the ruin and infamy which they could desire or he deserve. Sir Ralph Winwood, secretary of state, having obtained the knowledge of the murder from the apothecary's servant, who had prepared the poison, imparted the matter to the king, and the lieutenant being questioned on the fact, gave visible signs of guilt, and at length, acknowledged that he knew of some attempts being made against the life of Sir Thomas Overbury. Circumstances which amounted almost to absolute conviction.

Matters being carried thus far, the king, to exempt himself from suspicion of being accessary to so a heinous a transaction, gave orders to Sir Edward Coke to investigate the affair fully and impartially; in consequence of which the whole of the plot was revealed: the lesser criminals, Sir Jervais Elwis, lieutenant of the Tower, together with some inferior accessaries, were first tried and found guilty; as were afterwards Somerset and his countess.

The inferior agents were brought to condign punishment; but, to the disgrace of humanity, the principals, who were the late favourite and his iniquitous consort, obtained pardons, and were, after some years imprisonment, restored to their liberty, and indulged with a pardon, with which they retired into the country, and languished the rest of their days in infamy and obscurity. There the hand of justice overtook them, conscience arrested their guilty minds, and they lived in misery and obscurity mutual plagues to each other.

An absurd, if not criminal, attachment to favourites influenced the mind of James as powerfully as ever. Villiers succeeded to all the honours and dignities of which the former minion had been possessed, and the king gave fresh instances of an arbitrary disposition. Lord chief justice Coke was divested of his office on pretence of some trivial misdemeanours, though the real cause of his disgrace was his opposing the king, in bestowing a vacant bishopric in commendam. Coke was succeeded by Montagu, and the lord chancellor Ellesmere, being seized with a dangerous distemper, resigned the seals into the hands of the king, who kept them till his death, and then delivered them to Francis Bacon, a man eminent for his unrivalled abilities both professional and literary.

A. D. 1616. The honour conferred on the king's son in being created prince of Wales, was inferior, (considering their vast disparity in the rank of life) to the dignities heaped on Villiers, his relatives and creatures. He was raised to the title of marquis and duke of Buckingham, and appointed knight of the garter, master of the horse, warden of of the cinque ports, ſteward of Weſtminſter, conſtable of Windſor, and lord high admiral of England. His mother was created counteſs of Buckingham, his brother viſcount Purbeck, and a numerous train of needy relatives admitted to places of truſt and profit.

The king now formed a reſolution of viſiting Scotland in the ſpring of the year, in order to accompliſh a ſcheme he had formed for reducing the Scottiſh clergy to a conformity with the church of England.

After ſo long an abſence, as a kind of compliment to their ſovereign, the aſſembly of the kirk of Scotland were prevailed on to adopt ſome innovations; but theſe innovations laid the foundation of thoſe troubles, which afterwards brought ruin upon his ſon and ſucceſſor.

James at the ſame time diſguſted his Engliſh ſubjects by an attempt to revive a cuſtom, which, to the diſgrace of the chriſtian religion, ever prevailed in Romiſh countries, where the people are allowed to take their diverſion on Sundays, after the performance of divine ſervice. With this view, he publiſhed a performance, entitled "The Book of Sports," recommending all kinds of diverſions after ſermon. He commanded this book to be publicly read in all churches, and ſeverely puniſhed ſuch miniſters as refuſed to comply with his royal mandate.

Sir Walter Raleigh, a man of an enterprizing genius, and intrepid ſpirit, having been long immured in a dreary priſon, where he had rendered himſelf uſeful to the community in finiſhing ſo arduous a work as the hiſtory of the world, the people compaſſionated his caſe, and conceived the warmeſt prejudices in his favour, which being made known to the king, concurred with other circumſtances to procure his releaſe.

A. D. 1617. Sir Walter, whoſe active ſpirit was rouzed by his releaſe, ſpread a report of a golden mine which he had diſcovered in Guiana, and affirmed it to be ſufficient not only to enrich the adventurers, but alſo to bring immenſe treaſure to the government. The king, whoſe love of money was founded on his love of pleaſure, granted him a commiſſion to engage adventurers, but with this limitation, that he ſhould not injure the ſubjects of Spain; but that was abſolutely inconſiſtent with their deſign of carrying away the Spaniſh ore. Many wealthy perſons, however, embarked in this project, ſo that Raleigh, being properly ſupplied with ſhips and men, ſet ſail in the month of Auguſt in queſt of the mine. When he arrived at the river Oroonoko, he remained at the entrance with five of his largeſt ſhips, and ſent the reſt to the town of St. Thomas, under the command of his Son and captain Keymis, in whom he repoſed the moſt entire confidence. The Spaniards endeavoured to oppoſe the landing of the Engliſh, but were repulſed and driven back into the town, after young Raleigh was killed in the aſſault.

The expedition proved unſucceſsful, and in the event was the cauſe of Raleigh's untimely fate. After the fatigue of cruizing about, and long marches up the country in queſt of this mine without effect, the detachment he had ſent off returned to their commander in chief, who, vexed at the diſappointment and the loſs of his ſon, threatened Keymis with the king's diſpleaſure, and that commander, being ſoon after found dead in his cabin, was ſuppoſed to have ended his life with a piſtol. The ſailors, tired with this chimerical expedition, inſiſted upon returning to England; and when they arrived at Kinſale in Ireland, Raleigh would have perſuaded them to go with him; but inſtead of complying with his deſire, they carried him againſt his will into Plymouth, where he was arreſted by the king's order, and from thence conveyed to the Tower of London.

There were two conſiderations which rendered his death inevitable; the one was the offence given to the Spaniſh court, and the other much more important in the opinion of the king, though the conſequence of the former, was the breaking off the treaty of marriage between the prince of Wales and the Infanta, ſo that James without heſitation ſigned the warrant for putting him to death upon the former ſentence. Sir Walter, finding his fate inevitable, ſummoned up all his courage, and ſuffered with becoming compoſure and reſolution, in the old palace yard, Weſtminſter, on the twenty-ninth of October, which was ſome months after his condemnation.

A. D. 1618. James was juſtly cenſured for the inhumanity, as well as temerity of his conduct, in thus ſacrificing the life of an Engliſh ſubject, whoſe general character did honour to his country, merely to gratify the reſentment of the haughty Spaniards, and from a puſillanimous apprehenſion of the breaking off the intended match between the prince of Wales and the infanta of Spain.

Raleigh having thus fallen a ſacrifice to the mortal hatred the Spaniards had conceived againſt him, the grand point which retarded the marriage was obviated, and the articles were ſoon after drawn up at Madrid, importing, that the children of this marriage be not conſtrained in matters of religion; that the Infanta and her family be permitted the free exerciſe of their religion; that the marriage be celebrated in Spain by a procurator, and that after the Infanta's arrival in England, ſuch a ſolemnization ſhould be uſed as might render the marriage valid, according to the laws of England.

From the enormous power Villiers had acquired by his influence over the mind of his ſovereign, he was conſtantly ſurrounded by a groupe of ſycophants, who obtained promotion as they could flatter that exalted minion. Amongſt his chief favorites was Dr. John Williams, who through his intereſt was made keeper of the great ſeal, and after advanced to the archiepiſcopal ſee of York, not from any predilection for Williams on account of ſuperior piety or learning, but becauſe he could condeſcend to gratify the vanity and pride of his ambitious patron.

A. D. 1619. During theſe tranſactions, the king loſt his royal conſort, who departed this life on the firſt day of March, in the fifty-ſixth year of her age, an event that ſo ſenſibly affected him, as to bring on a melancholy which threatened his diſſolution.

Ferdinand II. ſucceeding to the Imperial throne on the demiſe of the emperor Matthias, he prepared with great vigour to aſſert the cauſe of the Catholic religion throughout his dominions. Beſides the aſſiſtance of his ſubjects, who adhered to the Romiſh faith, he attached to his intereſt a powful combination of the neighbouring potentates. Gondemar, the Spaniſh ambaſſador, who received orders to keep on the deluſion of the marriage, by means of artful inſinuations, and a large ſum of money judiciouſly diſtributed, had ſo wrought upon the king, the favourite, and the miniſters in general, that nothing was tranſacted without his advice and concurrence.

The king of England, who was deemed entirely ſubſervient to the Spaniſh court, at their inſtance, and in oppoſition to the petitions of his ſubjects, ſent an ambaſſador to treat with the emperor Ferdinand, but his deſign, from various cauſes, was rendered abortive.

Commotions on account of religion now univerſally prevailed in Germany. Tho' the emperor had declared for the Catholic cauſe, the Proteſtants entertained hopes of his being influenced to moderation at leaſt, as being nephew to prince Maurice, who had obtained an almoſt unlimited authority in the United Provinces. The ſtates of Bohemia continued their rebellion againſt Ferdinand, and inſiſting on the obſervance of all the edicts enacted in favour of the reformed religion, made Frederic an offer of their crown, and the young palatine, prompted by ambition, immediately embraced the tender, and advanced with all his forces into Bohemia to aſſert their cauſe, and that of their religion.

A. D. 1620-1. Ferdinand, alarmed at this ſudden turn of affairs, raiſed a powerful army with the utmoſt expedition, which he ſent to oppoſe Frederic in Bohemia under the command of the duke of Bavaria. Spinola aſſembled an army of thirty thouſand veterans in the Low Countries. When Edmonds, the king's reſident at Bruſſels, demanded of the archduke Albert the meaning of theſe preparations, he was told, that Spinola alone could reſolve him, and when the Engliſh miniſter applied to him, he received for anſwer, that his orders were ſealed, and therefore he muſt defer his curioſity till he was allowed to break them open.

But ſufficient information was ſoon derived from the event, for intelligence was diſpatched at one and the ſame time to England, that Frederic was totally defeated in the deciſive battle of Prague, and had fled with his family into Holland; and that Spinola had invaded the Palatinate, and meeting with no oppoſition, but from one Engliſh regiment under the command of the gallant Sir Horace Vere, ſubdued the greateſt part of that principality. During theſe ſtruggles between the partizans of the proteſtant and popiſh religion, James remained an indolent ſpectator, which expoſed him to the cenſure of the Engliſh nation, and the contempt and deriſion of all Europe. He might have afforded Frederic conſiderable aid; but diſſipation and puſillanimity ever marked his character, and at this time in particular, he was fearful of embarking in any enterprize that might diſguſt the court of Spain, and thereby be the means of breaking off favourite match, from which, without juſt foundation, he propoſed to himſelf ſuch mighty advantage.

The king, however, though he purſued meaſures diametrically oppoſite to the opinion and voice of his people, exerted himſelf with his uſual diligence to raiſe his ſubſidies. Accordingly at the very firſt meeting of parliament, he addreſſed both houſes, expatiating on his own merit and neceſſities, and demanding ſupplies for the relief of the Palatinate, in defence of which, he declared he would hazard his crown, and even the life of his ſon, ſhould he miſcarry in his endeavours to procure a reaſonable pacification.

This declaration to eſpouſe the cauſe of the Palatinate proved agreeable to the commons, who immediately granted a ſubſidy, with which the king at preſent ſeemed to be ſatisfied. They then proceeded in a very calm and deliberate manner, to examine and redreſs public grievances. They found that a patent had been granted to Sir Giles Mompeſſon and Sir Francis Michel, for licenſing public houſes, and for the ſole vending of gold and ſilver lace; by virtue of which privileges, they had been guilty of ſuch ſcandalous frauds and oppreſſions, that upon complaint to the upper houſe, they were committed to priſon, though Mompeſſon, who was Buckingham's creature, found means to eſcape, but he was degraded from the dignity of knight, and his eſtate confiſcated.

Having carried this much deſired reformation thus far, the commons proceeded in their reſearches into other abuſes of a more delicate and important nature. The ſeals were at that time in the hands of the celebrated Bacon, created lord Verulam and viſcount St. Albans, a man equally diſtinguiſhed for his genius and affability. His want of œconomy, and his indulgence to ſervants, had involved him in debt, ſo that in order to ſupply his neceſſities, he had been tempted to take bribes, and that in a very open manner, from ſuitors in chancery. Some writers have endeavoured to palliate the conduct of chancellor Bacon in this reſpect, and have affirmed that his equity in giving decrees in the court wherein he preſided, was ſo extraordinary, that they were never reverſed. But how far conſiſtent ſuch an aſſeveration can be, provided the former charge could have been ſubſtantiated muſt be evident to every reader, who is capable of judging from plain facts. Nay, as a confirmation of the validity of the charge, it appears, that he was not only committed to the Tower, but that, conſcious of his guilt, he implored the mercy of his judges, and endeavoured, by a general confeſſion, to avoid the diſgrace of a ſtricter examination. But the lords were inexorable, and inſiſted upon a full confeſſion of his miſdemeanours, which having made, he was ſentenced to pay a fine of forty thouſand pounds, to be impriſoned in the Tower, during the king's pleaſure, and to be rendered for ever incapable of any office, place, or employment. This rigid ſentence he ſurvived, and being in a little time reſtored to liberty, notwithſtanding his ſentence precluded him from acting in a public capacity, he gave ſuch glaring proofs of genius, as have immortalized his name, as the glory and ornament of his age and nation.

Parties had long before ſubſiſted, but were only diſtinguiſhed by the titles of papiſt and proteſtant. Another diviſion now took place under the denomination of Whigs and Tories. All thoſe who favoured the hierarchy of the church, and the prerogative of the crown, were denominated Tories; thoſe who maintained toleration, and the liberty of the ſubject, where called Whigs. As the court, in order to diſcourage all parliamentary oppoſition, affixed the name of Puritans to its antagoniſts, thoſe rigid aſſertors of the proteſtant cauſe, in oppoſition to popiſh doctrines, as well as popiſh ceremonies, not only admitted, but gloried in the diſtinguiſhed appellation.

James had lately, to anſwer particular purpoſes, affected ſome popular and patriotic meaſures; but from the prevalence of oppoſite principles, ſoon degenerated into proceedings that ſullied the renown he had acquired. He impriſoned Sir Edwin Sandys and Mr. Selden, without any known cauſe; perſons highly reſpected by their repreſentatives for their integrity, hoſpitality, and patriotiſm.

To add to the jealouſy and ſuſpicions of the people, the proteſtant intereſt evidently declined in Germany: the parliament, therefore, was no ſooner re-aſſembled, than the commons took into conſideration thoſe very affairs, and drew up a remonſtrance, which they propoſed to preſent to his majeſty. They there repreſented, that the growing power of the houſe of Auſtria threatened the general liberties of Europe; that the progreſs of popery in England begat the moſt alarming apprehenſions, leſt it ſhould once more gain the aſcendant in the kingdom; that the king's lenity towards the profeſſors of the Catholic religion had rendered them arrogant and preſumptuous; that the uncontrouled conqueſts made by the Auſtrian family greatly raiſed the expectation of the Engliſh papiſts, and that the proſpect of the Spaniſh match in particular, excited the moſt ſanguine hopes, if not of the final re-eſtabliſhment, at leaſt the entire toleration of their religion.

To obviate the evils which muſt neceſſarily flow from the circumſtances thus particularly ſtated, they dutifully petitioned his majeſty, that he would immediately undertake the defence of the palatine, and ſupport him by force of arms; that he would declare war againſt Spain, whoſe arms and riches were the chief bulwark of the Catholic intereſt in Europe; that he would engage in no negotiation for the marriage of his ſon, but with a Proteſtant princeſs; that the children of popiſh recuſants ſhould be taken from their parents and committed to the care of proteſtant teachers and ſchoolmaſters; and that the fines and confiſcations to which the Catholics were by law ſubjected, ſhould be exacted with the utmoſt rigour.

A petition comprizing grants ſo oppoſite to the principles, and ſubverſive of the real deſigns of the king, met with ſuch a reception as might reaſonably have been expected. It was ſent to him from London to Newmarket, where having peruſed the contents, he diſpatched a letter to the ſpeaker, in which he ſeverely reprimanded the houſe, for interfering with matters above their reach and capacity, and enjoined them, in a particular manner, not to concern themſelves with his ſon's marriage, nor to aſperſe the character of the Spaniſh monarch, nor any of his friends and confederates. To enforce this reprimand, he mentioned the impriſonment of Sir Edwin Sandys, and further declared, that he was reſolutely determined for the future to take cognizance of any hint thrown out in word or action, that might ſeem to infringe on the royal prerogative. But the commons were by no means intimidated by this menacing mode of enforcing prerogative in oppoſition to privilege; and inſtead of retracting what they had done, entered with greater freedom on the national grievances, aſſerted their right to interpoſe in all affairs of ſtate, inſiſted that it was their ancient and undoubted right to uſe freedom of ſpeech in all their debates, and that if any member abuſed that liberty, the houſe alone, who were witneſſes of his offence, were entitled to inflict a puniſhment upon him.

This peremptory and unequivocal declaration of the repreſentatives of the people in favour of the rights of their conſtituents, put the principles of their king to the teſt, and extorted from him a reply more explicit than moſt of the former. He told them, that their remonſtrance carried in it the air of a declaration of war, rather than an addreſs from dutiful ſubjects; that their pretenſions to intermeddle in all ſtate affairs without exception, was ſuch an extent of power, as had never been arrogated by any of their anceſtors, even under the weakeſt princes; but aſſured them at the ſame time, that as long as they continued within the limits of their duty, he would be as careful to maintain their lawful liberties and privileges, though he was determined in all his tranſactions never to encroach on his own royal prerogative.

Thus aſſured of his inflexible attachment to deſpotic and arbitrary government, the commons nobly aſſerted their claim as fully veſted in them by the ſeveral clauſes of the ever memorable Magna Charta, and accordingly drew up a proteſtation, inſiſting on all their former claims and privileges, as the undoubted birth-right and inheritance of the ſubjects of England.

On the reception of the paper containing the reſolutions of the houſe officially tranſmitted to him in the country, the king haſtened to town, and ſending for the journal of the houſe of commons, tore out with his own hand, in the preſence of the council, this ſpirited proteſtation, declaring it null and and void as an infringement on the royal prerogative. The commons, however, ſtill perſevered in their claim, and the king had recourſe to his uſual mode of diſſolution, and then diſcovering his reſentment to thoſe who had ſignalized themſelves in the eſpouſal of the laws and liberties of their country.

A. D. 1622. To preſerve the parade and pageantry of government, and an affectation of attachment to the proteſtant cauſe in Germany, James diſpatched lord Digby on an embaſſy to the emperor, deſiring a ceſſation of hoſtilities, and that miniſter being referred to the duke of Bavaria, who commanded the Auſtrian forces, was informed by him "that there needed no treaty for that purpoſe, as hoſtilities were already ceaſed by his "having got firm poſſeſſion of the Palatinate, "which he intended to maintain till a final accommodation ſhould be effected between the contending parties." But the timid and puſillanimous king of England, inſtead of reſenting ſuch an indignity offered to him as ſovereign of a mighty people, concurred with Ferdinand in the purſuit of meaſures deſtructive of the intereſts he proteſted to maintain. The palatine, in the mean time, exerted his utmoſt endeavours, in order to recover his dominions; but without any proſpect of ſucceſs, as the Auſtrians were ſuperior in number, and being duly paid obſerved a much ſtricter diſcipline than his troops, which were greatly fatigued as well as diſcouraged by maintaining ſo unequal and fruitleſs a conteſt.

The king of England, therefore, ſuſpecting that his eſpouſal of the cauſe of the Palatine would involve him in a diſpute with the Auſtrians, and bring on an expenſive war, which, at that juncture, it was his particular intereſt to avoid, adviſed Frederic to withdraw his forces under pretence of dutiful ſubmiſſion to the emperor, and this counſel was immediately followed.

As a proof of the verſatility of human nature, and the influence of the paſſions even over exalted minds, lord Digby, who had lately been created earl of Briſtol, now went over to Spain in quality of king James's ambaſſador to Philip, to negotiate that very match between Charles prince of Wales and the Infanta, which he had reprobated upon ſo many former occaſions. To gloſs over the inconſiſtency of his conduct, he endeavoured to prevail on the Engliſh council, by inſinuating, that a daughter of Spain, extremely amiable, would be conducted into England, with an immenſe fortune of two millions of pieces of eight (amounting to ſix hundred thouſand pounds,) a ſum four times greater than Spain had ever given with with any other princeſs. Nothing now ſeemed wanting to the concluſion of the marriage, but a diſpenſation from the pope, who would not grant it without ſtipulating terms greatly conducive to the intereſt of the Catholic religion, which met with no oppoſition from the king of England, who, provided he could bring about the favorite match, and thereby procure an immediate ſupply for the gratification of his folly and extravagance, was diſpoſed moſt obſequiouſly to accede to any terms the court of Spain, or his holineſs, might propoſe, however diſgraceful to himſelf, or injurious to his people.

A, D. 1623. The minion Buckingham had the addreſs to inſinuate himſelf as much into the graces of prince Charles, as of the king, inſomuch that both father and ſon implicitly followed his counſels, and adopted his maxims. He had long ſwelled with envy at the earl of Briſtol's having the ſole management of the Spaniſh match, and was therefore determined to exert all his influence to procure a ſhare in the honour of the negotiation. To gratify this ambitious deſire, he prevailed with the prince, to apply to his royal father for permiſſion to pay a viſit to the court of Madrid, repreſenting to him, in a moſt alluring point of view, both the intereſt and advantages with which it muſt be attended, in conciliating at once the affection of the Infanta, and the regard and eſteem of the Spaniſh nation in general. The king, through motives of affection for his ſon, and regard for the minion Buckingham, gave his aſſent to the propoſal, but upon reflection on the conſequences that might probably attend it, he determined to prevent it, and accordingly, when the prince and Buckingham returned for their diſpatches, he acquainted them with the reaſon which induced him to alter his mind, and deſired they would drop all thoughts of ſo ridiculous an adventure.

But the favorite, through an infatuated prevalence over the mind of the king, obtained that which his ſon had importuned, without real effect. Preparations were accordingly made for the expedition, and Sir Francis Cottington, the prince's ſecretary, and Endymion Porter, gentleman of his bed-chamber, being appointed to attend them, the prince and Buckingham paſſed diſguiſed and undiſcovered through France, and even ventured into a court-ball at Paris, where Charles had an opportunity of ſeeing the princeſs Henrietta whom he afterwards eſpouſed. In eleven days from the time of their leaving London, they arrived at Madrid, and were received with every token of honour and reſpect, as the Spaniſh monarch employed every expedient to ſhow the eſteem which he had for his royal gueſt.

As good is frequently produced by cauſes apparently evil, trivial, or abſurd, this chimerical project eventually ſubſerved the Proteſtant intereſt; for when, on a peremptory demand whether they intended to give the infanta to the prince, and upon what terms, Olivarez, a leading perſonage in the court, informed him, that it was expected the prince ſhould change his religion, and that it was generally ſuppoſed he had come to Spain on that account, Buckingham ſpiritedly diſclaimed even an inſinuation of that kind, and demanded a categorical reply, equally regardleſs of the pretences of the holy ſee, as of the court of Madrid. To retard the negociation and final adjuſtment of the affair, his holineſs added ſome new clauſes, and containing articles wholly exceptionable upon Proteſtant principles, as they had reference to the iſſue of the marriage, imbibing popiſh tenets from their earlieſt years, and conſequently abetting the ſame in more advanced life.

But the weak and pliant James, notwithſtanding the remonſtrances of the archbiſhop of Canterbury, not only ſigned theſe articles, but ſeveral private ones, in which he promiſed to ſuſpend the execution of the penal laws againſt the Catholics, and tolerate the popiſh religion in private houſes. By theſe means, king James highly contributed to the gratification of his holineſs, as well as the Spaniſh monarch, and affairs reſpecting the match wore a pleaſing aſpect, till on the demiſe of Gregory XV. the nuncio refuſed to deliver the diſpenſation, until confirmed by his ſucceſſor Urban VIII.

This manœuvre produced the effect ſo much deſired by Buckingham; the royal gueſt took his leave, and was honoured at his departure with every circumſtance of reſpect; even a pillar was erected on the ſpot where they parted, as a monument of their friendſhip. The prince and Buckingham then embarked, and after a tempeſtuous paſſage arrived at Portſmouth, from whence they poſted immediately to James, who received them with infinite joy and ſatisfaction.

The minion Buckingham having rendered himſelf as obnoxious to the court of Madrid by his ſupercilious behaviour, as the prince had endeared himſelf by his affability and modeſty, dreading the reſentment of the Spaniards, ſhould the match take place, from the alliance which muſt naturally enſue, exerted his utmoſt influence to prevent the ſame, and maintaining ſtill an abſolute aſcendancy over the mind of Charles, he wrought on him to recede from the articles, and diſcloſe to the king the grounds of his objections to the marriage with the infanta, in conſequence of which orders were diſpatched to the earl of Briſtol to return from his embaſſy, and put a ſtop to all future proceedings.

The Spaniſh monarch, naturally piqued at this unexpected behaviour of the king of England, not only laid aſide all thoughts of the match, which was now ſo apparently approaching, but made vigorous preparations throughout his dominions for re-commencing hoſtilities.

However odious Buckingham might have rendered himſelf in other reſpects to the Engliſh nation, in this particular inſtance of breaking off the match with the houſe of Spain, he was much applauded: nay, ſo general was the joy upon this occaſion, that throughout the kingdom they celebrated the rupture with bonfires and every token of mirth and feſtivity.

A. D. 1624. James having thus fell out with Spain, laid before both houſes his cauſes of complaint, and condeſcended to aſk the parliament advice, which he had ever before rejected, with regard to the management of ſo important an affair as the marriage of his ſon. The duke of Buckingham preſented to a committee of both houſes a long narrative, which he affirmed to be full and complete of every ſtep taken in the treaty with the Spaniſh monarch; and though it was loaded with palpable falſities and miſrepreſentations, it was vouched for truth by the prince of Wales, and even the king ſeemed tacitly to approve of it. Though this narrative, vamped for a temporary purpoſe, evidently bore the ſemblance of fiction, the parliament admitted the contents as valid, and, in conſideration of the urgent demands of the ſtate, voted a conſiderable ſupply. This meaſure on the part of the parliament was productive of very ſalutary effects; for as it conciliated the mind of the king, king, it was embraced as a happy opportunity for paſſing a bill againſt monopolies, which had miſcarried through the long breach that had ſubſiſted between them. The bill was expreſſed in ſuch terms, that all monopolies, without exception, were condemned as inconſiſtent with law and the known liberties of the people. The houſe of commons likewiſe confirmed, by a new precedent, the important power of impeachment, which had been exerted ſome time before in the caſe of chancellor Bacon, and which before had lain dormant for more than a century paſt, excepting when it was employed on the part of the crown alone, thereby excluding the privilege of the ſubject.

While the attention of the Engliſh parliament was engroſſed by the Spaniſh match, and concerns relative to the commercial intereſts of the kingdom, freſh commotions were excited in Germany. The electors of Saxony and Brandenburgh, jealous of the growing power of the houſe of Bavaria, and the untractable inſolence of the emperor, had ſignified their diſguſt, and James, after renewing his round of negotiation, brought matters to ſuch a criſis, that he wrote a letter to the king of Bohemia, wherein he adviſed him to lay down his arms, and ſubmit to an arbitration between him and the emperor; but Frederic would not hearken to ſuch advice, and James ſeemed inclinable to have him aſſiſted powerfully, could he have ſecured the concurrence of the Dutch or the French. But this pacific negotiation on the part of the king of England was fruſtrated by an event that happened at Amboyna in the Eaſt Indies, in the beginning of the preceding year. It had been agreed, four years before, in a treaty between England and the United States, that the Dutch, as a compenſation for the immenſe expence they had been at in obtaining the trade to the Molucca iſlands, Banda, and Amboyna, from the Spaniards and Portugueſe, ſhould enjoy two thirds of that trade, and the Engliſh one third. Purſuant to this treaty, the Engliſh factories were founded at the reſpective ſettlements; but the Dutch, deſirous of monopolizing the ſpice trade in particular, feigned a pretence that a plan had been concerted between the Engliſh and the natives to ſeize the fort of Amboyna, in order to exclude them from one part of that trade. To vindicate their right thus pretendedly infringed by this attempt, the Engliſh were tortured in the moſt cruel manner, ten of whom, together with nine Japoneſe and one Portugueſe, were ignominiouſly executed, though they proteſted their innocence to the very laſt.

The artful and fallacious manœuvres of the miniſter Buckingham to fruſtrate the intended marriage between the prince of Wales and the Infanta, at length became apparent to the king, and though he ſtifled his reſentment for certain reaſons, he conceived an averſion to him which he was determined openly to avow, on the arrival of the earl of Briſtol.

Notwithſtanding ſuch were the diſguſt and reſolution of the king, Buckingham, who wiſhed to put off the day of retribution for his fallacious conduct towards his blind infatuated ſovereign, wrought on his mind ſo powerfully, that he procured an order for committing the earl to the Tower, immediately upon his landing in England, and though he was ſoon after releaſed, orders were ſent him by the king, to retire to his country ſeat and not approach the court. The earl obeyed the mandate of his ſovereign; but aſſerted his right of appeal to him for the rectitude of his conduct, as well as alledging circumſtances to criminate the favourite, who, alarmed at the reſolution of Briſtol, declared, in concurrence with the the prince of Wales, that they were willing to be reconciled to him if he would confeſs his errors; but he diſdained to purchaſe favour at ſo dear a rate, and the favourite thereupon determined to proſecute his intention of completing his ruin.

To further the deſigns and vindicate the cauſe of the injured earl, the Spaniſh ambaſſador, (having previouſly cautioned him to read it apart,) put a paper into the hands of the king, in which he aſſured him, that the prince and Buckingham had formed a conſpiracy againſt him, and had the whole court at their devotion; that cabals were raiſing among the popular leaders in parliament, extremely prejudicial to his perſon and government, and therefore, that it behoved him, by one vigorous effort, to aſſert his independency, and to chaſtiſe thoſe who had ſo groſsly infringed on his royal prerogative. But ſuch was the infatuation of this weak prince, that this repreſentation produced no real effect; indeed, he gave ſome oblique hints of jealouſy of the favourite, which, however, ſoon vaniſhed.

A deſign was conceived in the ſummer, of making ſome military preparations to oppoſe the Spaniſh monarch, and to aſſiſt the elector palatine. An army of ſix thouſand men was, therefore, raiſed and tranſported into Holland, under the command of four young noblemen, who were ambitious of ſignalizing their valour on this occaſion.

While this matter was in agitation, the king received intelligence from his ambaſſador at the court of France, that Lewis XIII. was diſpoſed to attend to an overture of marriage between the prince of Wales and his ſiſter the princeſs Henrietta Maria, in conſequence of which the earl of Carliſle was appointed to negotiate the affair, in conjunction with the earl of Holland.

James affected, at the commencement of this affair, a concern for the ſecurity of the proteſtant cauſe and intereſt, but at length being apprehenſive leſt his ſon ſhould be diſappointed of a bride, the Chriſtian king no ſooner interpoſed his mediation in behalf of the Catholics, than orders were given for the releaſe of thoſe of that faith who had been impriſoned ſince the petition of parliament. So ſtrong was the deſire of the Engliſh monarch to terminate this affair, that in a few months the articles were ſigned at Paris, being in ſubſtance much the ſame as thoſe concluded with Spain; for as prince Charles, while in Spain, had given a verbal promiſe to leave to the infanta the education of her children till they attained to the age of thirteen years, this article was alſo inſerted in the treaty; and this very circumſtance ſeems to have given riſe to the ſubſequent and juſt expulſion of the race of Stuarts from the throne of the realms.

To facilitate the propoſed match, the court of France, with their uſual perfidy, had made pompous promiſes, though in general terms, not only of affording a free paſſage to the Engliſh troops, but alſo of ſending them powerful ſuccours in their march towards the Palatinate, and the Engliſh council were ſo imprudent as to conſider theſe profeſſions as ſincere. The troops were embarked, indeed, at Dover, but on their arrival before Calais, found that no orders were come for their admiſſion. In conſequence of this, embaſſies were continually diſpatched between the Engliſh and French courts, till the French equivocally urged the expediency of deliberation, previous to the fulfilmen filment of their engagements. The Engliſh forces directed their courſe towards Zealand, where, before any meaſures could be taken for their landing, great numbers were carried off by a peſtilential diſeaſe, and thoſe that remained, weakened by ſickneſs and diſcouraged by misfortunes, were deemed incapable of the intended expedition.

This negotiation between the powers of England and France, evinces the greateſt duplicity and perfidy on the one part, and the utmoſt credulity and puſillanimity on the other; indeed, it appears, from a review of that part of the hiſtory, which relates to the different tranſactions that have paſſed between theſe nations, that the Engliſh miniſtry have in general been duped by French policy, if not bribed by French gold.

Commotions ſtill continued in various parts of Ireland at the inſtigation of the Spaniſh monarch and the Roman pontiff. But their malicious efforts were greatly fruſtrated by the powerful influence, both as an orator and a writer, of Dr. Uſher, archbiſhop of Armagh, who ſtood forth an able and zealous champion of the proteſtant cauſe.

A. D. 1625. This was the laſt memorable tranſaction in the reign of James I. who ſoon after departed this tranſitory life at Theobalds, in Hertfordſhire, in the fifty-ninth year of his age, having reigned in England twenty-two years, and over Scotland almoſt from his infancy.

The character of this monarch, like that of moſt others, has been miſrepreſented through the influence of party prejudice, and religious bigotry, which have induced writers to applaud or condemn as actuated by their own particular prejudices, or prepoſſeſſions. On an impartial ſurvey, however, of his life and conduct, whether we conſider him as a man, or a king, we cannot hold him up as an example to poſterity. That he poſſeſſed ſome talents is indiſputable, but that in general he perverted them, muſt alſo be granted. Though he appears to have had ſome ſkill in logic, his actions ſeem rarely to have been guided by the dictates of reaſon and common ſenſe; indeed, he was a ſlave to the meaner paſſions, and therefore proſtituted favours on the moſt unworthy and deſpicable objects. As a king, he was ambitious, deſpotic, and tyrannical; characteriſtics, which have branded his name with the moſt indelible odium.

The king ſeized, and committed to cloſe confinement. His trial. Affecting ſcene at taking leave of his children. His death and character.

ACCORDING to the uſual form and ceremony upon ſuch occaſions, prince Charles, on the demiſe of his father, was proclaimed king in all the public places of the metropolis, and from the general good opinion the people entertained of him, aſcended the throne with the eclat of univerſal approbation. The principal object of his regard upon his acceſſion, was the conſummation of the marriage with the princeſs Henrietta Maria of France, of which notice being ſent to the French court, that princeſs ſet out with her retinue, and arriving at Dover on the twelfth of July, the nuptials were ſolemnized the following day with great pomp and magnificence.

The marriage being thus conſummated, the young king immediately dirrected his attention to the great concerns of the nation; and on the meeting of the parliament, he repreſented, in a ſhort ſpeech, to both houſes, the ſituation of public affairs, the war in which he was engaged with the king of Spain, together with the difficulty of reſtoring the palatine to his dominions; and thence inferred the neceſſity of a proportionate ſupply. The commons deliberated on the particulars recounted in his ſpeech; but, after all, could not be induced to grant his majeſty more than a ſupply of two ſubſidies, amounting only to about an hundred and twenty thouſand pounds. Charles very prudently ſeemed ſatisfied with the grant, deeming it an earneſt of the good affections of his people, and not doubting but he ſhould obtain farther ſupplies before the cloſe of the ſeſſion.

The influence of the minion Buckingham now began to decline. It is natural to ſuppoſe, from the honours he engroſſed, and the wealth he had accumulated, that he was as obnoxious to the people in general as to the courtiers in particular. Indeed, on the acceſſion of Charles, the nation laboured under many grievances, which loudly called for redreſs.

The houſe of commons was at this time filled with men of diſtinguiſhed abilities, who, inſpired with the ardent love of liberty, ſaw with regret an unlimited power uſurped by the crown, and were determined to ſeize the opportunity which the king's neceſſities afforded, of circumſcribing the prerogative within more reaſonable bounds. They therefore came to an unanimous reſolution not to grant any ſupplies till the king had given up ſome points that reſpected the liberty of the ſubject. But, juſt as this determination might appear in itſelf, Charles could not entertain the ſame ſentiments; and was, therefore, not a little ſurpriſed, that the parliament ſhould refuſe to ſupport the expences of a war that had been undertaken at their own requeſt. It is evident, that the king inherited the arbitrary principles of his father, and that they invariably actuated his whole conduct, from his acceſſion to the throne, till they unhappily terminated in his death. While he meant to requeſt, he ſeemed to threaten; and by declaring, that reſpectful treatment would endear him to the uſe of parliaments, he might naturally be ſuppoſed to inſinuate, that harſh treatment would prejudice him againſt thoſe popular aſſemblies, and perhaps induce him to diſcontinue them entirely; a power which, however deſirous he might be to uſurp, the commons were by no means whatever willing to allow.

Notwithſtanding the diſagreement between the king and his parliament, Charles was determined to proſecute the Spaniſh war with vigour, and accordingly ſent the duke of Buckingham, and the earl of Holland, ambaſſadors to the United Provinces, where, at the Hague, they met the ambaſſadors of France and Denmark, and concluded a league with them and the States, for reſtoring the liberties of Germany.

To carry on this intention, as he was denied the parliamentary aid he required, Charles iſſued privy ſeals for borrowing money from his ſubjects, by means of which he was at length enabled to fit out a fleet. It conſiſted of eighty veſſels, and had on board ten regiments of infantry. Sir Edward Cecil, lately promoted to the title of viſcount Wimbleton, was appointed commander, and had under him the earl of Eſſex as vice-admiral. They bent their courſe for Cadiz, where the enemy was fully prepared to meet them, and the attack of Port Puntal was, with twenty Engliſh and five Dutch ſhips, committed to Eſſex, who was ſo intent upon ſtorming the port, that he was charged by the commander in chief of the land forces, with ſuffering the ſhipping, which formed the line, to give him battle to eſcape. But this charge ſeems rather invidious: however, on the reſult of the whole, the Spaniards retired to Port Real, and the earl of Eſſex, after many vigorous efforts, found it impracticable to take the Puntal on that ſide. Upon this, Sir John Burroughs, an old Engliſh officer, landed with his regiment, and driving ſome companies of Spaniards, who had oppoſed his landing, back to the fort, the governor ſurrendered. But this conqueſt was of no importance, for the raw Engliſh troops, tempted by the deliciouſneſs of the Spaniſh wines, indulged themſelves in ſuch exceſſes as produced univerſal confuſion. At length, diſſention increaſing among the officers, and diſeaſes among the private men, they abandoned the enterprize and returned to England, without having performed any one action of conſequence.

A. D. 1626. Notwithſtanding the failure of this expedition, and the very little probability of deriving any important advantage from the Spaniſh war, the king, on the opening of the ſeſſion of parliament this year, made that, together with the demands of his houſhold, a pretence for requiring their aid; and they accordingly voted him three ſubſidies and three fifteenths, to which they afterwards added one ſubſidy more.

It has been already obſerved, that the influence of Buckingham was viſibly on the decline; but now, in conſequence of the houſe of commons being, in general, as ſevere in their invectives againſt the minion, as they had before been laviſh of their encomiums in his favour, informations from all quarters were brought againſt him, and the commons proceeded, with great acrimony, in their enquiries concerning them. They accuſed him of having engroſſed many offices in his own perſon; of neglecting to guard the ſeas in quality of high-admiral; of furniſhing the French with ſhips in order to ſerve againſt the Hugonots; of procuring extenſive grants from the crown; and of giving medicines to the late king without the knowledge of his phyſicians. Theſe charges being never ſubſtantiated, have been deemed the fictions of his moſt inveterate foes to effect his ruin. However, the king, notwithſtanding the reſolution and rigour which the commons evinced in their proceedings againſt Buckingham, continued to diſcover his contempt and diſregard of them; for when they exclaimed againſt the favourite's being appointed to ſucceed the earl of Suffolk in the chancellorſhip of the univerſity of Cambridge, the king was ſo imprudent as to write with his own hand a letter to the univerſity, thanking them for their choice. Nay, he was ſo imprudent as to threaten the commons, in one of his meſſages, that if they did not furniſh him with ſupplies, he muſt be obliged to try new councils.

The parliament being convinced by this, as well as former inſtances, of the king's proceedings, of an arbitrary diſpoſition, which evidently ſhewed his deſire of obtaining a deſpotic ſway, determined to purſue ſuch cautious meaſures as might obſtruct his ambitious and unconſtitutional deſigns. Accordingly, two members of the houſe, who had managed the impeachment againſt Buckingham, having been committed to priſon, the commons declared, they would deſiſt from all farther buſineſs, until ſatisfaction ſhould be given them for this violation of their privileges.

The king alledged in excuſe, that thoſe members, in their impeachment, had uſed ſome ſeditious expreſſions; but as, upon examination, the pretence appeared to be groundleſs, the members were diſmiſſed, and Charles, upon the whole of this affair, not only ſhewed his arbitrary principles, but expoſed himſelf, in a particular manner, to the reſentment of the parliament. The

The houſe of lords, who had been, ſome time, inactive ſpectators of the meaſures of the commons, now determined to aſſert their privileges, and inſiſted upon the releaſe of the earl of Arundel, who had been ſome time committed to the Tower; and the king, with much apparent reluctance, complied with their requeſt.

It appears, from the ſequel, that Charles, in the aſſurance he gave the commons of a general redreſs of religious grievances, had been actuated by a view of engaging them to compliance with his exorbitant demands by way of ſupply; for the houſe, finding him rather diſpoſed to defer the fulfillment of his promiſe, actually claimed the execution of the penal laws enacted againſt the catholics, preſenting him, at the ſame time, with a liſt of perſons inveſted with offices under the government, who were either convicted or ſuſpected of popery. By this method of proceeding they intended to include Buckingham, as his mother, who had great influence over him, was a catholic, and the indulgence given them, of conſequence, thought to be wholly owing to his credit and authority.

After a minute and critical inveſtigation of the general conduct of Buckingham, they could not find ſufficient ground for impeachment: however, conſidering him as a very incapable miniſter, as well as dangerous minion, they came to a reſolution to preſent a petition for removing him from his majeſty's councils and perſon for ever. The king, incenſed at this meaſure, reſolved on the diſſolution of the parliament, and carried his determination into execution notwithſtanding the interpoſition of the peers, who entreated him to permit them to ſit a little longer. But as the commons had the utmoſt reaſon to expect this meaſure, they haſtily finiſhed and induſtriouſly diſperſed their remonſtrance, which they preſumed would amply vindicate their proceedings to the public.

A paper war enſued upon theſe proceedings between the king and parliament, which, of courſe, excited violent animoſities amongſt the partiſans on both ſides. Application being made to the council, they granted a commiſſion for compounding with the catholics, and agreeing for a diſpenſation with the penal laws, which had been paſſed againſt them. This was a circumſtance highly pleaſing to the king, as it produced the ſupply refuſed by parliament, and diſappointed the hopes of the puritanical ſect, who were the objects of his averſion.

To raiſe the ſupplies for fitting out a powerful fleet, an order of council was iſſued for all the ſea-ports to equip a certain number of veſſels, and the city of London was rated at twenty ſhips. This taxation, which had been impoſed by queen Elizabeth, and afterwards aggravated by Charles, produced great diſcontent among the people. Such methods of ſupply, though exceeding unconſtitutional, were purſued, till intelligence arrived that the king of Denmark was defeated by the imperial general, in a great and deciſive engagement.

A ſupply being now abſolutely requiſite for the defence of the kingdom, the council, after ſome deliberation, paſſed an act, importing, that as the then exigency of the ſtate would not admit of the leaſt delay, the moſt ſpeedy and convenient method would be, a general loan from the public, to be levied according to every perſon's reſpective aſſeſſment.

But the form and mode they purſued in effecting this neceſſary purpoſe were exceeding unpopular, as well as dangerous in their conſequences; as appears from the following injunction laid on the commiſſioners appointed to gather the money: "If any ſhall refuſe to lend, and ſhall make delays and excuſes, and perſiſt in his obſtinacy, you ſhall examine him upon oath whether he has been dealt with, to deny or refuſe to lend, or make an excuſe for not lending; who has dealt with him, and what ſpeeches and perſuaſions were uſed to that purpoſe. And you ſhall alſo charge every ſuch perſon, in his majeſty's name, upon his allegiance, not to reveal to any one what was his anſwer."

But this aſſumption of inquiſitorial right excited the ridicule rather than dread of the public, who ſeemed determined to concur in the aſſertion of their legal privileges; while the council, to enforce their arbitrary meaſures, tampered with ſome creatures among the clergy, who preached and publiſhed ſermons, not only recommending the loan, but inculcating the odious doctrine of paſſive obedience in its full extent; inſiſting that the authority of the ſtate was veſted in the king alone, and condemning all reſtrictions of laws as ſeditious and impious.

To add a ſanction to the efforts of theſe infamous hirelings, the king interpoſed his eccleſiaſtical authority, in the ſuſpenſion and confinement of archbiſhop Abbot, merely becauſe that venerable prelate had refuſed to licenſe one of thoſe ſermons as ſubverſive of the civil and religious liberties of England. Theſe united means, however, had no influence over the people in general, who diſcovered a zeal for the aſſertion of a juſt cauſe, inſomuch that numbers abſolutely declined all concern in the loan.

The council now arrogated to themſelves a lawleſs power in impriſoning many who refuſed to comply with their peremptory mandates; but the perſons ſo confined were generally diſmiſſed after preſenting petitions to the king. Five knights of conſiderable property defended their liberties at their own hazard and expence, demanding enlargement, not as a favour from the court, but as their right by the laws of their country. No reaſon was given for their confinement, but the warrant from the king and council; ſo that it was affirmed by law, that this plea was not a ſufficient cauſe for denying the priſoners bail or enlargement.

A. D. 1627. Through the interference of ſeveral zealous and powerful adherents to the cauſe of the people, the legality of theſe warrants iſſued from the king and council, independent of parliament, was litigated in the court of King's Bench. On ſumming up the matter, after a formal diſcuſſion, and due attention to the ſeveral debates, it appeared, that the parliaments of England had ever moſt cautiouſly guarded againſt the encroachments of deſpotiſm, and for that purpoſe had enacted ſix ſevere ſtatutes, and among the reſt a ſpecial artile of Magna Charta, the moſt ſacred foundation of the laws and conſtitution of the realm. It likewiſe appeared that, upon extraordinary occaſions, ſuch as foreign invaſions, or domeſtic inſurrections, theſe articles had been diſpenſed with; but as no ſuch urgency could be pleaded in the preſent caſe, it was thought impoſſible that the judges could decide in favour of their arbitrary proceedings, ſo oppoſite to the expreſs letter of the law, and repugnant to the very genius of the Engliſh conſtitution: all, therefore, they thought proper to do in ſo critical a caſe was, to refuſe the bail that was offered.

But the nation at this time was not only diſtracted by internal feuds and lawleſs oppreſſions, but alſo harraſſed by ſoldiers being quartered all over the kingdom; as if impoſitions were to be laid on the people by force of arms. Many perſons likewiſe of inferior rank in life, who joined in the oppoſition to unconſtitutional meaſures, were impreſſed, and obliged to ſerve in the fleet or army; and this is the firſt reign ſtigmatized with a practice ſo incongruous with the character of a free ſtate.

Notwithſtanding the odium Charles had incurred from his deſpotic meaſures, the ill ſucceſs of his arms in Germany, and the exhauſted ſtate of his finances at home, he was ſo infatuated as to meditate and embark in a war with France as well as Spain, though thoſe two powers united were a match for all Europe. The king is ſaid, by the generality of thoſe who had ſeconded this abſurd tranſaction, to have been inſtigated to it by the perſuaſion of the miniſter Buckingham, who was prompted to this advice by diſappointed ambition and implacable reſentment.

The duke had been ſent to aſſiſt at the royal nuptials celebrated by proxy in France, where his exalted character, together with the ſplendor of his equipage, and the graceſulneſs of his perſon, contributed to procure him univerſal reſpect and veneration. Intoxicated with the honours that were heaped upon him by the court, he ambitiouſly aſpired to the favour of the queen-mother herſelf, and is ſaid to have made an impreſſion upon the heart of that princeſs. This opinion was founded on more than ſurmiſe, for it is very certain, that after his departure from Paris on the buſineſs for which he was ſent thither, he privately returned, paid her a viſit, and was diſmiſſed with a reproof, that betokened more kindneſs than diſapprobation.

But cardinal Richlieu, as conſummate a courtier as ſtateſman, fired at the aſpiring ambition of the Engliſh favourite, deſcended from an obſcure origin, determined to level his touring project, and accordingly prevailed on the French king, when the duke was preparing for a new embaſſy to Paris, to inform him by meſſage, "that he muſt lay "aſide all thoughts of ſuch a journey;" but the haughty Buckingham exclaimed in a rage, that he "would ſee the queen in ſpite of the whole "power of France;" and from that very moment reſolved to embroil the two nations.

To foment the diſſentions he had already excited, Buckingham perſuaded the king to diſmiſs all the queen's French attendants; though the marriage articles poſitively ſtipulated their continuance in their reſpective poſts and employments. He likewiſe not only permitted but encouraged Engliſh ſhips of war to make captures of French merchantmen, and condemned them as lawful prizes. But perceiving that even theſe injuries could not effect an open rupture, as they were only followed by remonſtrances, or at moſt by repriſals on the part of France, he determined to ſupport the intereſt of the duke of Soubiſe, and engage at once in a military expedition againſt that nation.

Soubiſe, who was a moſt ſanguine advocate for the Proteſtant cauſe, being then in London, was perſuaded by Buckingham to ſolicit Charles to vindicate the wrongs which the Hugonots ſuffered in France. Though the king was particularly averſe to theſe Hugonots, from their ſimilarity in principles to the puritans of his kingdom, he was ſo wrought on through the repreſentations of Soubiſe, urged and enforced by the preſſing inſtances of his miniſter, that, with the utmoſt expedition, he made the moſt formidabe preparations for an invaſion of France, and committed ſo important and hazardous an undertaking to Buckingham, though literally unſkilled both in naval and military manœuvres; ſo that on the arrival of the fleet before Rochelle the inhabitants ſhut the gates in defiance, refuſing them admittance, till made acquainted with the purport of their viſit.

Buckingham, foiled in all his attempts both naval and military as commander in chief, inſtead of invading Oleron, a fertile and defenceleſs iſland, directed his courſe to the iſle of Rhé, a place ſtrongly garriſoned and well fortified both by art and nature. Having landed his men with conſiderable loſs, he relaxed in his operations; and allowed the French governor five days reſpite, during which the fort of St. Martin was furniſhed with great ſtore of proviſion, and put into a poſture of defence. Beſides, he was ſo careleſs in guarding the ſea, that the garriſon received continual reinforcements, ſo that deſpairing of being able to reduce it by famine, he aſſaulted it without having made any breach, and raſhly, as well as cruelly, ſacrificed the lives of his ſoldiers. Underſtanding, at length, that a body of French troops had ſtolen over in ſmall parties, and landed at Priè, he began to think of a retreat, but made it with ſo little judgment, that it was equal to a total defeat. He was the laſt of the whole army that embarked: he returned to England, after an expedition carried on with as much weakneſs and more expence, as it had been ſuggeſted by folly and preſumption. The lives of the greateſt part of his men were ſacrificed to the temerity of a commander, of whom nothing can be ſaid in commendation, but a ſignal diſplay of perſonal courage and reſolution.

A. D. 1628. Theſe important loſſes evidently reſulting from the king's obſtinate attachment to a favourite, added to the former diſguſt of the people: they ſaw their liberties encroached on; illegal taxes impoſed; their commerce ruined; their military glory ſtained by two unſucceſsful enterprizes; they apprehended greater calamities from perſiſting in a war with two powerful monarchs, and all theſe diſtreſsful circumſtances were but too juſtly attributed to the obſtinacy of their ſovereign, in adhering to the councils of Buckingham, who had given ſo many proofs of incapacity for the due diſcharge of the important truſt veſted in him by an infatuated king.

The ſtate of public affairs was involved in ſuch perplexity through the mal-adminiſtration of Charles, his miniſter, and partizans, that they were reduced to the diſagreeable expedient of calling a parliament. To introduce this deſign on the tapis, Sir Robert Cotton, one of Buckingham's dependants, propoſed that the duke himſelf ſhould be the firſt perſon who ſhould mention in council, the aſſembling a new parliament; by which means it was imagined, all his former faults would be excuſed, and that inſtead of a tyrannical oppreſſor, he would be conſidered as the firſt patriot in the kingdom. But this plan, like moſt of thoſe projected by an infamous junto, fell to the ground, being too palpable to eſcape the detection of the diſcerning part of both houſes. But this ſcheme had no effect, as the view of the leading men in both houſes were more rational and profound.

At the opening of the ſeſſion, notwithſtanding the late flagrant violations of the privileges of the ſubjects in general, and of parliament in particular, in the impriſonment of ſeveral of the members, they proceeded with great order and decorum, in the grand buſineſs of the nation.

Charles had given repeated proofs of averſion to parliamentary reſtraint in the proſecution of arbitrary meaſures, and now openly and explicitly avowed his principles in the following part of his ſpeech; "that if they ſhould not do "their duties in contributing to the exigencies of "the ſtate, he muſt, in diſcharge of his conſcience, "uſe thoſe means which Providence had put into "his hand, in order to ſecure that prerogative "which was endangered by the follies of ſome "particular perſons." This intimation was enforced by the lord-keeper, who, purſuant to his majeſty's command, ſubjoined, "that his majeſty "had choſen the way of parliamentary ſupplies "as the fitteſt method; not that he was deſtitute "of others, but becauſe it was moſt agreeable to "his own gracious diſpoſition; and that if ſuch "means were deferred, neceſſity and the ſword of "the enemy might make way to the others." He concluded with theſe remarkable words, "Re-"member his majeſty's admonition; I ſay, re-"member it."

Theſe ſpeeches, however, though conceived in haughty language, and uttered with an air of confident importance, did not deter the commons from entering on the means of redreſſing public grievances; reſtraining the exerciſe of lawleſs power; fixing the limits of the royal prerogative, and ſecuring the rights and privileges of the people. Having diſpatched theſe grand and important duties to themſelves in particular, and the body of the people in general, as their legal repreſentatives, they proceeded to the buſineſs of the ſupply, and in order to convince his majeſty, that they were readily diſpoſed to relieve his neceſſities, provided he would comply with their juſt demands, they voted him five entire ſubſidies; a ſum with which Charles declared his entire ſatisfaction, and promiſed to comply with all their reaſonable requeſts.

But they wiſely deferred paſſing the ſupply into an act, having experienced, in many former inſtances, that the moſt liberal grants were not only proſtituted to unworthy purpoſes, but inſufficient to ſecure their privileges againſt future invaſions. With this proviſo they nominated a committee to draw up the form of ſo important a law; they aſpired not, as they declared, to any new or unuſual privileges, but only aimed at ſecuring thoſe which had been tranſmitted to them from their anceſtors: this law they determined to call "a pe-"tition of right," thereby intimating, that it contained only an explanation of their ancient privileges, not any infringement of royal prerogative or acquiſition of new liberties.

The upper houſe, generally diſpoſed from their elevated rank in life to ſupport the prerogative in its utmoſt extent, propoſed a more moderate law, and recommended the ſame to the conſideration of the commons, who reſolutely perſiſting in defence of "the petition of right," it paſſed the houſe, and only waited the royal aſſent to carry it into execution.

When the king came to the houſe of peers to ſettle this important point, he ſent for the commons, and being ſeated in his chair of ſtate, the petition was read before him; after which he thus addreſſed the houſe: "The king willeth, that right "be done according to the laws and cuſtoms of "the realm, and that the ſtatutes be put in due "execution; that his ſubjects may have no cauſe "to complain of any wrong of oppreſſion contrary "to their juſt rights and liberties, to the preſerva-"tion whereof he holds himſelf in conſcience as "much obliged as of his own prerogative." But the commons, deeming this ſpeech equivocal and by no means agreeable to their deſire, returned to the houſe, and proceeded to take under conſideration the caſe of the duke of Buckingham, whom they juſtly deemed the author of many grievances, under which the nation then laboured.

To protect his favourite from public reſentment, the king anticipated the deſigns of the commons, by granting them the full import of the petition according to its moſt extenſive reference, and for that purpoſe he came to the houſe and ſtamped it with the royal aſſent. As a gratification for this compliance, they immedietely granted a very large ſubſidy, and having thus balanced accounts with his majeſty, continued to carry their reſearches into every abuſe of government.

The miniſter Buckingham ſeemed to be the determined victim of their wrongs and injuries; for they unanimouſly reſolved to preſent a remonſtrance to his majeſty, recapitulating the national grievances and calamities, to which his arrogance and ambition were ſuppoſed to have given riſe. But Charles, to prevent ſo diſagreeable an addreſs from being preſented, prorogued the parliament. Being now freed for ſome time from the reſtraints of parliament, Charles turned his attention towards foreign wars, in which his efforts were as unſucceſsful, as in domeſtic government.

The reign of the favourite now approached its period, and he fell a ſacrifice to that very paſſion of revenge he ſo often gratified in his behaviour and conduct towards others. His brother-in-law lord Denbigh, having incurred the imputation of cowardice, in declining to engage the enemy's fleet off Rochelle, which he had been ſent to relieve, to wipe off this ſtain, Buckingham repaired to Portſmouth, where he had equipped a conſiderable armament, but before he could ſet out on his expedition, he met with death from the hands of a deſperate aſſaſſin, which, had he ſurvived much longer, he would probably have ſuffered from the laws of his country.

It ſeems the duke had been applied to by one Felton, a lieutenant in the navy, for a company vacated by his captain's having been killed in a late expedition, but being denied, he had reſigned his commiſſion and retired in diſguſt. Watching an opportunity for wreaking his vengeance on the duke, he followed him to Portſmouth, where having heard that he had an appointment with ſome gentlemen at a certain houſe, he waited for him near the entrance, and as he turned about in the paſſage to ſpeak to a colonel in the army, ſtabbed him to the heart with a knife. The duke exclaiming, "the villain has killed me," drew out the knife, and inſtantly expired. No one had perceived the blow, nor obſerved the perſon that gave it; near the door, however, was found a hat, in the inſide of which was ſewed a paper, inſcribed with a few lines of that remonſtrance of the commons, which declared Buckingham an enemy to the kingdom, and containing ſome private reaſons of the aſſaſſin for the commiſſion of the fact. From this circumſtance it was naturally concluded that the hat belonged to Felton, and in the mean time, a perſon without a hat being obſerved to walk very compoſedly composedly before the door, there was a general cry, "here is the villain who killed the duke." The man replied, with great intrepidity, "True, I "am he;" and resolutely exposed his naked breast to the swords of the assailants, being desirous to save himself by instant death from the disgrace of a public execution. Felton boldly avowed the fact, and being asked at whose instigation he had committed that atrocious crime, replied, that they need not concern themselves about that matter; that the resolution was entirely owing to the suggestions of his own conscience; that his motives would appear if his hat was found; for that apprehending he should perish in the attempt, he had there taken care to explain them. Charles was so affected at the untimely fate of his favourite, that he commanded the assassin to be put to the torture, to extort from him a discovery of his accomplices, but he at length desisted from enforcing his mandate, on the judges giving their opinion against such a proceeding. Thus fell the minister Buckingham, by the poniard of resentment. We will not attempt to justify the act, but would only hold it up as a memento to succeeding favourites, in order that they may shun his example, lest they share his fate.

A. D. 1629. The conquest of Rochelle by the French, after a fruitless attempt of the earl of Lindsay to relieve it, with other unfortunate incidents, could not fail to weaken the king's authority with the commons. They accordingly availed themselves of the same, by rectifying many abuses ecclesiastical and political, but their sudden prorogation, however, hindered them from bringing the matter to a final conclusion.

Notwithstanding the late spirited behaviour of the commons, Sir John Elliot, Valentine, and Hollis, were summoned to answer in the king's bench for the pointed remonstrances they had made in the house, which the ministers were pleased to term disloyal; but refusing to account in an inferior court for their conduct, as members of a superior, they were condemned to be imprisoned during the king's pleasure, to pay a fine, and to give security for their good behaviour.

A. D. 1630. Charles having, on every occasion that presented itself, evinced a disposition arbitrary in the highest degree, repugnant to the very genius of English liberty, and thereby rendered himself so obnoxious to his sujects and parliament, as to frustrate every attempt to raise subsidies adequate to the prosecution of a war with two of the most powerful potentates in Europe, was reduced to the necessity of concluding a peace on terms that reflected no more honour on his arms, than they had acquired by his military exploits.

The negotiation which followed was as frivolous as fruitless. Charles had entered into a private agreement with Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, by which he engaged to support him in his intended invasion of Germany; but that he might save appearances with the house of Austria, he employed the marquis of Hamilton to levy the troops destined for that purpose. The Swede, however, did not perform his part of the agreement, and Charles withdrew his forces, after having incurred much expence without gaining either profit or honour.

The person who principally engrossed the royal favour on the decease of the late minister, was Laud, bishop of London, afterwards promoted to the see of Canterbury, a prelate of some parts and learning, but strongly suspected of an attachment to popery. The doctrine of the puritans had now made great advances in England, and the king, by the advice of bishop Laud, sent instuctions to all the prelates in the kingdom, enjoining them, amongst other things, to take the greatest care that no puritan minister should be admitted into the church; and to discover all such teachers as should neglect the rites prescribed by the canons. It is therefore no wonder that the puritans conceived the most implacable hatred against Laud, who, in the end, severely felt the effects of their resentment. The archbishop now made great and even apparent strides in favour of the Romish religion; for at his instance, when a certain sum was imposed on each county for the maintenance of a regular militia, compositions were openly made with Catholics, and their religion became a regular part of the revenue.

A. D. 1631. Recourse was now had to methods of raising money equally oppressive to the subject, injurious to trade and commerce, and destructive of industry. The last parliament of this king's predecessor, which abolished monopolies, had made an exception in favour of new inventions; and, on pretence of these, and of establishing new companies and corporations, this grievance was now renewed.

The aversion of Charles to any parliamentary restraint has been strongly marked in many preceding parts of his reign, but in none so pointedly as in the following instances: besides some innovations introduced by the late king, with the council of York erected by patent from Henry VIII. without consent or authority of parliament Charles had ventured to enlarge its powers, and to invest it with a kind of civil jurisdiction, which, in some respects, was even discretionary. In consequence of this illegal measure, all the northern counties were deprived of the protection of the common law, and subjected to an authority which was wholly arbitrary. The court of Star-chamber was a grievance no less intolerable; it infringed upon the privileges of the other courts, imposed the heaviest fines, and inflicted the severest punishments beyond the usual courts of justice.

A. D. 1632-3. He also revived an act of Edward II. compelling persons possessing twenty pounds per annum, of landed property, to appear and receive the honour of knighthood. Edward VI. and queen Elizabeth, who had employed this expedient for raising money, had summoned only those possessed of forty pounds a year and upwards, to receive the honour of knighthood, or compound for their neglect; and Charles, without considering the great alteration in the value of money since this law was enacted, followed the example of those monarchs. He appointed commissioners for establishing the rates of composition, and enjoined them not to accept of a less sum than the person would have paid upon a tax of three subsidies and a half. These arbitrary measures met with little opposition; Sir David Foulis, indeed, was fined five thousand pounds, chiefly because he had persuaded a friend to refuse compounding with the commissioners.

Taxes were now levied on various articles of trade, manufactures, and domestic conveniencies. Commissioners were appointed for collecting, and officers for receiving the same; as if the king was as desirous of stripping his subjects of their property, as he had been of depriving them of their liberty.

liberty. In ſhort, he evinced throughout the whole tenor of his conduct, principles diametrically repugnant to the true intereſt, welfare, and happineſs of his ſubjects, and his prevailing foible was an implicit deference to the queen, who, being a bigot to popery, inſtigated him to meaſures ſubverſive of the Proteſtant cauſe.

To further his deſigns in Scotland, the king viſited thoſe parts of his dominions in the ſpring, accompanied by his court, in order to hold a parliament there, to paſs through the ceremony of his coronation, and to eſtabliſh, if poſſible, the Engliſh liturgy in that country. The act for regulating the habits of clergymen was eaſily paſſed; but the attempt to introduce the liturgy was attended with the moſt fatal conſequences.

Charles, immediately on his return to England, preferred his favourite Laud, biſhop of London, to the archiepiſcopal ſee of Canterbury, vacant on the demiſe of Abbot the late dioceſan. The newly erected primate procured the ſee of London for his friend Juxon, but though he was poſſeſſed of many virtues and endowed with a good underſtanding, his promotion was exceeding diſagreeable to the nation.

A. D. 1634. As Laud determined to maintain eccleſiaſtical dignity with great rigour, proſecutions were commenced, and the ſevereſt puniſhments inflicted on the ſmalleſt pretences. As an inſtance one Prynne, a barriſter of Lincoln's-Inn, but a bigotted and even fanatical puritan, having compoſed a volume, entitled Hiſtorio Maſtyx, intended to explode muſical and theatrical diverſions, in which were ſome oblique hints on the king and queen's encouraging the ſame, he was proſecuted in the Star-chamber, condemned to be expelled from the bar, to ſtand on the pillory in two places, to loſe both his ears, to pay a fine of a thouſand pounds to the king, and to be impriſoned during life.

Nor was this adminiſtration leſs attentive to pecuniary concerns, for the tax of ſhip money was impoſed during the courſe of this year; the firſt writs of that kind had been only directed to ſea-port towns, but ſhip money was now levied throughout the kingdom, and each county was aſſeſſed in a particular ſum, which was afterwards exacted from individuals.

There were many taxes levied at this time both reaſonable and neceſſary, and the candid and diſcerning part of the public did not object to theſe taxes conſidered in themſelves, but the mode in which they were both firſt paſſed as ſuch, and afterwards levied. For theſe being entirely arbitrary, by the ſame rule any other tax might be impoſed, and moſt perſons conſidered a powerful fleet, though very neceſſary, a poor compenſation for their liberties, which were thus ſacrificed in order to obtain it.

The higher claſs of people, and particularly the courtiers, now imperiouſly lorded it over the reſt of their fellow creatures and fellow ſubjects, as is always the caſe where deſpotiſm prevails,; and whenever the latter failed in what was ſuppoſed to be their duty, they were ſure to be puniſhed with the utmoſt ſeverity. One Granville, a private gentleman, having received an injury from the earl of Suffolk, had engaged in a law ſuit with him, and in the courſe of the trial, happened to ſay of that nobleman, that he was a baſe lord: the evidence againſt him was exceeding weak; yet for this ſlight offence, inſufficiently proved, he was condemned by the Star-chamber to pay a fine of eight thouſand pounds; one half to the earl, and the other to the king.

A perſon of the name of Alliſon was alſo expoſed to the ſentence of this oppreſſive and arbitrary tribunal. He had intimated that the archbiſhop of York inſtigated the king to many meaſures in favour of the Catholics, which by the Star-chamber being pronounced defamation, the culprit was fined ten thouſand pounds, obliged to find ſecurity for his good behaviour during life, and to ſtand on the pillory at Weſtminſter, and in three different towns of England. Theſe inſtances are adduced to demonſtrate the baneful influence of power perverted, through the prevalence of ambitious and arbitrary principles, when veſted in the hands of weak or wicked men. Nothing can be more injurious to ſociety, or deſtructive of the good order of government, as appears from the fatal conſequences which terminated this reign.

A. D. 1635. Amidſt theſe deſpotic meaſures, the king found leiſure to attend to the naval ſtate of the kingdom, and ſent a fleet under the command of the earl of Northumberland to ſeize the Dutch fiſhing veſſels which annoyed the Britiſh coaſt. Through this meaſure the Hollanders were obliged to purchaſe a licence for this ſeaſon, by paying the ſum of thirty thouſand pounds.

A. D. 1636. This ſquadron was ſent the following year to clear the channel and coaſts of a ſwarm of piratical adventurers, which had long infeſted the ſame to the interruption of commerce and diminution of the revenue. The Star-chamber penalties were alſo again enforced aginſt ſeveral individuals, who dared to oppoſe the arbitrary meaſures of a deſpotic government.

A. D. 1637. Religious perſecution began to break out with ſuch violence, that numbers of Proteſtants, and particularly thoſe of the ſect of Puritans emigrated to America, and there laid the foundation of a government, which enjoyed the moſt perfect liberty civil and eccleſiaſtical. To enforce the ſhip-money tax, whenever he was diſpoſed to gratify his own caprice, Charles obtained from a corrupt bench of judges, a declaration, that in caſe of neceſſity, the king might, by his own authority, levy that tax; and that he was the ſole judge of that neceſſity.

This proceeding in a great meaſure obviated the difficulty of levying the tax, as it enforced ſubmiſſion; one man, however, was found amidſt a torrent of oppreſſion and corruption, who nobly dared to oppoſe the arbitrary meaſures of the court, and to ſtand up in defence of the laws and liberties of his country.

John Hampden, immortalized in the page of hiſtory, having been rated at twenty ſhillings for an eſtate he poſſeſſed, determined, rather than comply with ſo illegal an impoſition, to try the event of a legal proſecution, and expoſe himſelf to all the reſentment and indignation of the court. The caſe was argued during twelve days in the exchequer chamber before all the judges of England, and the people beheld with the utmoſt anxiety every ſtep of a trial, which though it ſeemed to relate meerly to a private perſon, was for ever to decide the fate of national liberty.

After many and long debates, the prejudiced or proſtituted judges, notwithſtanding the crown lawyers had nothing in the end to oppoſe to the pleadings of Hampden's council, gave ſentence againſt him by a conſiderable majority; however, this diſtinguiſhed patriot, though he failed in carrying a particular point, laid the foundation of that neceſſary ſary ſpirit of oppoſition, which at length ſtemmed the rapid progreſs of tyranny, that was ready to overwhelm the civil and religious rights and liberties of Britain.

It is but juſtice to record, that Scotland nobly withſtood the deſpotic meaſures of Charles and his tyrannical court. The preſent king was deſirous of completing the work that his father had begun, which was to reduce the Scottiſh church to perfect conformity with the Engliſh, and to effect that deſign, he propoſed to encreaſe both the numbers and authority of epiſcopal dignitaries. With this view the liturgy was literally copied from that of England, and tranſmitted to the clergy at Edinburgh, with orders to begin the uſe of it with all convenient ſpeed.

In conſequence of the royal mandate, on Eaſterday, the time appointed by proclamation, the dean of Edinburgh, in the cathedral church of St. Giles, began the ſervice, the biſhop himſelf and the members of the privy council being preſent; but he was ſoon interrupted by the populace, who exclaimed "a pope! a pope! an antichriſt! ſtone him." As this tumult prevented the continuation of the ſervice, the biſhop mounted the pulpit in order to appeaſe the multitude, who were ſo incenſed that they threw ſtools at him, inſulted the council, and it was with the utmoſt difficulty that the magiſtrates were able to expel them, and to ſhut the church doors againſt them.

Notwithſtanding this tumult, and the repreſentation of the primate of Scotland, a man eminent for his learning and candour, who, together with the lord treaſurer, repaired to London to diſſuade the king from the purſuit of ſo unpopular a meaſure, he obſtinately perſiſted in his reſolution of introducing his liturgy into Scotland, and iſſued a proclamation, in which he pardoned all paſt offences, and exhorted all people to be more ſubmiſſive for the future, and to receive peaceably that form of worſhip which he was pleaſed to preſcribe.

According to the intimation Charles received from the primate and lord treaſurer, this proclamation was inſtantly oppoſed by a public proteſtation, preſented by the earl of Hume and lord Lindſay; and this was the firſt time that perſons of quality appeared to countenance the proceedings of the people. The ſpirit of diſcontent, which had been gradually ſpreading among all ranks of men, now blazed out at once. Four tables, as they were called, were eſtabliſhed in Edinburgh; one was compoſed of nobility, another of gentry, a third of miniſters, a fourth of burgeſſes; and among the firſt of their acts was the production of the covenant.

The tenour of this memorable covenant was a ſolemn abjuration of the ſupremacy, doctrines, ceremonies and tenets of the church of Rome, and a general agreement confirmed by oath of the parties, to aſſiſt each other, and concur in the defence of their religion, againſt all innovations, or oppoſition, whatſoever.

A. D. 1638. Charles, alarmed at theſe ſtrenuous efforts, ſent the marquis of Hamilton as his commiſſioner into Scotland, and impowered him to treat with the covenanters. He inſiſted that the covenant ſhould be renounced and aboliſhed, and offered to ſuſpend the canons and the liturgy, until they could be introduced in a fair and legal manner. In anſwer to this propoſal, they plainly told the marquis, that, as they had engaged in a general combination to defend their civil and religious liberties, they were fully determined to hazard their lives and fortunes in ſupport of ſo good a cauſe. Hamilton, finding all his attempts ineffectual, returned to London, and was immediately ſent back with more ſatisfactory offers. The king therefore from compulſion agreed to diſpenſe with divers ceremonies and forms, which he found to be highly obnoxious to the kingdom, and as a proof of his conciliatory diſpoſition, empowered his commiſſioner to convoke firſt an aſſembly, and then a parliament, when every public grievance might be redreſſed.

Theſe conceſſions, however, on the part of the king, were very far from being ſatisfactory to the covenanters, who had entered into an agreement to convoke a general aſſembly even without the king's permiſſion. By an order of the tables, whoſe authority was ſupreme, an elder from every pariſh was empowered to attend the preſbytery, and to vote in the choice both of the commiſſioners and miniſters, who ſhould be ſent to the aſſembly; and to every commiſſioner four lay-aſſeſſors were aſſigned, who, though they could have no vote, might interpoſe with their council and authority in the aſſembly.

To fruſtrate every effort that had been uſed to introduce the hierarchy, and confirm their religious rights and privileges, acts were paſſed by the aſſembly convened at Glaſgow, not only condemning the liturgy, canons, high commiſſion, excommunicating fourteen biſhops, and abjuring epiſcopal government, but even annulling the ſubſcription of ſuch as had ſigned the confeſſion of faith according to the king's order, and to defend and ſupport theſe reſolutions by force of arms, if it ſhould be found neceſſary; military bodies were raiſed amongſt the vaſſals and dependants of ſeveral noblemen, who had embarked in the deſign.

A. D. 1639. The king incenſed at theſe bold attempts of the Scottiſh male-contents, determined at once to reduce them to obedience and conformity; and with that view fitted out a fleet, conſiſting of ſixteen ſail of large ſhips, and conferred the command on the marquis of Hamilton, with orders to ſail to the frith of Forth, and make a diverſion among the forces of the enemy. The army amounted to twenty thouſand foot and three thouſand horſe, and was conducted by the earl of Arundel, a nobleman of great family, but diſtinguiſhed neither for his military or political talents. The Scottiſh army in point of infantry was equal to that of the king's, but inferior in cavalry; the officers had more experience, and the ſoldiers were fired with the proſpect of throwing off the yoke the king was deſirous of impoſing upon them.

Previouſly, however, to the actual commencement of hoſtilities, ſome of the more moderate and prudent of the leaders ſuggeſted the propriety of a dutiful addreſs to the king, praying for admittance to a treaty. Charles, influenced by ſome unſucceſsful attempts lately made by one of his generals, aſſented, ſo that a pacification was concluded, in which it was agreed, that within eight and forty hours, the Scots ſhould diſband their forces; that the king's forts ſhould be reſtored to him; his authority acknowledged, and a general aſſembly and parliament be forthwith ſummoned, in order to compromiſe all differences.

But the reſult of this temporary pacification by no means anſwered the expectations of the king; for a general aſſembly having been convened at Edinburgh, they then declared epiſcopacy to be unlawunlawful in the church of Scotland; repreſented the liturgy and canons as popiſh inſtitutions; and affirmed the high commiſſion to be a ſtretch of tyranny. The parliament which met after the aſſembly, laid claim to ſeveral pretenſions, which tended ſtill farther to abridge the power of the crown; and on account of theſe claims, hoſtilities were re-commenced, with great advantages on the ſide of the covenanters, and infinite diſadvantages on that of the king.

Charles, on the ſettling of the late treaty, had, from the reduced ſtate of the public finances, been under an indiſpenſable neceſſity of diſbanding his forces; while the covenanters, ſenſible that their pretenſions would ſoon occaſion a freſh rupture, took care, in diſmiſſing their troops, to preſerve nothing but the appearance of peace. The officers were ordered to be ready on the firſt warning; the ſoldiers had the ſame charge; and the religious zeal which poſſeſſed all ranks of men made them flock to their ſtandards as ſoon as the ſignal was given.

Such was the alarming ſituation of affairs in Scotland, that Charles was again compelled, though with the utmoſt difficulty, to make military preparations, in order to oppoſe the male-contents. But being conſcious of the exhauſted ſtate of his exchequer, and conſequently of his inability to ſupport the expences of the ſame, recourſe was had to the only expedient, of ſummoning a parliament to raiſe the neceſſary ſupplies.

A. D. 1640. Charles having received private intelligence, that the male-contents had ſolicited the aſſiſtance of the French king, and partly repenting of the conceſſions he had made to the Scots, as well as offended at their late pretenſions, embraced this opportunity of breaking with them. He had committed to the Tower the lord Loudon, commiſſioner from the covenanters, one of the perſons who had ſubſcribed a treaſonable letter; and he now laid the matter before parliament, whom he hoped to inflame by the indignity, and alarm by the danger of this application to a foreign power. But all that he could urge had no effect on the commons, ſo that the king went to the houſe of peers, and entreated their good offices in his behalf with the other houſe. The peers complied with his requeſt, but the commons, ſtill perſiſting in their reſolution of humbling an haughty ſovereign, voted the interpoſition of the lords to be a breach of privilege; ſo that Charles, provoked at their paſt proceedings, and dreading the conſequences of their future, diſſolved the parliament. Various cauſes concurred at this time to inflame the minds of the people, and excite commotions in the ſouthern as well as northern parts of the king's dominions. The introduction of the pope's agent in a public capacity, at the inſtance of the queen, an avowed abettor of the Catholic religion, gave ſingular offence, and irritated the male-contents to a more vigorous exertion than ever, inſomuch that the king, after divers meaſures had been purſued, and many difficulties encountered, aſſembled an army, amounting to nine thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe. The earl of Northumberland was appointed commander in chief, the earl of Stafford acted as lieutenant general, and lord Conway was general of the horſe. The Scots, whoſe army was always held in readineſs, had already advanced to the borders of England, and were encamped at Newburn, about four miles from Newcaſtle. The lord Conway with a body of four thouſand men had intrenched on the other ſide, in order to defend the ford, but the Scots determined to force a paſſage. This, after ſome oppoſition, they effected, and took poſſeſſion of Newcaſtle, Conway having retired with precipitation to Durham.

With the advice of ſome prudent leaders, the Scots diſpatched meſſengers to the king, who was arrived at York, humbly to entreat admiſſion into his preſence, in order to lay their complaints before his majeſty. Charles, ſeeing no other method of ſtopping their progreſs, than by complying with their propoſals, agreed to a treaty, and appointed ſixteen Engliſh noblemen to confer with eleven Scottiſh commiſſioners at Rippon. But all that was done upon this occaſion, was the ſigning preliminary articles, providing for the maintenance of the Scottiſh army, and reviving the commerce which uſed to ſubſiſt between the two nations.

In order to expedite the deſign of this conference, or rather negotiation, it was transferred to London, and ordered to be laid before parliament. The commons attended moſt cordially to all public grievances, but the principal objects of their reſentment were archbiſhop Laud, and the earl of Stafford, whom they impeached of high treaſon, and committed to the cuſtody of the uſher of the black rod; and in a few days the latter was ſent to the Tower. The Scottiſh commiſſioners, who acted in concert with the puritan party, impeached Laud, archbiſhop of Canterbury, taxing him with being the cauſe of all the troubles in England and Scotland, and exciting a war between his majeſty and his ſubjects, for which the commons committed him to the Tower.

The lord keeper Finch, who from his abetting arbitrary meaſures had rendered himſelf extremely unpopular and was in danger of impeachment, ſecretly withdrew, and took refuge in Holland. Theſe ſtrenuous exertions of the repreſentatives of the people, in defence of their rights againſt the invaſion of deſpotiſm, produced a viſible declenſion in the intereſt of the king's party, which, added to the popular clamour, diſpoſed him to wiſh for an accommodation. The committee for examining the rights of the ſubject was ordered to draw up impeachments againſt lord keeper Finch, and the reſt of the judges, concerning the juriſdictions of eccleſiaſtical courts, and the court of admiralty, as well as their own illegal proceedings.

In the courſe of a parliamentary inveſtigation into the public grievances, as well as infringements on religious liberty, ſo many enormous inſtances of the arbitrary proceedings of the courts of high commiſſion in the provinces of Canterbury and York appeared, that the commons appointed commiſſioners to examine into the ſame.

A. D. 1641. Alarmed at theſe meaſures, the king went to the houſe of peers, where in a ſpeech he recommended diſpatch, in providing for the maintenance of the fleet and army, and obſerved the diſtinction between reforming and altering the government. The upper houſe would by no means accede to the expulſion of the prelates from their ſeats in the grand aſſembly; ſo that it was oppoſed by a great majority. The commons, however, to ſhew how little they were diſcouraged by this repulſe, preſented to the peers nine reaſons for excluding the biſhops from parliament, and in a few days afterwards, the peers voted that the prelates ſhould be maintained in their right to ſit in parliament. Upon this the commons paſſed a vote importing, that all deans, chapters, chapters, prebendaries, chanters, canons, and their officers, ſhould be totally ſuppreſſed, and their revenues employed in the encouragement of ſcience, and other laudable uſes.

Encouraged by the ſucceſs of their attempts, in vindication of the religious rights of their conſtituents, the commons turned their attention to the civil intereſts of the nation. As the levying the duties of tonnage and poundage, without conſent of parliament, and even encreaſing them at pleaſure, was repugnant to the very genius of a free government, where the people, by their conſtitutional privileges, cannot be taxed but by their own conſent; ſuch encroachments, therefore, could no longer be endured by the then vigilant guardians of liberty. In the preamble, therefore, to the bill, by which theſe duties were granted to the king, the commons aſſerted, in the moſt clear and expreſs terms, their own right to beſtow this gift, and to deprive the crown of all independent title of aſſuming it: and in order to put the matter beyond all controverſy, they voted theſe duties only for two months, and reſerved to themſelves the power of renewing the grant, as they from time to time ſhould deem expedient.

Such was the urgent ſituation of affairs, that the king was under a neceſſity of paſſing even this bill, which deprived him of ſuch a large and conſiderable branch of his revenue. The next meaſure purſued by this very ſpirited houſe of commons, was to draw up a bill for triennial parliaments; to which his majeſty alſo ſubjoined his ſignature, from the ſame motives as had influenced him to ſuch compliant behaviour in divers late inſtances. However, he obtained the hearty thanks of both houſes, and the whole nation reſounded with ſhouts of joy and exultation. As a change of miniſters as well as meaſures was now deemed neceſſary, the king admitted into his council the earls of Hertford, Bedford, Eſſex, Briſtol, and Warwick; the lords Say, Kimbolton, and Saville. Juxon, biſhop of London, and friend of Laud, reſigned the poſt of treaſurer; and Oliver St. John was appointed ſolicitor-general.

In the mean time, the lower houſe proceeded with great rigour againſt the earl of Stafford. A committee was choſen to prepare the charges againſt him; authorized to examine witneſſes, and papers touching any part of the earl's conduct. They alſo took an oath of ſecrecy, that the earl might be perplexed in ſolving their enquiries, and from preparing for his defence.

To deprive him of the aſſiſtance of a powerful advocate, Sir George Ratcliff, the earl's intimate friend, was accuſed of high-treaſon, brought over from Ireland, and thrown into priſon. The Iriſh houſe of commons ſent over a committee to aſſiſt in the proſecution of Stafford, againſt whom they were highly incenſed; and indeed, the whole nation was bent on his deſtruction. Eight and twenty articles of impeachment were preferred againſt him; charging him with having been the cauſe of the war in Scotland; levying an army of Iriſh papiſts to enſlave the kingdom, and adviſing the king to eſtabliſh an abſolute government on the ruins of the conſtitution. The earl behaved with courage and compoſure; his defence was able and ſpirited. He acquitted himſelf of every imputation, except a few inſtances of indiſcretion, to which every man is liable.

Such was the prejudice which prevailed in general, with the members of the houſe of commons, againſt this unfortunate nobleman, that though they could not find juſt cauſe for proſecution, they were reſolutely bent on his deſtruction. With this view, young Vane pretended he had found ſome papers by accident in his father's cloſet, and as they were thought to bear teſtimony againſt the earl, his accuſers next day read them openly at his trial: they were intituled, No danger of war with Scotland if offenſive, not defenſive. The earl in his defence obſerved, that it was hard to be proſecuted for giving his opinion. After he had anſwered the different articles of impeachment, which were enforced with all the virulence of malice, and energy of elocution, he directed his diſcourſe to his children, and then to the lords preſent, with ſuch grace and elegance, that the audience (except a few hardened wretches) were deeply affected with his hapleſs fate.

To mitigate the rigour of ſuch proceedings againſt the earl, the king in his ſpeech to the parliament, after having aſſured them that Stafford ſhould never more be admitted into his councils, or any public poſt of government, requeſted that they would treat him with juſtice and lenity. The earl and his council produced ſuch weighty arguments in his defence, that the commons ſaw no proſpect of his deſtruction but by a bill of attainder, which paſſed the houſe after a long debate, and was immediately ſent to the houſe of lords.

To compleat their deſign againſt Stafford, a bill was brought in for the purpoſe of continuing the ſeſſion of this parliament, which ſhould not be prorogued or diſſolved without the conſent of both houſes, until the grievances ſhould be redreſſed. A majority of the peers voted the earl of Stafford guilty of high treaſon. This circumſtance affected the king in the moſt ſenſible manner; his counſellors adviſed him to give up the earl, in order to appeaſe the enraged people. Stafford himſelf, in a letter, gallantly exhorted his majeſty to ſacrifice him to a reconciliation with his ſubjects. The queen, who was no friend to the earl, uſed all her influence with the king to make him comply with inceſſant importunities, ſo that at length he conſented to their requeſt. Stafford, when he found that his ſovereign had conſented to his death, exclaimed with a ſtart of ſurprize and aſtoniſhment, "Put not your truſt in princes, nor "in the ſons of men; for in them there is no "ſalvation." The king, filled with compunction for his late conduct towards the unfortunate earl, addreſſed the peers in the ſtrongeſt terms, to recommend to the houſe of commons a mitigation of his ſentence; but the repreſentation of his majeſty was without effect, the commons obſtinately perſiſting in their reſolution.

The day of execution being fixed for the twelfth of May, on Tower-Hill, the earl appeared on the ſcaffold with that ſerenity, which is the attendant on true courage and conſcious innocence; obſerving, that a reformation begun with the ſhedding of innocent blood could not have a happy iſſue. Having bid a final adieu to his brother and friends, who attended him, and ſent a bleſſing to his near relations, who were abſent; "And now, ſaid he, "I have nigh done; one ſtroke will make my "wife a widow, my dear children fatherleſs, de-"prive my poor ſervants of an indulgent maſter, "and ſeparate me from my affectionate brother "and all my friends." In preparing himſelf for the block; "I thank God (added he) that I am "no way afraid of death, nor am daunted with "any terrors; but can reſign a weary life with the "utmoſt compoſure."

So

So finiſhed this precarious ſtate of exiſtence the illuſtrious Thomas Wentworth, earl of Stafford, a nobleman poſſeſſed of many amiable and recommendatory qualifications, but unhappily attached to ſuch principles as incurred the reſentment of the nation, and thereby brought him to a premature death. The king apprehended the moſt alarming conſequences from the fate of Stafford, inferring, that thoſe very men who had been acceſſary to the ſame, would perſiſt in their violent meaſures. This produced in him an immediate attention to every propoſal the parliament then thought proper to make; nor did they fail to avail themſelves of ſo favourable an opportunity, for by one ſtroke they ſuppreſſed all the taxes the king had heretofore impoſed; carried up an accuſation to the lords againſt thirteen biſhops, who had aſſiſted the king in levying money contrary to law; and aboliſhed the high commiſſion. Lord Digby, ſon to the earl of Briſtol, who had ſignalized himſelf in vindication of Stafford againſt his moſt powerful opponents, was not only called up to the houſe of peers, but honoured with particular tokens of royal favour and approbation.

Though the king was ſo circumſtanced as to comply with almoſt every requiſition of parliament, he peremptorily refuſed to diſband the Iriſh army; alledging, that he had engaged to ſend a body of four thouſand men into the Spaniſh ſervice, and could not violate his honour. But no maſters of veſſels would venture on the tranſporting troops into foreign parts; the commons having publiſhed a declaration that any perſon concerned in ſuch tranſportation, ſhould be deemed an enemy to the ſtate; and thus his majeſty's intentions were fruſtrated.

In conſequence of the diſputes which had long ſubſiſted between his majeſty and his Scotiſh ſubjects being ſettled through the concluſion of a treaty, their parliament reſumed buſineſs, and the king ſignified his pleaſure of aſſiſting at it in perſon. But the commons of England interpoſed their authority, and appointed a committee to attend him to Scotland, on pretence of conferring with the Scotiſh parliament, but in reality to inſpect the king's conduct. They then adjourned from the ninth of September, till the twentieth of October.

Purſuant to this reſolution, the king attended by the duke of Richmond, the marquis of Hamilton, and the lord Willoughby, arrived at Edinburgh, where he found it convenient to acquieſce in every thing that the Scottiſh parliament propoſed. In order to acquire popularity in that nation, he promoted the earl of Argyle to the dignity of a marquis, Loudon to an earldom, and general Leſley was created earl of Leven. A law was enacted to prevent foreigners from being created peers of Scotland, unleſs they poſſeſſed eſtates in that kingdom. Argyle and Hamilton, having conceived a ſuſpicion that the earl of Crawford, and others, intended to murder them, left the parliament abruptly, and withdrew into the country.

The parliament of England, who had ſo ſtrenuouſly exerted themſelves in the cauſe of religious liberty, ſuſpecting from ſome late intelligence, that the Catholics of Scotland had formed a conſpiracy againſt them, to protect their perſons from ſuch attempts, obtained a guard by order of the earl of Eſſex, whom the king had appointed generaliſſimo, to attend the avenues of both houſes, during the time of their coming and going from thence.

While his majeſty was employed in ſettling affairs in Scotland, information was received of a dangerous inſurrection in Ireland, attended with dreadful ſcenes of rapine and ſlaughter. The old adherents to the Romiſh religion, ſince the advancement of the Proteſtant cauſe, had, it ſeems, been treated with ſome degree of rigour, reſpecting the forms and ceremonies of their worſhip. Animated by their prieſts, they reſolved to riſe throughout all the provinces in one day, and attack the Engliſh ſettlements, and it was agreed, that the caſtle of Dublin ſhould be ſurprized by lord Maguire and Sir Roger More, two of the leaders of the faction.

Matters having been duly concerted, Maguire and More repaired to Dublin, with a large body of their confederates, intending to attack the caſtle in the morning. But O'Connolly, a Proteſtant, revealing the ſecret, the juſtices and council took ſhelter in the city, and reinforced the guards. Maguire was taken, but More eſcaped.

The fate of the inſurgents in Dublin did not intimidate the inhabitants of other parts from proſecuting their deſign; for a rebellion broke out immediately after in Ulſter, where the horrid maſſacre that followed ſurpaſſes conception, and cannot be deſcribed without thrilling the human breaſt. During the ſpace of three months only, no leſs than forty thouſand fell victims to ſuperſtition and bigotry. The roads were crowded with ſpectacles of horror; men, women, and children, were driven naked into the fields, to periſh with cold and hunger; and more than ſavage barbarity exaſperated beyond all feeling, by religious phrenzy, left its dreadful tracts throughout the greater part of the nation. The juſtices aſſembled all the troops that were not already ſurrounded by the rebels, and thoſe, together with ſuch as inliſted in the ſervice, amounted to ſix thouſand, but ſix hundred were routed and put to the ſword, in their attempt to relieve the tower of Tredagh, which was beſieged by the natives.

An army of twenty thouſand rebels, under the command of lord Goſmanſtone, threatened to inveſt the city of Dublin; and in order to encourage the people to repair to their ſtandard, aſſumed to themſelves the title of the queen's army; nay, to cover the pretence with the ſemblance of authority, they affixed the ſeal torn from the royal patent of a general officer they had murdered, to a commiſſion, and preſented the ſame as duly ſigned and ſtamped.

His majeſty having applied by meſſage to the Engliſh parliament for a grant, to enable him to ſuppreſs this dangerous rebellion, the commons, with the conſent of the upper houſe, borrowed fifty thouſand pounds of the city of London, for the relief of Ireland. They alſo voted that two hundred thouſand pounds ſhould be raiſed and tranſported into that country, that a magazine of arms and ammunition ſhould be eſtabliſhed at Cheſter for the uſe of Dublin, and the ammunition at Carliſle be ſent to Carrickfergus.

But in all theſe meaſures the commons had particular regard to the preſervation of their own ſuperior importance, and the ſecurity of their property and rights, in caſe of commotions they apprehended in England, in conſequence of the rebellion of Ireland. By engroſſing the management of the war, they acquired an aſcendant in the army; they levied money under pretence of the Iriſh expedition, but received it for purpoſes in which they were more deeply intereſted; they took arms arms from the king's magazines, but preſerved them with a ſecret intention of employing them againſt their ſovereign, and voted and paſſed every law they deemed neceſſary for the promotion of their ſchemes and deſigns.

Reſolved to curtail prerogative as much as poſſible, the commons drew up a remonſtrance replete with the utmoſt virulent malignity againſt the king's adminiſtration, ſince the commencement of his reign, and even from every accident that proceeded from the uncertain chance of war. Charles, however, met with a moſt favourable reception from the public on his return from Scotland, and entered London amidſt the univerſal plaudits of the people. Sir Richard Gournay, lord-mayor of London, a man of merit and influence, had promoted theſe favourable diſpoſitions, and prevailed on the populace to give the king theſe tokens of their duty and allegiance.

But the complacency ariſing from theſe tokens of public eſteem was but of ſhort duration, for his mind was ruffled and embarraſſed by a remonſtrance and petition preſented from the commons relative to the inſurrection in Ireland. To preſerve moderation in their meaſures, he anſwered the one in general but reſpectable terms, and publiſhed a declaration as to the other; but neither produced any favourable effect. He alſo recommended diſpatch in the relief of Ireland, and deſired they would appoint commiſſioners to treat with the two Scottiſh noblemen, deputed by the parliament of that kingdom to receive their propoſals, touching the ſuccours to be ſent from thence to Ireland. A committee was immediately appointed for that purpoſe.

The inſurgents of Ireland having, in a memorial preſented to the juſtices, demanded liberty of conſcience, and a toleration of the Romiſh religion in that kingdom, it was determined, by a majority of both houſes, to put an abſolute negative upon ſuch demand, as incompatible with the general intereſt of his majeſty's ſubjects. At this time multitudes of people crouded towards Weſtminſter, and abuſed the prelates and ſuch lords as adhered to the court. The peers drew up a declaration againſt theſe tumults, and ſent it to the other houſe, but they paid no regard to it.

During the tumults and riots which prevailed at this time in London, many apprentices being apprehended and committed to priſon, were immediately reſtored to their freedom; by an order of the commons. Hence aroſe the appellation of Round Heads, on account of the cropt hair worn by the apprentices, who, in return, gave their antagoniſts the name of Cavaliers.

Anarchy and confuſion now univerſally prevailing, it is not to be wondered that a licentious and diſſolute mob availed themſelves of the ſame, to make wanton depredations in defiance of law, juſtice, and every tie civil and ſacred. No ſteps being taken to reduce the people to order, and Mr. Pym being requeſted to uſe his influence for that purpoſe, he replied, "God forbid that people ſhould be hindered from obtaining their juſt deſires."

A proteſt having been preſented to the king by twelve prelates aſſembled at the palace of the archbiſhop of York, ſetting forth the inſults and injuries offered them in their attendance on their duty in parliament, and declaring againſt all tranſactions which might paſs there during their abſence, it was, by the upper houſe, laid before the commons, who immediately preferred an impeachment of high treaſon againſt the biſhops, as endeavouring to deſtroy the fundamental laws, and to invalidate the authority of the legiſlature. The prelates were therefore not only prohibited from attending parliament, but were alſo taken into cuſtody.

A. D. 1642. At the inſtance of lord Digby, a nobleman of conſiderable talents, but of a violent, impetuous temper, the king was unfortunately at this juncture prevailed upon to impeach lord Kimbolton, and five of the moſt popular commoners, of high treaſon. This proceeding being pronounced by the houſe (from which, it ſeems, there was no appeal) a breach of privilege, they entered into a reſolution of defending the liberty of the members thus encroached on. The king, incenſed at this oppoſition, went next day to the houſe in perſon, attended by his ordinary retinue, conſiſting of about two hundred perſons armed as uſual. The five members immediately withdrew, and they had ſcarce quitted the houſe, when the king entering, walked up to the ſpeaker's chair, ſaying, "By your leave, Mr. Speaker, I muſt make uſe "of your chair a little." Having ſeated himſelf, he looked around, and told them, he was ſorry that their refuſing to deliver the perſons he had impeached to his Serjeant at Arms, had obliged him to come to ſeize them in perſon; and then addreſſing himſelf to the ſpeaker, he aſked whether any of them was in the houſe. The ſpeaker, falling on his knees, replied, that he had neither eyes to ſee, nor tongue to ſpeak, in that place, but as directed by the houſe, whoſe ſervant he was, and begged his majeſty's pardon, that he could give no other anſwer. The commons were in the utmoſt confuſion, and when the king was leaving the houſe, ſome members cried aloud, "privilege, "privilege;" after which they adjourned from the fifth to the eleventh of January.

Charles, whoſe temper was compoſed of a mixture of obſtinacy and puſillanimity, ſeems to have repented of the reſolute meaſures he had lately purſued; for when the commons met, purſuant to adjournment, he ſent them a meſſage, offering to pardon the accuſed members, to aſſent to any law that ſhould acquit or ſecure them, and to make any reparation to the houſe for the breach of privilege, of which he owned they had reaſon to complain. But theſe conceſſions produced no effect in his favour; the commons being determined that his majeſty ſhould deliver up to juſtice the adviſers of his late illegal proceeding, as the only ſatisfaction he could make for their injured honour.

The breach between the king and parliament viſibly widening every day, and producing effects of an alarming nature, the queen made preparations for withdrawing to Holland; and to obviate immediate danger, ſhe perſuaded the king to comply with the demand of the commons, in hopes of ſuſpending the fury of the people, till ſhe ſhould effect her eſcape.

The commons, aſſured of the neceſſity of aſſerting their rights and privileges by force of arms, determined on the purſuit of thoſe means. According, a large magazine of arms being lodged in the town of Hull, they beſtowed the government of that place upon Sir John Hotham, forbiding him to deliver it up to any perſon whatever, except ſuch as ſhould be commiſſioned by the king, and both houſes of parliament.

Injunctions to the ſame effect were laid on Goring, governor of Portſmouth, and ſeveral others; and the commons poſſeſſed themſelves of extenſive power by giving the command of caſtles and fortified places in general, to officers of their own appointment, and firmly attached to the common intereſts of the people.

An enthuſiaſtic zeal for liberty, which had manifeſted itſelf in ſo many inſtances, having deprived the officers, both civil and military, of that power which is neceſſary to enforce the execution of the laws, and preſerve the order of government, it was now deemed expedient to remedy this inconvenience. Accordingly, an ordinance was framed, and paſſed the two houſes, which reinſtated lieutenants and deputies in the poſſeſſion of their former powers; but at the ſame time, the names of all the lieutenants were mentioned in the ordinance, and theſe conſiſted entirely of perſons devoted to the ſervice of the parliament.

As the ordinance was preſented to the king, on his journey to Dover with the queen and princeſs, he returned for anſwer, that the particulars contained in it required ſome deliberation. The parliament pronounced this anſwer unſatisfactory, and declared, that in caſe he ſhould perſiſt in his refuſal, they were determined to regulate the militia by the authority of both houſes. They entreated he would reſide in ſome place near London, and begged leave to inform him, that the power of regulating the militia could not be granted to any community or corporation, without the authority of the parliament. With reſpect to the militia, he told them their requeſt was agreeable to juſtice and reaſon; but inſinuated ſome doubts reſpecting his own perſonal ſafety, ariſing from their requeſt of his reſiding in the vicinity of London; declaring, that as all his views centered in the intereſt and happineſs of his people, he relied on the guardianſhip of an all-diſpoſing Providence.

Theſe compliant meaſures induced the commons to revoke their reſolution reſpecting the militia; and on the ninth of March, the king being at Newmarket, they preſented him with a declaration, explaining the cauſe of their pretended fears and ſuſpicions, which they aſcribed to a fictitious plot againſt the religion and peace of the kingdom, formed by evil counſellors, by whom his majeſty had been miſled.

The apprehenſions of the king being greatly increaſed by the contents of this declaration, he determined to reſide in a ſituation more remote from London; and accordingly, taking with him the prince of Wales and the duke of York, he repaired to York, where, from the attachment that ſtill prevailed towards the hierarchy, he was received by the people with open arms.

Such was the popularity of Charles in the northern parts of the kingdom, that the principal inhabitants repaired to York, in order to pay their reſpects to their ſovereign, and to promiſe him their aid and aſſiſtance in his then neceſſities. Encouraged by this appearance in his favour, Charles began to retort the accuſation of the commons, with a ſpirit which he had never before diſcovered, and, unmoved by all their entreaties and menaces, perſiſted in his reſolution of refuſing the militia ordinance. But the commons, with their uſual reſolution, proceeded to eſtabliſh a new ordinance, in which, by the authority of the two houſes, the command of all the military force, and of all the garriſons and forts in the kingdom, was given to the lieutenants of the counties whom they had appointed.

Charles publiſhed a proclamation againſt this invaſion of his prerogative; and as he was firmly reſolved, he ſaid, to obey the laws himſelf, ſo was he determined to compel every other perſon to yield them a like obedience. As theſe meaſures, both on the part of the king and the parliament, could not fail of producing ſuch an avowed oppoſition as muſt terminate in open hoſtilities, the aim of both, at ſo critical a juncture, was to acquire popularity, as the moſt effectual means of furthering their reſpective deſigns.

A determined oppoſition now took place, and ſeemed, for ſome time, to be carried on with the utmoſt reſolution on both ſides. The king, eſcorted by a retinue of only three hundred horſe, on the 23d of April, demanded entrance into the town of Hull, which Sir John Hotham, the governor, refuſing, was proclaimed a traitor; but the parliament approved and juſtified his conduct. The forces which had been every where raiſed, on pretence of the ſervice of Ireland, were henceforth more openly inliſted by the parliament for their own purpoſes, and the command of them beſtowed on the earl of Eſſex. They iſſued orders for bringing in loans of money and plate for the maintenance of the army; and the people contributed with ſuch amazing alacrity, that in ten days no leſs than eleven millions are ſaid to have been collected; circumſtances which evidently proved a ſpirit of liberty actuated the people in general, whoſe efforts in oppoſition to deſpotiſm and hierarchy, prevailed againſt the united intereſts of the principal nobility in the kingdom.

The royal proclamation having been iſſued for transferring the courts of juſtice to York, the parliament prevented its execution; and, in order to bring the matter to a final iſſue, ſent the king certain conditions, on which they were willing to compromiſe the difference. The particulars of theſe conditions were, that no man ſhould continue in council, who was not agreeable to parliament; that no act of the king's ſhould be deemed valid unleſs it paſſed the council, and was atteſted under their hands; that all officers of ſtate ſhould be choſen with conſent of parliament; that none of the royal family ſhould marry without conſent of parliament or council; that the laws againſt catholics ſhould be ſtrictly executed; that popiſh lords ſhould be deprived of their votes; that the liturgy and church government ſhould be reformed according to advice of parliament; that the ordinance with regard to the militia ſhould be ratified; and that no peers be created but with conſent of parliament.

As theſe conditions were abſolutely levelled at the very extinction of the royal prerogative, which the king determined, at all events to maintain, he raiſed ſome forces, marched to the ſouthward, and at Nottingham erected his ſtandard, the open ſignal of civil war throughout the nation. Every advantageous circumſtance ſeemed to favour the parliament. London, and all the ſea-ports, except Newcaſtle, being in their hands, the cuſtoms afforded a conſtant fund of money, and all contributions, loans, and impoſitions, were more eaſily levied in the cities, which poſſeſſed ready money, than they could be raiſed by the king in thoſe open countries. The parliament intercepted the greateſt part of the ammunition and arms which the queen ſent from Holland; and the magazines were in their own hands.

The royal party was ſo inconſiderable in point of numbers, and ſo ill provided with arms and ammunition, that it was generally apprehended the king could never be induced to contend with foes foes so evidently superior in force, as well as determined in their resolution. The wretched condition in which he appeared at Nottingham strengthened these conjectures. He had been forced to leave his artillery behind him for want of horses to bring it up. His cavalry were only about eight hundred, and those ill accoutred, and (except the militia of the country, which had been raised by Digby the sheriff) he had only about three hundred infantry; while Essex, the general of the parliament, assembled an army of sixteen thousand men at Northampton, well armed, with an excellent train of artillery. Notwithstanding the reinforcements obtained from his partisans throughout all quarters of the kingdom, the king's army was in every respect so inadequate to that of his opponents, that he deemed it expedient, by slow marches, to withdraw to Derby, and thence to Shrewsbury, that the levies which his friends were making in those parts might be increased by his presence.

To conciliate as much as possible that popularity which he foresaw must eventually decide the contention between prerogative and privilege, the king, on a general review of his forces at Wellington, solemnly protested, before the whole army and surrounding multitude, that he would maintain the true protestant religion, defend the rights and privileges of his subjects, and particularly observe those laws to which he had given his assent in the present parliament.

While the king's army lay encamped at Shrewsbury, himself was engaged in collecting money, which he received from the neighbouring gentry by voluntary contributions; and with the plate of the universities which was presented him, he received the news of an action, in which victory determined in favour of the royal party.

This victory was attended with success in another part; for the princes Rupert and Maurice, sons of the unfortunate palatine, having offered their services to the king, the former was appointed to the command of a party of horse, which had been ordered to Worcester, to watch the motions of Essex, who was advancing to that city. The prince had no sooner reached the place, than he perceived some of the enemy's cavalry advancing to the gates. Without delay he gallantly attacked them as they came out of a lane, and totally routed them, after killing their commander, and about thirty men on the spot, as well as taking several officers prisoners. This action, though in itself of little consequence, raised the reputation of prince Rupert, and flattered the royalists with hopes of success.

Fortune now seemed to favour the royal cause: the king had considerably augmented his army, and disposed of the command in the following manner: Lord Lindsay, who had been trained to military discipline in the Low Countries, was general; prince Rupert commanded the horse; Sir John Astley the foot; Sir Arthur Ashton the dragoons, and Sir John Heydon the artillery.

The royal and parliamentary armies had casually approached without the knowledge of either of the generals. The day was considerably advanced before prince Rupert gained intelligence of the situation of the enemy, of which the king was no sooner apprised, than he determined on an immediate engagement; and accordingly drew up his army on Edge-Hill, about two miles from the parliamentary forces.

The defection of Sir Faithful Fortescue, who had engaged in the cause of the people, and had been stationed on the left wing, but afterwards wheeled off and joined the royalists under the command of Prince Rupert, contributed not a little to the success of the day; insomuch that the adverse party was nearly routed, till Sir William Balfour, advancing with his reserve, fell upon the flank of the royalists, and did great execution. Lindsay, the general, was taken prisoner, after having been mortally wounded. His son, in attempting to rescue him was likewise made captive; Sir Edmund Verney, who bore the king's standard, was slain, and the standard seized, but it was afterwards recovered. It appears, from the immediate result, that the loss sustained by each party was nearly equal, and the prospect of victory equally doubtful, as, having rested all night on their arms, they took different routs the ensuing morning, indisposed to re-commence an attack.

The king with his party proceeded towards London, hoping to obtain a reinforcement from that quarter; of which the parliament receiving intelligence, they voted an address for a treaty, by way of gaining time, as their own army lay at a considerable distance, and the royal army was so near the capital.

The earls of Northumberland and Pembroke, with three commoners, presented the address of both houses, in which they entreated his majesty to chuse some convenient place where he might reside, till committees could attend him with proposals for an accommodation. Charles named Windsor, and demanded that his troops might be received into the castle instead of the garrison, which he desired might be withdrawn.

During the delay occasioned by the address, and the interval of time between the presentation and the answer, the parliamentary army, under the command of their general the earl of Essex, had reached London. But the king, far from being intimidated at their approach, attacked two of their regiments which were quartered at Brentford, drove them thence, and made about five hundred prisoners. But this being considered as a violation of treaty, the city of London sent the train-bands to reinforce Essex, whose army, already much larger than that of the king's, now amounted to about twenty-four thousand men. In consequence of this the king retired to Reading, and from thence marched back to Oxford, where he spent the winter season in making military preparations on the one hand, and projecting schemes of accommodation on the other; while the parliament was employed much in the same manner.

Though the king, during this inactive season, with the greatest difficulty raised means for the subsistence of his army, there were many other demands which he could not possibly supply; while the parliament had better and more certain methods of raising money, and consequently their military prepararions were in much greater order and readiness. Besides a tax levied in London, amounting to the twenty-fifth part of every one's substance, they imposed on that city a weekly assessment of ten thousand pounds, and another of twenty-three thousand five hundred and eighteen on the rest of the kingdom, and as their authority was very great in most counties, they found no great difficulty in levying these taxes.

A. D. 1643. The fate of this struggle between the king and parliament still remaining doubtful, and and the reſult being equally important to each party, a treaty was renewed the beginning of this year, but without any ſuſpenſion of arms, as was at firſt propoſed. In this treaty, the king demanded the re-eſtabliſhment of the crown, in its legal powers, and the reſtoration of himſelf to his conſtitutional prerogatives; the parliament ſtill inſiſted on new conceſſions, and farther limitations of regal authority, as a more effectual ſecurity againſt future oppreſſions. The parliament recalled their commiſſioners, on finding that their differences were too great to promiſe any chance of an accommodation.

Hoſtilities were now carried on with the utmoſt vigour. Eſſex inveſted the town of Reading on the fifteenth of April, when Sir Arthur Aſhton, the governor, being dangerouſly wounded, colonel Fielding aſſumed the command. In a little time, the town was found to be no longer tenable, and though the king advanced with a deſign of compelling Eſſex to abandon the ſiege, the parliamentary army was ſo well diſpoſed, as rendered that ſcheme wholly impracticable. The town was, therefore, given up by Fielding, and on condition of his delivering up the deſerters, he was permitted to march out with the honours of war.

The conduct of the governor in ſurrendering the deſerters was deemed ſo puſillanimous as well as diſloyal, that he was tried by a court-martial and condemded to death, but pardoned, in conſideration of former ſervices, and lived to ſignalize his courage and fidelity on many different occaſions.

Eſſex being reinforced by a party under the command of Sir William Waller, having made an unſucceſsful attempt upon Worceſter, received orders from the two houſes to march towards Oxford, where the king was ſuppoſed to be in great diſtreſs for want of ammunition, and accordingly advanced to Thame, within a few miles of that city. During his ſtay in this place, colonel Urrey, a Scottiſh officer took this opportunity of deſerting to the king, and perſuaded prince Rupert to beat up the enemy's quarters, propoſing to go himſelf as a volunteer, with a detachment, which he conducted to part of theſe quarters, defeated ſome regiments, and brought a great number of priſoners to Oxford with a ſtrong body of horſe, and arriving by break of day at Wickham, routed two regiments of the enemy and cut them to pieces.

During this ſucceſsful attempt of the king's party, the commander of the parliamentary army detached ſome of his cavalry to cauſe a diverſion, till he could bring up his infantry. But this detachment was charged with ſuch fury by the royaliſts, that they fled, after having ſuſtained the loſs of ſome of their braveſt officers, and amongſt the reſt, the renowned John Hampden, who had the ſatisfaction of dying in opinion as he lived, in the ſervice of his country, and vindication of its deareſt rights and privileges. Lord Eſſex's forces, diſpirited by theſe diſaſters, being ſick and in great want of proviſions, were obliged to march to Uxbridge and St. Alban's to ſeek refreſhment.

When the royal army reached Oxford, colonel Urrey was recommended by the commander in chief to the king; who, as a reward for his bravery, conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and promoted him to the rank of general. The earl of Stamford about the middle of May marched into Cornwall, at the head of ſeven thouſand horſe and foot with a train of artillery, encamped on the top of a hill near Stratton, and detached Sir George Chudleigh with twelve hundred cavalry, to ſurprize the high ſheriff of Bodmin. The Corniſh royaliſts under lord Mohun and Sir Ralph Hopton, ſeizing this opportunity of attacking their infantry, in the abſence of the horſe, formed their little body into four diviſions, and attacked the hill in ſo many different places. After a warm conteſt, they met upon the ſummit, diſarmed major Chudleigh, routed the parliamentary army, and took poſſeſſion of the camp and artillery; while the earl of Stamford fled to Exeter, and Chudleigh to Bodmin. The royaliſts then marched into Somerſetſhire, where they were joined by prince Maurice, and the marquis of Hertford.

Bridgewater and Dunbar caſtle were now reduced by theſe united forces, which compoſed an army of ſeventeen thouſand men, with a good train of artillery.

The fortune of war having favoured the royal army with theſe important ſucceſſes, which of courſe were attended with conſiderable loſs on the part of their opponents, it was deemed expedient to ſend Sir William Waller into Somerſetſhire to recruit. On this expedition he acted with ſuch caution, that a detachment of his army ſurprized that of the earl of Somerton; but were repulſed by the earl of Caernarvon, who purſued them ſo far, that he fell into a kind of ambuſcade, formed by a ſtrong party of Waller's dragoons; before which he was obliged to fly in his turn, till he was joined by prince Maurice, who here diſtinguiſhed himſelf in a ſignal victory over the enemy.

Sir William Waller having received intelligence that a part of the royal army was on the march to Mansfield in their way to Oxford, in order to intercept them, took poſſeſſion of Landſdown-hill, which he fortified with cannon and breaſt-works; then he detached a body of horſe towards Mansfield, from whence they were repulſed by the royaliſts, who marſhalled their army on the plain; but obſerving the advantageous ſituation of the enemy, retreated to their old quarters. But they were attacked on their retreat with ſuch ſpirit and reſolution by Waller's horſe, that their cavalry were diſperſed; however, they returned to the onſet with vigour, and put the parliamentary army to flight. The royaliſts then attacked the hill with intrepidity, and after an obſtinate engagement, gained the ſummit; the enemy concealing themſelves behind a ſtone wall, retired afterwards to Bath through favour of the night. Victory was at length obtained by the royaliſts, but with conſiderable loſs; many gallant, veteran officers fell in the attack. The day following the engagement, Sir Ralph Hopton, and major Sheldon were blown up by an exploſion of gunpowder, as they were ſurveying the field of battle on horſeback. The former's life was with difficulty preſerved, but the latter expired two days after the accident to the general regret of his fellow ſoldiers.

Lord Hertford intending to join the royal army began his march for Oxford, but Waller attended to his motions with ſuch vigilance, that finding impoſſible to reach that city with his whole army it was reſolved, that he and prince Maurice ſhould fight their way through the enemy; and that the infantry ſhould remain at the Devizes. Waller then beſieged that place, and the earl of Crawford marching to its relief, was intercepted by a ſtrong body of the enemy's cavalry, ſo that having loſt his whole convoy and ammunition, he preſerved his life with great difficulty.

The attack on the Devizes was carried on with ſuc-such vigour, that the town was on the point of surrender, till relieved by a detachment of horse with two pieces of cannon, under command of lord Wilmot. Waller then drew up his forces to Roundway-down, in order to prevent that general from joining the king's troops; and Wilmot, hoping the infantry from the Devizes would join him during the action, resolved to give the enemy battle; when Waller, charging the royalists with his whole cavalry, met with such obstinate resistance, that his forces were routed with great slaughter. Wilmot, at this juncture, being joined by the Cornish infantry from the Devizes, attacked the enemy's foot with such impetuosity, that the greatest part of them were killed or taken prisoners; and the city of Bristol being in possession of the parliament, Waller and his few followers hastened thither, as their only asylum.

During these various events which attended the conflicts between the two armies, his majesty met the queen on the field of Keinton, who had brought with her for his service about two thousand infantry, and one thousand horse, well accoutred, together with six pieces of cannon, two mortars, and one hundred waggons of ammunition, which were safely conveyed to Oxford.

It having been determined in a council of the royalists to invest the city of Bristol, where the scattered remnants of the enemy's infantry had retired, the king undertook the siege, and proceeded by assault. But as the place was strongly fortified, and well supplied with military stores and provisions of every kind, the assailants were, at the onset, repulsed with considerable loss. At length colonel Washington breaking in upon the line, and opening a passage for the horse, the enemy quitted their posts, and retired within the town, when the governor marched out with his arms and baggage, surrendering the city, though the opponents had with great loss and difficulty only obtained possession of the suburbs.

The capture of Bristol was attended with the loss of many of the king's gallant officers, who bravely fell in carrying on the attack. Fiennes, the governor, was sentenced to death by the parliament, for having surrendered the city; but at the intercession of the earl of Essex, the sentence was remitted. The success of the parliamentary army was much obstructed by a disunion which prevailed between the commander in chief, and Sir William Waller, who upbraided each other with remissness in duty, and this circumstance, added to the late defeat, induced the parliament to apply to their friends in Scotland for assistance.

The king having received from the commander of the garrison of Gloucester, an assurance that he would surrender on a summons from his majesty in person, repaired thither, attended by the marquis of Hertford, and forthwith sent a trumpet to sound a summons, but received for answer, that the citizens would always keep their proper district, according to the commands of his majesty signified by both houses of parliament, so that the investiture of the place as a retaliation for the indignity offered to his majesty became inevitable.

The parliament who had long acted with vigour and unanimity, were now divided in their councils through the prevalence of faction and personal disgust. Edmund Waller, the celebrated poet of those days, opposed their measures with great force of argument, and formed an association of respectable persons, who refused the payment of taxes imposed without the royal assent. The councils of this association were over-heard, and communicated to several of the leaders of the opposite party; in consequence of which the abettors were apprehended and sentenced to death. Waller escaped with life, though principal in the scheme, through the base practices of information, dissimulation, and bribery.

In this critical situation of affairs, a covenant was framed and subscribed by lords, commons, and leaders of the parliamentary army, solemnly declaring that they would never lay down their arms, as long as the papists, who were in open war against them, should be screened from justice. To such a pitch did this faction rise, that they presented the house of lords with an impeachment, in which they accused the queen of high treason. The king, exasperated at this insult, issued a proclamation, forbidding his subjects to obey the orders of the two houses, whom he no longer looked on as a parliament. Many members withdrew themselves from the house, where they could not sit in safety. A great number of citizens went with a petition to parliament for peace, but they were attacked by one Hervey with a troop of horse under his command, and many of them put to death.

To protect the associated counties, and prosecute the opposition to the royalists with vigour, the parliament raised a fresh army, and bestowed the command on the earl of Manchester. They sent a committee to tamper with Essex, who had been greatly offended, and received Waller after the remitment of his sentence, with tokens of general esteem. The king's army had been successful in the west of England, and carried on the siege of Gloucester with vigour, till Essex having obtained a reinforcement fortunately arrived when the garrison was on the point of surrender, and compelled the assailants to raise the siege. Having reinforced the garrison, and added the necessary supplies, he hastened to Cirencester, where he surprized two regiments of the royalists, and seized a great quantity of provision designed for their army; from thence he proceeded to Wiltshire, having marched twenty miles before the king heard that he was in motion.

Divers skirmishes ensued between parties of the troops of Essex, and a detachment of the royalists under the command of prince Rupert, who charged the former with such vigour as to put their rear into confusion, so that next day the king took possession of Newbury with his foot, and Essex was obliged to lay in the field all night without tents or covering. He, however, disposed his army in excellent order, on Bishill, within a mile of the town.

At length a general engagement took place, and was sustained with equal bravery by both armies, which disdained to yield till night closed the doubtful battle. In the morning, however, neither party seemed disposed to renew the combat, for the king recalled his troops from the field; and Essex pursued his march towards Reading, which he reached with his cannon and baggage, after his rear had sustained considerable loss from prince Rupert, who charged it when in disorder, at the head of his horse, and one thousand musqueteers.

The earl of Sunderland and lord Falkland, men of virtue, courage and learning, fell in this action. The latter might be deemed a subject truly constitutional, for as he even opposed prerogative when exerted in violation of the rights of the people, so he likewise maintained prerogative against the attempts of that republican ſpirit, which would ſap the foundation of a government.

Faction, and conſequently diſunion, now prevailed in the royal councils; the king's party, though ſmall, was divided through a jealouſy between thoſe noblemen that had ſignalized themſelves in the protection of their ſovereign, and the favourites of the queen, who were inceſſantly contending for poſts of honour and profit.

The parliament ſucceeded in their negotiation, through a committee detached by them into Scotland, to treat with the general aſſembly, with whom they entered into amicable terms, and ſigned a covenant for the extinction of epiſcopacy, and a more intimate connection between the parliaments of the reſpective nations. In conſequence of this treaty the Scots levied an army of twenty thouſand men for the ſervice of the parliament, and beſtowed the command of it upon their old general, the earl of Leven; who, without heſitation, accepted the offer, though he had ſolemnly ſworn never to bear arms againſt his majeſty. In the treaty between the two nations, it was ſtipulated, that the committee of the Scots ſhould always ſit with the cloſe committee at Weſtminſter, and that the conſent of both nations ſhould be obtained, before any treaty of peace ſhould be ſet on foot.

From the power now aſſumed, or rather uſurped, by the commons of England, that of royal prerogative ſeems to have been totally aboliſhed. They had prepared a new great ſeal, reſembling that which the lord-keeper Lyttleton had given to the king, and ſix commiſſioners being ſworn keepers of the great ſeal, the parliament publiſhed an ordinance, declaring void and invalid all grants and letters patent which had paſſed ſince the keeper left the houſe.

They alſo took upon them to try two of the king's meſſengers, who were ſent with writs to the judges at Weſtminſter, for adjourning the term to Oxford, one of whom was ſentenced to death, and the other to impriſonment for a term by them appointed. The king, to invalidate the claim which the remnant of Weſtminſter laid to the appellation of the parliament, iſſued a proclamation, ſummoning the members of both houſes to aſſemble at Oxford, on a certain day fixed for that purpoſe. He determined alſo to uſe part of the troops, that ſerved in Ireland for his defence, and the rebels of that kingdom had ſent repeated petitions to the king, beſeeching him to appoint commiſſioners to hear what he could ſay in his own vindication.

In conſequence of this addreſs, the earl of Ormond and ſeveral of the heads of the law were deputed to conclude with a committee appointed with the malecontents, a treaty for the ceſſation of hoſtilities for one year.

It was unanimouſly reſolved by both houſes aſſembled at Oxford, to ſend, with the concurrence of his majeſty, a meſſage to the earl of Eſſex, expreſſing their earneſt deſire, that perſons might be appointed on both ſides to treat for an accommodation. Eſſex ſent back the meſſenger, with a ſhort billet to the king's general, the earl of Brentford, ſignifying, that as the letter was not directed to the two houſes, he could not communicate its contents to the parliament.

The Scottiſh army, having penetrated into England, the marquis of Newcaſtle marched from York northwards, in order to oppoſe them; but colonel Bellaſis being defeated at Selby, by Sir Thomas Fairfax, the marquis was obliged to return and ſecure York, while Fairfax took his route towards Cheſhire. The marquis of Ormond ſent a body of foot from Ireland to Cheſter, where, joining the lord Byron, they reduced ſeveral places, and routed a party of parliamentarians at Middlewich. The fugitives retired to Nantwich, and the victors undertook the ſiege of that place; but Fairfax, in conjunction with Sir William Brereton, marching to the relief of the beſieged, charged them ſuddenly, and the garriſon making a ſally at the ſame time, the beſiegers were totally routed; lord Byron eſcaped with the cavalry to Cheſter; the famous colonel Monk (who afterwards engaged in the ſervice of the parliament) was taken priſoner, and committed to the Tower.

The parliament this year ſuſtained a very important loſs in the death of the famous John Pym, a zealous republican, whoſe counſel, example and influence had long been exerted with unremitting aſſiduity in vindication of the rights of the people, though perhaps he ſometimes ſwerved from that duty and allegiance, which, as a ſubject, he owed to his lawful ſovereign.

A. D. 1644. The rigour of the ſeaſon did not appear to relax the military preparations of either of the two contending parties. As the marquis of Newcaſtle retired, the Scots advanced farther into the kingdom. The town of Newark in Nottingſhire, garriſoned by the king's troops, being beſieged by lord Willoughby, and Sir John Meldrum, at the head of five thouſand men, the king detached prince Rupert with a body of forces to ſuccour the place. On his approach, Meldrum, who commanded in the abſence of lord Willoughby, marſhalled his army, and an action enſued, in which both fought gallantly till night, when Meldrum attempted to retire by a bridge, where he had poſted a ſtrong guard to ſecure his retreat; but being ſurrounded was obliged to capitulate on condition that he ſhould give up his arms, ammunition, and other effects, only that the troops ſhould retire with their horſes, and the infantry with their ſwords.

A party of the parliamentary army had beſieged the houſe of the counteſs of Derby at Latham, in Lancaſhire, in which ſhe had gallantly defended herſelf, till prince Rupert marched to her relief, when the aſſailants abandoned their enterprize; part of them reinforced the garriſon of Bolton, which the prince afterwards took by aſſault. The city of York having been inveſted by the parliamentary forces under the command of the earls of Mancheſter, Leven, and general Fairfax, prince Rupert was ordered by the king to its relief, on whoſe approach the enemy abandoned the ſiege, ſo that the prince entered the place in triumph. Elated with the ſucceſs of this enterprize, the prince, in a conference with the marquis of Newcaſtle, propoſed a general and deciſive engagement with the parliamentary army, and though that experienced commander ſtrongly objected to the meaſure, as highly inexpedient at that juncture, the prince ordered his troops to be in readineſs to engage next day. The marquis, who ſeemed to foreſee the conſequence of a battle, told him he would act as a volunteer only, but in that capacity was ready to obey the orders of the king's nephew.

The commander of the royaliſts perſevering in his reſolution, and the enemy being equally diſpoſed to hazard the fate of a general action, both armies were drawn up in order of battle on the third day of July. The prince commanded the left wing, conſiſting of five thouſand horſe, the right wing was commanded by Sir Charles Lucas and colonel Urrey, and the main body by general Goring. The right wing of the enemy, conſiſting of all their cavalry, joined by three regiments of Scottiſh horſe, was commanded by Sir Thomas Fairfax, the left by the earl of Mancheſter and lieutenant general Cromwell; lord Fairfax took poſt with a body of reſerve, and the main body was commanded by the earl of Leven. Prince Rupert charged the right wing of the enemy, with ſuch reſolution, that they were totally routed, and the parliament's three generals quitting the field, fled towards Cawood caſtle.

Upon this occaſion Oliver Cromwell, afterwards renowned in hiſtory, for exploits as ſingular as were ever atchieved by man, ſignalized himſelf for the firſt time, in an attack of the right wing of the royaliſts, in which Newcaſtle acted as a volunteer. His valour and military ſkill changed the face of the battle, which however was maintained ſome time with great impetuoſity, but at length the royaliſts were entirely defeated, and when their left wing, which had been victorious, returned from the purſuit of the enemy's cavalry, it was charged by Cromwell with ſuch fury, before it could be reduced to order, that it was entirely broken and diſperſed, the parliamentarians obtaining a complete victory. Mortified by this diſappointment, the prince, having ſuſtained the loſs of ſix thouſand men, together with his whole artillery, ammunition and baggage, retired with the poor remains of his troops into Shropſhire. The marquis diſguſted at the obſtinacy of the prince in purſuing a meaſure ſo contrary to his advice and opinion, declined his command, and retreated to the continent, where he lived in private till the reſtoration of Charles II.

This important victory on Marſton-moor was followed by a ſeries of ſucceſs in that quarter, particularly the ſurrender of the garriſon of York to the parliamentary army, and the ſtorming the town of Newcaſtle, by a reinforcement under the command of a Scottiſh general.

The parliament receiving intelligence of the ſucceſs of prince Maurice in the weſt of England, found it neceſſary to raiſe a conſiderable army to oppoſe him. The king, however, apprized of their deſign, detached lord Hopton againſt them, and at Farnham he was oppoſed by Waller, who, after ſome few ſkirmiſhes, drew his men into the town, and repaired to London, that he might ſollicit of both houſes the neceſſary ſupplies. Accordingly, a thouſand horſe from Eſſex, commanded by Sir William Balfour, and a body of the city militia were ordered to reinforce him; with which aſſiſtance he retook the caſtle of Arundel, that Hopton had reduced in his abſence, who having received a ſupply of men from his majeſty, reſolved to give him battle immediately. On the twenty-ninth day of March, the two armies met near Abresford. The king's horſe were routed by Balfour, and the infantry put into great confuſion; however, the battle was maintained till night, when lord Hopton retired with his artillery and ammunition towards Reading, and left Waller in poſſeſſion of the field; who immediately repairing to Wincheſter, attempted to reduce the caſtle, but not ſucceeding therein, he plundered the city.

From the ſucceſſes which had lately crowned their arms, the parliament reſolved by one grand manœuvre to obtain the ſummit of their deſires. This was the reduction of Oxford, where the king reſided; and for this ſervice the armies of Eſſex and Waller began their march; Eſſex at the head of three thouſand cavalry, and twelve thouſand foot, and Waller with fifteen hundred dragoons and ſeven thouſand infantry. On the enemy's approach, the king's officers abandoned Abington, where he had aſſembled an army of twelve thouſand men to ſtop their progreſs.

Having paſſed the rivers Iſis and Cherwell, they attempted to ſeize the king's perſon, but he eſcaped through favour of the night with a ſmall body of horſe, at the head of which he and the prince of Wales arrived ſafe at Worceſter. The queen had retired ſome time before this to Exeter, where ſhe was delivered of a princeſs called Henrietta. The king, after his arrival at Worceſter, in order to elude the vigilance of Waller, who had followed him with vaſt expedition, made a feigned march towards Shrewſbury, as if he intended to join prince Rupert. Waller, imagining that it had been his real deſign, planted himſelf between the king and Shrewſbury; then the king ſuddenly wheeled, and took the rout to Oxford, where he was joined by the reſt of his army. He then proceeded to Buckinghamſhire, in order to give the enemy battle; Waller advanced with the ſame intention, ſo that in a very ſhort ſpace of time, the two armies appeared on the oppoſite banks of the river Cherwell. The king, therefore, leaving a ſtrong guard at Croperdy-bridge, to diſpute Waller's paſſage, in order to draw him from his advantageous ſituation, made a feint of beginning his march towards Northamptonſhire; and hearing that a large body of the enemy was within a mile of his van, ordered his troops to double their pace, in hopes of intercepting the whole body. Waller, perceiving the diſtance between his van and rear, ordered a large detachment to ford the river, while himſelf with fifteen hundred horſe, a thouſand foot, and eleven pieces of cannon, attacked and made himſelf maſter of the bridge, then paſſing with his whole army, attacked the king's rear, but was repulſed by the gallantry of the earl of Cleveland, who routed his horſe took part of his artillery, and forced the enemy to repaſs the river with precipitation.

The king endeavoured to gain poſſeſſion of the bridge, but failed in the attempt; however, having obtained a conſiderable reinforcement, and underſtanding that the earl of Eſſex was in the utmoſt diſtreſs for want of proviſions, he determined, if poſſible, to reduce him, without hazarding a battle; and accordingly raiſed a fort on the bank of the river, by which the army of Eſſex had been ſupplied, and by that means intercepted all his convoys. In this emergency, the earl ordered Balfour to force his paſſage through the king's quarters, at the head of his cavalry, which was accompliſhed through favour of the night, and leaving the infantry under the command of general Skippon, he embarked with other officers in a veſſel at Foy. A council compoſed of officers belonging to both parties being held upon the occaſion, it was agreed that Skippon ſhould deliver up all his artillery, arms, and ammunition, and be conducted to Southampton. The earl of Eſſex, on his return to London, was treated by both houſes with tokens of reſpect, his ſoldiers received new accoutrements, and his forces were recruited.

Animated by theſe tokens of honour, Eſſex marched to join Waller and the earl of Mancheſter at Andover. Their junction was effected at Reading on the twenty-firſt of October, notwithſtanding his majeſty's endeavours to prevent it. He then then detached the earl of Northampton with three regiments of horſe to relieve Banbury-caſtle, while himſelf marched to Donnington-caſtle, in the neighbourhood of Newbury, which was beſieged by the enemy's forces. Having thrown ſuccours into the place, and conferred the honour of knighthood on the governor, for his gallant defence, he entered Newbury, where he entrenched himſelf, while the enemy from Reading, with ſuperior numbers, continued to advance againſt him.

A very obſtinate engagement enſued on the twenty-ſeventh of October, which was ſuſtained with the greateſt intrepidity on both ſides a conſiderable time, to their mutual loſs; till at length the king retired in the night to Wallingford, leaving his artillery and baggage in the caſtle of Donnington, which was next day ſummoned to ſurrender by the earl of Mancheſter. Though the governor refuſed to capitulate, they made no effort towards the reduction of the place, but remained inactive at Newbury, when the king purſued his rout to Oxford, where he was joined by prince Rupert, with the northern forces, and lord Northampton, who had drafted men from different garriſons; ſo that he found himſelf at the head of eleven thouſand men, with whom he returned to Donnington, and drew up his army in order of battle, between the caſtle and town of Newbury. To defray the expences attending this unnatural and deſtructive war, the parliament levied a tax this year, by iſſuing an order, that each family throughout the kingdom ſhould abridge themſelves of one meal every week, and that the reſpective rates of the ſame ſhould be funded for public ſervice. A tax as extraordinary in its nature, as it muſt have been difficult in collecting.

Laud, archbiſhop of Canterbury, after a tedious impriſonment was at length brought to trial, and made ſo vigorous a defence, that the commons, foreſeeing he could not be convicted by common evidences, declared him guilty by an act of attainder, which, notwithſtanding many debates, at length paſſed the houſe of lords. He pleaded the king's pardon, which had been ſent him from Oxford, but it was declared null and void by both houſes. Being ſentenced to death as a common felon, he entreated that ſome deference might be paid to his ſacred function and elevated character; to which, with much reluctance, the commons acceded. On the tenth of January, this aged prelate was brought to the ſcaffold, where he addreſſed the ſpectators with great fortitude; he declared he had never been averſe to the inſtitution of parliaments, though he could not approve all their tranſactions; he proteſted his innocence of any deſign tending to ſubvert the laws of the realm, or to introduce the Roman catholic religion; he forgave all his enemies, and ſubmitted his neck to the executioner, who, with one ſtroke, ſevered his head from his body. This prelate, who poſſeſſed great learning and abilities, fell a ſacrifice to the very principles of ambition and deſpotiſm, which influenced him, as well as his royal maſter, to ſuch meaſures as were obnoxious to a free people, and terminated in their deſtruction. At the ſame time, the two Hothams were convicted by a court martial, for having connived at the eſcape of lord Digby, and correſponded with the marquis of Newcaſtle. To effect an innovation in church as well as ſtate, the parliament this year paſſed an ordinance for aboliſhing the book of common prayer, and liturgy, and for eſtabliſhing the directory which had been compoſed by the eccleſiaſtical aſſembly.

Commiſſioners were now appointed on the part of the king and parliament, to meet at Uxbridge, to ſettle a treaty of peace. The king's commiſſioners were the duke of Richmond, the marquis of Hertford, the earls of Southampton, Kingſton, and Chicheſter, and eleven commoners, among whom was Sir Edward Hyde, chancellor of the exchequer, and afterwards earl of Clarendon. The parliament appointed twelve deputies, at the head of whom were the earls of Northumberland, Pembroke, Saliſbury, and Denbeigh; lord Loudon, the marquis of Argyle, and others, being commiſſioned on the part of the Scots.

The demands of the two houſes were ſo exorbitant, degrading, and derogatory to the royal dignity, as to preclude all probability of a reconciliation; but the king's commiſſioners, in the courſe of the conference, agreed, that every perſon ſhould enjoy liberty of conſcience; that no biſhop ſhould exerciſe any kind of juriſdiction; that the management of the militia ſhould be veſted in the hands of twenty commiſſioners, half to be appointed by the king, and half by the parliament; but theſe conceſſions, however humiliating they may appear, produced no good effect, and the commiſſioners departed without coming to any treaty of accommodation.

By this time Oliver Cromwell had acquired great popularity and conſequently great influence, and became the leader of a party, diſtinguiſhed by the appellation of independents, whoſe aim was to aboliſh hierarchy, and introduce democracy, while the preſbyterians ſought only to reſtrain their prerogative. They indeed rejected the hierarchy, but the independents renounced all form of church government, condemning the epiſcopal ordination of miniſters, and allowing all perſons without exception, to teach, preach, and expound the ſcriptures. To the independents of this period we owe, in a great meaſure, the numerous ſects which have ſince ariſen in this country.

Theſe ſectaries employed emiſſaries to inflame the minds of the people, by inſinuating the king's miſconduct both in civil and military affairs. Cromwell had accuſed the earl of Mancheſter of miſmanagement at the laſt battle of Newbury. The earl retorted upon Cromwell, by declaring, that in a conference with him, he hinted, that if Mancheſter would adhere to honeſt men, he would ſoon find himſelf at the head of an army, that would give law to both king and parliament.

Alarmed at this aſpiring idea ſuggeſted by Cromwell to the earl, the parliament took into conſideration the expediency of putting him under arreſt, but the point was deferred to another opportunity. In the mean time Oliver and his confederates expedited the plan they had projected for new modelling the army. They propoſed that the troops ſhould be formed into new regiments, and that no offices civil or military ſhould be held by members of parliament.

To carry this propoſal into ſpeedy execution, the commons, having entered into a reſolution of inſpecting the general ſtate of the nation, Cromwell roſe and pointed out the expediency of proſecuting the war with vigour, concluding, with giving it as his opinion, that every member ſhould reſign the poſt he enjoyed, as an evidence of his patriotiſm, and diſintereſted principles. Some of his his associates seconded the motion, and at length Tate and Vane proposed an ordinance for excluding members from all offices whatsoever. A day of solemn fast was also appointed, to implore the blessing of heaven on their designs.

From the plan now adopted by the commons, Cromwell's ordinance passed them without a negative, but met with some opposition from the upper house; till the earls of Essex, Denbigh, and Manchester, having resigned their places, and the popular torrent running hard in favour of the self-denying ordinance, it passed the next day.

A. D. 1645. The presbyterians, who possessed moderation, and disapproved of the violent religious zeal that seemed to actuate Cromwell, and this independent party, intended to nominate Fairfax as their general; but that officer dissembled his sentiments, and was in reality attached to the interest of Cromwell, so that the parliament's army was new modelled by his plan, and all members of parliament being excluded, and their adherents resigning their commissions, the vacant places were filled up with independents, who acted as chaplains as well as officers.

At the head of this considerable army, Cromwell marched from Windsor, on the twenty-fourth day of April, and in the neighbourhood of Islip cut in pieces four regiments of the king's cavalry. Buckingham was surrendered up to him at the first summons by colonel Windebank, who was condemned by a court martial, and shot for cowardice. The king took the town of Leicester by assault, and continued his march towards Wales, where he expected to be joined by Goring with three thousand cavalry, and by colonel Gerard with two thousand recruits which he had raised in Wales.

Fairfax, having intercepted a letter addressed to the king by general Goring, and pointing out the ease with which the town of Taunton might be put in possession of the royalists, determined to prevent the execution of that design. With this view he followed the royalists, and the king finding he could not reach Leicester without exposing his rear to certain destruction, determined to meet him half way, and marching back, came in sight of the enemy on the fourteenth day of June, who were drawn up in order of battle on a rising ground, near a small village called Naseby. Lord Astley commanded the main body of the royal army, prince Rupert the right wing, Sir Marmaduke Langdale the left, and his majesty headed a body of reserve. The main body of the opposite army was commanded by Skippon and Fairfax, the right wing by Cromwell, and the left by Ireton.

The prince attacked the left wing of the parliamentary army with great success, so that they were dispersed and pursued as far as the village; but in his return, he misemployed his time in a fruitless attempt to seize the enemy's artillery. Cromwell was in the mean time engaged with Sir Marmaduke Langdale, whose cavalry was broken after a very obstinate dispute. The infantry maintained the battle on both sides for some time with equal fury; but at length the battallions of Fairfax and Skippon giving way, Cromwell returned and charged the king's infantry in flank with such vigour as they could not resist, so that they were immediately routed.

Though victory had declared in favour of prince Rupert at the first onset, his troops, intimidated at the order preserved by the enemy's forces, could not be rallied to make a second attack. The king would have charged them at the head of his reserve, had he not been prevented by the earl of Carnwarth, who riding by his majesty's side, seized the bridle of his horse, and turned him round, saying with a loud oath; "will you rush on cer-" tain death?" Many circumstances concurring to deter the royalists, they precipitately left the field to the enemy, who took in pursuit above five thousand prisoners, and the whole of the king's ammunition and baggage.

His majesty and prince Rupert proceeded after this defeat to Hereford, where it was agreed, that the latter should repair to Bristol, while the former continued his rout towards Wales, in hopes of assembling an army in that country. Fairfax advanced to Leicester, which, surrendered on capitulation. He then marched to the west-ward and reduced Bridgewater, Sherborn, and Bath, and having defeated lord Goring at Lamport, undertook the siege of Bristol, which was well supplied and fortified. It was universally believed by friends and foes, that the garrison under the command of the gallant prince Rupert, would sustain a long and obstinate attack; but to the astonishment of the world, terms of capitulation were proposed, and a surrender made before the place was invested in due form; so that the king disgusted at such humiliating behaviour, cancelled Rupert's commission, and commanded him as soon as possible, to quit the kingdom.

Fairfax having reinforced the garrison of Bristol, marched into the western counties, bearing all before him. Cromwell now reduced the Devizes and several other places. Fairfax likewise made himself master of Tiverton, and blocked up the city of Exeter. Hearing that the prince of Wales had an army in Cornwall, and was on his march to give battle, he advanced to meet him with the greatest expedition, and falling on a part of his cavalry by surprize, obliged his royal highness to retire into Cornwall.

Lord Hopton, who was appointed by the prince of Wales to succeed lord Goring, who had fled into France, was routed by the enemy in his march to relieve Exeter; and the prince perceiving his danger of falling into the hands of Fairfax, retreated to the isle of Scilly. Hopton being surrounded, capitulated on condition that his troops should be dismissed, and allowed either to cross the sea, or return to their own habitations. Their arms and horses were delivered to Fairfax, who granted pass-ports to all those who desired to quit the kingdom, having previously sworn never more to serve against the parliament. This treaty being executed, the lords Hopton and Colepepper retired to the prince of Wales in Scilly. By the month of April, the king's troops in the west were entirely routed, the city of Exeter having submitted to Fairfax.

Notwithstanding the misfortunes and disappointments with which the efforts of the king and his friends had been attended, his majesty still maintained an extraordinary degree of fortitude. He was now indeed reduced to such a dilemma, that he saw no other prospect of retrieving his affairs than that of joining Montrose in Scotland, and this expedient he intended to embrace. Receiving intelligence that a considerable detachment of the enemy's cavalry was posted under the command of Poyntz, between Hereford and Worcester, he determined to pass through Cheshire, Lancashire, and by that means got with safety into Scotland.

The king, on his approach to Cheſter, finding the enemy in poſſeſſion of the outworks and ſuburbs, detached Sir Marmaduke Langdale over Holt-bridge, in order to fall on the back of the beſiegers, while he entered the city. Poyntz, who had followed the king with expedition, appeared next day, and was charged by Sir Marmaduke; who compelled him to retire to a greater diſtance: The aſſailants no ſooner perceived him, than they began to abandon the ſuburbs, in order to join his troops, and thus re-inforced, he attacked and drove the royaliſts to the very gates of the city.

A party of the royaliſts under command of the earl of Litchfield and lord Gerard, behaved ſo gallantly as to force the enemy to a retreat, but their muſqueteers being drawn up among the narrow lanes and hedges, diſcharged ſuch a volley on the king's new raiſed forces, that they were broken, routed, and diſperſed, after many gallant officers had been ſlain in the action. The king retreated with five hundred horſe to Denbigh caſtle, where being joined by prince Maurice, with eight hundred more, and ſome other ſmall re-inforcements, he croſſed the river Dee, gained a march upon the enemy, and arrived at Bridgenorth, where he was informed that the parliament's forces had made themſelves maſters of Berkley-caſtle and the Devizes.

Lord Digby having been raiſed to the chief command, of all his Majeſty's northern troops, was ordered, together with Sir Marmaduke Langdale, to proceed with fifteen hundred horſe to Scotland, to join Montroſe, who had lately been defeated by Leſley. Digby began his expedition without delay, and placed a thouſand foot raiſed for the ſervice of the parliament, in the neighbourhood of Doncaſter; and at Sherborn attacked a body of horſe commanded by colonel Copley; but was routed, and fled to Skippon, and his baggage falling into the hands of the enemy, the parliament publiſhed a copy of ſome papers which they found among his effects. Digby at length having been unable to procure any intelligence of the ſituation of Montroſe, embarked with ſome other Scottiſh lords for Ireland. When his majeſty returned to Newark, prince Rupert addreſſed him, deſiring he might have an oppertunity to juſtify his conduct. The king granted his requeſt, admitted of his apology, and publickly declared himſelf ſatisfied with his conduct and loyalty.

The fate of this unfortunate monarch now ſeemed to draw near to a criſis. Deſerted by his conſort, his eldeſt ſon, and the far greater part of his friends; apprehenſive for the ſafety of the reſt of his offspring; in imminent danger of falling into the hands of implacable enemies, and finding himſelf ſo entangled in a labyrinth of wiles that his eſcape appeared impracticable, it required no ſmall ſhare of reſolution to ſupport ſuch complicated diſtreſs. However, having with great preſence of mind ſent orders to the governor of Oxford, to ſtation, at a fixed time, the horſe of the garriſon between Banbury and Daventry, he left Newark at night, attended by five hundred horſe, and arrived at three in the morning at Belvoir caſtle, where he found Sir Gervas Lucas, the governor, ready with guards, to attend him farther on his way. He was ſo fatigued towards evening, that he found it neceſſary to take ſome repoſe in a village near Northampton. Early next morning he continued his march, and reached Banbury about noon, where he found the horſe, by whom he was ſafely conducted to Oxford, after having, with the utmoſt fortitude, gone through the moſt amazing ſcenes of danger and fatigue.

Having reached his general aſylum in times of danger, he once more had recourſe to conciliatory meaſures. He demanded of parliament a ſafe conduct for the duke of Richmond, the earl of Southampton, and ſome others, whom he deſigned to ſend with propoſals for an accommodation. He offered liberty of conſcience to non conformiſts; he propoſed, upon the diſmiſſion of the armies, to join the two houſes; to take meaſures for ſettling the public debts, and regulating the affairs of the militia to their ſatisfaction.

The treaty he deſired might particularly refer to himſelf, as he wiſhed to vindicate his character from the aſperſions of his enemies, and to diſcover his ardent deſire to put a ſtop to the effuſion of Chriſtian blood. But theſe conceſſions produced no other effect, than to heighten the claims of parliament, and eſtabliſh that democracy to which they arrogantly aſpired.

While Charles was involved in this maze of perplexity the court of France ſent over Montreuil, on pretence of making a peace between the king and parliament, but in reality to effect a ſecret accommodation between his majeſty and the Scottiſh army. The ambaſſador found the Scottiſh commiſſioners at London, inclined to treat with his majeſty; but they inſiſted on the abolition of the epiſcopacy, as an indiſpenſible condition, with which Charles obſtinately refuſed to comply. While the French miniſter made a journey to the Scottiſh army, in hopes of allaying their intemperate zeal, Fairfax advanced to Oxford with his army; ſo that the king was in great danger of being ſurrounded. Lord Aſtley, with about a thouſand men under his command, advanced towards Oxford, in order to join his majeſty; but Fairfax, apprized of his deſign, fell on his troops, greatly fatigued, routed them, and took him priſoner, together with Sir Charles Lucas, and many officers of diſtinction.

Thus deprived of all ſuccour from that quarter, this unfortunate monarch, as his laſt reſource, determined to put himſelf wholly under the protection of his Scottiſh ſubjects, conceiving that their attachment to their own peculiar mode of church government would excite their averſion to the innovations of Cromwell and his independent clan, and diſpoſe them to aſſert the royal cauſe.

A. D. 1646. Accordingly Sir John Aſhburnham and doctor Hudſon, having undertaken to conduct him through bye-ways, he left Oxford on the twenty-ſeventh of April, and as ſoon as his eſcape was known, the parliament iſſued a proclamation, denouncing the penalty of high treaſon againſt thoſe who ſhould ſhelter or protect their ſovereign. On his diſcovery of himſelf to the earl of Leven, the general was aſtoniſhed at his preſence, but received him with due reſpect and veneration.

On receiving information of the king's ſudden arrival in Scotland, the parliament gave orders that Fairfax ſhould abandon his enterprize againſt Oxford, and direct his courſe to Newark; but on the declaration of the Scottiſh commiſſioners, that the king's arrival was entirely unexpected by the general, who would punctually adhere to their orders, this reſolution was deferred. The Scots, hearing that Fairfax was deſtined to the northward, retired with his majeſty to Newcaſtle, where he was excluded from all communication with Montreuil and Aſhburnham, through fear of being apprehended hended, fled the kingdom. The bigots amongſt the preachers fulminated anathemas againſt him in their public harangues; and the officers treated him with coldneſs and reſerve. To ſo abject a ſtate was the quondam majeſty of this unfortunate prince now reduced, that the parliament had only to impoſe commands for him to obey. All the garriſons were ſurrendered to parliament, who in fact governed by themſelves and deputies, England, Scotland, and Ireland, having totally annulled his majeſty's commiſſions throughout the reſpective kingdoms.

In this ſituation of affairs, a meſſage was ſent to the two houſes, deſiring they would decide the religious controverſy by the arbitration of certain able divines; and the king ſignified, in letters to the city of London, his diſpoſition to ſatisfy them in every particular they required.

The Scots profeſſedly adhering to the covenant, at the general aſſembly of the kirk, wrote to the parliament of England, the city of London, and the eccleſiaſtical aſſembly, intreating them to forward the work of reformation according to the tenor of the covenant. The houſes then ſent propoſals to the king, more unreaſonable than thoſe, upon which they had inſiſted at Uxbridge, arrogating to themſelves the whole power of the adminiſtration. The king ingenuouſly replied, that though he could not diveſt himſelf of that which he inherited by birth and the laws of the realm, he would nevertheleſs, regardleſs of his own intereſt, accede to any meaſures tending to promote the public welfare.

The parliament, however, ſeemed to have tampered with the Scottiſh deputies ſo effectually, that on the payment of four hundred thouſand pounds in lieu of their demands in general, they agreed to withdraw their army from England, ſo that their king may be ſaid to have been ſold to his enemies for that conſideration.

The duke of Hamilton having been releaſed by order of parliament, immediately repaired to his majeſty at Newcaſtle, and intreated him to cloſe with the two houſes. The king, ſtill deſirous of putting a ſtop to the ravages of a civil war, propoſed that the hierarchy ſhould be confined to ſome particular dioceſes, and that preſbytery ſhould be eſtabliſhed in all other parts of the kingdom, juſtly concluding that ſuch a conceſſion would induce them to liſten to terms of accommodation.

Conſidering Charles at this time as diveſted of all regal power and authority, the two houſes appointed a committee about the middle of September, to confer with the Scottiſh commiſſioners, about diſpoſing of his perſon. The Scots claimed an equal intereſt in his perſon with the Engliſh, but after many debates, the precedency was given to the Engliſh. Charles ſent repeated meſſages to the parliament, deſiring leave to treat with them in perſon, declaring his readineſs to comply with whatever might tend to the intereſt of his ſubjects; he reminded them that it was their king who ſollicited for that, the denial of which, to the meaneſt of his ſubjects, would brand him with the name of tyrant to all poſterity.

This ſubmiſſive behaviour produced a vote, that his majeſty ſhould reſide at Holmby in Northamptonſhire, and be treated with due reſpect. Commiſſioners were then appointed to receive him from the hands of the Scots, who delivered him up on the thirteenth of January, and that very day their army began its march for Scotland. The king had the mortification in his journey, to be the ſpectator of crowds of his former ſubjects, who lined the avenues through which he paſſed, lamenting his unhappy fate, and offering their prayers to heaven for his deliverance from the hands of his enemies.

A. D. 1647. Since the acceſſion of Cromwell to ſuch great power and influence, the animoſity between the preſbyterian and independent parties began to appear. He principally guided the operations of the independents; gained vaſt influence over general Fairfax, and filled the army with his creatures; ſuch were Rainſborough, Fleetwood, Lambert, and Harriſon.

Cromwell now pretended to approve of the proceedings of the parliament, and declared an opinion in favour of the preſbyterian form of church government, quoted ſcripture phraſes, and perſuaded Fairfax to believe that he was actuated ſolely by religious views and motives.

To further his deſigns alſo he employed his emiſſaries, to excite a ſpirit of mutiny among the troops. The inferior officers had been ſo long accuſtomed to a military life, that they were averſe to the very thought of reſuming their former occupations. The commons voted that the army ſhould be diſbanded, and the ſoldiers receive ſix weeks pay on their diſmiſſion. But the ſoldiers having been long in the ſervice, complained highly of the cruelty of thoſe who propoſed to diſband them ſo ſuddenly.

The parliament deputed Cromwell, and ſeveral of his creatures and dependents to inform the army of the deſign to take their complaint into conſideration. On this occaſion the ſoldiers elected deputies to diſcuſs their affairs, and communicate their reſolutions to a council, compoſed of generals, field officers, and captains. Theſe were choſen from the private ſoldiers, or loweſt claſs of officers, for their reputed ſanctity, and extraordinary gifts of preaching and prayer.

The parliament now began to deliberate on the means by which they ſhould accompliſh their deſign of diſbanding all the troops, except thoſe deſtined for Ireland. The ſoldiers, in a petition to the general, ſet forth the injuſtice of this deſign, and deſired that the army might be aſſembled in one place, where they might conſider of means to redreſs their grievances, intimating that unleſs their petition was attended to, they muſt have recourſe to harſher and more deſperate meaſures.

The neceſſity of purſuing a plan for appeaſing the army, and preventing the dangerous effects of a delay, having been reſolved on in a council of war, the parliament, intimidated by this intelligence, determined, if poſſible, to divide the forces. But no conceſſion, could prevail; till the army by being veſted with extraordinary privileges, became a kind of republic, in which the vote of the common ſoldier was as prevalent as that of the colonel; and every private man aſſumed a right of entering into, and executing projects of his own. A few regiments of horſe determined to ſeize the perſon of the king. For the execution of this deſign they ſelected cornet Joyce, formerly a taylor. This officer, on the third day of June, arrived with a detachment of fifty horſe at Holmby, about break of day, and going up ſtairs attended by three troopers, knocked at the door of the king's apartment; which being opened, Joyce and his attendants approaching him with their hats off and piſtols in their hands, told him he must go to the army. When the king asked by what authority he came on this expedition, the cornet answered, "By this," pointing to his pistol, and insisted on immediate compliance with his orders.

When the committee appointed by the two houses to take care of the king's person demanded of Joyce, if he acted by order of the parliament, he replied in the negative, and held up his pistol. They then told him they would write to the parliament to know their pleasure: he answered they might do so, but the king must go along with him immediately. The king, finding his guard averse to any resistance, resigned himself to the will of Joyce, to be disposed of in such manner as he should think proper.

He lodged at colonel Montague's near Cambridge the first night, and next day arrived at Newmarket, where he was treated with great respect by the officers of the army. The regiments being assembled at this place, presented a petition to the general, complaining of the parliament, and next subscribed a writing which they termed "The engagement," consenting to be disbanded, on condition of obtaining redress of their grievances, as adjudged by a council, consisting of the generals, two officers, and as many soldiers of every regiment; but declared they would consent to no other proposals. The army was now advanced to St. Alban's, when a message to the houses, requesting immediate recompence to the soldiers, was sent by the general.

These hypocritical demagogues had for some time carried every thing before them with impunity. They had levied by the most unprecedented exactions about thirty millions of money in five years; notwithstanding which the public was loaded with enormous debts and incumbrances. They laid taxes on the common necessaries of life, sequestered one half of the lands belonging to the royalists, deprived of their livings, and reduced to beggary more than one half of the clergy, because they would not renounce their civil and religious principles.

To cover such illegal measures with the veil of sanctity, they affected a whining cant in their prayers, and impudently as well as impiously affirmed that they were the peculiar favourites of heaven.

Alarmed at this arrogant assumption of unprecedented authority, the two houses empowered the city of London to raise some cavalry, as if they intended to put themselves in a posture of defence. They likewise ordered ten thousand pounds to be paid to the soldiers, who should quit the army, and engage in the Irish expedition.

Determined to carry measures by dint of arms, the army at length presented a remonstrance to the two houses, demanding that the parliament should be purged of corrupted and unduly elected members; that the public accounts should be equitably settled, and that, after some acts of justice upon delinquents, an act of amnesty should be passed. They then impeached eleven members, who headed the Presbyterian party, and alledging that they had hindered the course of justice, desired they might be removed from the house.

From the event, it appears to have been the evident design of the army, abetted by Cromwell and his adherents, to take away the life of their sovereign, though his friends began to hope, that a rupture between the parliament and army would redound to his majesty's advantage.

The army at length appearing to be satisfied with some marks of submission from parliament, retired to a greater distance from London, and fixed their head quarters at Reading. But they carried the king with them wherever they went. That prince was now in a much better situation than at Holmby, and had obtained some greater degree of liberty, as well as respect from both parties. All his friends were allowed to approach him; his correspondence with the queen was even permitted; his chaplains were restored, and he was indulged in the use of the liturgy; his children were suffered to visit him, and spent a few days at Caversham, where he then resided. Cromwell, Ireton, and others of the independent party amused him with vain hopes, till they had obtained a complete victory over the city and parliament. They then treated him with much arrogance, ordered him to be strictly guarded, would hardly allow any of his domestics to speak with him in private, and employed spies to watch over all his words and actions. Major Huntingdon, who had been trusted with private commissions from Oliver to the king, assured his majesty, that Cromwell if not speedily prevented, would effect his ruin. Charles became too late apprehensive for his personal safety. Resolving, however, to make his escape from Hampton Court, where he was now kept under a strong guard, he retired to his chamber early in the evening, on pretence of being indisposed; and in an hour after midnight went down the back stairs, attended by Ashburnham and Legg, both gentlemen of the bedchamber. Sir John Berkley waited for him at the garden gate with horses, which they instantly mounted, and directed their rout towards Hampshire. He travelled through the forest, and next day proceeded towards Titchfield, a seat of the earl of Southampton, possessed by the countess dowager, a woman of great honour on whose fidelity he could securely rely. But before he reached that place, he had made for the sea coast, and expressed much chagrin that a certain vessel had not arrived; from whence his attendants inferred his resolution of escaping to the continent.

They then advised him for the convenience of contiguity to seek refuge in the Isle of Wight, although Hammond, a creature of Cromwell's, was at that time governor. Hereupon, Ashburnham and Berkley were dispatched to the island, and enjoined to conceal from Hammond the place of the king's residence, till they could obtain a promise that he would not detain his majesty's person. Ashburnham rashly, if not treacherously, brought Hammond to Titchfield; and the king was forced to put himself into his hands, and to accompany him to Carisbroke castle in the Isle of Wight, where he was treated at first with marks of duty and respect. Though Ashburnham's conduct on this occasion carries in it much suspicion of treachery, the king acquitted him of any treasonable intention; however, it certainly argues in it the height of rashness and folly.

Cromwell having now effectually carried his point in the subjection of parliament to his will and pleasure, and the security of the person of the king, privately assembled a council of some of the principal officers at Windsor, to consult about the settlement of the nation, and the future procedures towards his majesty; and there is shrewd cause to surmize that the death of the king was first meditated in this council.

Conscious that a private assassination would brand their their names with an indelible ſtigma, they reſolved on the expediency of an attempt which would carry the appearance of juſtice, and cover its barbarity by the boldneſs of the enterprize. To give ſanction, therefore, to their proceedings againſt the king, and ſecure the friendſhip of the army, they propoſed to adopt the favourite opinion of the equality of mankind, and thereby render him at once amenable to trial.

In order to gratify the republican principles of the people, which ſo generally prevailed, the king had promiſed, by a meſſage ſent from Cariſbroke caſtle, to relinquiſh, during his own life, the power of the militia, and the appointment of all the officers of ſtate, on condition, that after his death, theſe prerogatives ſhould be reſtored to the crown. But the parliament, wholly influenced by the army and independent party, inſtead of agreeing to theſe terms, drew up four propoſitions, which they ſent him as preliminaries, and to which they demanded his poſitive aſſent, before they would engage in any treaty. Theſe preliminary articles were, for recalling all the declarations iſſued againſt the parliament and their adherents; eſtabliſhing the militia; depriving peers created ſince the troubles, of their right to ſit in parliament; and empowering the two houſes to adjourn at their own pleaſure.

A. D. 1648. The king, having reviſed theſe propoſitions, requeſted of the two houſes, that terms on both ſides might be adjuſted, before any conceſſions on his part were ſpecified. Cromwell, availing himſelf of this reply, inveighed with great acrimony againſt Charles, branded him with odious epithets, and adviſed the parliament to decline all meſſages in future, and regulate the affairs of the kingdom without his concurrence. The parliament were intimidated into compliance, though ninety-one members had ſpirit enough to diſſent. It was, however, voted, that for the future, no addreſſes or meſſages ſhould be ſent to the king, which vote received the aſſent of the houſe of lords.

At this juncture there prevailed in Scotland three diſtinct parties; theſe were the royaliſts, who demanded the re-eſtabliſhment of the king's authority, without any regard to religious ſects, or opinions; and of theſe Montroſe, though abſent, was conſidered as the head. The rigid Preſbyterians, who inſiſted on a perfect uniformity of worſhip, and were reſolved to give no aſſiſtance to his majeſty, unleſs he would ſign the covenant: theſe were directed by Argyle. A third party under the two brothers Hamilton and Laneric, were the moderate Preſbyterians, who wiſely endeavoured to reconcile the intereſts of religion with thoſe of the crown; and hoped by the concurrence of the Preſbyterian party in England, to ſubdue the independent army, and reſtore the parliament as well as the king, to their juſt freedom and authority.

Upon a review of the ſtate of affairs both at home and in Scotland, it was deemed expedient to raiſe an army of forty thouſand men for the defence of the nation. But the duke of Hamilton, who was declared general, was not able to raiſe fourteen thouſand men, and thoſe ill armed, and undiſciplined, and therefore not in a condition to march for England, till the beginning of July.

During theſe tranſactions in Scotland, Langhorne, Poyer, and Powell, three officers who had ſerved in the parliament's army, declared for the king, ſecured the caſtle of Pembroke, and influenced the greateſt part of South Wales to eſpouſe the royal cauſe. Young Hales and the earl of Norwich excited commotions in Kent. Sir Charles Lucas, Sir George Liſle, Sir Bernard Gaſcoigne, and colonel Farr, who laſt had been in the parliament's ſervice, aſſembled a body of three thouſand men, and took poſſeſſion of Colcheſter, where they intended to remain, till they could join the Scottiſh army, which they heard were on the march. But Fairfax deprived the inhabitants of all relief, by inveſting and blocking up the town.

A fleet was fitted out by parliament, and the command given to the earl of Warwick with orders to oppoſe the ſeventeen ſhips which had revolted to the prince of Wales. While the forces were at a diſtance, the parliament recovered its former liberty, and began to act with its uſual ſpirit and reſolution. They ſent commiſſioners to the Iſle of Wight to treat with his majeſty, who, on their arrival, were ſhocked at the manifeſt change that appeared in their unhappy ſovereign. Being deprived of ſocial converſe, he had entirely neglected his perſon; his hair was now waxen grey, not only by the hand of time, but the iron rod of affliction; and both his dreſs and viſage indicated adverſity and decay.

His mental faculties, however, had not ſuffered the leaſt impair. The earl of Saliſbury, amazed at his nervous though cool reaſoning, ſaid to Sir Philip Warwick, "The king is extremely improved of late." "No," replied Sir Philip, "he was always ſo, but now you are at laſt convinced of it." Sir Henry Vane obſerved, that as his majeſty's abilities appeared to be great, the ſtricter and more ſevere ought to be the terms of agreement.

The terms as propoſed by parliament, and aſſented to by the king, were to the following effect: that his proclamations, &c. &c. againſt the parliament ſhould be annulled; he gave up to the parliament the whole power of regulating the militia, during the term of twenty years, or for a longer time, if deemed conducive to the public good. With reſpect to religion, he obſerved, that his conſcience would not permit him to conſent to the abolition of epiſcopacy; and as to the ſale of church lands, he deemed it not only ſacrilegious, but expreſsly contrary to his coronation oath, whereby he was bound to maintain the rights of the clergy; yet, to evince his ſincere deſire of pacification, he conſented to their reducing epiſcopacy to its primitive uſe; that archbiſhops, deans, and chapters ſhould be aboliſhed; that the preſbyterian form of government ſhould continue three years, during which, the king and parliament, with the advice of the eccleſiaſtical aſſembly, and other divines nominated by his majeſty, ſhould agree upon ſome ſuitable plan of church government. He indeed made ſuch conceſſions in general, as not only degraded royalty, but would have been wholly inconſiſtent with and ſubverſive of the order of government, had they produced a peace, and been brought into action. Notwithſtanding theſe humiliating conceſſions, the two houſes after deliberating on them, voted them inſufficient and unſatisfactory on account of the articles of epiſcopacy and the ſale of church lands.

Though the duke of Hamilton had brought with him into England a conſiderable body of forces, he was prevented from joining the troops under the command of Sir Marmaduke Langdale, by the Engliſh loyaliſts declining to take the covenant, and the peremptory refuſal of the Scottiſh preſbyterians to act in concert with them upon any other terms. The two armies were on the march at the ſame time, and in the whole might conſiſt of twenty thouſand men. Cromwell boldly encountered them, with a body not amounting to half that number. He ſurprized Langdale near Preſton in Lancaſhire, and though the royaliſts behaved gallantly, yet not being properly ſupported by their confederates, they were routed with great ſlaughter. Hamilton was next attacked, his troops defeated, and chaſed to Utoxeter, where himſelf was taken priſoner. Cromwell having purſued his victory, proceeded to Scotland, where, being reinforced by Argyle, he ſubdued Laneric and Monro, and returned triumphantly to England.

The garriſon of Colcheſter, after a ſpirited and moſt reſolute defence, through want of a reinforcement of men and ſupply of ſtores and proviſions, was compelled to ſurrender at the pleaſure of the victors; and Fairfax, prompted by the barbarous and blood-thirſty Ireton, ſeized Sir Charles Lucas, and Sir George Liſle, and determined to ſacrifice them to the fury of the army.

This flagrant inſtance of cruelty met with general execration. Lord Capel, regardleſs of danger, upbraided Ireton with his ſavage barbarity, and challenged him, as they were all embarked in the ſame cauſe, to inflict the ſame puniſhment on them all without exception. Lucas, who was firſt ſhot, gave the word fire, with as much courage as if he had been at the head of his regiment. Liſle having embraced the breathleſs body of his friend, deſired the executioners to come nearer. One of them ſaid, "I'll warrant you Sir, we'll hit you": "he anſwered with a ſmile, "Friends, I have "been nearer you, when you have miſſed me." So ſaying, he received their ſhot, and fell lamented by all good men.

This lawleſs and blood-thirſty clan having now removed all oppoſition, a remonſtrance was framed by a general council of officers, and preſented to the parliament. They there condemned the treaty with the king; inſiſted on his puniſhment for the bloodſhed during the war; demanded the diſſolution of the then parliament; and affirmed, that though ſervants, they had a right to repreſent theſe important points to their maſters, who were themſelves no more than the ſervants and miniſters of the people. To compleat their deſign, they removed their army to Windſor, and ordered colonel Ewer to ſeize the king's perſon at Newport, and tranſport him to Hurſt caſtle, where he was committed to cloſe confinement.

Intelligence being received in London of the king's removal and commitment, the commons interpoſed their right, and reſolved, that his majeſty's conceſſions might ſerve as a foundation for peace. Next day, when the commons were to aſſemble, colonel Pride, formerly a drayman, had ſurrounded the houſe with two regiments, and, aſſiſted by the lord Grey of Groby, arreſted in the paſſage forty-one members, whom they confined in a neighbouring houſe. About an hundred and ſixty members were excluded, and none were ſuffered to enter, but the moſt deſperate of the independents, who hardly amounted to ſixty in number. This flagrant violation of the liberties of parliament was commonly known by the name of Pride's Purge.

The Independent party through the excluſion of the preſbyterians now compoſing the whole of the commons, thanks were voted to Cromwell their head and abettor for his great and important ſervices rendered to the true church as well as the ſtate.

A ſpecial committee, ſelected from this remnant of the commons, was appointed to draw up a charge againſt their ſovereign; colonel Harriſon, the ſon of a butcher, and one of the moſt furious fanatics of the army, was ordered to conduct the king to London, under a ſtrong guard. At Windſor, the duke of Hamilton, who was there impriſoned, was admitted into the king's preſence, and falling on his knees, feelingly exclaimed, "My dear maſter!" The unhappy monarch raiſed him up, and embracing him, replied with tears; "I have indeed been a dear maſter to "you." The king was inſtantly hurried away, and the duke, bathed in tears, foretold, that from that time he ſhould ſee his king no more.

Though the king bore his own ills with unexampled fortitude, the misfortunes of his friends and adherents touched him in the tendereſt part. When he arrived at the caſtle of Windſor, an order was iſſued from the council of war, to deprive him of all the enſigns of royalty, and treat him on the level of an ordinary perſon.

All neceſſary preparations were now made for the trial, and the high court of juſtice finally ſettled. It was compoſed of an hundred and thirty three perſons as nominated by the commons, but ſo general was the averſion to theſe violent proceedings, that more than ſeventy never attended. Cromwell, Ireton, Harriſon, and all the chief officers of the army, with ſeveral citizens of London and members of the lower houſe, compoſed a part of this high court of juſtice.

The twelve judges behaved loyally and conſtitutionally upon the occaſion, for having been enrolled in the number of this high court of juſtice, they cauſed their names to be expunged, declaring, that according to the laws of England, the king could not be tried for treaſon, as all impeachments for treaſon muſt be carried on by the royal authority. Bradſhaw, a lawyer, was choſen preſident; Coke acted as ſolicitor-general; Doriſlaus and Aſke attended as aſſiſtants, and the court aſſembled in Weſtminſter-hall.

When the crier of the court, amongſt the names of others who were to compoſe the tribunal, came to call that of lord Fairfax, a female voice was heard from the gallery to exclaim, "He has more "wit than to be here." When the impeachment "was read, "In the name of all the good people "of England," "No (replied the ſame voice) "not the twentieth part of them, Oliver Crom-"well is a rogue, and a traitor." One of the officers ordered a file of muſqueteers to fire at the place whence the voice came, but they ſoon perceived the perſon who ſpoke to be the lady Fairfax, whom with much difficulty they prevailed upon to depart.

The charge on this very ſolemn and awful occaſion was opened, in the name of the commons of England, by the ſolicitor-general, who repreſented, that Charles Stuart, being admitted king of England, and entruſted with a limited power, from a wicked deſign to eſtabliſh an arbitrary and tyrannical government, had traiterouſly and malicioully made war upon the preſent parliament, and the people, whom they repreſented; and was therefore accuſed as a tyrant, traitor, murderer, and a public and implacable enemy to the common-wealth. After the impeachment was finiſhed, the preſident addreſſed addreſſed himſelf to the king, and informed him, that the court expected his anſwer.

His majeſty with becoming dignity, reſolution, and compoſure, diſclaimed the legality of this ſelf-inſtituted court, and conſequently pronounced their juriſdiction uſurped and invalid. The preſident, in order to defend the majeſty of the people, and aſſert the ſuperiority of the court above the priſoner, ſtill inſiſted, that he muſt not deny the authority of his judges, and that the preſent court owed its authority to that community of which kings themſelves were but the ſervants.

The king having been thrice cited in form, and as often paſſed over the ſummons unnoticed, on the fourth time, after a peremptory denial of their authority, ſentence was pronounced againſt him. He deſired to be heard before the two houſes in the painted chamber; but the court refuſed to grant him his requeſt, which they conſidered merely as a delay of juſtice. In walking through the hall to the place of his confinement, the ſoldiers, prompted by their ſuperiors, exclaimed, "Juſtice and execution." They loaded him with the moſt cruel and bitter reproaches; in a word, they treated him in the moſt undeſerved, arrogant, and inſolent manner, which he bore with aſtoniſhing compoſure, only obſerving to a friend who attended him, "that for a little money they "would treat their commanders in the ſame man-"ner." A ſoldier, moved by ſympathy, implored for the bleſſing of heaven on oppreſſed majeſty; an officer overhearing the petition, ſtruck him to the ground in ſight of the king, who ſaid, "The pu-"niſhment methinks exceeds the offence." On his return to Whitehall, he requeſted to be indulged with a viſit from his children, and that Dr. Juxon, late Biſhop of London, might have free acceſs to his perſon, as ſuperintendant of his preparatory devotional exerciſes. Theſe petitions were accordingly granted.

The potentates of Europe in general could not ſuppreſs their amazement or reſentment at ſo unprecedented an inſtance as that of a mighty monarch being arraigned in the moſt humiliating form, at a tribunal compoſed of his own ſubjects. The French and Dutch miniſtry preferred their manifeſtos againſt it, and the queen and prince addreſſed the parliament to interpoſe their conſtitutional authority, but all without effect, as no conſideration could influence the fanatical demagogues to deſiſt from their blood-thirſty deſigns. As a memento due to genuine loyalty, it is recorded, that four noblemen offered to lay down their lives for their ſovereign. Theſe were the duke of Richmond, and the earls of Hertford, Southampton, and Lindſay.

Purſuant to requeſt, all his family that remained in England were permitted to attend him, during the interval of the three days between his ſentence and execution; and the interview exhibited an affecting ſcene. He wept over his orphan children, and claſped them in his paternal embrace. He beſtowed on his daughter the princeſs Elizabeth prudent advice and pious exhortations, charging her to tell the queen her mother, that during the whole courſe of his life he had never once, even in thought, ſwerved from his fidelity towards her, and that his conjugal affection could only end with his life. He implored heaven to ſhower down bleſſings on thoſe forlorn babes, as well as the reſt of his children; and reſigned himſelf to his fate with the utmoſt compoſure. Doctor Juxon attended his majeſty the night before his execution, and after ſpending great part of it in devotion, he enjoyed four hours of ſound reſt; an inconteſtible proof that his mind could not have been much ruffled by the apprehenſions of his approaching fate.

The ever memorable day appointed for the execution of his ſentence, was the 30th of January, (1649) on which he was conducted, by virtue of a warrant from the high court of judicature, to Whitehall, accompanied by doctor Juxon, and guarded by a regiment of foot ſoldiers, commanded by colonel Tomlinſon. When he came upon the ſcaffold, which was ſo crouded that he could not be heard, he directed his diſcourſe to colonel Tomlinſon, doctor Juxon, and ſome others about him, declaring himſelf innocent of having commenced the war againſt the parliament, but ſuggeſting, at the ſame time, that heaven had retaliated on him his want of candor and charity, in conſenting to the execution of the unfortunate earl of Stafford.

Though he profeſſed to die in perfect love and forgiveneſs even towards the authors of his deſtruction, he conjured the whole nation to reſtore the conſtitution of the kingdom, by paying obedience to their lawful ſovereign, his ſon and ſucceſſor. When he was preparing himſelf for the block, doctor Juxon told him, there was but one ſtage more, which was ſhort though troubleſome, and would convey him to the regions of ineffable joy; "I "go, (replied the king) from a corruptible to an "incorruptible crown, of which I ſhall never be "bereaved." Having uttered theſe laſt words, he ſubmitted to his fate without an apparent token of reluctance, and at one ſtroke his head was ſevered from his body. A man in a maſk, then held up the head ſtreaming with blood, and exclaimed, "This is the head of a traitor."

Mankind have ever been divided in their opinions concerning not only the public character, but the legality of thoſe proceedings which deprived Charles I. king of England, both of his crown and life. It appears from a general view of the conduct of his father James I. as well as that of the ſubſequent race of the Stuart's family, that they had all imbibed principles of deſpotiſm, which added to the influence of popiſh ſuperſtition, to which they were moſt undoubtedly attached, actuated them to ſuch arbitrary meaſures, reſpecting the ſtate as well as the church, as were incompatible with the genuine ſpirit of the Engliſh conſtitution, and eventually brought on their expulſion from the Engliſh throne. By that party, ſtill diſtinguiſhed under the appellation of tories, the friends to the hierarchy and royal prerogative, he is deemed to have died a martyr to the cauſe they would wiſh to maintain. By the other party called whigs, the aſſertors of the rights of the people in oppoſition to the infringements of the crown, as well as univerſal toleration, he is cenſured as the moſt deſpotic of tyrants, and by ſome, pronounced highly deſerving the fate he met. But men of moderation and candour, of whatever profeſſion they may be, never carry points to the extreme.

That his opponents in their general meaſures exceeded the limits of the laws of the realm, as well as that reverential decorum due to a ſovereign, all thinking, diſpaſſionate perſons muſt allow. And it may be inferred upon the whole, that they ſwerved as much from the conſtitution on the one hand as the king did on the other. We ſhall ſum up his private character in the words of an honourable hiſtorian, leaving the reader to adopt or reject it at pleaſure: it is by that writer recorded, "that "he was the worthieſt gentleman, the beſt friend, "the beſt maſter, the beſt father, the beſt huſ-"band, and the beſt chriſtian of the age in which "he lived." It is to be feared, from the ſway his conſort bore over his reaſon in ſome inſtances, that he had, at times, been too much the huſband and too little the king. He loſt his life in the forty-ninth year of his age, and twenty-fourth of his reign, if it may be diſtinguiſhed by that title.

He had iſſue by his queen, four ſons and five daughters; viz. Charles James, who died in his infancy, Charles, prince of Wales, by whom he was ſucceeded; James duke of York, afterwards James the ſecond, king of England; Henry, duke of Glouceſter, who died after the reſtoration; Mary, who eſpouſed the prince of Orange; Elizabeth, confined in Cariſbroke-caſtle, where ſhe died of grief; Anna, and Catharine, who died in their infancy; and Henrietta Maria, married to Philip, duke of Anjou and Orleans, brother to Lewis XIV. king of France.

General Monk effects a coalition, between the army and the city of London. Charles II. proclaimed king of England. Makes his public entry into London, &c.

A. D. 1649. THE democratic party having now obviated the main obſtructions to the proſecution of their deſigns, as an effectual barrier to the immediate acceſſion of a king, iſſued a proclamation, forbidding all perſons, on pain of high treaſon, to acknowledge or declare Charles Stuart, commonly called prince of Wales, as ſovereign of England. They likewiſe voted, that they ſhould make no more addreſſes to the houſe of lords, and that that houſe was therefore to be aboliſhed; the peers, however, might be elected as members of the lower houſe. They afterwards paſſed an act, aboliſhing the king's power as uſeleſs, and decreed that the nation ſhould be governed under the form of a republic, by the people's repreſentatives, the houſe of commons.

To enforce this uſurped authority, a new great ſeal was provided, containing the arms of England and Ireland, round which were theſe words, "The "great ſeal of England." The other ſide repreſented the houſe of commons, ſurrounded with this inſcription, "In the firſt year of Freedom by "God's bleſſing reſtored, 1648." It was committed to the charge of a certain number of perſons, intitled, the conſervators of the liberties of England; and all public orders were expedited in their names, under cognizance of parliament.

The officers of government were choſen friends among ſuch as had ſignalized themſelves in the parliamentary intereſt, and their opponents, in redicule, pointed at as objects of their reſentment. Bradſhaw was again choſen preſident of another high court of juſtice, for the trial of the duke of Hamilton, the earl of Holland, the lord Goring, lately created earl of Norwich, lord Capel, and Sir John Owen; all of them accuſed of having carried arms againſt the parliament. After a ſhort trial, they were all convicted and condemned to the block. The duke of Hamilton, on his trial, complained, that as he acted by authority of the parliament of his own country, he could not come under the cognizance of an Engliſh tribunal. The old earl of Holland made little or no defence; Sir John Owen ſeemed pleaſed with having been admitted to the honour of the axe, and his ſubmiſſive reſignation to his ſentence probably ſaved his life. The other three were immediately executed; they died with becoming fortitude profeſſing allegiance to the ſon of the late unfortunate monarch.

The heir-apparent to the crown of England was not only deprived of the retinue due to his perſon and dignity, but had no fixed place of reſidence; wandering from place to place, deſerted and forlorn, lorn, having nothing to console him, but the hopes of a reversion of fortune.

To revenge the death of his late sovereign, the earl of Ormond went over to Ireland, and levied an army of sixteen thousand men, with which he retook from the parliament the town of Dundalk, Newry, Trim, and Drogheda; and was resolved to undertake the siege of Dublin. To this kingdom, Charles determined to repair, but his design was suspended, on hearing that the parliament of Scotland had issued a proclamation, acknowledging Charles II. as their lawful and hereditary sovereign on the following conditions; that he should give proper satisfaction to the kingdom touching the security of religion, the union between the two nations, and the peace of Scotland, according to the national and solemn league of the covenant. For this purpose, deputies were sent to the Hague, to signify their intentions to the young prince; and in a few days, the marquis of Montrose, and the earls of Lauderdale and Lanerk, paid him a visit. The former of these noblemen was engaged in the service of the emperor, but hearing of the tragical fate of the late king, he hastened to the Hague and received from Charles a renewal of his commission as captain-general of Scotland.

The seeming loyalty of the parliament of Scotland did not encourage the hopes of young Charles; on the contrary, the principles and measures espoused by the presbyterians, both with respect to church and state, under the reign of his father, induced him to doubt the sincerity of their professions; so that instead of subscribing to their conditions, he persisted in his resolution of visiting Ireland, at the same time, ordering Montrose to make a descent upon Scotland. The king's friends in that kingdom, understanding that he was averse to the conditions proposed by the parliament, determined to excite an insurrection, and if they succeeded, to receive him upon his own terms. About this time, Charles sent the lord Collington and chancellor Hyde, his plenipotentiaries to the court of Madrid, to solicit succours from the court of Spain.

If the young king had pursued his designs of visiting Ireland, it would have been attended with imminent danger of his life, as Cromwell had been sent thither as lord lieutenant, at the head of a formidable army raised by the vote of the English parliament, in order to quell any insurrection that might arise from the junction of the Catholics of that kingdom with the royalists. Such indeed was his success against Ormond, their commander in chief, that Charles, despairing of succour from that quarter, was under a necessity of listening to the Scottish treaty. Accordingly, the marquis of Argyle having influenced the parliament and general assembly of the kirk, propositions being prepared, and deputies appointed, Breda was fixed on as the place of conference.

A. D. 1650. When the young monarch and deputies met according to appointment, though he by no means secretly approved the four particular conditions specified in the articles, yet not being in a condition to shew his resentment, he carefully dissembled, offering to confirm the Presbyterian discipline in Scotland by act of parliament, but thought it unreasonable to expect that he would renounce the form of religion, in which he had been educated. He asked them if they had power to relax in any demand, or to treat about the assistance he might expect from the Scots, towards restoring him to the crown of England, but they replied in the negative. As this was the most important point he could possibly propose to carry by a treaty with the Scots, the disappointment must have been attended with the greatest chagrin; however, it was deemed necessary to protract the negotiation, until he should receive some intelligence from Montrose, on whose success all his hopes were founded. That intrepid nobleman, having re-inforced his handful of men with a few recruits, which he had raised in the Orkneys, passed over to Caithness, hoping the general affection to the royal cause, and the fame of his former atchievements, would allure the people to his standard. But the nation was now fatigued with continual wars, many of his former adherents had been apprehended and punished, and no hopes of success remained against so great a force as was now destined to oppose him, Lesley and Holborne being ordered to advance against him with an army of four thousand men. Strachan being sent forward with a body of cavalry to prevent his progress, attacked Montrose suddenly, and totally defeated his army, all of whom where either slain or taken prisoners; and Montrose himself being soon after seized was conducted to Edinburgh, where, notwithstanding the king's commission, he was condemned to death, and bore his sentence with that fortitude of mind, of which he had given such exemplary proofs during the whole course of his life.

Thus bereft of all military assistance, Charles was under the necessity of signing the terms, which the Scottish committee had presented to him. In consequence of this agreement, he immediately set sail for Scotland, and arrived in the frith of Cromarty. Before he was permitted to set foot on shore, he was required to sign the covenant; and with this demand he immediately complied. Hamilton, Lauderdale, and other noblemen attached to the royal cause, were immediately removed from his presence, and obliged to retire to their estates, where they lived without any trust or authority. The young king himself was merely so in name, being divested of prerogative, debarred of all kind of amusement, and though of a volatile disposition, compelled to conform to the gravity and precision of the Scottish manners in common life, as well as in matters of religion.

The reception which Charles met with from the Scots, however, alarmed the English parliament, insomuch that they renewed their military operations, and recalled Cromwell from Ireland, which by this time was almost reduced. That general, having constituted Ireton, his son-in-law, deputy lieutenant, returned to England, according to the summons of the parliament; and was honoured, on taking his seat, with general thanks for the signal services he had rendered to the commonwealth. They then desired to know, whether Fairfax would undertake the command of the troops destined for Scotland; and on his refusal bestowed it on Cromwell, who, without delay put his troops in motion, and entered Scotland with an army of sixteen thousand men. The command of the Scottish army was conferred on Lesley, an able officer, who laid a very proper plan for defence; and removing whatever he thought might help to support the English army, fortified himself in a camp between Edinburgh and Leith.

The English general took every measure to bring the Scots to action, but Lesley, conscious of the superiority of the enemy in discipline and experience, though his army exceeded in numbers, wisely declined a decisive engagement, and kept within his intrenchments. By ſkirmiſhes and petty rencounters he endeavoured to animate his ſoldiers, and was generally ſucceſsful in theſe enterprizes. His army became every day more numerous, more dexterous, and expert in their exercife. Cromwell made another motion, in hopes of drawing the Scottiſh general from his entrenchments, but all his efforts proved ineffectual; ſo that by this manœuvre of the Scottiſh commander, Cromwell, through want of proviſions, was compelled to retire, after the two armies had remained ſeveral weeks in ſight of each other. He therefore withdrew to Dunbar: Leſley followed him, and encamping on a hill oppoſite the town, aſſured himſelf of putting an end to the war, by the deſtruction of the whole Engliſh army. To ſuch a dilemma was Cromwell reduced, that he had even once entertained the thoughts of embarking all his foot and artillery, and of forcing his way at the head of his cavalry.

But the fanatical zeal which then prevailed equally in Scotland as in England, defeated the military plan of Leſley, and proved eventually ſucceſsful to Cromwell. At the inſtance of ſome Scottiſh miniſters, of whom great numbers attended the camp, Leſley was prevailed upon, through an aſſurance of the peculiar interpoſition of heaven in their favour, contrary to all the rules of art, and every inſtance of former experience, to quit his advantageous poſt, and deſcend into the plain, in order to come to a general action with the enemy.

Oliver, as was his uſual cuſtom, prefaced the fight with a prayer, and further to animate his men, and inſpire them with an enthuſiaſtic ardour, ſolemnly aſſured them, (and with as much authority as the Scotch fanatics had arrogated in order to prevail with their general) that he had received a particular revelation from heaven that his enemies would be delivered into his hands. So indeed, however, it proved, for the Scots unaccuſtomed to, and undiſciplined in war, were altogether unable to ſuſtain the ſhock of ſuch hardy and experienced veterans as the Engliſh. Though double in number to the enemy, they were inſtantly routed with great ſlaughter, and purſued to a conſiderable diſtance. Three thouſand were ſlain on the ſpot, and about nine thouſand taken priſoners. The Engliſh general then took poſſeſſion of Leith and Edinburgh, but the caſtle did not ſurrender till the latter end of December.

This victory proved a favourable circumſtance to Charles, as it induced the Scottiſh parliament to treat him with more than uſual reſpect and indulgence; inſomuch that his friends were ſuffered to approach him, and his coronation was performed with great ſolemnity at Scone. His ſituation, however, though ſomewhat amended, was far from being eaſy or agreeable. Of a gay diſpoſition, he could but ill digeſt the rigid auſterities to which he was confined by the clergy, or the ſtill more ſlaviſh ſubmiſſion in which he was held by Argyle and his party. Diſguſted at theſe and many other circumſtances, he determined to attempt the recovery of his liberty. General Middleton being proſcribed by the covenant, had retired with a party of royaliſts to the Highlands, where he waited for Charles, who, eſcaping from Argyle, fled to join him with all poſſible expedition. Colonel Montgomery, with a troop of horſe, was ſent in purſuit of him. Though the defeat of his expectations in being compelled to return with that officer, might pique the pride of Charles, the conſequences favoured his deſigns; for the committee and Argyle being now alarmed with the apprehenſion that the ſeverity with which they had treated him might force him to join the cavaliers, and ſo involve the nation in a civil war, he was therefore admitted to a little part in the adminiſtration, and, upon the whole, their rigour towards him conſiderably abated.

But the king, conſcious of the importance and influence of Argyle in ſupporting his pretenſions, treated that nobleman with uncommon affability and eſteem, and even hinted a deſire of eſpouſing his daughter. Argyle, well acquainted with his majeſty's principles, kept at a diſtance; but his ſon, the marquis of Lorn, attached himſelf to the king, and faithfully executed his private commiſſions. And ſuch was his popularity, that in a ſhort ſpace of time, an army was raiſed to ſupport his claim to the throne.

A. D. 1651. This formidable body of troops, under the command of the generals Hamilton and Leſley, encamped early in the ſpring at Torwood in the neighbourhood of Stirling, and being animated by the preſence of the king, who had joined them, determined on the moſt vigorous exertions of military proweſs, as they were fortified by the caſtle of Stirling, which lay at their back; ſupplied with proviſion by the northern countries, and their front was ſecured by ſtrong intrenchments. Cromwell without effect had recourſe to divers ſtratagems to bring them to action, ſo that at length, wearied with waiting their motions, he ſent Lambert over the Frith into Fife, in order to intercept the proviſions of the army. He was oppoſed by Holborne and Brown, who commanded a party of the Scots; but theſe were defeated with great ſlaughter.

At length the Engliſh general paſſed over the river with his whole army, and drawing them up in the rear of the king, compelled him to abandon his ſtation. As his laſt and only reſource, Charles determined to march for England, not only as there was no obſtruction to impede his progreſs, but as he hoped that all his friends, and all thoſe who were diſſatisfied with the preſent form of adminiſtration, would flock to his ſtandard. He prevailed on the generals to agree to his propoſals, and with one conſent the army, to the number of fourteen thouſand men, quitted their camp, and proceeded by long marches, towards England.

Alarmed at this ſpirited meaſure of the young king, and fearful of his ſucceſs in England, where his preſence, from the general hatred which prevailed againſt the parliament, was capable of producing ſome great revolution, Cromwell ſent a body of cavalry under the command of Lambert to hang upon the rear of the royal army, and having left Monk with ſeven thouſand men to finiſh the reduction of Scotland, purſued the king with the utmoſt expedition.

To further the efforts of the royaliſts, a conſiderable body of forces were raiſed in Cheſhire and Derbyſhire, by the earl of Derby, but they were ſoon defeated by the parliamentary army, and the king's army being greatly diminiſhed by deſertion and diſeaſe, his majeſty laid aſide his deſign of marching to London, and directed his route to Worceſter, where he met with a kind reception from the magiſtrates, and next day was ſolemnly proclaimed.

The active and intrepid Cromwell purſued him thither, at the head of a formidable army, and attack-tacking the city with his usual vigour, surprized and threw the royalists into the utmost confusion. A terrible carnage ensued, the streets were covered with the carcases of the slain; Hamilton, a worthy nobleman, was mortally wounded, and the king compelled to fly. By the earl of Derby's advice, he repaired to Boscobel, a lonesome mansion on the borders of Staffordshire, inhabited by one Pendarell, a farmer.

The loyal peasant here hospitably entertained his deserted and bewildered sovereign at the hazard of his life, as all persons were forbidden to harbour him on pain of death. At length the farmer having communicated the secret to his three brothers, they furnished the king with a peasant's habit, and led him into a neighbouring wood, put an axe into his hand, and pretended to employ themselves in cutting wood.

During his continuance in this abject state of retirement, he chearfully partook of the homely, but best fare his host could furnish. One day, on the approach of a party of soldiers, he climbed up into an oak tree, where he sheltered himself for the space of twenty-four hours. This tree was afterwards called the Royal Oak, and for many years held by the royalists in great veneration. At length, however, after having been exposed to the most imminent danger, encountered many and great difficulties, and assumed a variety of external disguises by way of deception, he landed at Fescamp in Normandy, for which place he had embarked at Shoreham in Sussex.

Cromwell had now acquired such renown among the people, and influence with parliament through his victorious career, that he might be said to govern both the army and the state.

Elated by their late successes, the English parliament passed an act, abolishing the royalty of Scotland, empowering it, however, to send a certain number of representatives to the British senate. All causes in both kingdoms were now determined by a mixture of English and Scottish judges; justice was administered impartially, and peace and order were maintained by the prudent conduct of general Monk, who commanded the forces in Scotland. The people, being secured in their property, applied themselves to the manual arts, and enjoyed, during the inter-regnum, more of peace and plenty than their ancestors had experienced in any equal period of time.

Blake, who had heretofore acted only in a military capacity, now signalized himself as a naval commander, by atchieving such feats in character of admiral of the parliamentary fleet, as raised him to the highest pinnacle of fame. Among other proceedings he had the bravery to pursue prince Rupert, in his flight from Kinsale to Portugal, and could hardly be prevented from attacking him even in sight of Lisbon. The prince, however, having escaped from the intrepid English admiral, through the interposition of his Portuguese majesty, directed his course to the West-Indies, where his brother prince Maurice was shipwrecked in a storm; so that after undergoing many hardships, and finding it impossible to do any effectual service to the royal cause, he returned to France, where he disposed of the few ships which remained, together with all his prizes.

As all the American colonies, New England excepted, professed regal allegiance, Sir George Ayscough was sent with a considerable squadron to exact their submission to the power of parliament. Bermudas, Antigua, and Virginia, made little resistance; Barbadoes, commanded by lord Willoughby of Parham, held out for a considerable time, but was at length obliged to follow the example of the other plantations. Jersey, Guernsey, Scilly, and the Isle of Man, were with equal ease brought under obedience. Nor were the arms of the republic less successful in Ireland and Scotland. Ireton, deputy lieutenant of the former kingdom, persevered with great industry in subduing the revolted Irish, and defeated them in many engagements, which, though in themselves of little importance, entirely ruined their declining cause. The horrid massacres which had been there committed were retaliated on the perpetrators, among whom was Sir Phelim O'Neal, who justly suffered on the gallows for the many barbarities he had committed. After the reduction of Limeric, Ireton, the deputy lieutenant, died in that city of the plague.

A. D. 1652. Having succeeded in their military and naval enterprizes, and obtained despotic power throughout the British dominions, the parliament of England determined to carry their arms to foreign countries. In order to restrict the commerce of the Dutch, they passed an act of navigation, prohibiting all nations to import any merchandize into England, but what was the produce of the country to which the ships belonged. The states general, alarmed at these measures, sent ambassadors to London, to solicit the repeal of the act of navigation; but the parliament, far from complying with their request, demanded satisfaction for the massacre at Amboyna, the murder of Dorislaus, the correspondence which, during the war, the Dutch ambassadors had maintained with the late king; claiming also two millions of money for the losses they had sustained by the Hollanders in the East Indies. The United States, apprehensive that these proceedings would terminate in an open rupture, equipped a powerful armament, but were so impolitic as to menace the court of London with its destination.

In order to secure the Dutch merchantmen from the depredations of the English corsairs, Tromp, a gallant veteran, was sent to cruize off the coast of Holland with a fleet of forty-five sail. When hailed by the English admiral, he omitted paying the usual compliment of striking, and Blake fired a blank shot to remind him of the honour due to the English flag. Tromp taking no notice of these warnings, Blake fired a ball, which was returned by a broadside from the Dutch admiral.

A general engagement ensued which lasted five hours, and was sustained with equal fury and resolution; but the event is partially described by the respective historians of each country. The populace of London were highly incensed, and would have assaulted the Dutch ambassadors, had they not been furnished with a guard for the safety of their persons.

The Dutch admiral then directed his course towards the Downs, in order to engage rear admiral Ayscough, who lay at anchor with part of the English fleet; but on receiving intelligence of Blake's having sailed to the northward with forty ships, to destroy the herring busses on the coast of Shetland, he followed him with a very numerous armament. The two fleets came in sight of each other near Newcastle, but a violent storm arising just as they were ready to engage, scattered the Dutch fleet in such a manner, that not above thirty sail could then reach Holland, though the rest arrived in a few weeks after.

Sir

Sir George Ayſcough was afterwards attacked by a Dutch fleet of thirty-four ſhips, under the command of admiral de Ruyter; when though much inferior in numbers, the Engliſh engaged them valiantly until night put an end to the action. A ſhort time before this engagement, commodore Badily was defeated in the Mediterranean, by Van-Galen, who was ſlain in the action.

Soon after this indeciſive engagement, Blake fell in with the grand fleet of the Dutch, under the command of the admirals Tromp and de Ruyter near the Goodwin ſands. Blake determined to face the enemy, but being greatly inferior in numbers was worſted in the action, being wounded himſelf, and having two of his ſhips taken, two burned, and one ſunk. Blake retired to the Downs, and Tromp, elated with his victory, hoiſted a broom at his main top-maſt head, as a ſignal that he would ſweep the channel clear of the enemy.

A. D. 1653. To retaliate this loſs, the parliament fitted out a fleet of fourſcore ſail, the command of which was given to Blake, aſſiſted by Dean, together with Monk, who had been recalled from Scotland for that purpoſe. While they lay off Portland, they eſpied the Dutch fleet of ſeventy-ſix ſail, having above three hundred merchant-men under their convoy, and bore down immediately to give them battle. The fight was continued three days with the moſt reſolute obſtinacy, and the commanders in chief equally ſignalized their valour and their conduct. The Dutch admiral made an excellent retreat, and ſaved all the merchantmen except thirty. Eleven of his ſhips of war were taken or deſtroyed; two thouſand men were ſlain, and about fifteen hundred made priſoners. The number of ſlain among the Engliſh were nearly equal to that of the enemy. They loſt, however, but one ſhip, which was ſunk, but they had many greatly damaged.

The ſtates of Holland having ſuffered ſo much from the capture of their ſhips and the ſtagnation of their commerce, deputed an embaſſy to apply to the parliament for ſettling a treaty of peace; but this was interrupted by a ſtrange event taking place in England.

Cromwell, who, as before obſerved, might be ſaid to govern, in conſequence of a conſultation with ſome of the officers of the army on whoſe fidelity he could rely, had preſented to the houſe a petition, or rather poſitive demand of the payment of arrears due to the army; and the parliament treating this behaviour with becoming reſentment, Oliver availing himſelf of the opportunity, aſſembled a council of officers, in order to deliberate concerning the ſettlement of the nation; and while they were engaged in debates, colonel Ingoldſby entered, and informed him that the parliament had met, and were come to a reſolution not to diſſolve themſelves, but to ſupply the vacancies by new elections.

To effect his deſign of centering all power civil and military in himſelf, Cromwell haſtened to the houſe with a body of three hundred ſoldiers, which he poſted at the different avenues. He firſt addreſſed himſelf to his friend St. John, and hypocritically told him he was come to do that, which, to his great grief of ſoul, the Lord had impoſed on him After ſitting ſome time to hear the debates, he ſuddenly roſe up, and in the moſt opprobrious terms reviled them for their tyranny, oppreſſion, and robbery of the public. Then ſtamping with his foot, which was the ſignal for the ſoldiers to enter, he ſaid, "Get you gone, give place to honeſt men, you "are no longer a parliament; I tell you, you are "no longer a parliament, the Lord has done with "you, he hath choſen other inſtruments for per-"fecting his own work." Sir Harry Vane riſing to remonſtrate againſt this outrage, he exclaimed, "O! Sir Harry Vane, Sir Harry Vane! the Lord "deliver me from Sir Harry Vane." Taking hold of Martin by the cloak; "Thou art a whore-"maſter," ſaid he. Another he called a drunkard; a third, an adulterer, and a fourth, an extortioner. "It is you," ſaid he to the members, "that have driven me to this. I have prayed the "Lord, night and day, that he would rather ſlay "me, than put me on this work. He then gave orders to the ſoldiers to clear the premiſes, and having himſelf locked the door, and ſecured the key, cooly retired to his apartments at Whitehall. By one reſolute effort, through the aid of that enthuſiaſm, which ſeems to have been the moſt effective principle of the times, did Oliver Cromwell annihilate the legiſlative power of three kingdoms, and arrive to a degree of eminence and dignity hardly to be paralleled in the annals of hiſtory.

This ſingular tranſaction produced addreſſes of congratulation and duty from the officers naval and military, and many religious ſects and ſocieties. Yet there was a formidable clan, whoſe oppoſition might greatly impede the progreſs of Cromwell's deſigns. Theſe were ſuch as were denominated in general republicans, but yet comprehended ſects of very oppoſite tenets. The firſt were the Calviniſts, called alſo fifth monarchy men, who affirmed that dominion being founded in grace, all diſtinction of magiſtracy ought to be aboliſhed, except what aroſe from ſuperior ſanctity; and conſidering themſelves as ſaints, thought they alone had a right to govern. The ſecond were the Deiſts, who aſpired to more liberty than they could expect under any monarch, and wiſhed for unbounded freedom in religion and politics.

As a man of Cromwell's penetrating genius muſt have diſcerned that as enthuſiaſm is the child of folly, the former were the apteſt to aſſiſt him in finiſhing his intended project; in conſequence of which he firmly attached himſelf to the Calviniſts. Though he had already aſſumed the ſupreme authority, he thought proper to amuſe them with the appearance of a commonwealth. He firſt juſtified his conduct in diſſolving the parliament, by a declaration ſubſcribed by all the principal officers of the fleet and army; and then propoſed the eſtabliſhment of a parliament, conſiſting of one hundred and forty members, in whom the ſupreme power ſhould center. Having carried this point, he took care to ſelect men of obſcure birth, and a fanatical enthuſiaſtic turn of mind; aſſured that ſuch would upon every occaſion become his pliant tools. Accordingly this very choice and ſingular legiſlature began to exerciſe their authority, in aboliſhing the clerical function, the tythes, the univerſities, the court of chancery, and the common law, in the room of which they intended to ſubſtitute the Moſaic inſtitution.

While theſe extraordinary meaſures were effecting by Cromwell, ſome of the provinces of the United States were preparing remonſtrances to lay before the Engliſh parliament for their non-attention to the propoſals they had made for a general pacification. Admiral Tromp, with a fleet of an hundred ſail fell in with the Engliſh fleet commanded by Monk, Dean, Penn, and Lawſon. They engaged on the third of June, near the coaſt of Flanders, and fought with equal valour until night parted them. Admiral Dean was ſlain in the action, notwithſtanding which, the Engliſh renewed the battle next day, and the Dutch were obliged to retire with great loſs; for, towards the cloſe of the battle, the Engliſh were reinforced by Blake, with eighteen ſail of freſh ſhips, and the victors purſued the enemy to the coaſt of Holland.

The gallant Tromp having repaired this loſs, ſoon after weighed anchor, hoiſted ſail, and bore down upon the enemy as they lay in the Texel, though he was greatly inferior in point of numbers. A freſh engagement enſued on the twenty-ninth of July, which, with no material advantage to either party, laſted from morning till night. The next day Tromp, being reinforced with twenty-ſeven ſhips, engaged them again, but was defeated by the Engliſh with ſome conſiderable loſs. A few days after Tromp, ſailed with a fixed reſolution either to repair his late misfortunes or die in the attempt. He fell in with the Engliſh commanded by Monk, and the fight immediately began with the utmoſt fury. Tromp, bravely encouraging his men, was ſhot through the heart with a muſquet ball, in conſequence of which, the Dutch were ſo diſpirited that they began to give way on all ſides, and at length retired into their harbours with the loſs of their beſt ſhips, which were either ſunk or taken.

The United States having now ſuſtained the heavieſt loſſes both in their trade and navigation, very ſolicitouſly applied for a treaty of pacification, to which Cromwell acceded on the following terms. A defenſive league was concluded between the two republics. They engaged each of them to baniſh the enemies of the other; thoſe concerned in the maſſacre of Amboyna were to be ſeverely puniſhed; the honour of the flag was to be yielded to the Engliſh; eighty five thouſand pounds were to be paid by the Dutch Eaſt-India company, as an indemnification for the loſſes which the Engliſh company had ſuffered; and the iſland of Polerone in the Eaſt-Indies was to be ceded to the latter.

Cromwell ſoon found the powerful effects of ſelecting the members which compoſed his parliament, as they unanimouſly agreed to reſign their authority to thoſe from whom it had been received, and accordingly repaired to Whitehall, and confeſſing themſelves unequal to the taſk they had undertaken, delivered the inſtrument of government to him.

A. D. 1654. The late ſhadow of legiſlature having delegated their nominal authority to a council of officers, compoſed of the creatures of Cromwell, the power of government was declaratively veſted in him with the title of lord Protector of the Common-wealth, to be occaſionally aſſiſted by a council compoſed of only twenty-one members. His firſt act of ſovereignty was the execution of Mr. Vowel, and colonel Gerard, who were charged with having formed a conſpiracy againſt his life; the former was hanged at Tyburn, and the latter beheaded on Tower-hill. The ſame ſcaffold ſerved for the execution of don Pantaleon Sa, knight of Malta, and brother to the Portugueſe ambaſſador. He had repaired with ſeveral others, to the New-exchange, and in a miſtake killed a man, whom he took to be the before mentioned Gerard, by whom he had been affronted on the preceeding day. Cromwell being informed of this tranſaction ordered the knight to be apprehended; and though he had retired to his brother's houſe, he and his accomplices were delivered up: the latter were hanged at Tyburn, and the knight was beheaded on Tower-hill.

But Cromwell, notwithſtanding the arts he practiſed and the guiſes he aſſumed, to veil his ambitious deſigns, could not elude the diſcernment of the thinking part of mankind. Parliament no ſooner met and choſe Lenthall for their ſpeaker, than they entered on a diſcuſſion of the pretended inſtruments of government, and of that authority, which, under the title of protector, he had uſurped over the nation. Cromwell, incenſed at their refractory diſpoſition, ſummoned them to the Painted-chamber, where he harangued on the abſurdity of arraigning his title, ſince the ſame inſtrument of government, whith conſtituted them a parliament, had entruſted him with the protectorſhip. On their return to the houſe, they found a guard placed at the door, who would not ſuffer any member to enter, until he had ſigned the recognition, by which he engaged faithfully to adhere to the then government, as veſted in a ſingle perſon and a parliament.

Theſe lawleſs and arrogant proceedings induced many of the members, poſſeſſed of power and influence in their reſpective places of reſidence in the country, warmly to engage in a conſpiracy againſt the haughty protector, who, apprized of their deſign, diſſolved the parliament eleven days before the expiration of the term fixed, telling them he knew there was a plot formed againſt the adminiſtration.

A. D. 1655. The royaliſts, availing themſelves of the general murmer which prevailed againſt the meaſures of adminiſtration, formed a deſign for reſtoring the king to his crown and dignities, and the nation to its former mode of government under king, lords, and commons. But Cromwell obtaining immediate intelligence of the ſame, through the vigilance of his ſpies, ſeveral of them were impriſoned.

Though the reſolute behaviour of the protector occaſioned a general panic, Jones, Grove, and other gentlemen of the Weſt, aſſembled about two hundred horſe, with which they entered Saliſbury at the time of the aſſize, took poſſeſſion of the gates and market-place, and proclaimed young Charles king of England; but not being joined by any of their aſſociates, they abandoned the town, and wandered about that country, till their numbers were greatly diminiſhed, ſo that one troop of horſe was at leaſt able to ſuppreſs them. The leaders being taken, were condemned and executed, and the reſt tranſported to the plantations.

The protector, now thinking his authority ſufficiently eſtabliſhed at home, directed his attention to foreign purſuits, to which he was not a little induced by the puſillanimous behaviour of Charles II. of France, who, notwithſtanding an unjuſtifiable attack of his fleet in their way to the relief of Dunkirk, waved the inſult and ſent ambaſſadors to London to ſue for the friendſhip and alliance of the protector.

During theſe tranſactions admiral Blake had been ſent with a fleet to the Mediterranean, to chaſtiſe the Algerine corſairs, who had annoyed the Engliſh traders. Another fleet was ſent to the Weſt-Indies, under the command of admiral Penn, having on board five thouſand ſoldiers under general Venables. Cromwell delivered to the admiral orders ſealed up, the purport of which he was not to know, until he reached a certain latitude. By theſe he was ordered to make a deſcent upon the iſland of Hiſpaniola, and attack St. Domingo the capital. On their approach, the Spaniards abandoned their houſes, and fled into the woods; but when they ſaw Venables landing his ſoldiers at a conſiderable diſtance from the place, they recovered their ſpirits, returned to their habitations, and prepared themſelves for a vigorous defence. But the fatigue ariſing from the very intemperate heat of the climate ſo affected the Engliſh, that being wholly debilitated, they were eaſily repulſed by the natives, and driven on board their ſhips with conſiderable loſs. However, if they failed in that enterprize, they ſucceeded in their attack of Jamaica, which ſubmitted to their arms without oppoſition.

Notwithſtanding the capture of the important iſland of Jamaica, the protector ordered the naval and military commanders in chief into confinement immediately on their arrival in England. The king of Spain, incenſed at theſe hoſtilities, iſſued orders for confiſcating all the effects of the Engliſh in his dominions, and the Spaniſh trade was transferred to the Dutch, who ſoon indemnified themſelves for the loſſes which they had ſuffered in the war with England.

A. D. 1656. Hoſtilities being thus openly commenced between the crown of Spain and the Engliſh government, the fleet of the latter under the command of admirals Blake and Montague cruized off Cadiz in order to intercept the Weſt-India trade on their return; but being diſtreſſed for water, were forced to make for Portugal. Captain Stayner who was left on the ſtation, with ſeven ſhips, ſoon deſcried the galleons, and immediately gave chace. The Spaniſh admiral and two of his captains ran their veſſels a-ſhore, but the two ſhips richly laden fell into the hands of the Engliſh, and two were ſet on fire. The treaſure was brought from Portſmouth in waggons, and carried in triumph through the city of London.

The next engagement with the Spaniards, though not ſo profitable, was more honourable to the Engliſh flag, and terminated the naval atchievements of the brave admiral Blake, who on receiving intelligence that a Spaniſh fleet of ſixteen ſhips had taken ſhelter among the Canaries, ſailed thither, and found them in the bay of Santa Cruz, drawn up in line of battle. The bay was fortified by a caſtle, and ſeven forts united by a line of communication; and the Spaniſh admiral had moored his ſmaller veſſels cloſe in ſhore, and the larger galleons further out with their broadſides to the ſea. Blake attacked them with ſuch fury, that the enemy quitted their ſhips, which were ſet on fire, and conſumed with all their treaſure. The gallant admiral, after this ſignal victory, dying of a dropſy on his return to his native country, was interred with all the honours due to his ſtation and character; his loſs being ſincerely regretted, not only by the protector, but the nation in general.

About this time an accident happened which greatly endangered the life of Oliver. Having been preſented with ſix fine Frieſland horſes, he attempted, for his amuſement, to drive his own equipage round Hyde Park, attended by Thurloe his ſecretary. The horſes taking fright, ran with ſuch violence, that he could neither manage the reins nor keep his ſeat; but being thrown on the pole, was dragged on the ground for ſome time, and a piſtol which he had in his pocket went off during the time of his being in this dangerous ſituation; however, he happily received no injury either from the fall or exploſion.

Cromwell exerciſed his exalted office without the leaſt interruption or moleſtation; and on the meeting of parliament obtained the neceſſary ſupplies by an unanimous vote. An act was alſo paſſed for the renunciation of all title in Charles Stuart or any of his family to the Engliſh throne; and this was the firſt act of that nature which had the leaſt appearance of a parliamentary ſanction.

A. D. 1657—8. In the beginning of this year, a powerful conſpiracy was formed againſt the life of the protector by one Syndercomb, formerly a trooper, who very narrowly miſſed his aim in attempting to ſhoot him. At his trial, he behaved with undaunted reſolution, declaring that many other perſons were engaged in the ſame deſign, and intimated that he had received undoubted aſſurances of being ſcreened from juſtice. He was convicted of high treaſon, and condemned to death, but on the day appointed for his execution he was found dead in the priſon.

This very obſequious parliament became daily more devoted to the will and pleaſure of the lordly protector; and ſo far did they carry their complaiſance, that on a motion made by colonel Jephſon for tendering him the crown they moſtly ſignified their approbation of the propoſal; and, when the motion was ſeconded by an aldermen of London, it paſſed by a conſiderable majority.

On his being urged by a ſelect committee to comply with the requeſt of the parliament, he ſeems to have acted with the duplicity of the tyrant Richard, and to have uſed all his art and fineſſe, which plainly indicated that ambition prompted him to accept of the glittering gewgaw. But foreſeeing that his compliance would draw on him the reſentment of the army, and the contempt of the world, as he had ever been the avowed foe of kingly government, after deſiring time to deliberate on the important matter, he gave an abſolute denial, and the parliament, to reward his conſummate modeſty, confirmed his title of protector.

Cromwell now removed from their reſpective offices, commiſſions and appointments, all thoſe perſons of whoſe attachment to his intereſt he had the leaſt ground to entertain ſuſpicion. His eldeſt ſon Richard was introduced at court, as the protector's heir apparent. He is repreſented by hiſtorians as a youth of an amiable character, particularly adorned with the virtue of benevolence, and exempt from the ambition and bigotry of his father, as a proof of which is cited, his ſtrenuous interpoſition in behalf of the unfortunate king Charles II.

Having two daughters yet unmarried, Cromwell beſtowed one on the grandſon and heir of the earl of Warwick; the other on lord viſcount Falconbridge, of a very ancient family, formerly attached to the royal party.

A plan was now formed in favour of the king, by Mr. Mordaunt, brother to the earl of Peterborough, Sir Henry Slingſby, a man of great property in Yorkſhire, and doctor Hewet, a clergyman of the church of England.

Elated by this plauſible effort in his favor, Charles made ſome preparations in the Low Countries for obtaining that crown of which he was deprived by the protector. Cromwell receiving intimation that one of the king's commiſſions was accepted by a gentleman of the name of Stapely, ſent for him to court, and prevailed on him to diſcover all he knew of the conſpiracy. He alſo intiintimated that the marquis of Ormond had lately reſided in London three weeks. That nobleman came over to learn the particulars of the combination, and finding matters not yet ripe for action, returned to the continent without the knowledge of Cromwell. Mordaunt, Slingſby, and Hewet, with a great number of their confederates, were apprehended, and a court of juſtice was erected to try the conſpirators. Slingſby and Hewet were condemned and executed, but Mordaunt eſcaped, his wife having bribed the evidence to abſent themſelves on the day of trial.

The laſt memorable tranſaction of a military nature during the protectorſhip of Oliver Cromwell, was the victory obtained by the combined forces of France and England over the Spaniſh army at the famous battle of Dunes, where the Spaniards were routed with the loſs of twelve hundred ſlain, and about two thouſand taken priſoners. Dunkirk had been previouſly inveſted, but being by this means deprived of all hopes of aſſiſtance, was obliged to ſurrender, and the government of it was given to Lockhart, a Scotchman, who had married Cromwell's neice, was his ambaſſador at the court of France, and deemed a profound politician.

But amidſt all the power, honour, and renown, which Cromwell had acquired as protector of the realm, he was not exempt from anxiety and diſquietude. The coolneſs of relations and friends on the one hand, and the plots and ſchemes of enemies on the other, greatly affected his repoſe. Fleetwood and others, concluding from the pomp and ſtate he had now aſſumed, that his views had ever been directed by pride and ambition, inſtead of religion and the love of his country, began to form parties againſt him, but the event which touched him moſt nearly was the death of a favorite daughter, whoſe amiable diſpoſition had procured her univerſal eſteem.

In the month of Auguſt he was attacked with a fever, which encreaſing with great violence, he began to apprehend it would terminate in his death. His phyſicians were ſenſible of his perilous ſituation, and began to drop ſome hints on the ſubject; but his chaplains, by their fanatical inſinuations, perſuaded him to believe himſelf out of all danger. But notwithſtanding this deluſive aſſurance, his ſymptoms became more violent, and the council deſiring to know if his ſon Richard ſhould ſucceed him, he anſwered in the affirmative, and then expired on the third of September, (1658) in the 59th year of his age.

Cromwell was robuſt in perſon, and his viſage manly, though not engaging. In no inſtances have the prejudice and partiality of hiſtorians been more glaring than in the deſcription of the character of this very extraordinary man. He is variouſly and emphatically ſtiled, by four different writers, "a fortunate madman; a judicious villain; a brave wicked man; and a tyrant without vices:" to which an appellation of more modern date has been added, "a prince without virtues." How far any or all of theſe epithets are applicable, will beſt appear from a review of his life, which certainly exhibits the moſt palpable effects of wild enthuſiaſm and towering ambition. If he attained not to a degree of excellence in human literature, he appears to have been well acquainted with the human heart, and could ſo adapt his words and actions, as to gain an aſcendancy over moſt perſons whom he deſired to mould to his purpoſe. Verſed in the arts of diſſimulation and inſinuation, he not only concealed his own deſigns, but diſcovered the moſt ſecret intentions of others: as to religion, if its principal characteriſtics are juſtice and benevolence, we muſt offer it as our candid opinion, that, though he might have much of the theory of it in his head, very little of its influence appears in his actions. As mankind may be celebrated, or diſtinguiſhed however, in the annals of time for their vices as well as their virtues, ſo the name of Cromwell will be memorized to the lateſt poſterity, by the extraordinary nature of the tranſactions he effected. Upon the whole, it muſt be acknowledged, that though his mode of evincing his oppoſition to the government, and averſion to the principles of his ſovereign, cannot be juſtified by any law human or divine; yet as good frequently is brought about by apparent evil, he was by his proceedings acceſſary to the ſuppreſſion of arbitrary power, and the reſtoration of the conſtitutional rights of England; ſo that whether he did moſt good or moſt harm to the general intereſts of mankind, is a problem not eaſily to be ſolved.

Oliver Cromwell was interred with great funeral pomp in the chapel of Henry VII. amongſt the kings and princes of England, by command of his ſon Richard, who, immediately on the demiſe of his father, was, by the council, choſen to ſucceed him in the protectorſhip of the realm.

But neither the diſpoſition or genius of Richard was adapted to manage the ſeveral parties with whom he had to engage in his new character, ſo that each one ſeems to have purſued their own particular intereſt: for a parliament for the three kingdoms being convoked in the name of the new protector, they met on the twenty-ſeventh of January, and began to examine the authority of the Scots and Iriſh in ſending members to the houſe. After many debates, it was voted that the other houſe ſhould ſubſiſt, and the Scottiſh and Iriſh members ſit in parliament. They then paſſed an act, confirming Richard's title of protector.

A. D. 1659. The army, zealous of maintaining the power they had acquired under the government of Oliver, preſented a petition to Richard, entreating that Fleetwood might be appointed generaliſſimo, and on their being ſeverally repulſed by the new protector, not only reprobated his character, but uſurped a claim to ſettle the government. On the twenty-ſecond of April, they repaired to him, and inſiſted on the immediate diſſolution of the parliament. Deſborough, a man of a clowniſh diſpoſition, endeavoured to frighten him into compliance; and the protector having neither ſpirit to deny, nor power to reſiſt, the parliament was diſſolved, and the protector generally conſidered as depoſed. In a few days after, indeed, he ſigned his reſignation in form.

The council of officers, in conſequence of this reſolute effort, being reſtored to their former elevated ranks in government, began to conſider what ſort of government ſhould be eſtabliſhed. Many of them were diſpoſed to erect a military government, and to exerciſe the power of the ſword in an open manner; but as it would be difficult to compel the people to the payment of the taxes impoſed by arbitrary will, it was reſolved to retain the appearance of civil authority, and to reſtore the long parliament which had been expelled by Oliver Cromwell, with this proviſo, that they could not be diſſolved but with their own conſent.

The council then applied to Lenthall, late ſpeaker ſpeaker in the long parliament, and preſented him with a declaration, by which he and the other members were invited to re-aſſemble. Accordingly, on the eighth day of May, two and forty met in the houſe, and the preſbyterian members, who had formerly been excluded, attempted to reſume their ſeats, but the houſe refuſed them admiſſion, and was ſupported in their rejection by the military council, in conſequence of which, and ſeveral acts obnoxious to that party, they reſolved to exert their utmoſt efforts to bring about the reſtoration of the royal family to the crown of England. Mordaunt, who had been concerned in the late conſpiracy, rather encouraged than intimidated by his paſt danger, was become the chief director of all their councils.

To effect this deſireable purpoſe they concerted a plan for riſing in ſeveral counties at once, and ſurprizing at the ſame time, Glouceſter, Lyme, Plymouth, Exeter, and Cheſter. This ſcheme being approved by Charles, he repaired privately to St. Malo, that he might be near at hand, in caſe the enterprize ſhould ſucceed; but the conſpiracy was defeated by the intelligence of Sir Richard Wallis, who now maintained with the parliament the ſame correſpondence which he had formerly carried on with Cromwell. Many of the conſpirators were ſeized and impriſoned, others abanded their houſes; a violent tempeſt raged during the whole time appointed for the inſurrection; inſomuch, that from the utter inability of ſome, and apprehenſive fears of others, the junction of the parties was wholly fruſtrated.

The city of Cheſter, however, was ſurprized through the vigilance and activity of Sir George Booth and Sir Thomas Middleton; but Lambert marching againſt them with a ſuperior force, after an obſtinate engagement, they were totally routed. Sir George Booth eſcaped from the field of battle, but was afterwards diſcovered in a diſguiſed habit, and impriſoned in the Tower of London.

The military council, apprehenſive of the deſign of parliament gradually to abridge and finally annul their authority, held frequent conferences in and about London, and at length came to an unanimous reſolution of preſenting a petition to the following effect: that the parliament would immediately comply with the contents of a former addreſs preſented by the council of Wallingford-houſe; that they would eſtabliſh general Fleetwood in his command, which, according to the preſent commiſſion, would in a few months expire; that Lambert ſhould be appointed lieutenant general; Deſborough general of the cavalry; and Monk general of the infantry; that they would proſecute with the utmoſt ſeverity thoſe communities, who had aſſiſted the enemy in the late inſurrections; and that no perſon might be elected chief magiſtrate of any corporation, who had ſhewn by his conduct, that the government of the commonwealth had not met with his approbation.

But while this petition, which was dated at Derby, was left with Fleetwood for his reviſal and amendment, Sir Arthur Haſlerig defeated their whole deſign, by ſending intelligence to the ſpeaker; in conſequence of which, it was reſolved in the houſe, after ſome debate, that a military council was not only uſeleſs, but expenſive as well as dangerous to the ſtate. The officers, incenſed at this peremptory reſolve that ſo particularly militated at their authority, determined on the diſſolution, or at leaſt the ſubjection of parliament, for which purpoſe Lambert approached London with his brigades. Having received aſſurance from Monk, that he would ſupport them, the parliament caſhiered Lambert, Deſborough, and ſome other officers, who had ſigned the petition, revoked Fleetwood's commiſſion, and appointed commiſſioners, for a limited time, to command the army.

For their own ſecurity, two regiments commanded by officers of whoſe fidelity they had no doubt, were ordered to take up their quarters in Weſtminſter, and guard the avenues to the houſe; but Lambert, entering London with four regiments, took poſſeſſion of them all, re-conducted the ſpeaker to his own houſe, and excluded the members.

Having thus paved the way for the accompliſhment of their deſign, the officers nominated a council compoſed of ten members, who ſhould take upon themſelves the regulation of the concerns of the commonwealth. They then appointed a committee of ſafety, in which the power of the adminiſtration was veſted. The chief members were Fleetwood, Deſborough, Lambert, Ludlow, and Sir Henry Vane. The officers, at the ſame time, publiſhed a declaration, annulling the late orders of parliament, declaring they were ſo far from ſetting up a military government, that they had eſtabliſhed a committee of ſafety, which was enjoined to deliberate and propoſe a form of legiſlature, proper to maintain the ſubjects liberties, and the happineſs of the commonwealth, and that conſequently there was no neceſſity for a houſe of peers, a protector, or a king.

In this critical ſituation of affairs, general Monk declared a firm reſolution to eſpouſe the cauſe of the parliament, and contended for their privileges thus violated by the army; though he was ſuppoſed to be actuated to this reſolve not ſo much by an attachment to the king, as a jealouſy wich had long prevailed between him and Lambert, ſo that the reaſon of his thwarting the projects of that ambitious general, whoſe ſucceſs he knew would deſtroy his own authority, was plain and evident.

But as the completion of his deſign required the utmoſt caution and deliberation, Monk, previouſly to his acting in open defiance, aſſembled his troops, diſmiſſed ſome officers whom he knew diſaffected to his purpoſes, impriſoned Cobbet, ſecured the town of Berwick, demanded an extraordinary ſupply from the Scots for this expedition, and having received intelligence that Lambert with his army was marching towards the north, ſent Clobbery and two other commiſſioners to London, to aſſure the committee of his peaceable diſpoſition, and to propoſe terms of accommodation. His chief view was to procure delay, and retard the preparations of his enemies. The committee of ſafety agreed to a treaty, which was at laſt ſigned by the commiſſioners, but Monk refuſed to confirm it, on pretence that his commiſſioners had exceeded their inſtructions. He deſired, however, to renew the negotiation at Newcaſtle.

A. D. 1660. Having adjuſted the neceſſary meaſures for the execution of his deſign, and recruited his forces by a ſupply to a very conſiderable amount from the Scots, general Monk entered England on the ſecond day of January, and was congratulated on his arrival by two deputies commiſſioned by parliament for that purpoſe. The city of London ſaluted him on the ſame occaſion by four of its principal merchants, and aſſured him alſo of the expediency of calling a free parliament, agreeable to the general voice of the people.

Thus encouraged and ſupported, Monk without delay ſent a meſſenger to the parliament, deſiring them them to remove from London thoſe regiments, who, though they now pretended to return to their allegiance, had ſo lately dared to expel that aſſembly. Though this demand increaſed their ſuſpicions, yet they complied with his directions. He was introduced to the houſe with great ſolemnity, and received, from the mouth of the ſpeaker, the public thanks for the great ſervices which he had done his country. He then made a ſhort ſpeech, in which he obſerved, that the peaceable reſtoration of the parliament was not one of the ſmalleſt bleſſings which God had beſtowed on the nation; he told them, that he had received a great number of addreſſes, expreſſing their deſire of a free parliament, propoſed to reſtore the excluded members without exacting the oaths, and recommended Scotland and Ireland to their particular care and attention.

As an evident token of their diſapprobation of the then mode of adminiſtration, the common council of London refuſed to pay an aſſeſſment till a free and legal parliament was eſtabliſhed. As this refuſal tended to annul their authority, they were reſolved to make at once a full trial of their own ſtrength and the general's fidelity; and therefore ordered Monk to march into the city, to carry off their chains and demoliſh their gates, and commanded him to ſee theſe violent orders carried into immediate execution. Monk obeyed the injunction, entered the city in an hoſtile manner, levelled ſome of the gates and portcullices, and returned in triumph to his quarters in Weſtminſter, leaving the citizens equally aſtoniſhed and incenſed at his proceedings.

Monk had obeyed theſe orders in direct repugnance to his own will, but finding the neceſſity of throwing off the maſk he had aſſumed, and openly avowing the cauſe he determined to maintain in oppoſition to an arbitrary and tyrannical clan, he ſent a a letter to the parliament, in which, after complaining of the odious taſk they had impoſed on him, he upbraided them with the new cabals they were carrying on with Vane and Lambert, and demanded in the name of the citizens, ſoldiers, and whole community, that they ſhould iſſue writs within a week for ſupplying the then vacancies in the houſe, and appoint the time for their own diſſolution, and the ſummoning of a new parliament.

In order to conciliate the affections of the citizens, juſtly incenſed by his late proceedings, he repaired to Sir Thomas Allen, the lord mayor, and deſired him to ſummon a court of common council at Guildhall. He there endeavoured to apologize for the inſults which he had been obliged to offer them, proteſted his firm adherence to the meaſures which he had embraced, begged that a ſtrict union might be effected between the city and army, and repreſented that the national affairs could be no way ſo well ſettled as by their union.

This coalition between the city and army was matter of univerſal joy, and celebrated by all who wiſhed well to their country. Former animoſities between the royaliſts and preſbyterians totally ſubſided, and they unanimouſly concurred in the proſecution of ſuch meaſures as might tend to retrieve a conſtitutional form of government, and prevent the further effuſion of the blood of their countrymen and fellow ſubjects.

To complete his deſign by one bold ſtroke, Monk returned with his army to Weſtminſter, and requeſted the excluded members to repair to the houſe. They went accordingly, and forming a majority, their firſt buſineſs was to annul all the orders by which they had been deprived of their ſeats; they reſtored Sir George Booth and all his party to their liberty and eſtates; renewed and enlarged the general's commiſſion; voted an aſſeſſment for the maintainance of the fleet and army; and having taken theſe ſteps for promoting the peace of the nation, they diſſolved themſelves, and iſſued orders for convoking a new parliament. But while Monk was purſuing theſe ſpecious meaſures for effecting a reformation in government, he awarded, for private reaſons, all intercourſe with the king; profeſſed himſelf a republican in principle, and communicated his intentions but to one confidential friend, Mr. Maurice, a gentleman of Devonſhire.

To enforce the authority of the parliament he was about to eſtabliſh, the general directed ſome particular officers to preſent him with an addreſs; in which they promiſed to obey implicitly the orders of the enſuing parliament. He approved of this engagement, which he ordered to be ſigned by all the different regiments; and this furniſhed him with a pretence for diſmiſſing all the officers, by whom it was rejected. In the midſt of theſe tranſactions, his deſign was near being defeated by Lambert's eſcaping from the Tower; and beginning to aſſemble forces. As it was neceſſary to exert the greateſt activity in ſuppreſſing ſo dangerous an enemy, the general detached colonel Ingoldſby with his own regiment againſt Lambert, who had taken poſſeſſion of Daventry with four troops of horſe; but Lambert himſelf was obliged to ſubmit, as the greateſt part of his troops deſerted to Ingoldſby.

The day following the firſt meeting, (being the twenty-ſixth of April) of the new parliament, the king preſented by Sir John Granville a letter to the houſe, which being immediately read, a committee was nominated to draw up an anſwer; and, in order to propagate the joyful news throughout the kingdom, it was reſolved, that the letter ſhould be publiſhed. The king's declaration contained in it was happily adapted to flatter the people with hopes of public tranquillity. It promiſed a general indemnity to all perſons whatſoever; and, in ſhort, contained every conceſſion that could tend to the happineſs of the king and his ſubjects.

From the reception with which the meaſures of general Monk, and the declaration of his majeſty, met from the public in general, who now became unanimous in the common cauſe, the peers of the realm determined to repoſſeſs themſelves of their ancient authority, and to take their ſhare in the ſettlement of the nation. The doors of their houſe they found open, and all were allowed to enter; even ſuch as had formerly been excluded on account of their pretended delinquency. The lords voted, that the government ought to be jointly in the king, lords, and commons, according to the ancient conſtitution of the kingdom.

The ſpirit of unanimity, and indeed of true patroiſm, univerſally prevailing, the commons concurred in the votes of the upper houſe without a diſſentient voice, and to teſtify their approbation of the king's letter, allotted five hundred pounds to purchaſe a jewel for Sir John Granville the bearer; they preſented fifty thouſand pounds to his majeſty, ten thouſand to the duke of York, and five thouſand to the duke of Glouceſter. Both houſes then cauſed to be erazed from their journals all ſtatutes and edicts, which had paſſed to the annulling of the royal prerogative.

A lawleſs junto being thus expelled the ſeat of government, Charles II. was proclaimed king of England on the eighth day of May, in Palace-yard, Whitehall, and at Temple-bar, the two houſes attending at the ceremony.

Theſe tokens of duty and loyalty from his ſubjects, naturally procured the king the homage of foreign powers. Spain, France, and the United States, ſent their reſpective deputies with complimentary invitations to him to take ſhipping at any of their ſea-ports; but he gave the preference to the latter.

He was attended by a multitudinous concourſe amidſt general acclamations, in his route from Breda to the Hague, whither on his arrival having received the congratulatory compliments of the States General, he embarked on the twenty-third, and on the twenty-ſixth arrived at Dover, where he was received by general Monk, whom he embraced with the warmeſt affection, calling him father, guardian, and protector; and proceeding to Canterbury, conferred upon him the order of the garter. He entered London on his birth-day, the twenty ninth of May, the anniverſary of which is obſerved by many at the preſent time.

Remarkable Occurrences between the death of Charles I. and the reſtoration of Charles II.

A. D.

1650 Potatoes firſt cultivated in England.

1651 On the third of September there happened a moſt dreadful hurricane in England, which blew down many houſes, and did other conſiderable damage, in various places, but more particularly in London.

1652 The art of roaſting and making coffee brought into England by a Greek ſervant to Mr. Edwards, a Turkey merchant.

Many learned men flouriſhed in England during the reign of Charles I. and the period that took place between his death and the reſtoration of his ſucceſſor Charles II. the moſt remarkable among whom were the following:

Ben Johnſon, poet-laureat to James I. and Charles I. was the greateſt dramatic writer of his age. He was familiarly acquainted with the beſt antient authors, and was the firſt that brought critical learning into repute. Some of his plays are ſtill acted with great applauſe. He died in 1637.

Edmund Waller was particularly diſtinguiſhed for his poetical genius, and poſſeſſed that elegance of expreſſion which will ever make his memory reſpectable. Among others of his compoſitions, he wrote two poems, the one on "divine love," and the other "on the fear of God;" both of which are inimitable. He was greatly reſpected by Oliver Cromwell, whom he celebrated in three excellent poems. When the reſtoration took place he wrote a copy of verſes on the occaſion, which he preſented to Charles II. but the king obſerving that they were not equal in elegance to thoſe written on the uſurper, Mr. Waller anſwered, "We "poets never ſucceed ſo well in truth as in fiction." He retained his mental faculties to the laſt, and died in the year 1687, in the eighty-ſecond year of his age.

The great poet Milton alſo flouriſhed during this period. He is particularly celebrated for his excellent poem, intituled, "Paradiſe Loſt," which exhibits ſuch an amazing force of genius as at once confounds and tranſports the reader; and it is with juſtice conſidered as equal to the firſt epic poem of antiquity. He lived in an eaſy though not affluent manner, till 1674, when he died of a fit of the gout, and was interred in the church of St. Giles, Cripplegate.

Sir Francis Bacon (lord Verulam) was at the head of the geniuſſes who flouriſhed during this period. He diſcovered the emptineſs of the viſionary ſyſtem of philoſophy, which had, for many ages, amuſed mankind, and taught the world that the only method of finding out truth was by experiment. In ſhort, he diſcovered ſuch mines of knowledge as will never be exhauſted.

William Hervey, D. M. acquired immortal honour for his diſcovery of the circulation of the blood. He enjoyed the happineſs, to find the clamours of ignorance, envy, and prejudice againſt his doctrine (which for ſome time prevailed) totally ſilenced, and his diſcovery univerſally eſtabliſhed. He died in 1657.

During the reign of Charles I. the polite arts flouriſhed in England, and more eſpecially painting and ſculpture. Charles was the patron of Rubens, Vandyke, Inigo Jones, and other eminent artiſts, ſo that, had it not been for the civil wars, he would probably have converted his court into a ſecond Athens; and the collections he made of painting and curioſities (conſidering the difficulties under which he laboured) were amazing. His favourite the duke of Buckingham imitated his example, and in the like articles expended the enormous ſum of £400,000.

Death and character of Charles* II.

A. D. 1660. ON the reſtoration of Charles II. to the throne of his anceſtors, the affairs both of church and ſtate aſſumed a very different aſpect from that which preſented itſelf during the interval of the commonwealth. The firſt, and by far the wiſeſt act of his reign, was the promotion of Sir Edward Hyde whom he had created earl of Clarendon, to the dignity of chancellor. Indeed he was looked upon by the whole nation as his majeſty's chief counſellor, and had he been guided by the advice of that great and good man, his conduct would have more redounded to his own honor, and the happineſs and glory of his ſubjects.

A council was prudently formed between the royaliſts and preſbyterian parties. Of the latter the earl of Mancheſter was appointed lord chamberlain, lord Say, privy ſeal, Anneſley was created earl of Angleſey, Aſhley Cowper, and Denzil Holles were advanced to the dignity of barons. Of the former the admiral Montague was created earl of Sandwich, the dukedom of Albemarle was conferred upon general Monk, and Sir Edward Nicholas, and Sir William Maurice, were appointed to be ſecretaries of ſtate.

Charles during his exile had made a conſiderable progreſs in the ſtudy of hiſtory, and rendered himſelf acquainted with the politics and faſhions of the principal courts of Europe; but mechanics had chiefly engroſſed his attention, inſomuch that he had great knowledge in the art of ſhip-building. But his other qualities were by no means correſpondent. He was a latitudinarian in religion, careleſs, indolent, and immoderately addicted to pleaſure. To the pernicious influence of his example muſt be aſcribed that deluge of luxury and debauchery, which ſoon after over-ran the nation.

To add a due ſanction to the parliament now convened, all judicial proceedings tranſacted in the name of the commonwealth or protector, were confirmed by a ſpecial ſtatute; and both houſes confeſſing the guilt of the former rebellion, embraced his majeſty's pardon and indemnity.

Many of the peers who were particularly attached to the intereſt of the late king, voted that this pardon ſhould not extend to thoſe who had adjudged perſons executed by virtue of ſentences paſſed in high commiſſion courts, and this circumſtance cauſed a general alarm; but his majeſty coming to the houſe of peers, and moſt earneſtly intreating them to make the indemnity general, they promiſed to comply with his requeſt.

Though both houſes at firſt ſeemed to concur with the king, reſpecting the general indemnity, they would not conſent to a clauſe relating to nineteen of thoſe, who had ſat as judges on his father. The eſtates of Oliver Cromwell, Bradſhaw, Pride, Phillips, and Haſlerig, and one and twenty members, deceaſed, were confiſcated, and their families ſubjected to ſuch other penalties, as the king and parliament ſhould think proper to inflict.

Vane and Lambert were exempted from the benefit of the bill of indemnity, though they did not come under cenſure as ſitting in judgment on their late ſovereign. Oliver St. John, and ſeventeen other perſons were deprived of all benefit from this act, if they accepted or executed any office, whether eccleſiaſtical, civil, or military. Commiſſioners were now appointed to proceed upon the trials of the ninety that had been immediately concerned in the murder of the late king. Of theſe, twenty-five were dead, twenty-nine had eſcaped out of the nation, ſeven were deemed proper objects of mercy, twenty-nine received ſentence of death, but nineteen were reprieved during the king's pleaſure, on account of their having ſurrendered themſelves according to the proclamation. The ten who were to be executed were Harriſon, Carew, Coke, Peters, Scot, Clement, Scrope, Jones, Hacket, and Axtel; who ſubmitted to their fate with ſuch fortitude and reſolution, as evinced thoſe principles for which they ſuffered.

The parliament, in adjuſting the king's revenues, were equally attentive to the liberties and privileges of the ſubject, and the honour and dignity of the crown. In the time of the commonwealth, wardſhips and liveries had been utterly aboliſhed, and even in the then parliament, before the king's reſtoration, a bill had been introduced, offering him an equivalent for theſe revenues. An hundred thouſand pounds a year was the ſum, which the parliament propoſed, and the king, ſenſible ſenſible that theſe imports did not yield ſo much profit, readily accepted the offer. Half of the exciſe was granted in perpetuity to the crown, as the fund for producing that revenue; but the making good theſe engagements was left to the parliament's future deliberation, as the produce ariſing from half the exciſe would not amount to more than two thirds of that ſum.

Charles, whoſe volatile mind was not the moſt ſuſceptible of the tender impreſſions of conſanguinity, appeared, however, greatly affected at this time by the loſs of the duke of Glouceſter, who died of the ſmall pox, in the twentieth year of his age.

To pave the way for the introduction of the hierarchy, the king, as ſoon as the parliament was adjourned, publiſhed a proclamation, ordering that a certain number of able divines ſhould be choſen to review and alter the liturgy; at the ſame time directing the biſhops to exerciſe their ſpiritual juriſdiction in the ſame form, as had been formerly uſed in the church of England. Nine of the old biſhops ſtill living were reſtored to their dioceſes, and biſhoprics offered to the moſt eminent preſbyterians, but to the honour of their profeſſion, they all (Reynolds who was made biſhop of Norwich excepted) rejected the offer as inconſiſtent with their religious principles.

In the month of October, the princeſs dowager of Orange arrived in London, and in a ſhort time after his majeſty was viſited by her mother the princeſs Henrietta, and Edward, prince palatine, brother to prince Rupert. The queen mother at this juncture propoſed a match between her daughter Henrietta and the duke of Orleans, to which the king conſented.

The ſubject of diſbanding the army being propoſed for debate in both houſes of parliament, the king who had reviewed a detachment of his veteran troops, was ſo charmed with their expert manœuvres and martial appearance, that he expreſſed an ardent deſire of retaining them in his ſervice. But the chancellor repreſenting to him the inexpediency of ſuch a meaſure, from the conſequences that muſt inevitably enſue, all the forces were immediately diſbanded, except one regiment of infantry, and another of cavalry, maintained as guards for the king's perſon. The two houſes then cauſed the bodies of Cromwell, Bradſhaw, Ireton, and Pride, to be taken out of their graves, and carried upon ſledges to Tyburn, and buried under the gallows, after hanging a whole day.

When his majeſty with the advice of his council diſſolved the parliament at the cloſe of the year, he expreſſed a due ſenſe of that loyalty and affection they had ſhewn him upon every occaſion. The chancellor in his ſpeech recommended the ſettlement of the militia, and alſo hinted the formation of a conſpiracy, for ſurprizing Windſor, Whitehall, and the Tower of London, affirming, that many diſbanded officers and republicans were concerned in this deſign, and that their intention was to raiſe an inſurrection in the weſt, under the command of general Ludlow.

A. D. 1661. An alarm of the moſt ſerious nature marked the commencement of this year, when a number of the fifth monarchy men, under the command of one Venner, a deſperate enthuſiaſt, iſſued forth into the ſtreets of London completely armed. Theſe violent and outrageous fanatics took poſſeſſion of a houſe in the city, which being attacked by the guards, they defended themſelves until the greater part was killed; the few that remained being taken, were tried, condemned, and executed.

Meaſures had been taken in Scotland to ſuppreſs the kirk party, and this year epiſcopacy was reſtored to that kingdom, and the parliament abrogated the ſolemn league and covenant, under pretext of the violence which had been uſed, in extorting the conſent of his late majeſty to theſe ſtatutes.

On the twenty-third of April, being St. George's day, the ceremony of his majeſty's coronation was performed with great pomp in Weſtminſter-abbey, on which occaſion, honours and dignities titular and lucrative, were conferred on his favourites and adherents; and ſoon after the king eſtabliſhed the Royal Society, now ſo well known in moſt parts of the world.

The parliament aſſembled on the 8th of May, and the commons having choſen Sir Edward Turner ſpeaker, immediately proceeded to buſineſs; they paſſed an act for the ſecurity of the king's perſon and government, and it was made high treaſon to intend or deviſe his impriſonment or dethronement. To call him a papiſt or heretic, or to endeavour by ſpeech or writing to deprive him of the affections of his ſubjects, was declared puniſhable with excluſion from all offices, eccleſiaſtical, civil, or military. They annulled the act for excluding biſhops from ſitting in parliament; declared that the power of the militia belonged to the king alone, and empowered him to diſpoſe of all the land forces; after which both houſes were adjourned to the 20th of November.

A party who were diſtinguiſhed by the denomination of cavaliers, murmured greatly againſt the king and council for witholding from them all reparation for the loſſes they had ſuſtained during the civil war, while thoſe who had proſecuted them with the utmoſt ſeverity, enjoyed, by the act of indemnity, all the wealth they had unlawfully extorted from the royaliſts, before the reſtoration. On the other hand, the miniſtry ſpread through the whole city rumours of plots and conſpiracies againſt the king and government. This appears to have been a plauſible pretence of the miniſtry, who together with moſt of the members of both houſes, were deſirous of humbling the preſbyterians, under the general term of non-conformiſts; for no ſooner did the act of uniformity paſs both houſes, than the rumour of the conſpiracy immediately ſubſided.

Theſe pretended plots were the foundation of the corporation act, ordaining all officers of all corporations to take the oaths as preſcribed in form according to the ſtatutes in ſuch caſes made and provided.

A. D. 1662. On the ſeventeenth of May his majeſty gave the royal aſſent to an act for eſtabliſhing uniformity in public worſhip, and in the adminiſtration of the ſacrament, and on the twenty-firſt of May, his marriage with Catharine, infanta of Portugal, was celebrated with great magnificence. This princeſs, though virtuous, poſſeſſed no perſonal charms; her chief attraction was a portion amounting to three hundred thouſand pounds, beſides the fortreſs of Tangier in Africa and Bombay in the Eaſt-Indies.

At this time ſeveral criminals were tried and executed, amongſt whom were three regicides who had eſcaped to Holland, where they were ſeized and brought back in chains to England. But the attention of the public was principally engroſſed by the trials of Vane and Lambert; the former of whom was executed, being the laſt who ſuffered on account of the civil wars. Lambert, from his dutiful and ſubmiſſive behaviour on his trial, was reprieved at the bar. His ſentence was afterwards mitigated to perpetual confinement in the iſle of Guernſey, where he ſurvived his condemnation thirty-ſix years, living in calm repoſe, wholly undiſturbed by the noiſe and tumult of party or faction.

In conſequence of the act of uniformity, about two thouſand miniſters, ſuppoſed to have been chiefly preſbyterians, abandoned their livings in the church for refuſing to conform to the rites and ceremonies as eſtabliſhed by law. During theſe proceedings, admiral Lawſon, who in the beginning of the year ſailed with a ſquadron to the coaſt of Barbary, concluded a peace on the part of England with the Dey of Algiers.

A. D. 1663. The prodigality of this luxurious and diſſipated monarch compelled him to a meaſure which contributes amongſt others not a little to ſully his reign. This was the ſale of Dunkirk with all the ammunition and artillery in the garriſon to the French, for the ſum of four hundred thouſand pounds, and he is ſaid to have done this with the advice of the lord chancellor Clarendon.

On pretence of eaſing the proteſtant diſſenters who complained of being much aggrieved, a plan was formed by the council for a toleration act; and the indulgence granted by it was extended to the Catholics, to whom the king, and particularly the duke of York, was ſuppoſed to be attached.

As the chancellor had oppoſed the plan of toleration, the earl of Briſtol, who in his exile had embraced the Romiſh religion, now employed all his raillery in ridiculing and rendering him obnoxious to his ſovereign. Nor was the earl the only perſon that endeavoured to traduce that faithful miniſter. The ducheſs of Cleveland, the favourite concubine of Charles, becauſe Clarendon diſdained to flatter her vanity, or gratify her ambition, uſed all her influence with the king to effect his ruin. Secretary Nicholas, who was Clarendon's intimate friend, was depoſed, and ſucceeded by Sir Henry Bennet, a reputed papiſt.

Notwithſtanding the loſſes ſuſtained by the royaliſts from their adherence to the cauſe of his father, Charles was in general inattentive to their petitions. He granted indeed a few penſions, to the Penderells, Mrs. Land, and ſome others, who had contributed to his preſervation after the battle of Worceſter. But the greateſt part of the royaliſts were ſtill involved in poverty and diſtreſs, aggravated by the diſappointment of their moſt ſanguine hopes, and the additional mortification of ſeeing all places of power and profit poſſeſſed by their inveterate foes. With regard to the act of indemnity and oblivion, they alledged, that it was an act of indemnity to the king's enemies, and of oblivion to his friends.

Notwithſtanding the chancellor by his oppoſition to the plan of toleration had incurred his majeſty's diſpleaſure, from motives of policy, he continued him in his high and important office, which inflaming the malice and reſentment of the earl of Briſtol, he impeached Clarendon of high treaſon before the houſe of peers. In this inconſiſtent charge, he was accuſed of having endeavoured to fix the imputation of popery upon the king; of promiſing to uſe his influence in aboliſhing the penal laws againſt the papiſts; of having ſcandalized his majeſty; adviſed the ſale of Dunkirk; reviled the parliament; embezzled the public money, and enriched himſelf by ſelling employments. The peers treated this ill-founded impeachment with contempt, and lord Briſtol, aſhamed of his conduct, retired to the continent, and there continued ſome years.

A. D. 1664. The miniſtry from their firſt appointment had been continually alarmed with plots and conſpiracies ſaid to be formed by the republican party, and one was now diſcovered to ſurprize ſeveral towns in the north, and excite a general inſurrection. This was nothing more than an idle ſcheme of ſome inconſiderable fanatics, and diſbanded ſoldiers, thirty of whom were taken and executed; however, it furniſhed the king with a plea, to demand, in his next ſpeech to the two houſes, the repeal of the act for triennial parliaments. With this demand they alſo complied, in conſequence of his affirming, that the kingdom was expoſed to continual troubles from the ſuggeſtions of a ſet of wretches, who arrogated to themſelves a right of meeting for a new election, under pretence that the preſent parliament was already diſſolved by virtue of that act.

About this time a diſpute aroſe between the Engliſh and the Dutch, in relation to commerce, the latter having oppoſed the African company in eſtabliſhing their ſettlements on the coaſt of Guinea. This tranſaction, which could only be conſidered as a prelude to a Dutch war, was by no means diſpleaſing to Charles, whoſe increaſing wants, the natural conſequence of exceſſive prodigality, prompted him to hope that he might convert to his private uſe ſome of the ſupplies granted for the maintenance of the war. He delighted in ſhipbuilding, and was ambitious of equipping a navy, that ſhould maintain the ſuperiority of the ocean; and the duke of York longed for an opportunity of ſignalizing his courage and power, as high admiral, againſt a people whom he deteſted, not only for their republican principles, but as one of the chief bulwarks of the proteſtant cauſe.

A rupture between England and the United States now ſeemed inevitable, and the deſign of proſecuting a war had the hearty concurrence both of the council and the parliament. Downing, the Engliſh reſident in Holland, delivered a memorial to the ſtates, containing a liſt of thoſe depredations of which the Engliſh complained. Mean while, as Charles was fully determined on the war, he had ſecretly diſpatched Sir Robert Holmes, with a fleet of two and twenty ſail to the coaſt of Africa. Holmes not only expelled the Dutch from Cape Corſe, to which the Engliſh had ſome plauſible claim, but likewiſe made himſelf maſter of Cape Verde, and the iſle of Goree, together with ſeveral veſſels trading on that coaſt. When the ſtates remonſtrated againſt theſe hoſtilities, the king affected a total ignorance of Holmes's enterprize, and the better to carry on the deception, committed Holmes to the Tower, but reſtored him to liberty in a ſhort time.

Fired with reſentment at the neglect and inattention with which the Engliſh court treated their remonſtrances, the States ſent private orders to De Ruyter, to ſail for the coaſt of Guinea, and make repriſals on the Engliſh. De Ruyter executed his commiſſion with his uſual vigour and ſucceſs. He retook all the conqueſts which the Engliſh had made, made, except Cape Corſe; expelled them from ſome of their old ſettlements, and ſeized all the Engliſh ſhips that fell into his hands. He then ſteered to the Weſt-Indies, in hopes of making himſelf maſter of Barbadoes, but failed in the attempt.

The naval preparations had for ſome time been carried on with uncommon diligence, and as the parliament had not yet granted the king any ſupplies, the city of London gratified him with a loan of an hundred thouſand pounds; he himſelf viſited the docks, encouraged and rewarded the workmen, and in a ſhort time the Engliſh navy was put in a very formidable condition.

In the month of November the parliament met, and voted his majeſty two million and a half for carrying on the intended war againſt the Dutch, the largeſt ſupply ever before granted to any monarch of England; encouraged by which, he declared war againſt the United States about the middle of March, having prorogued the parliament to the following October.

A. D. 1665. The duke of York, who was appointed admiral of the Engliſh fleet, ſailed on the 18th of May, with one hundred and fourteen ſhips of the line beſides frigates and ketches; having under him prince Rupert, and the gallant earl of Sandwich. Opdam, who was admiral of the Dutch navy, of near equal force, received poſitive orders to give battle to the enemy. In the heat of the action, when engaged in furious combat with the duke of York, Opdam's ſhip blew up, and himſelf periſhed with all his crew. This incident decided the fortune of the day, for the Dutch, diſpirited by the loſs of their admiral, immediately broke the line, and made toward their own coaſt; and Tromp, ſon of the admiral of that name, favoured the retreat of the Dutch by ſuſtaining the fight alone for ſome time.

The Engliſh loſt only four ſhips, but ſeveral perſons of diſtinction were killed, whereas the Dutch had nineteen ſunk or taken. It is confeſſed, that during the whole action, the duke diſcovered equal courage and conduct; he was long engaged in the heat of the battle, and kept his ſtation, when the earl of Falmouth, lord Muſkerry, and Mr. Boyle, were killed by one ball at his ſide, and he was beſmeared with the blood and brains of thoſe three gallant officers. A day of thankſgiving was appointed in England for this victory, and medals were ſtruck on the occaſion in honour of the duke of York.

As the queen was ſuppoſed to be barren, and the duke, therefore, conſidered as preſumptive heir to the crown, it was reſolved in council that he ſhould not be permitted to hazard another engagement; whereupon the command of the navy was given to the earl of Sandwich, of which, however, he was ſoon deprived, for the king having ordered him to ſet ſail for Berghen, where a fleet of Dutch merchantmen lay at anchor, inſtead of obeying the command in perſon, he diſpatched Sir Thomas Tiddeman, with part of the fleet for that ſervice, who attacked them with great impetuoſity, but met with ſo warm a reception that he was obliged to deſiſt from the enterprize with great loſs. Charles, incenſed at the earl for omitting to go thither in perſon, deprived him of the command, and ſent him on an embaſſy to Madrid.

During theſe tranſactions abroad, the city of London was groaning under a moſt dreadful plague, which raged with ſuch violence, that in the ſpace of eleven months it ſwept away above 100,000 perſons in the city and its environs. The king retired to Hampton Court, in order to avoid the contagion, but that being thought too near the capital, he afterwards removed to Saliſbury. Barnard Van Galen, biſhop of Munſter, at the inſtigation of the king of England, took up arms againſt the ſtates general, in conſideration of receiving a large ſubſidy from the Britiſh court. This turbulent prelate aſſembled a body of twenty thouſand men, with whom he invaded the province of Overyſſel, and reduced ſeveral places, but was glad to compromiſe matters, on finding the ſubſidy from England ill paid, and a large reinforcement to the Dutch being ſent by the duke of Lunenburgh and the king of France.

In the month of October the parliament, purſuant to prorogation, aſſembled at Oxford, and voted a ſupply of one million two hundred thouſand pounds for the ſupport of the war, and one hundred and twenty thouſand to the duke of York for the ſignal ſervices he had rendered his country by his late naval victory over the Dutch. The king now iſſued a proclamation, commanding all non-juring miniſters to remove with their families to the diſtance of twenty miles from the places of their uſual reſidence. Theſe perſons would have been much aggrieved by this command, had not the munificence of their friends increaſed in proportion to the ſeverity of the government.

A. D. 1666. By this time Lewis the 14th of France had openly eſpouſed the cauſe of the Dutch, ſo that war was declared againſt that kingdom, on the king's return to London, in February. The Dutch fleet, conſiſting of ſeventy ſail, was now at ſea, under the command of de Ruyter and Tromp. Prince Rupert and the duke of Albemarle commanded the Engliſh fleet, which amounted only to forty, notwithſtanding which diſparity, they bore down on the enemy in the morning of the firſt of June. The Dutch prepared for battle by cutting their cables on the approach of the Engliſh veſſels.

This combat, which is one of the moſt famous recorded in hiſtory, began with prodigious fury on both ſides. De Ruyter and Tromp were obliged to ſhift their flags to other ſhips, their own being ſo greatly damaged, that they were momentarily expected to ſink. One of their fleet was blown up by the Engliſh, and admiral Evertzen killed by a cannon ball. Sir William Berkely, who commanded the van of the Engliſh, fell into the thickeſt of the enemy, and after an obſtinate reſiſtance, being over-powered by numbers, his ſhip was taken, and himſelf ſlain. Two Engliſh ſhips were alſo loſt, notwithſtanding the courage and activity of Albemarle, who, though in the decline of life, diſplayed amazing ſpirit and intrepidity till the approach of night obliged them to deſiſt.

At day break the fight was renewed with greater fury than it had been maintained before. Van Tromp, in the utmoſt danger of being taken by the Engliſh, was ſaved by de Ruyter, who came to his aſſiſtance and brought him off. In the courſe of the action the Dutch were reinforced by ſixteen freſh ſhips, ſo that Albemarle found himſelf under a neceſſity of retreating towards the coaſt of England, where he was followed by the victorious enemy. Albemarle, on the third day, having made a previous diſpoſition, ſent the diſabled ſhips a-head, while he remained in the rear with eight and twenty ſail, ſo as to form a line a-ſtern occaſionally, for the reception of the purſuers.

The ſquadrons of Albemarle and prince Rupert having at length effected a junction, it was determined to face the enemy, and accordingly after ſome cannonading the ſhips came along ſide of each other, and the men fought, at cloſe quarters, till a fog put an end to the conteſt, and the Engliſh fleet retired to their own harbours. The Engliſh, by their diſtinguiſhed courage received the chief honour of this engagement, but the Dutch had a manifeſt advantage in point of the capture of ſhips.

Advice being now received in Holland, that the French admiral was ready to enter the channel, De Ruyter took his ſtation at the mouth of the Thames, in order to block up the Engliſh fleet in their own harbour. Albemarle and Rupert obſerving de Ruyter's ſituation, haſtened to the attack, and the fight began with great obſtinacy. Sir Thomas Allen, who commanded the white ſquadron of the Engliſh, fell upon the Dutch van, which he entirely defeated, having killed the three admirals, who conducted it.

Van Tromp engaged Sir Jeremy Smith, and during the heat of the action, was parted from de Ruyter and the main body, but by what means is uncertain. De Ruyter, with great courage and conduct, continued to ſuſtain the fight againſt the main body of the Engliſh, till night put an end to the combat. Next day, ſeeing the Dutch fleet ſcattered and diſperſed, he was obliged to retreat. For many hours the Engliſh hung upon the rear of the Dutch, who owed their ſafe arrival in their ports, chiefly to the courage and conduct of de Ruyter.

Albemarle, finding himſelf maſter of the ſea by the retreat of the Dutch fleet, detached admiral Holmes with a ſquadron to take and deſtroy all that fell in his way belonging to the enemy. He accordingly burned in the road of Vlye, a great number of merchant ſhips, and two large men of war appointed for their convoy; he then made a deſcent upon the iſland of Schelling, and reduced the town of Brandaris to aſhes. To prevent a junction between the French and Dutch ſquadrons, Holmes, on his return to England, was ſtationed near the Iſle of Wight.

While the Britiſh navy thus rode triumphant on the ocean, a dreadful calamity happened in London, which threw the people into great conſternation. On the ſecond of September, a fire breaking out in a baker's houſe near the bridge, diffuſed itſelf with ſuch rapidity, that no efforts could extinguiſh it, till it reduced a conſiderable part of the city to aſhes. Three days and nights did the fire continue to rage, and it was only by the blowing up of houſes, that it was at laſt extinguiſhed. Four hundred ſtreets, including eighty-nine churches, many hoſpitals and public edifices, and thirteen thouſand two hundred private houſes, were entirely deſtroyed.

The extent of this amazing fire, and which covered four hundred and ſix acres of ground, was from the Tower along the river to the Temple church, and from the north-eaſt gate as far as Holborn-bridge. His majeſty and the duke of York perſonally aſſiſted on horſe-back, from its beginning till it was totally extinguiſhed. The ſtreets of London were extremely narrow, the houſes were built entirely of timber, the ſeaſon was remarkably dry, and a violent eaſt wind happening at that time to blow, are ſuppoſed to be the cauſes of the ſurprizing damage that was done. Various however were the conjectures on the cauſe and authors of this dreadful conflagration. Some imputed it to the reſentment of the republicans, others to the malice of the catholics, though it is not probable that either party could derive any advantage from ſuch a cataſtrophe. However, the latter are fixed with the crime by the inſcription on the monument, which was erazed by order of king James II. but after the revolution replaced. The fire of London, though at that time a great calamity, has eventually proved advantageous both to the city and kingdom. The city was rebuilt in a very ſhort time. The king regulated the plans of the new ſtreets, ſo as to render them more ſpacious and convenient than thoſe which had been burned; and he prohibited the uſe of lath and timber, as the materials for the conſtruction of houſes.

London became much more healthy in conſequence of theſe regulations, and the plague which uſed to break out once or twice every century has not appeared ſince that misfortune. Amongſt the acts paſſed this ſeſſion, was one for rebuilding that part of the city demoliſhed by fire. The commons alſo voted a ſupply of one million, eight hundred thouſand pounds, to be raiſed partly by a poll-bill, and partly by aſſeſſment.

A. D. 1667. The king upon mature reflection, now became ſenſible that all the ends for which the war had been undertaken were likely to prove abortive. The Dutch, unconnected with any other power, had been able to contend with the whole naval force of England, and were daily improving in courage and conduct. So that Charles neither fond of action, nor animated by ambition, gladly ſought for means of reſtoring tranquillity to his ſubjects, already harraſſed with the complicated evils of the peſtilence and the fire.

Conferences were accordingly opened at Breda the enſuing May; when Charles, by his plenipotentiaries, inſiſted on the reſtoration of the two ſhips taken by the Dutch from the Engliſh before the commencement of hoſtilities between the two nations; and they demanded the iſland of Polerone in the Eaſt Indies, retaken from the Hollanders ſince the beginning of the war. The king, perſuaded that a peace would be the certain reſult of the negotiation, had cauſed the greater part of his ſhips to be laid up, of which the Hollanders taking the advantage, their admiral De Ruyter ſailed from the Texel with a ſquadron of fifty ſhips, on the tenth of June, entered the mouth of the river Thames, attacked the fort of Sheerneſs, which he took almoſt without oppoſition, and deſtroyed three guard ſhips in the mouth of the Medway, having broke the chain laid acroſs the mouth of that river.

It was now apprehended that the enemy would ſail up the river, and deſtroy all the merchantmen, therefore to prevent ſo injurious an accident, thirteen veſſels were immediately ſunk at Woolwich and four at Blackwall. Platforms of cannon were raiſed on the banks of the river, and every poſſible precaution was taken to prevent an aſſault. But De Ruyter, declining ſo hazardous an enterprize as an attempt to make himſelf maſter of the Thames, ſteered his courſe for Portſmouth, upon which he made an unſucceſsful attempt. He then ſailed to Torbay, whence he carried off ſeveral veſſels; attempted Plymouth, but was repulſed with conſiderable loſs; chaſed a ſquadron commanded by Sir Edward Sprague; once more entered the Thames, and kept all the ſea ports on that ſide the iſland, in fear and conſternation. The people, fired with indignation, loudly exclaimed againſt the king, for leaving the kingdom defenceleſs, and laviſhing the money raiſed for the purpoſes of the war in idle and diſſipated purſuits.

An uninterrupted ſcene of profligacy and obſcenity now prevailed at court, and only one individual was left who had virtue enough to oppoſe the licentiouſneſs of the times. This was the great earl of Clarendon, whom the king and his abandoned courtiers therefore determined to remove. His favourite miſtreſs was continually inveighing againſt this faithful miniſter; and the duke of Buckingham, and other courtiers, ridiculed his perſon and character.

At the ſame time the king was ſtimulated in his reſentment by his paſſion for Mrs. Stuart, a lady of great beauty, whoſe virtue he had hitherto found impregnable; but the chancellor, fearful of the conſequences of a diſputed title, perſuaded the duke of Richmond to marry Mrs. Stuart, and by that means defeated the king's project, whereupon the ſeals were given to Sir Orlando Bridgeman; and, in ſhort, Charles was ſo incenſed at this action, that it is ſaid he could never afterwards be reconciled to the earl.

The court minions had now made every preparation for commencing an attack upon Clarendon, and on the meeting of parliament, the commons ſent up an impeachment againſt him to the upper houſe, of which the principal article that could admit of proof, was that of adviſing, or conniving at the ſale of Dunkirk. But the peers, when the charge was preſented, refuſed to commit him to cuſtody, which occaſioned great animoſity between the two houſes.

Clarendon, finding that the popular torrent, added to the king's inveterate hatred, ran powerfully againſt him, retired into Normandy. He was no ſooner withdrawn, than a bill paſſed both houſes for his baniſhment, which immediately received the royal ſanction. The French, who were more diſcerning, if not more humane than his countrymen, received him with open arms, and treated him with every token of reſpect due to ſo exalted a character.

He ſurvived his exile about ſix years, which he ſpent in reducing into order the materials he had collected for compiling the hiſtory of the civil wars, a performance which has done the greateſt honour to his memory. He died at Rouen, leaving behind him an example worthy the imitation of the moſt dignified of human beings. The foundation of the Royal Exchange was laid at the cloſe of this year, and that noble building was finiſhed in a ſhort ſpace of time.

A. D. 1668. Lewis the XIVth was ſo aſſiduous in purſuing the extenſive deſigns of conqueſt he had formed, that all Europe ſeemed to be alarmed, and as the Dutch, from their ſituation were expoſed to his deſigns, they were deſirous of uniting with the Engliſh, as the beſt expedient for their own defence. To retrieve his reputation with his ſubjects, Charles engaged in the confederacy ſo famous under the name of the triple alliance with the ſtates of Holland and the king of Sweden, to ſtop the progreſs of the French king, who propoſed to himſelf the conqueſt of the Spaniſh Netherlands. This grand point was not only effected, but a peace ſoon happily reſtored between Spain and Portugal, through means of Sir William Temple and De Wit the Engliſh and Dutch miniſters, who were eminent throughout Europe as the moſt conſummate ſtateſmen of the age.

The king by entering into this union performed a very meritorious action, and baniſhed for a time that ſpirit of jealouſy and diſcontent which had too long reigned. But the affairs of Scotland were in much confuſion, great incroachments on the liberties of the people having been made by the miniſters to whom the king had committed the care of the government of that kingdom.

The grand object of complaint amongſt the Scots was the rigorous execution of the laws for the introduction of the epiſcopacy. When the ſevere law was made in England againſt conventicles, the Scottiſh parliament followed this violent example, by enacting a law to the ſame purport. Whoever refuſed to comply with the new model of the church government, was ſubjected to military force, and the ſoldiers were allowed to quarter themſelves on thoſe who forſook their churches.

As the ſons of rapine and plunder ever avail themſelves of ſuch opportunities as now preſented, a lawleſs banditti, under the command of Sir James Turner, were conſtantly quartered on thoſe who refuſed to pay a ſevere fine which they demanded of the ſuppoſed delinquents. The inhabitants of the weſtern counties took up arms, and ſurpriſed Dumfries, where Turner was quartered with his freebooters. At Laneric they renewed the covenant, and publiſhed a manifeſto, in which they profeſſed their attachment to his majeſty's perſon and government, requiring only the reſtoration of preſbytery and their former miniſters.

However, ſuch was the ſeverity of thoſe who were entruſted with the execution of this oppreſſive and unpopular meaſure, that, contrary to the expreſs mandate of the king, which enjoined this diſmiſſion of the delinquents in promiſe of future obedience to the laws, forty of the unhappy people ſuffered death.

The conduct of the Engliſh parliament on its reaſſembling after a long adjournment, afforded his majeſty equal ſurprize and diſguſt. They were ſo piqued at his lenity towards the non-conformiſts, that they not only neglected to thank him for the triple alliance, but appointed commiſſioners to examine certain perſons who were ſuppoſed to have miſbehaved in the late war. The king, to obtain their favour, was obliged to iſſue a proclamation againſt conventicles, in conſideration of which they voted him three hundred and ten thouſand pounds, by an impoſition on wine and other liquors, and were then adjourned.

The famous theatre at Oxford, erected by Sheldon, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and chancellor of the univerſity, was opened with great magnificence in the month of July.

A. D. 1669. The parliament, according to adjournment, met in October, and voted an addreſs of thanks to the king for his proclamation againſt conventicles; in conſequence of which, he requeſted a ſupply for the diſcharge of his debts, and recommended the union of the kingdom of England and Scotland to their mature deliberations. But the commons waving theſe articles, determined to examine into the manner in which former ſubſidies had been expended; and finding by enquiry, the books, kept by Sir George Carteret, in great confuſion, they expelled him the houſe.

A violent diſpute happened this ſeſſion between the two houſes. Skinner, an opulent merchant of London, having ſuſtained ſome injury from the East India company, laid his grievance before the upper houſe, which decreed that the company ſhould pay five thouſand pounds to the complainant. The commons, in conſequence of a petition from the company, committed Skinner to priſon for having applied to the upper houſe, in an affair that related to the common law of the kingdom, and the peers inſiſted on the company's petition being a ſcandalous libel. The king, hereupon, to prevent thoſe feuds and animoſities which might reſult from the maintenance of this controverſy, prorogued the parliament to the fourteenth of February.

A. D. 1670. His majeſty having in his ſpeech to both houſes on their opening, demanded a ſupply in the moſt preſſing terms, the commons granted him an additional duty, during eight years, of twelve pounds on each ton of Spaniſh wine, and eight on each ton of French. They alſo paſſed an act, authorizing his majeſty to diſpoſe of his quit-rents and fee-farms, by which expedient his neceſſities were ſupplied; though his exceſſive prodigality ſoon involved him in the greateſt difficulties.

Charles, in the choice of his counſellors, had ſelected ſuch perſons as, either from private intereſt or ſimilarity of principle, were wholly ſubſervient to his will and pleaſure. This infamous council was compoſed of five members, Clifford, Arlington, Buckingham, Aſhley Cowper, afterwards earl of Shaftſbury, and Lauderdale, who from the initial letters of their reſpective names were termed the CABAL.

To gratify their licentious ſovereign, as well as his arbitrary brother, this cabal aſſerted, that even this parliament, ſo remarkably attached to the crown, had already diſcovered ſymptoms of diſcontent; that they had been penurious in their temporal ſupplies, and kept the king's revenue in a very precarious ſituation; that his kinſman, the king of France, if properly applied to, would enter into ſuch engagements with him, as would raiſe him above all fear of a revolt; that a war with Holland, in conjunction with Lewis, would procure him every advantage that he could wiſh to enjoy, and furniſh him with a pretence for equipping a navy, and raiſing forces, with which he might retrieve the loſt power of the crown, and even extend his prerogative to abſolute monarchy. The dutcheſs of Orleans, a lady whoſe influence over the mind of the king her brother was well known, arrived in England about this time, and was ſumptuouſly entertained by him at Dover, for the ſpace of a fortnight.

The intimations of the cabal, which coincided with the diſpoſition of the king, produced the deſired effect, and Charles now ſought an opportunity to break off his treaty with the ſtates, and enter into one of an oppoſite tendency with the French monarch. Lewis, well knowing the prevailing foible of his volatile and diſſipated neighbour, reſolved to ſecure an alliance by adminiſtering to the novelty and variety of his ſenſual enjoyments. For this purpoſe, he ſent over with the dutcheſs of Orleans, Mademoiſelle de Querouailles, whom the king had no ſooner ſeen, than he was captivated with her charms. She accompanied him to London, where ſhe was created dutcheſs of Portſmouth, and maintained her influence over him during the whole courſe of his life.

But the pleaſure which Charles received from this new alliance, was greatly abated by the death of his ſiſter, and more ſo by the circumſtances which attended it. The death of this lady was occaſioned by a malady conſequent on drinking a glaſs of ſuccory water. Her huſband, from the jealouſy of his diſpoſition, was ſuſpected of having cauſed a poiſonous draught to be adminiſtered to her; and her brother for ſome time entertained the ſame opinion, but on the atteſtation of the faculty that the ſuſpicion was groundleſs, he was, or at leaſt pretended to be, ſatisfied. The king took occaſion from this incident, to ſend the duke of Buckingham to Paris to finiſh the ſecret alliance, under pretence of condoling with the duke of Orleans.

During theſe tranſactions, the parliament met at Weſtminſter, where his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a very ſhort ſpeech, and left the buſineſs to be explained by the lord keeper. That miniſter repreſented the preſent exigencencies of the ſtate, and the abſolute neceſſity of an immediate ſupply, the augmentation of the naval power of France, the remarkable decay of the Engliſh navy, and the ſeveral enagements into which the king had entered with the different ſtates of Chriſtendom.

This artifice ſucceeded, for apparently ſatisfied with the late meaſures, the commons voted the king two millions and a half ſterling, ſo that having ſucceeded in his main and principal point, he put an end to the ſeſſion. Sir William Temple, who reſided at the Hague as ambaſſador, was recalled to England, the king and cabal knowing he had too much integrity and love for his country to be a tool to the miniſtry. In the winter the prince of Orange arrived in England, and was received by the king his uncle with the greateſt demonſtration of love and affection.

A. D. 1671. The famous ſtatute called the Coventry act paſſed this ſeſſion of parliament, and aroſe from the following circumſtance. A propoſal having been made in the lower aſſembly, of laying a tax upon the play-houſes, it was oppoſed by the courtiers, one of whom obſerved, that the players were the king's ſervants, and contributed to his diverſion. Sir John Coventry then aſked, whether his majeſty's pleaſure lay among the male or female players? As the king kept two players, Mrs. Davis and Nell Gwin, at this time the ſarcaſm was pointedly perſonal, ſo that in reſentment for this inſult, the duke of Monmouth engaged Sands, Obrien, and ſeveral officers of the guards to ſet upon Coventry, as he ſhould return to his lodgings in the evening. He made a brave and obſtinate reſiſtance, and after wounding ſeveral of the aſſailants, was with great difficulty overpowered. They ſlit his noſe with a knife, in order, as they ſaid, to teach him, for the future, to treat his majeſty with greater reſpect. The commons, exaſperated at the aſſault, immediately enacted a law, making the maiming any perſon a capital offence, and added a clauſe, importing, that thoſe who had attacked Sir John Coventry ſhould not be intitled to a pardon from the crown.

This year the dutcheſs of York, daughter to the great earl of Clarendon, paid the debt of nature, and died in the faith of the church of Rome. She was mother to Mary princeſs of Orange, and Anne, afterwards queens of England. This event put an end to the diſguiſe which the duke had hitherto worn, and he now openly declared his attachment to the Catholic religion.

The cabal had ſome time ſince conceived a deſign of coming to an open rupture with the United States, and at length, as a pretence for commencing hoſtilities, they reſolved that the captain of the yacht employed in conveying lady Temple from Holland, ſhould demand an obedience to be paid to the Engliſh flag, from the whole Dutch fleet, and on their refuſal to fire upon them. This officer, after he had received lady temple and her children on board his veſſel, ſailed through a ſquadron commanded by Van Ghent, and as they did not ſtrike their top-ſails, diſcharged a broadſide at them without heſitation.

When the Dutch admiral ſent an officer to remonſtrate with the commander of the yatcht on the impropriety of his conduct, he peremptorily replied, he had acted according to orders; on which Van Ghent very juſtly obſerved, that though the ſtates general had by treaty engaged to pay the compliment to the Britiſh flag, he could not expect that a large fleet commanded by an admiral would ſtrike their topſails to a ſingle ſail, which was not even a ſhip of war, but a private veſſel for pleaſure and diſpatch. The cabal, however, to evince at once their malignity and preſumption, impriſoned the Engliſh commander on his return, for not having attempted an act that muſt have produced the moſt deſtructive conſequences.

About this time a private tranſaction happened, through which the king was much cenſured for a capricious lenity. Blood, one of the protector's diſbanded officers, had been concerned in a plot for exciting a rebellion in Ireland, for which he himſelf was attainted, and ſome of his confederates capitally puniſhed. While the duke of Ormond was viceroy of that kingdom, he had undertaken to ſurprize the caſtle of Dublin, but failing in his attempt, determined to attempt the life of the duke. For this purpoſe, he followed him into England, and one night, accompanied by eight of his confederates, he aſſaulted his coach in St. James's-ſtreet, and made himſelf maſter of his perſon.

To glut his reſentment, he determined to hang his grace at Tyburn, and accordingly bound him, and mounted him on horſeback behind one of his companions. They had advanced a conſiderable diſtance, when the duke endeavouring to diſengage himſelf, fell from the horſe together with the ruffian, to whom he had been faſtened, and while they lay ſtruggling on the ground together, Ormond's ſervants came to his aſſiſtance. Blood finding it impoſſible to accompliſh his deſign, ordered his confederates to fire at the duke, in which the villains obeyed him, and then made their eſcape through favour of the night.

This diſappointment, however, did not intimidate the daring ruffian from a more deſperate attempt, even that of carrying off the crown and regalia from the Tower of London. He had actually bound and wounded Edwards, the keeper of the jewel office, and got out of the Tower with his prey, but was apprehended in the ſtreets, with ſome of his accomplices. One of them was known to have been concerned in the attempt upon the duke of Ormond, and Blood was ſuppoſed to be the ringleader. When queſtioned on the ſubject, he boldly acknowledged the fact, but refuſed to diſcover his confederates, declaring, "That the fear "of death ſhould never induce him either to deny "a crime, or to betray a friend." The king, prompted by curioſity to ſee and converſe with this extraordinary perſon, Blood was introduced to his majeſty, and confeſſed his having once entertained a deſign on his life, on account of his ſeverity towards the godly; but that his reſolution failed, and he altered his intention on ſight of his majeſty. He further aſſured the king, that though life had long been indifferent to him, the conſequences of his execution might prove fatal, as his aſſociates had bound themſelves by the ſtricteſt oaths, to revenge the death of any of the confederacy; ſo that whether through fear, or ſurprize and aſtoniſhment, the king not only granted him a free pardon, but indulged him with an eſtate of five hundred pounds a year in Ireland, and permitted him to attend his perſon at court.

A. D. 1672. The total deſtruction of the Dutch republic was now meditated, and every effort that ambition or policy could ſuggeſt was propoſed by the French monarch. It was concerted, that while the combined fleets of England ſhould attack the ſhipping, and interrupt the commerce of the ſtates general, the French king, the elector of Cologne, and the biſhop of Munſter, ſhould attack their territories by land. However, it was reſolved by agreement between the councils of both nations, to ſeduce the prince of Orange. The ſovereignty of the provinces of Holland, and the protection of England and France, were offered him againſt the invaſions of foreign enemies, as well as in the inſurrections of his own ſubjects. But the prince nobly ſpurned their propoſal, declaring, "as the only way not to "be a ſpectator of the final ruin of his country, "he would die in a ditch." And ſo vigorous were his efforts, that Lewis gave over his project, and Charles was diſpoſed, for the preſent, to lay aſide his intentions.

The king of England being reduced by his extravagance to his uſual neceſſity, gave his miniſters to underſtand, that it would be impoſſible to begin the war without a further ſupply of five hundred thouſand pounds; but as he could not think of obtaining it from parliament, propoſed to confer the office of treaſurer on him who ſhould deviſe the means of furniſhing the preſent demand. Shafteſbury dropped a hint to Clifford, which the latter immediately communicated to the king, who beſtowed on him the promiſed reward, together with a peerage. This modeſt device was nothing leſs than keeping the money which ſhould be paid into the exchequer and ſhutting it up.

This ruinous meaſure was attended with the moſt alarming conſequences, particularly to the mercantile part of the nation. The bankers ſtopped payment; the merchants could anſwer no bills; diffidence and jealouſy every where prevailed, ſo that men were univerſally exaſperated at thoſe myſterious councils from which the parliament and all men of honour were excluded, and which began with the deſtruction of public credit, and the violation of the moſt ſacred engagements both foreign and domeſtic.

As a prelude to theſe arbitrary proceedings on which the king and the cabal ſeemed reſolutely bent, a proclamation was publiſhed, ſuſpending the penal laws, which had been made againſt nonconformiſts, and granting to proteſtant diſſenters the public exerciſe of their religion; and to Catholics, the exerciſe of it in their own houſes. About the ſame time, the act of navigation was ſuſpended, and a proclamation iſſued for impreſſing ſailors, puniſhing all thoſe who ſhould dare to arraign his majeſty's meaſures; martial law was now eſtabliſhed for the regulation of the army. The earl of Shafteſbury, another member of the cabal, was made lord keeper in the room of Bridgeman, who was turned out for refuſing to affix the ſeals to the declaration for ſuſpending the penal laws.

Nor were foreign tranſactions conducted with more credit or ability, for previous to the declaration of war, a perfidious attempt was made upon the Dutch Smyrna fleet. The deſign however was rendered abortive by the bravery of the Dutch admiral, after an engagement of three days. The ſtates enveighed againſt this piratical attempt with great virulence: even Charles was aſhamed of having given his aſſent to an outrage ſo diſhonourable to his crown and dignity, as well as repugnant to the true intereſts of his ſubjects; however, being no longer able to conceal his real intentions, he declared war againſt the republic on the ſeventeenth of March.

The declaration of war by the Engliſh was ſoon followed by another on the part of France, the ſovereign of which was at the head of an army conſiſting of one hundred and eighty thouſand men, commanded by the ableſt officers in Europe. His ſubjects were enriched by commerce, and his finances managed with the greateſt œconomy, while the Dutch were diſtracted between two powerful factions. Filled with a general conſternation, the ſtates made the moſt humiliating conceſſions to the combined powers, but as they were wholly diſregarded, or rather contemptuouſly treated, De Wit, their able ſtateſman, who preſided in the council, made the neceſſary preparations for the threatened invaſion, and now reſolved to make a powerful effort by ſea, while the levying of troops, and improving the diſcipline of the army, was committed to the care of the prince of Orange.

De Ruyter ſtood out for ſea with a formidable fleet, conſiſting of an hundred ſail, ſtore and fire ſhips included; Cornelius de Wit acting on board the admiral as deputy from the ſtates. The combined fleets now rode in Solebay harbour, to the number of one hundred and thirty ſhips of the line. The duke of York commanded in chief, and the earl of Sandwich acted as admiral of the blue; mareſchal d'Etrées commanded the French ſquadron.

Sandwich had given the duke warning of the danger, but it was then ſuppoſed (though without foundation) that there was more of caution than of courage in his apprehenſions, for it ſoon appeared that the noble earl was deficient in neither. On the approach of the enemy, every one flew to his poſt with the utmoſt precipitation, and many ſhips were obliged to cut their cables in order to prepare for the action. Sandwich commanded in the van, and though reſolved to conquer or die, he yet behaved with ſo much prudence, that to him the ſafety of the whole fleet was viſibly owing. He hurried out of the bay, and by this wiſe meaſure afforded time to the duke of York, who conducted the main body, and to mareſchal d'Etrées, admiral of the rear, to get out to open ſea. The earl ſuſtained a moſt furious attack from the enemy; he repulſed the ſhip of Van Ghent, after that admiral had been killed in the engagement; he ſunk another ſhip which attempted to board him, together with three fire ſhips which came full againſt him, and continued to ply his artillery, until the fourth fireſhip grappled him on the quarter, when that brave commander and his whole crew, amounting to one thouſand men, by an exploſion, periſhed in an inſtant. Thus fell as gallant an officer as ever graced the annals of England; probably ſtimulated to a raſh conduct from the reflection of a young admiral, who though ſuperior by birth, was inferior in point of naval ſkill.

De Ruyter, having attacked the duke of York, they fought with incredible fury for above two hours, in which time the Duke's ſhip was ſo ſhattered, that he was obliged to ſhift his flag to another, and his own diviſion was in danger of being overpowered, when Sir Joſeph Jordan, who ſucceeded Sandwich, came to his aſſiſtance. The battle continued till night, when the Dutch ſheered off, but were not purſued by the enemy. As d'Etrees took no part in the action, it was generally imagined he had received private orders to avoid fighting, that the Engliſh and Dutch might mutually deſtroy each other.

In the interim, Lewis had ſubjected all the territories of the ſtates-general on the ſide of Germany, and committed ſeveral depredations without oppoſition. In theſe circumſtances, the magiſtrates of Amſterdam obliged the burgeſſes to keep watch and ward; the other towns followed their example, and having opened all the ſluices, the whole province of Holland was laid under water; whereby a ſtop being put the conqueſts of Lewis, he left the command of the army to the duke of Luxemburg at Utrecht, and marched into Flanders, from whence he went to Paris, which he entered amidſt the acclamations of the populace. The paſſage of the Rhine, which he effected with much eaſe and expedition, was celebrated by the bards of France, as an exploit equal to that of Alexander in paſſing the Granicus, and the ſurname of "Great" beſtowed on him by his flattering ſubjects.

But while his ſubjects were thus perpetuating his conqueſts, ſchemes were forming in the different courts of Europe, for wreſting them out of his hands. The emperor, and ſeveral of the German princes, conſidering the reduction of Holland as a prelude to their own ſubjection, determined to lend aſſiſtance to the United States.

A. D. 1673. On the meeting of parliament, Charles in his ſpeech addreſſed them with the appearances of cordiality and confidence. Having enlarged on the expences inevitably incurred by the war, he proceeded to demonſtrate the neceſſity of engaging therein, obſerving at the ſame time, that his indulgence to non-conformiſts had been productive of the peace of the kingdom, and concluded with aſſuring them, that he doubted not of their proportioning the ſupplies to the preſent exigency. Shafteſbury, as lord chancellor, expatiated on the ſame topics, aſſerting, moreover, that the ſtates being the inveterate enemies of England, the parliament had laid it down as an invariable maxim, that this hoſtile government muſt by all means be deſtroyed.

The houſe, diſſatisfied with his majeſty's conduct, paid little regard to the ſpeech of Charles or his chancellor: they diſapproved of the war, and determined to inſiſt on the immediate redreſs of the nation's grievances. They then preſented an addreſs againſt the king's declaration for liberty of conſcience, beſeeching that his majeſty, by annulling the ſame, would remove the doubts and fears of his ſubjects, and to convince him of their affection towards his perſon and government, voted a tax of ſeventy thouſand pounds per month, for eighteen months to anſwer the king's urgent occaſions.

The king wanting reſolution to ſupport his favourite meaſure, at length gave it up, aſſuring his parliament, he was ready to concur in any motion that might tend to advance the national intereſt. He then publiſhed a proclamation for the redreſs redreſs of their grievances, but the commons were not ſatisfied with this, being determined to prepare a bill which ſhould effectually prevent the evil of which they complained; and likewiſe to defer paſſing the bill for the ſupplies, until the declaration for liberty of conſcience ſhould be recalled.

The duke of York and major part of the cabal, adviſed the king to perſiſt in the purſuit of theſe arbitrary meaſures he had adopted; while others propoſed more lenient proceedings; but the French monarch recommended ſuch a conduct as might conciliate his ſubjects, on whoſe aſſiſtance he totally depended for the carrying on of the Dutch war.

Shafteſbury finding his majeſty greatly perplexed, as well as irreſolute and undetermined, artfully ſecured his own perſon by eſpouſing the intereſt of that party which was likely to gain the aſcendancy. The country party received him with open arms, and afterwards uſed him as their agent in the accompliſhment of their moſt important deſigns.

Apprehenſive of the conſequences of delaying any longer to comply with the requiſition of parliament, Charles repaired to the houſe of peers, and ſending for the declaration, broke the ſeal with his own hand, aſſuring them at the ſame time, that he would grant his aſſent to every bill conſtructed to redreſs their grievances. But the recall of the indulgence was not ſufficient to ſatisfy the commons, nor remove thoſe ſuſpicions which they had conceived of the arbitrary deſigns of the court. They were determined to ſecure their religion by another act. They paſſed a law for impoſing a teſt on all thoſe who ſhould enjoy any public employment. This act, uſually called the Teſt Act, requires that the real preſence in the Euchariſt be renounced, and the ſacrament received in the eſtabliſhed church, beſides taking the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy.

In conſequence of the teſt act many of the popiſh officers reſigned their places, and among the reſt the duke of York his poſt of lord high admiral, and Shaftſbury, whoſe revolt from the cabal was now univerſally known, being deprived of the office of chancellor, Sir Henry Finch was made keeper of the great ſeal. A bill paſſed the lower houſe for the benefit of the proteſtant nonconformiſts, but met with ſome oppoſition in the houſe of peers. The vote for a ſupply was carried into a law, as a reward to the king for his ready compliance. A bill of indemnity likewiſe paſſed, which ſecured the miniſters from all farther ſcrutiny.

In the mean time Charles proſecuted the war againſt the Dutch with the utmoſt vigour. He appointed prince Rupert commander of the fleet in the room of the duke of York. Sir Edward Sprague, and the earl of Oſſory, ſerved under the prince, and being joined by the French fleet under the command of d'Etrées, they ſteered for the coaſt of Holland, where they found the enemy riding at anchor within the ſands of Schonvelt.

An engagement accordingly began on the 28th of March, which proved very obſtinate and bloody; but not being deciſive, both ſides claimed the victory. Another action was maintained on the fourth of June, but whether the combined fleets, or the Dutch retired firſt cannot be affirmed with preciſion.

The third engagement at the mouth of the Texel proved more deciſive. The Dutch fleet was commanded by De Ruyter and Van Tromp, a ſon worthy of the gallant father from whom he ſprung. De Ruyter was oppoſed to prince Rupert, Tromp to Sprague, and Brankert, their rear-admiral, to d'Etrées. The Engliſh and Dutch evinced in this battle the moſt ardent emulation, but the French kept at a diſtance, leaving the Engliſh to ſuſtain all the fury of the enemy. The Dutch rear-admiral Brankert, inſtead of preſſing on the French, ſhot a-head to the aſſiſtance of De Ruyter, who was warmly engaged with prince Rupert.

Never did that prince acquire more deſerved honour, his conduct and courage ſhining with equal luſtre. Having diſengaged himſelf from the numerous enemies with which he was encompaſſed, and joined his rear-admiral Sir John Chicheley, he bore down to the aſſiſtance of Sprague, who was almoſt overpowered by Tromp and his ſquadron. The Royal Prince, in which Sprague firſt engaged, was ſo ſhattered, that he was obliged to hoiſt his flag on board the St. George, while Van Tromp did the ſame from the Golden Lion to the Comet, and the action was renewed with redoubled ardor, until the St. George was likewiſe diſabled. The admiral was drowned to the great regret of Tromp himſelf, who beſtowed on his valour its merited applauſe. Prince Rupert obſerving the whole diviſion in great conſternation, ſent three fire ſhips into the midſt of the Dutch fleet, making at the ſame time a ſignal to the French to bear down, which if they had done, they would probably have obtained a compleat victory. But the French neglecting to obey his ſignal, Rupert was obliged to leave the victory undecided, by prudently ſteering for the coaſt of England, and thereby preſerving his diſabled ſhips. The victory in this as well as moſt other engagements fought during the war was of little advantage.

At length, through the interpoſition of the king of Sweden, a negotiation for peace took place at Cologne; but the kings of England and France inſiſted nearly on the terms which they had already impoſed, and the ſtates finding their affairs to be in a better poſture than formerly, relaxed daily in their offers, and there was little probability of the parties coming to any agreement.

The duke of York, determining on a ſecond marriage, had made choice of Mary, ſiſter to the duke of Medina, a princeſs educated in the principles of the church of Rome. This alliance was warmly oppoſed by the parliament, who, in an addreſs to the king, expreſſed their diſapprobation in the ſtrongeſt terms. Charles, however, told them, that their oppoſition came too late, and that the marriage was not only concluded, but ſolemnized by proxy. The commons perſiſted in their remonſtrance, and proceeding to the ſcrutiny of ſome other parts of the government, voted the ſtanding army a grievance, and declared, that unleſs it appeared that the Dutch rejected all reaſonable terms of peace, they would grant no farther ſupplies.

To prevent the further diſcuſſion of theſe ſubjects ſo diſagreeable to his majeſty, he prorogued the parliament to the ſeventh of January, having in a pathetic ſpeech, earneſtly beſought them to maintain that unanimity which was eſſentially neceſſary to their acting with vigour and ſucceſs againſt their enemies.

The princeſs of Modena arriving in England, with with her mother, about this time, her marriage with the duke of York was celebrated at Dover on the twenty-first of November.

A. D. 1674. Finding it impoſſible to continue a war ſo diſagreeable to the nation, as well as defeated in his expectations of parliamentary aid, Charles began to liſten to the propoſals which the States-general had made for a ſeparate peace. They wrote a ſubmiſſive letter, empowering the marquis de Freſno, the Spaniſh ambaſſador at London, to conclude a treaty with king Charles in their name, on certain conditions which were ſpecified therein.

Accordingly, with the conſent of parliament, conferences were opened with the marquis de Freſno, and in fifteen days the treaty was concluded. It was a renewal of the peace of Breda, with theſe additions, that the Dutch ſhould yield the honour of the flag to the Engliſh in the moſt extenſive terms, and pay about three hundred thouſand pounds to the king, towards defraying the expences of the war.

A. D. 1675. It was natural to imagine that Lewis would be highly incenſed at the manner in which his ally, the king of England, had abandoned him; but, on the contrary, he ſhewed no ſigns of reſentment, and even readily accepted his mediation.

Soon after the peace, Sir William Temple was ſent ambaſſador to the Hague, to induce the ſtates to come to terms of accommodation with France. But the prince of Orange, inſpired with ambitious views, and the deſire of military glory, ſhunned the Engliſh miniſter, and told him afterwards, that until the power of France could be farther weakened, they had nothing to expect from a negotiation.

The moſt rancorous animoſity now broke out among the courtiers and placemen. The duke of Buckingham loſt the dignity of chancellor of the univerſity of Cambridge, and was ſucceeded by the duke of Monmouth, who had ſignalized himſelf in France, and was become the idol of the people. The duke of Lauderdale kept his poſts, but being intimidated at a vote paſſed againſt him in the houſe of commons, he openly renounced the meaſures of the cabal, profeſſed uncommon zeal for the proteſtant religion, and even adviſed his majeſty to put the laws in execution againſt the Roman Catholics.

Theſe acts, however, could not effectually obviate the diſpleaſure of parliament. The commons, at their firſt meeting, preſented a ſecond addreſs againſt the duke of Lauderdale, and on the king's returning an evaſive anſwer, ſeemed reſolved to inſiſt on his removal, and for that purpoſe drew up a remonſtrance couched in the moſt expreſſive terms. Finding nothing was to be expected from addreſſes, the commons framed a bill, declaring it treaſon to levy money without the authority of parliament; another for vacating the ſeats of thoſe members who had accepted of poſts or employments; and a third for ſecuring the liberty of the ſubject, and preventing their being tranſported to diſtant iſlands.

Alarmed at the proceedings of the two houſes, Charles, as the only method of preſerving the peace of the kingdom, prorogued the parliament to the thirteenth day of October. On the opening the ſeſſion, according to the time of adjournment, the king demanded a ſupply, as well for the building of ſhips, as for diſcharging his debts. The commons abſolutely refuſed to pay his debts, but granted three hundred thouſand pounds for repairing and augmenting the navy. They then turned their attention to the redreſs of public grievances; but their deliberations were interrupted, by the inſolent behaviour of father St. Germain, a French jeſuit, who entered the houſe of one Luzancy, a convert to the proteſtant religion; and by threatening him with death, extorted a writing by which he renounced his recantation. Luzancy's complaint made ſo much diſturbance in the houſe of commons, that Charles was obliged to offer two hundred pounds reward for the apprehenſion of St. Germain, who had, however, fled the kingdom previous to the offer.

The diſſipation, levity and prodigality of the king now became a bye word with the people, inſomuch that, exaſperated at the liberties taken with his perſon and adminiſtration, he ſuppreſſed all the coffee houſes, and iſſued a proclamation, promiſing a reward to thoſe who ſhould diſcover the authors of libels and pamphlets written againſt the government.

A. D. 1676. Though the ſucceſſes of the allies had been conſiderable during the laſt campaign, yet the Spaniards and Imperialiſts well knew that Lewis was not ſufficiently humbled, and therefore were not willing to ſubmit to the terms propoſed by his plenipotentiaries, ſo that no progreſs was made in the conferences appointed at Nimeguen.

A. D. 1677. To raiſe money for preſent exigencies, the king on the meeting of the parliament in February declared that he was willing to grant every ſecurity in his power towards the maintenance of the proteſtant religion, as exerciſed in the eſtabliſhed church of England, together with the liberties and properties of his loving ſubjects; he laid before them his wants, and deſired a ſupply that would enable him to make a conſiderable addition to his navy. This was readily complied with, and every thing ſeemed to promiſe a good underſtanding between the king and the parliament.

But this tranquillity was ſoon interrupted by the intelligence received from abroad. The French monarch ſtill ſupported the ſuperiority of his arms. He had taken the field very early in the ſpring, inveſted and taken Valenciennes by ſtorm, whilſt his general the duke of Luxemburgh had defeated the prince of Orange before St. Omer's, and reduced that place together with Cambray. The parliament addreſſed the king, repreſenting the danger which threatened the kingdom, from the exorbitant power of Lewis, and deſiring that he would concert meaſures for the ſecurity of his own dominions and the Spaniſh Netherlands, and thereby remove the fears of his people. Charles in his anſwer, complained of their violating his prerogative, by inſiſting on his engaging in alliance with any power they propoſed, and then adjourned the parliament to the tenth of July.

Deſirous, however, of ſatisfying the wiſhes of the people without forfeiting the friendſhip of Lewis, the king formed a deſign of marrying the young prince of Orange to the princeſs Mary, daughter to his brother the duke of York. The prince coming over and finding the lady entirely agreeable to him, the marriage was ſolemnized ſoon after with ſuitable magnificence, and the prince embarked with his royal conſort for Holland.

Previous to his departure the king had entered into conferences with him on the ſubject of a general peace, at which were preſent the earl of Danby, and Sir William Danby. After ſome debate, it was agreed, that Lewis ſhould reſtore all he had taken from the emperor and the duke of Lorraine; that there ſhould be mutual reſtitution between France and Holland, and that Spain ſhould recover poſſeſſion of the Netherlands belonging to that crown. The prince engaged to uſe his endeavours in perſuading the ſtates to agree to theſe conditions, and Charles undertook to procure the conſent of the French monarch, declaring at the ſame time, that he would never depart from this plan.

Monſieur de Duras, a Frenchman by birth, was pitched on by Charles to notify this event to Lewis, who affected to receive it with great complacency. He ſaid, indeed, that the king of England might always command a peace, but he deemed it hard to reſign ſome of thoſe towns in Flanders, on the fortifications of which he had expended large ſums; he hoped his brother would not break with him for a few towns, and would commiſſion his ambaſſador at London to treat of the matter.

A. D. 1678. Piqued at the inſincerity of the French court, Charles determined to convince Lewis that he was not to be inſulted with impunity. The parliament, which ſtood prorogued to May, was ſummoned for the 15th of January, a circumſtance that greatly alarmed the French monarch. His majeſty informed them on their meeting, that he had concluded an alliance with Holland, and obſerved at the ſame time, that in the preſent ſituation of affairs, the nation could not be ſecure, unleſs ninety ſhips of war were kept in commiſſion, beſides an army of thirty thouſand men. He communicated the marriage of his neice with the prince of Orange, and deſired a ſupply adequate to the neceſſities of the kingdom.

The commons having attended to his ſpeech, entreated his majeſty that he would not engage in any treaty with France, until ſhe ſhould be reduced to the ſame ſtate in which ſhe was at the peace of the Pyrenees, and gave him to underſtand, that when he ſhould communicate to them the nature of his alliances, they would enable him to proſecute the war with vigour; or to make an honourable and advantageous peace. In the mean time, Lewis reduced Ghent, and Ypres, which ſo alarmed the Dutch, that they came to a reſolution of making a ſeparate peace. The king of France availing himſelf of the advantage he had gained over Charles, inſiſted on terms very different from thoſe which he and the prince of Orange had agreed to.

As ſoon as intelligence of theſe events reached England, the chancellor was ordered to notify them in form to both houſes, and requeſt their advice in this critical juncture. The commons exhorted the king to declare war immediately againſt France, and voted the Dutch alliance inſufficient for the ſecurity of the nation, deſiring in another addreſs, that he would pay more regard to their addreſſes, and remove from his councils the duke of Lauderdale. The king affected aſtoniſhment at this requeſt, and would not at that time return the anſwer they deſired. The levies were carried on with ſuch ſurprizing diligence and ſucceſs that in ſix weeks an army of thirty thouſand men was completed. The duke of Monmouth was ſent over at the head of three thouſand men to garriſon Oſtend. A fleet was equipped with great expedition, and the court breathed nothing but defiance againſt the French monarch. The ſtates general by their ambaſſador declared, that if the king of England would immediately denounce war againſt Lewis, they would break off their negotiations with France, and act vigorouſly in conjunction with their allies. The king replied, that as the ſtates were ready to accept of the conditions preſcribed by France, and Lewis had offered to purchaſe peace with a ſum of money, he thought himſelf juſtifiable in accepting his propoſal.

Sir William Temple declining all concerns in this ſcandalous negotiation, Charles found others, who undertook the office without reluctance, and the bargain was ſtruck for the ſum of three hundred thouſand pounds. The French miniſter then gave him to underſtand, that unleſs he would, by a ſecret article, engage never to keep an army exceeding eight thouſand men in his three kingdoms, the money would not even then be paid.

Incenſed at this humiliating intimation, the king exclaimed, "Cod's fiſh! "does my brother of "France think to ſerve me thus? are all his pro- "miſes to make me abſolute maſter of my people "come to this? or, does he think it a thing to "be done with eight thouſand men?" But always wavering and irreſolute, ſometimes wrought on by the promiſes of Lewis, and ſometimes by the allurements of pleaſure, Charles neither anſwered the expectations of the Engliſh, nor the confederate powers.

The parliament re-aſſembled in the month of May, when his majeſty aſſured them that a peace between France, Spain, and Holland was on the point of concluſion, from whence he inferred the neceſſity of keeping a good fleet at ſea, as the Spaniards had declared, they could not ſupport the expence of maintaining garriſons in Flanders, which muſt be left expoſed, unleſs England would ſupply the fortified places with men and proviſions; and recommended the ſafety of Oſtend to their ſerious regard, in which place, if neglected, the French might keep a fleet of forty ſhips of war. He deſired they would add three hundred thouſand pounds to his revenue, in which caſe they might appropriate, yearly, fifty thouſand pounds towards the maintenance of the fleet and artillery; and the prince of Orange having demanded the firſt moiety of his wife's fortune of forty thouſand pounds, which was already due, he begged them to conſider that his honour was engaged for the payment.

The commons indeed voted his majeſty thanks for the gracious expreſſions in his ſpeech, but refuſed to grant him any additional revenue. They voted him, however, ſix thouſand pounds for the payment of the army, and enacted a ſtatute, decreeing, that for the future the dead ſhould be buried in flannel, for the benefit of the woollen manufactory, after which the king prorogued the parliament to the 1ſt of Auguſt.

The States-general, againſt the inclination of the prince of Orange, concluded a peace with France and Spain, and the empire accepted the conditions preſcribed to them, and the treaty being filled up at Nimeguen, placed the French king on the pinnacle of glory.

This year was remarkable for the diſcovery of a famous conſpiracy in England, known by the name of the popiſh plot, which, for ſome time, engroſſed the public attention. One Kirby, at the inſtigation of doctor Iſrael Tongue, a clergyman of London, on the twelfth of Auguſt, approaching his majeſty in St. James's Park, ſaid to him: "Sir, keep within the company, your enemies "have a deſign upon your life." The king deſired fired Kirby to bring Tongue to him at eight o'clock that evening. He was accordingly introduced to his majesty, with a bundle of papers relating to this conspiracy, and referred to the lord treasurer Danby. He said that the papers were thrust under his door without his knowledge; but imagined it was done by a certain person, who had often entertained him with subjects of the like nature. The improbability of the story induced his majesty to look upon the whole as a fiction, and he requested it might be kept a secret, for fear of the consequences it might produce among his subjects.

One Titus Oates seems to have been the chief discoverer of this conspiracy. He had been a clergyman of the established church, but afterwards embraced the tenets of the Romish faith, at least he pretended to be a convert to that religion, and was become a member of the society of English seminaries at St. Omer's. He also went into Spain, and was admitted into the councils of the jesuits. By these means he is said to have been acquainted with all the secret designs that were carrying on in order to establish popery in England.

At length the affair becoming public, it was resolved to bring it before the council, when Oates gave evidence to the following effect: that he had been employed by several jesuits to carry letters to father Shee, an Irish jesuit at Madrid; that in the course of his journey thither, he had broke open letters, and discovered a design of exciting a rebellion in Scotland; that he saw several English students at Valadolid, who were obliged by the jesuits of the college to renounce their allegiance to the king of Great Britain; that one of them in a sermon to the students, presumed to affirm, that Charles Stuart was not a lawful king, nor the son of Charles the first, but of a black Scotchman; that upon his return to England, where he made farther discoveries, he was sent to St. Omer's with other letters to the same purport as the former; that in April 1668, he came over from St. Omer's with several jesuits, to assist at the grand council which was held by about fifty jesuits at the White-horse tavern in the Strand, where they signed an agreement to kill the king; that in June following he became privy to the treaty with Wakeman, the queen's physician, to poison, and Grove and Pickering to shoot his majesty; that he heard a jesuit assert in a sermon, that protestant and other heretical princes, were ipso facto deposed, and that it was as lawful to destroy them, as Oliver Cromwell, or any other usurper.

In consequence of this deposition of Oates, corroborated by information given respecting divers particulars, through means of Tongue, both of whom had been frequently examined at the council, several persons were taken into custody, among whom were Wakeman, physician to the queen, Edward Coleman, secretary to the duke of York, and eight priests and jesuits.

In Coleman's house were found letters that seemed to confirm what Oates had advanced, which, added to an incident that occurred a few days after, fixed the public in the belief of the plot. This was the murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, who had taken Oates's deposition, and who, after having been missing for several days, was found dead in a ditch near Primrose-hill. The coroners inquest were of opinion that his death was occasioned by strangling and suffocation, and brought in their verdict, "wilful murder by persons unknown." Five hundred pounds and an assurance of protection were immediately offered by the king, for the discovery of Godfrey's murderers.

This affair at length gained ground so fast, that it came under the cognizance of parliament, by whom it was unanimously resolved in both houses after examination of Oates upon the subject, "that "there hath been, and still is a damnable and "hellish plot, contrived and carried on by popish "recusants, for assassinating and murdering the "king, for subverting the government, and for "rooting out and destroying the protestant reli-"gion." One Bedloe also made his appearance as an evidence for the plot, and was strictly examined by the lords. In the mean time several persons whom Oates had impeached were apprehended, and among the rest the following noblemen, all of them avowed papists. The earl of Powis, the viscount Stafford, the lords Arundel of Wardour, Petre, and Bellasis, who were all committed to the Tower.

The depositions of Oates and Bedloe being published, excited such a ferment in the nation, that the king was obliged to issue a proclamation, commanding all popish recusants under the severest penalties to repair to their own houses, and not to venture from thence, without a particular licence, to a greater distance than five miles. At the same time another proclamation was published, offering a reward to any one who should discover or apprehend a Romish priest or jesuit; and the royal assent was given to a bill for disqualifying papists from sitting in parliament.

Coleman, secretary to the duke of York, was tried for being engaged in the pretended conspiracy, and being found guilty was executed pursuant to his sentence. On the seventeenth of December were arraigned and tried at the Old Bailey, Ireland and Pickering, both priests, Grove, a lay brother, Whitebread, provincial of the jesuits, and Fenwick, a member of the same society. But, as in the course of the evidence, there appeared no sufficient proof against the two last, the trial was confined to the three first, who, after a long examination, were found guilty, and condemned to be hanged, drawn, and quartered.

A. D. 1679. Much information was obtained as to this infernal conspiracy from the following incident. One Prance having been apprehended on suspicion of being concerned in the murder of Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, and being brought before the committee of the upper house, denied the charge with the deepest imprecations; but Bedloe affirming that he was one of the men he saw in Somerset-gardens with the dead body, he was immediately conveyed to Newgate, and confined in the condemned hole. Being carried before the earl of Shaftesbury, he discovered some particulars, and promised to make a fuller confession if he could be assured of obtaining a free pardon. This being granted, he was examined before the king and council at Whitehall, where he confessed that Godfrey was murdered in Somerset-house, by the contrivance of Gerald and Kelly, two Irish priests, Robert Green, cushion keeper to the queen's chapel, and several others.

In fact, Prance deposed upon oath, that himself, in company with Green, Berry, Hill, and some others, determining to take off Sir Edmundbury Godfrey, who had been remarkably active against the papists followed the justice for some time, till he went into the court of Somerset-house, where they they ſtrangled him with his handkerchief; that they then conveyed the body to the houſe of doctor Godden, where it lay two nights, and was then removed and thrown into a ditch, near Primroſe-hill, after they had thruſt his own ſword through it, that he might be ſuppoſed to have murdered himſelf. Green, Berry, and Hill, were executed for the murder, but perſevered in denying the fact to the laſt.

It appears from the joint teſtimony of cotemporary writers, that the king diſcovered ſome unwillingneſs for the parliament to take cognizance of the fact. Indeed, there are ſome grounds for ſuch an opinion, to be gathered from his obſerving in his ſpeech to parliament, that he would forbear offering his ſentiments on the matter, leſt he ſhould ſay too much or too little, and that he would leave the diſcuſſion of it entirely to the legiſlature. At leaſt ſuch were the jealouſies generally entertained of the meaſures of the court, and the deſigns of the catholics, that Charles, in order to avert part of the ſtorm that threatened him, removed the duke of York from his preſence, who retired with his wife and daughter to Bruſſels, in obedience to a written order from the king.

But notwithſtanding this popular tranſaction, the nation in general, and the parliament in particular, were greatly diſguſted at the conduct of the king, againſt whom they entertained the moſt inſurmountable prejudices from this additional circumſtance. Montague the Engliſh ambaſſador in France, having aſpired to the office of ſecretary of ſtate, was greatly incenſed againſt Danby for introducing a rival to ſupplant him, and having papers in his poſſeſſion ſufficient to ruin the earl, communicated the moſt ſtriking to ſome leading members of the lower houſe, who, exaſperated at this diſcovery, began to prepare new articles of impeachment againſt him. Tongue, Oates, Bedloe, and one Everard, a new witneſs, were ſummoned to the bar of the houſe to be examined concerning the plot. They likewiſe voted that a horrible conſpiracy had been contrived and carried on for aſſaſſinating the king, deſtroying the proteſtant religion, and ſubverting the government; the peers concurred with them in this vote, and a day of faſting and humiliation was petitioned for by both houſes.

Charles earneſtly interceded with the the lords for the earl of Danby, who, he ſaid, had voted in obedience to the orders he had received, but that for their ſatisfaction he would deprive him of his employments, and remove him from his preſence. But theſe conceſſions, inſtead of ſoothing, rather encouraged them to new exertions of their power. The commons choſe Edward Seymour for their ſpeaker, a man whom they knew to be averſe to the earl of Danby. The king refuſed his approbation, upon which a prorogation took place, but meeting again in a few days, they choſe Mr. Gregory ſerjeant at law, of whom the king approved, and thus ended the diſpute. This affair being ſettled, they brought in a bill, obliging Danby to ſurrender himſelf into the hands of juſtice by a certain day, on pain of being proceeded againſt by an act of attainder. This bill was ſent down from the lords with ſome amendments; when a diſpute aroſe, and conferences were held upon the ſubject. At length the peers acquieſced and the bill paſſed, and the earl, chuſing to appear rather than ſubmit to ſo rigorous a penalty, was committed to the Tower.

Alarmed at the reſolute meaſures of the parliament, the king, by the advice of Sir William Temple, propoſed to form a council, into which thoſe who poſſeſſed the confidence of the people might be admitted. Charles hoped that this alteration would have brought the commons into a more compliant humour, but he found himſelf miſtaken. Shafteſbury though made preſident of the council, finding that he had loſt the king's confidence, adhered to the oppoſition, and ſo biaſſed the opinion and judgment of the majority, that they proceeded to vote, that the duke of York, being a Roman catholic and the preſumptive heir to the crown, was the chief encouragement to the deſigns and plots of the papiſts againſt the king, and the proteſtant religion. It was even ſuppoſed, that a bill would be ſoon introduced for excluding him from the throne. In order to prevent this meaſure, the king concerted ſome limitations, which he imparted to the parliament, the particulars of which were, that the death of a king, if his ſucceſſor was a catholic, ſhould not diſſolve the parliament; that during the whole courſe of his reign he ſhould not be allowed to confer eccleſiaſtical benefices or ſpiritual offices upon any but pious and learned proteſtants; that no member of the privy council, or judges, ſhould be appointed or diſplaced but by the authority of parliament; that all juſtices of the peace ſhould be proteſtants, and that with regard to the militia, no lieutenant of a county ſhould be deprived of his office, but by order of parliament.

Theſe limitations, though very conſiderable, were not ſufficient to ſatisfy the commons, ſo that reſolving to free themſelves effectually from all their fears by ſuch a ſtep, as they were perſuaded could alone ſecure the religious and civil liberties of the kingdom. A bill was brought into the lower houſe for the total excluſion of James duke of York and Albany, and earl of Ulſter, from ſucceeding to the crown of England and Ireland. It was further declared, that upon the death or reſignation of the king, the ſovereignty of theſe kingdoms ſhould devolve to the perſon next in ſucceſſion to the duke; that all acts of royalty exerciſed by him ſhould be not only void, but deemed treaſonable, that if he entered any of theſe dominions, he ſhould be accounted guilty of high treaſon, and that all who ſupported his title ſhould be puniſhed as rebels and traitors. This important bill, which implied baniſhment as well as excluſion, paſſed the lower houſe by a majority of ſeventy-nine voices. They then proceeded to ſet on foot a ſevere enquiry againſt thoſe members who received penſions from court; and eighteen were diſcovered. The ſtanding army and the guards were deemed illegal, and they brought in the bill of Habeas Corpus, that great bulwark of Engliſh freedom, obliging the judge, under ſevere penalties, to grant a writ at the requeſt of every priſoner, directing the jailor to produce him in court, and certify the cauſe of his commitment.

Theſe bills ſo ſalutary to the ſubject, if not pleaſing to the ſovereign, having paſſed by a great majority, the king went to the houſe of peers, and ſending for the commons, prorogued the parliament from the twenty-ſeventh of May to the fourteenth of Auguſt; and this parliament was afterwards diſſolved without the advice of council, and writs iſſued for new elections. From this period, Charles, finding all his attempts to oppoſe deſpotiſm ineffectual, became penſive and ſullen, and diſcovered a viſible change of temper throughout his conduct.

Five jeſuits and Langhorne, an eminent lawyer who managed the affairs of their order, were executed on account of the popiſh plot. Langhorne objected to the credit of the informers, Oates and his accomplices, but without effect, as they all died proteſting their innocence with their lateſt breath. Such were the unconquerable prejudice and unrelenting obduracy of the times.

Sir George Wakeman the queen's phyſician was tried. Oates prevaricated greatly in his evidence, alledging on his firſt examination that he could adduce no circumſtance but by report, and afterwards ſwearing to matters frivolous and inconſiſtent. Wakeman refuted, by his council and evidence, the aſſertions of Oates and others, and was therefore acquitted, as were three benedictine monks who were tried at the ſame time.

The king, about the latter end of Auguſt, was ſeized with ſo violent a fever, that his phyſicians apprehended his life to be in imminent danger. Alarmed at this indication, Charles with the advice of his council, ſent a meſſenger for the duke of York, but fortunately recovered before his arrival. James, fearful that the duke of Monmouth, who was favoured by the king, and much eſteemed by the people, might rival him in the ſucceſſion, would not return to the continent, till Monmouth was deprived of his commiſſion, and ordered to quit the kingdom. Having gained this point, he returned again to Bruſſels, but ſoon obtained leave to reſide in Scotland, that he might have an opportunity of conciliating the affections of thoſe people, and be at hand in caſe of the demiſe of the king his brother; inſtead of which he made himſelf many enemies without gaining ſcarce a ſingle friend.

The nation was now ſo addicted to credulity, that every neceſſitous villain was encouraged to alarm them by pretended and fictitious plots. One Dangerfield a notorious miſcreant, was author of a new plot or incident, called, "the Meal-tub plot," from the place in which ſome papers regarding it were found. It is both difficult and immaterial to trace the ſource of this affair. It appears, however, that under pretence of betraying the conſpiracies of the preſbyterians, he had been countenanced by ſome catholics of condition, and had even been admitted to the preſence of the king and the duke: and that under pretence of revealing new plots, he had obtained acceſs to Shafteſbury and ſome of the popular leaders. Though no weight could be laid on the teſtimony of a man of ſo infamous a character, a great clamour was raiſed, as if the court had, by way of retaliation, intended to load the preſbyterians with the guilt of a falſe conſpiracy.

The obſtinacy of Charles in refuſing to aſſemble the parliament loſt him the ſupport of his moſt able and honeſt counſellors. Eſſex reſigned his treaſurer's ſtaff, which was beſtowed upon Laurence Hyde; Lord Ruſſel, a nobleman of approved integrity, quitted the council board; Sir William Temple retired into the country, and the earl of Radnor took the place of Shafteſbury, who was diſmiſſed the council for an inſult offered to the king in his abſence.

The duke of Monmouth at the inſtigation of Shafteſbury came over to England without the king's permiſſion, and made a triumphant progreſs through many parts of the kingdom, extremely careſſed by the people, inſomuch that a rebellion was apprehended.

The king's late indiſpoſition had occaſioned an univerſal alarm, and his reaſon as much as the fear of ſeeing his brother aſcend the throne, made the public regard his death (to adapt the phraſe of Sir William Temple) "as the end of the world." The male-contents demanded that a parliament ſhould be called, the court party oppoſed to their petitions, addreſſes full of duty, ſubmiſſion, and profeſſions of loyalty. The Whigs and Tories were extremely animated againſt each other, and diſplayed the moſt unrelenting fury, malice and reſentment.

A. D. 1680. Shafteſbury, at the head of the oppoſition to the court meaſures, was reſolved, if poſſible, to ruin the duke of York, in oppoſition to whom he ſet up the duke of Monmouth. He not only conducted him in the road to popularity, but propagated a report that the king had actually been married to Mrs. Walters, the duke's mother. The king declared in council againſt this rumour, and ordered the author of ſuch a malicious ſlander to be minutely ſought after. At length he iſſued a declaration, that he was never married or contracted to Mrs. Walters, the duke of Monmouth's mother, nor to any other perſon whatſoever but queen Catharine.

His majeſty at length ſummoned a parliament, and in his ſpeech, among other conſiderations, repreſented to them the neceſſity of a farther inveſtigation of the Popiſh-plot, and the condign puniſhment of criminals as neceſſary to the ſafety of the kingdom.

He informed them that he had concluded ſuch an alliance with Spain, as he did not doubt would be agreeable to them, aſſured them he would be ready to concur in all reaſonable meaſures for the ſecurity of the proteſtant religion, and concluded with ſignifying his earneſt deſire that they would cordially unite in proſecuting thoſe ſalutary purpoſes.

But theſe conciliatory expreſſions had no weight with the commons, who upbraided the court with miſapplication of the ſupplies granted from time to time, inveighed againſt the prodigality of the king, and at length preſented him an addreſs that he would remove from all public employment, Sir George Jefferies, recorder of London, and firſt judge of Cheſter. They then recommended Dr. Tongue to the king, for the firſt good benefice in the gift of the crown that ſhould become vacant. The lords Ruſſel and Capel enumerated the grievances of the nation, and were ſeconded by a great number of members; ſome of whom were very ſevere againſt the duke of York, and the lord Ruſſel, in direct terms, moved for excluding him from the ſucceſſion.

The bill now moved for occaſioned warm and virulent altercations in the houſe of commons. The ſpeakers in favour of it were lord Ruſſel, Sir William Jones, Sir Francis Winnington, Sir Henry Capel, Sir William Pulteney, colonel Titus, Treby, Hampden, and Montague. It was oppoſed by Sir Leoline Jenkins, ſecretary of ſtate; Sir John Erneley, chancellor of the exchequer; Sir William Temple, Hyde, and Seymour. The former party aſſerted, that the king, lords, and commons of England, had a right to alter any part of the conſtitution: that the lineal ſucceſſion to the crown of England had been often ſet aſide; that ſuch an expedient was indiſpenſably requiſite at a juncture, when the duke's zeal for the Romiſh faith, his conections with catholic princes, and his arbitrary diſpoſition, threatened the revival of popery, the perſecution of proteſtants, together with a dreadful train of miſeries inevitably reſulting therefrom. The latter party argued, that abſolute tyranny, or ſucceſsful uſurpation alone, had ever ſet aſide the right of ſucceſſion; that it could never be diſpenſed with without introducing the moſt violent convulſions, unleſs the whole nation concurred in the change; that a legiſlature, which deviates from a fundamental point of the conſtitution, ſubverts that very principle of authority on which itſelf is founded; and that the conſequence of driving the king to extremity ought to be well conſidered, as it was well known his majeſty would never give up the right of ſucceſſion.

Theſe arguments, however, had no force, and the bill was carried by a great majority. After a long debate, however, in the upper houſe, where Shafteſbury's eloquence was eclipſed by that of his nephew Hallifax, a zealous partizan of the court, the peers declared againſt the bill, and it was accordingly thrown out by a majority of thirty-three.

The loſs of their favourite bill highly incenſed the commons, inſomuch that they addreſſed the king to remove lord Hallifax, and other peers who had voted againſt it, from his preſence and councils for ever; revived the impeachment of the five catholic lords in the Tower, and determined to make the poor old viſcount Stafford the firſt victim. Accordingly he was brought from the Tower to his trial on the thirteenth of November, and notwithſtanding the ſtrength of his defence, the ſimplicity of his deportment, and his pathetic proteſtations of innocence, he was convicted of treaſon upon the evidence of Dugdale, Oates, and Tuberville, who ſeem to have been the hireling informers of a party. He, however, received the fatal verdict with firmneſs and reſolution, nor was the malice of his greateſt enemies able to ſhake the ſteady purpoſe of his ſoul. He diſavowed on the ſcaffold the principles for which he was ſentenced to death, when the populace exclaimed, "We believe you, my lord." The very executioner was ſtruck with ſympathy, and could not perform his office without heſitation, and when he held up the head according to cuſtom, exclaiming, "this is the head of a traitor," no clamours of aſſent were uttered, pity, remorſe, and aſtoniſhment had taken poſſeſſion of every heart, and was viſible in every countenance. No more blood was ſhed on account of this real or ſuppoſed conſpiracy, the circumſtances of which afford the moſt ſtriking proofs of the power of prejudice and bigotry, even over the moſt enlightened and liberal minds.

Not content with theſe marks of ſeverity, the commons voted that a bill ſhould be brought in for baniſhing the moſt conſiderable papiſts from the kingdom, alledging, that while the catholics retained any hopes of ſeeing the duke of York aſcend the throne, the proteſtant religion, and the lives and liberties of the people, would be in imminent danger.

A. D. 1681. The flexible character of Charles and his continual exigencies ariſing from an unreſtrained prodigality, having inſtigated the parliament to ſuch violent meaſures as he could not but conſider as a direct attack upon his dignity and prerogative, he determined to put a ſpeedy end to their ſeſſion. But the commons being apprized of this reſolution, met early in the day, on which it was expected that his majeſty would come to the houſe in order to prorogue the parliament, and paſſed a vote, that whoever adviſed his majeſty to prorogue the parliament to any other purpoſe than in order to the paſſing a bill to exclude the duke of York from the ſucceſſion, was a traitor to his king and country, a promoter of the French intereſt, and a penſioner of France. To this they added another vote, importing, that whoever ſhould advance any money on thoſe branches of the king's revenue ariſing from cuſtoms, exciſe, or hearth money, ſhould be deemed an enemy to the parliament, and be amenable to the bar of that houſe.

Theſe motions were no ſooner carried, than their attendance was required in the houſe of peers, where the king immediately prorogued the parliament, and at the ſame time ordered writs to be iſſued, for calling another to meet at Oxford on the twenty-firſt of March.

The meeting of this parliament had more the reſemblance of former times than the peaceable appearance of mere aſſemblies. Each party came armed and attended by their friends and adherents, as if confident of an immediate rupture. The members for London were ſurrounded by a numerous band of horſemen, diſtinguiſhed by knots and ribbons, inſcribed "No popery, no ſlavery." The king complained of the intolerable proceedings of the laſt houſe of commons, and plainly told them, that as he never intended to exerciſe arbitrary power over others, ſo he would not ſuffer it to be exerciſed over himſelf. He hoped the bad conſequences of former animoſities would diſpoſe them to more moderation, and induce them cooly to deliberate on meaſures neceſſary to be purſued in the preſent ſituation of affairs. He expreſſed an anxious deſire of obviating all reaſonable fears ariſing from the poſſibility of a popiſh ſucceſſor; and added, that he was willing to agree to any ſcheme for placing the power of governing in proteſtant hands, during the life of any king profeſſing popery.

But neither the menaces, nor ſoothing of the king, had the leaſt effect on the commons, who elected the ſame ſpeaker, and adopted the ſame meaſures. Being determined to enquire further into the popiſh plot and the bill of excluſion, one of his majeſty's miniſters propoſed that the duke of York ſhould be baniſhed, during life, to the diſtance of five hundred miles from any part of the Britiſh dominions; that the government ſhould be veſted in a regent; that this office ſhould be conferred upon the princeſs of Orange, and in caſe of her death, devolve to her ſiſter Anne; that ſhould the duke of York have a ſon, educated in the proteſtant religion, the ſaid regent ſhould act during his minority; that though the kingdom ſhould be governed in the name of James II. that no man ſhould take arms for him, or by virtue of his commiſſion, on pain of capital puniſhment, and that thoſe ſhould incur the ſame penalty, who ſhould affirm, that the ſimple title of king takes away all defects mentioned in this act, or in any degree eludes the obligation of it; that all officers, civil and military, ſhould bind themſelves by oath to the obſervance of this ſtatute; that acts of the ſame nature ſhould paſs in the parliaments of Scotland and Ireland; that if the duke of York ſhould enter either of the three kingdoms, he ſhould be excluded, "ipſo facto," and the ſovereignty devolve to the regent; that all papiſts of any conſideration ſhould be baniſhed by name, and their children educated in the proteſtant religion.

But even theſe expedients, which were almoſt equal to an excluſion, did not appear to the commons mons as a ſufficient barrier againſt the introduction of popery as the eſtabliſhed religion of the realm; ſo that they reſumed the conſideration of their favourite bill, and had actually ordered it to be read a ſecond time, when Charles, ſeizing the opportunity, diſſolved the parliament before they were apprized of his deſign. He forthwith retired to Windſor, whence he next day repaired to London, where he publiſhed a declaration, containing his reaſons for diſſolving the two laſt parliaments. The king had no ſooner taken this expedient, than addreſſes were brought him from all parts of the kingdom, containing the warmeſt expreſſions of loyalty, applauding the king's conduct in diſſolving the parliament, and inveighing againſt the commons for encouraging ſedition.

In this inſtance the conduct of the king admits of vindication, though he did not uſe this ſucceſs with prudence and moderation; for, not properly diſtinguiſhing between the lawleſs attempts of a diſcontented faction, and the noble efforts of a patriotic ſpirit to withſtand the encroachments of the crown, and aſſert the privileges of the ſubject, he determined to govern in future without the aſſiſtance of parliament, and became not only deſpotic, but even cruel. He immediately gratified with places or penſions all thoſe who had occaſionally appeared in, or acted for the intereſt of the court, and in order to convince the world of the ſuperiority he had acquired, committed Shafteſbury to the Tower, and impriſoned, at the ſame time, ſeveral perſons of inferior rank, who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves as leaders in that party. But the chief object of his reſentment was the earl of Shafteſbury, to proſecute whom no ſums were ſpared, nor no expedient left untried.

His trial was accordingly fixed, but he fortunately eſcaped by the grand jury's not finding the bill againſt him. Writers are far from agreeing with regard to the validity of the charges exhibited againſt the earl, which were nothing leſs than a deſign to ſeize the king at Oxford, and compel him to ſubmit to the demands of parliament. The event, however, was celebrated with every demonſtration of joy.

In Scotland the exerciſe of arbitrary power cauſed real evils, capable almoſt of driving the nation into rebellion. The parliament, being entirely at the devotion of the duke York, paſſed an act, acknnowledging that the crown of Scotland had, by an inherent right, by the nature of the monarchy, and the fundamental laws of the kingdom, always deſcended to the heir of blood, and that the ſucceſſion could not be altered by any law or conſideration whatſoever. They alſo paſſed an act for impoſing on perſons in office a teſt oath, acknowledging the king's ſupremacy, renouncing the covenant, and eſpouſing the doctrine of paſſive obedience. The form of this ſtatute was ſo ill conceived and ſo ill digeſted, that the earl of Argyle, a nobleman of unſullied honour, refuſed to take the oath without an explanation, for which he was ſentenced to loſe his head; but he eluded the puniſhment by eſcaping out of Edinburgh caſtle, and retiring to Holland. The king having thus conquered all oppoſition, the duke repaired to London, and acquired ſuch an influence over his brother, that he was, in effect, king of England, Scotland and Ireland.

A. D. 1682. The mutual animoſity which had long ſubſiſted between the two parties was inflamed into rage and rancour, and the king, who ought to have conducted himſelf as the common parent of his people, openly eſpouſed a faction. The city of London had hitherto preſerved its independence, and the whig intereſt ſtill preponderated there. But the king found means to attach to his intereſt Sir John Moor, then lord mayor, and he named two perſons for ſheriffs, whom he knew would be dupes to the miniſtry; a perſon devoted to the king's will was alſo ſecured to ſucceed Moor as lord mayor.

Theſe ſeveral circumſtances ſo alarmed the earl of Shafteſbury, that he conſulted his ſafety by flying into Holland, though he had before urged in parliament the ruin of that country in thoſe remarkable words, "Delenda eſt Carthago." But he died in a ſhort time after his arrival in that country.

A. D. 1683. The authority of the crown now encreaſed moſt rapidly. The king violated the privileges of the city of London, and gave a ſtab to the conſtitution, by iſſuing a writ of quo warranto," that is, an enquiry into the validity of its charter, which it was pretended the corporation had forfeited in two inſtances. The firſt was, their impoſing a toll in order to defray the expences of rebuilding their markets; the other, the preſenting an addreſs to the king, containing a ſcandalous reflection upon his majeſty and his adminiſtration. The cauſe was tried in the court of king's bench, and the council for the city proved, that all corporations had a power to make bye laws; that ſubjects had a right to petition the king; that the reflection in the addreſs was not levelled at the king, but his evil counſellors who had adviſed him to prorogue the parliament; and inſiſted, that if the magiſtrates had committed any fault they were puniſhable as individuals; but their conduct could be no reaſon for annihilating the body corporate.

But notwithſtanding theſe concluſive arguments, the court gave judgment againſt the city, whoſe liberties were declared to be forfeited, and their charter at the king's diſpoſal. The citizens were amazed and diſmayed at this tranſaction, and a common council being aſſembled, the majority agreed to a tame ſubmiſſion, before the ſentence ſhould be recorded. A petition was accordingly preſented to that effect, and the king offered to reſtore the charter on the following conditions: that no mayor or officer of the commonalty ſhould exerciſe his authority, until his election ſhould be confirmed under the king's ſign manual; that if his majeſty ſhould diſapprove of their choice of a mayor and ſheriffs, they ſhould proceed to a new election, and provided the ſecond ſhould be diſagreeable to the king, he ſhould appoint perſons of his own nomination; that the mayor and court of aldermen ſhould be empowered to diveſt any alderman of his office, by the king's permiſſion; that ſhould any alderman, after his election, be deemed incapable by the court of aldermen, the ward ſhould be obliged to chuſe another; and ſhould he be diſapproved by the court, a third ſhould be elected by the court itſelf; and that the juſtices of the peace in London ſhould act only by virtue of the king's commiſſion. To theſe rigorous terms the common council ſubmitted, by a majority of eighteen voices. The fate of the city of London alarmed many other corporations, who, delivering up their charters to the king, were obliged to pay large ſums for the redemption of them.

This was truly the triumph of deſpotiſm. The Engliſh could not now be ſaid to be thoſe bold and reſolute people, who had ſo often made an arbitrary monarch monarch tremble on the throne, in defence of their ancient rights and privileges. They ſeem to have dwindled into daſtardly ſlaves, who bowed the neck to the yoke of oppreſſion, and offered the incenſe of adulation to thoſe who trampled on their deareſt rights.

Shafteſbury had before formed the ſcheme for an inſurrection; but in order to conduct the deſign with more prudence and ſecrecy, a council of ſix perſons was eſtabliſhed, conſiſting of the duke of Monmouth, the earl of Eſſex, the lords Ruſſel and Howard, Algernon Sidney, and John Hampden, grandſon to the famous patriot who oppoſed the tax of ſhip money in the reign of Charles I. Theſe correſponded with Argyle and the malecontents of Scotland, and ſtill determined to proſecute the ſcheme of inſurrection, though they were influenced by very different motives. Sidney was a republican; Howard ſought the gratification of his own ambition; Eſſex inclined to the principles of Sidney; Ruſſel and Hampden, attached to the conſtitution, were for excluding the duke of York and remedying all grievances, while Monmouth aſpired to the crown.

During theſe tranſactions, an inferior order of conſpirators abetted by colonels Rumſey and Walcot, entered into a conſpiracy to aſſaſſinate the king in his way from Newmarket. Rumbald, one of their number, poſſeſſed a farm on that road, called the Rye-houſe, whence the conſpiracy was denominated the Rye-houſe plot. They agreed to ſtop the king's coach, by overturning a cart in the highway at this place, and to ſhoot him from the hedges. It was likewiſe determined, that his guards ſhould be engaged by forty horſe under Walcot, While Rumſey ſhould perpetrate the aſſaſſination. In the midſt of their deliberations, the palace in which the king reſided at Newmarket taking fire, he quitted the place ſooner than he intended, ſo that their intentions of deſtroying him on his return to London were fruſtrated.

The plot was at length revealed by one Keeling, in order to ſecure a pardon for himſelf. Rumſey, and Weſt, a lawyer, no ſooner underſtood that this man had informed againſt them, than they agreed to ſave their lives by turning king's evidences, and ſurrendered themſelves accordingly. Warrants were now iſſued againſt the chiefs of the conſpiracy. Monmouth concealed himſelf, the lords Ruſſel, Grey and Howard were arreſted. The laſt, a man diveſted of every principle of honour, purchaſed his pardon by betraying his accomplices. On his depoſition, they ſeized the earl of Eſſex, the famous Algernon Sidney, together with Hampden, a name revered for the ſacred ſtamp of liberty. Three criminals of lower rank were firſt executed. It appeared difficult to bring the charge home to the lords, as, according to the ſtatute of Mary, the two principal kinds of treaſon compaſſing and intending the king's death, and the actual levying war againſt him muſt be proved by the concurring teſtimony of two witneſſes, to ſome overt act tending to thoſe purpoſes. However, through the refinement of the lawyers, Ruſſel, the idol of the people, was condemned. Too honeſt a man to deny that he was engaged in the ſcheme of an inſurrection, he only inſiſted that he had entertained no deſign againſt the life of the king. Several applications were made for his pardon. His father, the old earl of Bedford, offered to purchaſe his pardon of the dutcheſs of Portſmouth, with the ſum of one hundred thouſand pounds; Ruſſel's lady, daughter of the earl of Southampton, threw herſelf at the king's feet, in a flood of tears, and pleaded the merit of her father in behalf of her huſband. But Charles was inexorable; he dreaded the principles and popularity of lord Ruſſel, who had denied that the king had authority to remit the barbarous part of the ſentence againſt lord Stafford, and oppoſed him in ſuch a manner in the late parliaments, as to incur the king's moſt inveterate hatred.

Lord Cavendiſh, the intimate friend of Ruſſel, offered to effect his eſcape by exchanging apparel with him, and remaining a priſoner in his room, the duke of Monmouth ſent a meſſage to him, importing, that he would ſurrender himſelf, if he thought that ſtep would contribute to his ſafety. But Ruſſel nobly declined theſe generous offers, and reſigned himſelf to his fate with admirable fortitude. His lady, that he might not be ſhocked in his laſt moments, ſummoned aſtoniſhing reſolution, and parted from him without ſhedding a tear. "Now, ſaid he, the bitterneſs of death is paſt," and afterwards behaved with the utmoſt ſerenity. Immediately before he was conveyed to the ſcaffold, which was erected in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields, he wound up his watch, ſaying with a ſmile. "Now "I have done with time, and muſt henceforth "think of eternity," and died without betraying the leaſt weakneſs.

Algernon Sidney, ſon to the earl of Leiceſter, was next brought to trial. His great genius, undaunted courage, and ardent paſſion for liberty, had occaſioned his acting a diſtinguiſhed part among the republicans. He had oppoſed the reſtoration of the monarchy with as much warmth as the uſurpation of Cromwell. The only witneſs who depoſed againſt him was the treacherous Howard, but as the law required two witneſſes, the council had recourſe to a ſtrange expedient to ſupply this defect. This produced ſome diſcourſes upon government found among his papers, and affirmed, that theſe were equivalent to another evidence. They were written in defence of liberty, maintaining the original contract upon which government was founded, and from which all power was derived; the lawfulneſs of reſiſting tyrannical and oppreſſive meaſures, and the maxim of preferring a republic to the government of an individual. There was no proof that the papers were his hand writing, or that he had ever ſhewn them to any perſon, nor did they contain any thing treaſonable; and in his defence he inſiſted, that the law ſtrictly required two living witneſſes to ſupport a charge of treaſon. All the arguments, though urged by the priſoner with great force of reaſoning, had no influence; the violent and inhuman Jefferies was now chief juſtice, and by his direction, a partial jury was prevailed on to give a verdict againſt Sidney, who was convicted, and being condemned, gloried in dying for the cauſe in which he had been engaged from his earlieſt youth.

Several more of the conſpirators were executed and others heavily fined. Hampden, againſt whom Howard was the ſole evidence, was indicted for a miſdemeanor, and caſt for forty thouſand pounds. Sir Thomas Armſtrong had been outlawed for the conſpiracy, and fled to Holland, where he was betrayed into the hands of Chudleigh, the Engliſh miniſter, who ſent him over to England. He demanded a fair trial, to which he was entitled by the ſtatute, as the time preſcribed for his ſurrendering himſelf was not yet elapſed. Jefferies declared he was not entitled to the benefit of

of the ſtatute, becauſe he did not ſurrender voluntarily; he inſulted him from the bench, and condemned him to die the death of a traitor, which he bore with the reſolution and ſpirit of a man.

The earl of Eſſex was found dead in priſon, with his throat cut. A report had been ſpread that he had been murdered by order of the king and his brother: it appeared, however, certain, that he had been guilty of ſuicide. We are told indeed by Dr. Burnet, the earl had occaſionally vindicated that criminal practice.

On the firſt diſcovery of the conſpiracy, Monmouth had abſconded, nor could the court gain any intelligence of him. He correſponded with the earl of Argyle, through whoſe means he hoped to be joined by the covenanters in Scotland, who were ſo enſlaved by the government, that any hazard was preferable to that ſervility under which they groaned. Argyle, who then reſided in Holland, undertook to ſupply the covenanters with arms, if the duke of Monmouth would remit eight thouſand pounds for that purpoſe. Bailie of Jerviſwood, a man of talents and integrity, conducted this affair, and was apprehended among the perſons concerned in the conſpiracy. As the miniſtry could find no evidence againſt him, they inſiſted upon his purging himſelf by oath, of all ſuſpicion of having been concerned in the Rye-houſe plot, otherwiſe they would hold him guilty. To this he objected as inhuman and tyrannical, and refuſed to anſwer their queſtions upon oath, whereon he was committed to priſon, and amerſed in the ſum of ſix thouſand pounds.

But ſuch was the rancour of their minds, that, at the inſtigation of the duke of York, they employed the moſt unjuſt and ſcandalous means to gratify their revenge. At length the earl of Tarras, who had likewiſe been impriſoned on account of the conſpiracy, and Murray of Philliphaugh, were induced, by threats, to ſwear that Bailie had tampered with them to raiſe a rebellion, by which this unhappy man was convicted of treaſon; and as he was already reduced to the brink of the grave, by hard uſage and diſtemper, the judge, fearing that death would diſappoint the duke's inhuman deſires, ordered him to be executed immediately after condemnation; and he bore his inhuman ſentence with all the fortitude of conſcious virtue.

Charles, having acquired ſome popularity, was deſirous of encreaſing it; and, conſcious that the dread of popery was the moſt predominant paſſion in the minds of the people, he judged it proper to marry his neice the lady Anne to prince George, brother to the king of Denmark, and a proteſtant. In order to leſſen the power of the duke of York, which was now become exorbitant, the earl of Halifax, having diſcovered the place of Monmouth's retreat, prevailed upon him to ſend two ſubmiſſive letters to the king, which awakened the paternal affection of Charles, who permitted him to appear at court, endeavoured to reconcile him to the duke of York, and ſummoned an extraordinary council, to acquaint the members of Monmouth's ſincere penitence.

But the duke in a few days repented of the ſtep he had taken, and finding that he was intirely diſgraced with his party, as his confeſſion was now made public, he reſolved at all events to retrieve his character, and entreated the king to return him the paper. Charles, provoked at this duplicity of behaviour, baniſhed him from his preſence, and afterwards ordered him to quit the kingdom. He withdrew into Holland, where he was cordially received by the prince of Orange, and afterwards correſponded with his father; but the duke of York was never acquainted with the ſecrets of the correſpondence.

A. D. 1684. But the king, amidſt the pleaſing hopes and expectations which were now preſented to his view, was in reality neither happy nor ſatisfied. Perhaps the violent and imprudent councils of his brother were the principal ſource of his diſquietude, as indeed may be gathered from this ſtriking addreſs to him, on his urging the purſuit of vehement meaſures, "Brother, I am too old to "go again on my travels, you may, if you pleaſe."

A. D. 1685. It is ſuppoſed he was deliberating on ſending him away, and rendering his government more conformable to the genius and conſtitution of the nation. But whatever may have been his deſigns they were prevented by his death, which happened on the ſixth day of February, in the fifty-fifth year of his age, and twenty-fifth of his reign, and was occaſioned by a kind of apoplectic fit, after which he languiſhed only a few days.

Previous to his diſſolution he received the euchariſt, and paſſed through the other ceremonies according to the rites of the Romiſh church, though, if a judgment may be formed from his life, he ſeems to have been both in principle and conduct an abſolute deiſt.

As exhaulted characters are held up to public view in the moſt eminent light, their vices as well as virtues are conſequently rendered thereby more conſpicuous and glaring. In deſcribing the character of king Charles II. moſt writers have been guided by their reſpective religions and political principles, and have therefore as a man repreſented him accordingly. Indolence and the love of pleaſure ſeem to have been his ruling paſſions, and diverted his mind from nobler and more worthy purſuits. He was not deſtitute of knowledge in ſpeculation, though he evinced very little in practice; hence aroſe that pointed cenſure, "that he "never ſaid a fooliſh thing, nor ever did a wiſe "one." That he poſſeſſed that prejudice in favour of deſpotiſm, which ſeemed to have been congenial with his race, is evident from his general ſyſtem of government, though the dread of popular reſentment frequently cauſed him to relax in his efforts to eſtabliſh arbitrary power.

In private life he was affable, witty, and convivial, and admirably adapted to enjoy the hours as they paſſed. But as in the choice and purſuit of his pleaſures, he was neither governed by reaſon nor confined by moderation, he became enſlaved by his paſſions, and frequently derogated from the man as well as the prince.

Remarkable Occurrences during the reign of Charles II.

A. D.

1660 General poſt-office in London firſt opened for all parts of the world.
Perukes firſt worn in England.

1662 A tax of two pence per annum on every fire-place or hearth throughout England.

1663 Fire-engines to raiſe water invented.
News papers firſt printed in England.

1665 The royal Gazette firſt publiſhed at Oxford (the court being then kept in that city) on November 7. On the removal of the court to London the title was changed to the London Gazette, which has ever ſince been publiſhed twice a week, namely, Tueſdays and Saturdays.
Signals at ſea firſt uſed by the Engliſh.

1666 Tea firſt brought into England by lord Oſſory from Holland, and being admired by perſons of rank, it was imported from thence, and generally ſold for ſixty ſhillings a pound, till our Eaſt India Company took up the trade.
1670 Muſlins from India firſt worn in England.
1676 Callico-printing invented and firſt practiſed in England.
1680 Votes of the houſe of commons firſt publiſhed.
Buckles firſt invented and worn in England.
1683 Penny-poſt office inſtituted.

The reign of Charles II. is celebrated for the flouriſhing ſtate of the Belles letters in general, and many eminent philoſophers, poets, ſtateſmen, and divines, amongſt whom were Newton, Boyle, Butler, Dryden, Otway, Stillingfleet, Lloyd, and Tillotſon, names which will be perpetuated to the lateſt poſterity.

CHAP. II.

JAMES II.

Acceſſion of James II. Proclamation for all people in office to hold their reſpective poſts. Parliament devoted to the king. Puniſhment of Oates. Rebellion and death of the duke of Monmouth. Indiſcreet zeal for the popiſh religion. Cruelties of Kirk and his clan. The teſt act diſpenſed with. Trial of the biſhops. Policy of the prince of Orange. His ſecret preparations. James rejects the offer of the French king. The prince of Orange ſails from Helvoet-ſluice with a powerful armament. Arrives in Torbay. Avows his intentions. Multitudes flock to his ſtandard. Forlorn ſituation of the king. His abdication of the throne and retirement to France.

THE love of novelty is a very prevalent paſſion with mankind in general, and perhaps it is the moſt cogent reaſon that can poſſibly be ſuggeſted, for that almoſt univerſal approbation with which potentates aſcend the thrones of their progenitors. This, if we may rely on the record of hiſtorians, was the caſe reſpecting the acceſſion of James II. though the torrent of popular odium ran ſo ſtrongly againſt him during the greater part of the late reign, and at the demiſe of the late king his brother. No ſooner had Charles paid the debt of nature than James was proclaimed, amidſt the univerſal acclamations of the people.

A proclamation was immediately publiſhed, by which all thoſe who held offices under the late king were continued in their reſpective poſts; the popularity of which ſtep in a new ſovereign needs no comment. Rocheſter was lord high treaſurer, his brother Clarendon keeper of the privy ſeal, and Hallifax preſident of the council. James and his queen were crowned on the twenty-third day of April, when the populace obſerved, that the royal diadem was too large for his head, and ſhook from ſide to ſide, a circumſtance from which they deduced a bad omen.

A little before the meeting of the parliament, Oates was tried in the court of king's bench, upon two indictments of perjury, and convicted on the evidence of above twenty witneſſes. He was ſentenced to pay a fine of two thouſand marks, to be publickly wipped twice in three days, to ſtand in the pillory once every year, and be impriſoned for life. He bore his fate with great reſolution, proteſting his innocence in the moſt ſolemn manner: he was cheriſhed and ſupported by a numerous party, and in the following reign was rewarded with a penſion of four hundred pounds, and his liberty.

The duke of Monmouth, ever dear to the people, undertook to dethrone his uncle, at the very time when his throne appeared the moſt firmly eſtabliſhed. Intelligence, however, being received of the deſign, the parliament preſented an addreſs to the king, aſſuring him of their zeal and aſſiſtance in quelling this rebellion, granted him a ſubſidy of four hundred thouſand pounds, and then adjourned.

Monmouth, it is ſaid, would willingly have delayed making any attempts for the preſent, but ſuch was the impatience of his followers, and ſuch the ardour of the duke of Argyle, who ſet out from Scotland a few days before him, that all his objections were over-ruled, and this unfortunate nobleman was precipitated into deſtruction.

On his firſt landing he publiſhed a kind of manifeſto, accuſing the duke of York as the author of the fire of London, the French alliance, the two Dutch wars, the murder of Godfrey, the aſſaſſination of Eſſex, the diſſolution of parliaments, the ſubordination of juries, and the moſt flagrant acts of tyranny and oppreſſion, and invited the people to join him in his endeavours to redreſs the grievances of the nation.

But theſe declarations produced very little effect in his favour, ſo that his army conſiſted chiefly of a rude undiſciplined rabble. With theſe he marched from Lyme to Taunton, where his army through conſiderable reinforcements amounting to about ſix thouſand men, he aſſumed the title of king and was proclaimed in form. He then marched to Bridgewater, where he was likewiſe well received, and from thence advanced to the neighbourhood of Briſtol, the inhabitants of which were deterred from joining him by the preſence of the duke of Beaufort, their governor, or they would probably have declared in his favour.

In conſequence of theſe proceedings of the duke of Monmouth, James ordered ſix regiments of Britiſh troops to be called over from Holland, the army was greatly augmented, and regular troops to the amount of three thouſand men were diſpatched under the command of Feverſham and Churchill, in order to check the progreſs of the rebels. Monmouth, ſenſible of the temerity of his project, and that he muſt either conquer or periſh, ſet forward to meet the king's forces hoping to meet them unprepared for an attack.

But the royaliſts being drawn up in excellent order at Sedgley-moor, near Bridgewater, the battle began at day break, and after a conteſt of three hours, hours, the rebels fled, and were purſued with great ſlaughter. Monmouth retired from the field of battle with about fifty horſe; but theſe being ſoon diſperſed, he rode towards Dorſetſhire, until his horſe could carry him no farther. He then alighted, and exchanging dreſs with a ſhepherd, fled on foot, attended by a German count, who had accompanied him from Holland. Being quite ſpent with hunger and fatigue, they laid down in a ditch, and covered themſelves with fern. The ſhepherd being found in his cloaths, was brought to lord Lumley, who diſcovered the duke in his hiding place, from whence he was conducted to London and lodged in the Tower.

On his arrival he wrote to the king humbly imploring his pardon, and James finding ſuch impreſſions of deſpondency on the unhappy priſoner, ordered him into his preſence, in hopes of drawing from him a diſcovery of his confederates; but Monmouth, however deſirous of life, would not condeſcend to purchaſe it by an action attended with ſo much infamy. Finding all his intreaties vain, he aſſumed courage from deſpair, and prepaired for death, with a ſpirit becoming his rank and character. This favourite of the people was conducted to the ſcaffold amidſt the tears and lamentations of the ſpectators. When he laid his head on the block, and made the ſignal, the executioner ſtruck three times ineffectually, and then threw down the ax; but the ſheriff compelled him to reſume the work, which, with three other ſtrokes, he finiſhed.

Thus fell James duke of Monmouth, whoſe character in many reſpects was truly amiable. He was brave, generous, and ſincere, but too open to flattery and too warmly addicted to pleaſure. At length his ambition prompted him to meaſures, which in the end coſt him his life.

But the victory obtained by the royaliſts on this occaſion was ſullied by the cruelty of their officers. The earl of Feverſham ordered twenty of the rebels to be hanged immediately after the action. Nineteen were put to death in the ſame manner at Bridgewater, by colonel Kirke, an inhuman wretch, who had ſerved at Tangier. He continued to execute others occaſionally for his diverſion, with ſuch circumſtances of wanton barbarity, as are ſhocking to human nature: indeed, he carried his cruelty to ſuch a ſavage exceſs, as to make a ſport of the executions of his victims. One execution was attended with ſuch circumſtances of perfidy, as well as barbarity, that its equal cannot, perhaps, be found in the hiſtory of any other country. A young maid, frantic with grief, repaired to the colonel, to implore pardon for her brother. She threw herſelf at his feet, armed with all the charms that beauty and innocence, bathed in tears, could poſſibly beſtow. Fired with luſt, rather than ſoftened by love and clemency, he promiſed to grant her requeſt, provided ſhe, on her part, would condeſcend to ſatisfy his deſires. The ſtruggle was ſevere between virtue and her affection for her brother. The latter at laſt prevailed, and ſhe ſubmitted to the conditions; but after paſſing the night with this inhuman ruffian, he ſhewed her next morning, from the window of the apartment, the darling object for whom ſhe had ſacrificed her virtue, hanging on the ſign-poſt of an inn, which was oppoſite to the houſe where he reſided. The ſhock was too great for human nature: rage, deſpair, and indignation, took at once poſſeſſion of her mind, and deprived her for ever of her ſenſes.

Jefferies, the chief juſtice, ſtill more inhuman, becauſe his profeſſion ought to have rendered him more merciful, now proceeded to ſcenes of deſtruction with more than brutal ſatisfaction. At Dorcheſter he ordered no leſs than eighty perſons to be executed immediately after conviction. He proſecuted the ſame work of carnage at Exeter and Taunton. Two hundred and fifty perſons are ſaid to have been ſacrificed, in this circuit, under colour of juſtice. Jefferies himſelf made it his boaſt, that he had hanged more men than all the judges in England, ſince the time of William the conqueror. He no ſooner returned from his circuit, which the king was wont to term his campaign, than he was created a peer, and in a ſhort time advanced to the dignity of chancellor; a circumſtance that gives us a ſufficient idea of the diſpoſition of James, and accounts, in ſome meaſure, for the ſhortneſs of his reign.

The bigotted attachment of James to the popiſh religion appeared in the moſt glaring colours, and ſuch were the inſtances of his cruelties and deſpotiſm, that the Spaniſh ambaſſador Ronquillo, conſidering the tranquillity of England as very neceſſary for the ſupport of Spain, took the liberty to remonſtrate on the ſubject, and adviſed the king not to follow too implicitly, the dangerous councils of his prieſts. "What! ſaid James, "is not the king of Spain wont to conſult with "his confeſſors?" "Yes, replied the ambaſſador, "and that is the very reaſon why our affairs are ſo "unproſperous." However, at all events, James reſolved to proceed in his enterprize, previous to which he thought it neceſſary to render himſelf abſolute, and then he ſhould be able to employ the moſt effectual means to obtain the much deſired end.

To carry the point in Ireland, the duke of Ormond was turned out of his poſt of lord-lieutenant, and though the primate and lord Garnard, proteſtants, ſtill enjoyed the office of juſtices, the whole power was veſted in the hands of Talbot the general, (ſoon after advanced to the earldom of Tyrconnel) a man who, from the bigotry of his prejudices, was actuated with the moſt furious zeal for the catholic cauſe, which he ſoon evinced, by placing catholics in the ſeveral offices, in the room of proteſtants whom he turned out.

Clarendon, who was appointed to ſucceed the duke of Ormond in the viceroyſhip, ſoon perceived the declenſion of his influence, as he was too honeſt a man to conciliate the favour of his ſovereign by changing his religion; in fact, he poſſeſſed at length but the ſhadow of authority, of which he was ſoon deprived, on the appointment of Tyrconnel, a fit tool for the accompliſhment of his maſter's deſigns.

Partiality for the catholics appeared in every department of church and ſtate. Tyranny and oppreſſion were exerciſed in every quarter of that kingdom, inſomuch that a renewal of the ancient maſſacre was dreaded, and many, alarmed at the imminent dangers to which they were expoſed, abandoned the kingdom. The more candid and ſenſible part of the catholics themſelves were diſſatisfied with theſe violent meaſures, and could eaſily foreſee the conſequences. Influenced by the advice of the queen and his confeſſor, Peters, a jeſuit, (whom he made a privy councellor) James paid no regard to the opinions of his ſubjects.

A. D. 1686. The arbitrary meaſures of the king ſtruck the whole nation with terror, and the proteſtants were alarmed more than ever with the apprehenſions of the eſtabliſhment of popery. To add add to their fears, James erected a new eccleſiaſtical commiſſion court, compoſed of ſeven members, ſecular as well as clerical; among the former were lord chancellor Jefferies, and the earls of Rocheſter and Sunderland. He alſo ſent a circular letter to the biſhops, ordering them to prohibit their inferior clergy from preaching upon points of controverſy. But the injunction was very little regarded by the proteſtant divines, who expoſed the abſurdities and cruelties of the catholic communion with ſuch learning, energy, and candour, as operated powerfully on the conviction of the public, and redounded to their immortal honour. On this occaſion Tillotſon, Stillingfleet, Teniſon, Patrick and Sherlock, greatly diſtinguiſhed themſelves.

Notwithſtanding the univerſal horror that had been ſpread throughout the kingdom, and the complaints of an aggrieved people, James ordered an army of fifteen thouſand men to be encamped on Hounſlow-heath in the time of profound peace. James became daily more ambitious of making converts. Sunderland ſacrificed his religion to his intereſt, though he would not make a public abjuration. The earl of Rocheſter conſented to a conference with ſome popiſh prieſts, but declaring himſelf diſſatisfied with their arguments, and refuſing to change, he was deprived of the office of treaſurer, but gratified with a conſiderable penſion. The king alſo deprived the earl of Clarendon of the privy ſeal, which was given to lord Arundel.

A. D. 1687. To veil, for a time, his reſolution of aboliſhing the proteſtant religion, James gave repeated promiſes of maintaining it, a circumſtance which afforded the higheſt ſatisfaction to the diſſenters in general, though the moſt diſcerning part of them ſaw through the artful diſguiſe. Nor was it long before the maſk was thrown off; for the king diſpatched the earl of Caſtlemain ambaſſador extraordinary to Rome, in order to make his ſubmiſſion to the pope, and to reconcile his three kingdoms to the holy ſee, from which (he ſaid) they had unhappily fallen by hereſy. Never did any man ſent on ſo important an errand meet with ſo many affronts as Caſtlemain. Pope Innocent, who was at variance with the French king, looked upon James as the partizan. Though he granted audience to the ambaſſador, he always pretended to be ſeized with a fit of coughing, which interrupted the earl's ſpeech, and obliged him to retire. At length he complained loudly of this contemptuous treatment, and threatened to return. The pope, with his uſual indifference, adviſed him to travel in the cool of the morning, and to repoſe himſelf during the heat of the day, otherwiſe the climate of Italy might prove dangerous to his health.

Nothing now ſeemed wanting to the completion of the king's deſigns, but the admiſſion of the catholics into the univerſities. Accordingly, father Francis, a Benedictine monk, was recommended by the royal mandate to the univerſity of Cambridge, for the degree of Maſter of Arts. They all perceived the dangerous conſequences of ſuch an admiſſion, and preſented a petition to the king, beſeeching him to recall his mandate. Their petition was diſregarded, and the deputies were ſummoned before the eccleſiaſtical commiſſion to anſwer for this act of diſobedience. The king ſuſpended the vice chancellor, but it had no effect, as a man of ſpirit was choſen by the univerſity to ſucceed to that office.

A ſecond attempt was made at Oxford, and proſecuted with more inflexible obſtinacy. The place of preſident of Magdalen College being vacant, the king ſent a mandate in favour of one Farmer, a new convert, whoſe character lay under imputation. The fellows of the college petitioned the king to revoke his mandate, but before they received an anſwer, the day arrived on which, by their ſtatutes, they were bound to proceed to an election. They choſe Dr. Hough a man of learning, integrity, and reſolution. The king was incenſed at their diſobedience, and the vice-preſident and fellows were ſummoned before the eccleſiaſtical court, where they proved Farmer in every ſhape unqualified for the office.

A new mandate was therefore iſſued in favour of Parker, lately created biſhop of Oxford; but as he was as diſſolute a character as the former, the fellows refuſed to comply with this injunction, in conſequence of which, the preſident, and all the fellows, (except two who aſſented,) were expelled the college. Parker was put in poſſeſſion of the office, and the places of the deprived fellows were filled by papiſts. This outrage was of itſelf ſufficient to convince the nation of the king's arbitrary deſigns; nor can any thing be imagined more illegal and unjuſt than theſe proceedings.

James, ſenſible of the popularity acquired by the prince of Orange in England, and that the princeſs his conſort was deemed preſumptive heireſs to the crown, was very deſirous of knowing their opinions concerning the penal laws, perſuaded if he could obtain their concurrence to a repeal it would have great weight with the nation. To effect this deſign, he employed one Stuart, who was acquainted with Fagel the penſionary, to aſſure this counſellor in a letter, that the intereſt of England, as well as that of the prince, required the abolition of the teſt and penal laws. Fagel, by direction of the prince, wrote an anſwer, importing, that the prince and princeſs would willingly agree to indulge the catholics with liberty of conſcience, and ardently wiſhed, that the proteſtant diſſenters were allowed the free exerciſe of their religion; but they could never conſent to the abolition of the teſt and penal laws, which were enacted to defend the proteſtant religion, by excluding the catholics from parliament, and from public employments. The publication of this letter produced very different effects on the king and the nation: to the former it gave the ſevereſt mortification, but to the latter it afforded the higheſt ſatisfaction.

A ſhort time after this, a proclamation was publiſhed, declaring the pregnancy of the queen, and ordaining a day of thankſgiving on the occaſion. Addreſſes of congratulation were immediately wafted to the king from all corners of the iſland, as if the whole nation had thought the birth of a prince would be a public bleſſing; but theſe addreſſes were procured by the emiſſaries of the miniſtry. All the proteſtants in the kingdom were alarmed, as at the eve of a terrible calamity. A great number fondly believed that the queen's pregnancy was counterfeit, as ſhe of late years had been in an ill ſtate of health, and the belief that the whole was an impoſture ſpread almoſt univerſally among the proteſtants.

James, however, deſirous of confirming his deſpotic power, and inflamed by frantic zeal, ſeemed determined no longer to keep any meaſures with his ſubjects; and in order to ſhew his contempt for the malecontents, publiſhed a ſecond declaration of indulgence, granting liberty of conſcience, and aboliſhing the penal laws. To this he ſubjoined an order, commanding the biſhops to cauſe it to be read in all the churches of their reſpective dioceſes. The prelates no ſooner received theſe orders, than they repaired to Lambeth, in order to conſult with the primate. Having deliberated on the ſubject, they unanimouſly agreed, that they could not obey the king's command, without betraying their conſciences, and their duty to God and their country. They then drew up and ſigned a petition to the king, repreſenting, that, though they were extremely deſirous in any lawful way of complying with his majeſty's royal will and pleaſure, yet, as the declaration of indulgence was founded on an authority formerly declared illegal by parliament, they could not in prudence, honour, or conſcience, conſent to be acceſſary to diſtributing it through the kingdom, and therefore beſought his majeſty to free them from the neceſſity of reading the declaration in public. Determined on the moſt rigorous proceedings againſt the biſhops, James commanded that they ſhould be brought before the council, where, being aſked if they owned the petition, the archbiſhop acknowledged it was written by his own hand, and the reſt declared that they had ſigned it. The chancellor then demanded, if they would give bail to appear in the court of king's bench, and anſwer the charge which ſhould be exhibited againſt them; but they refuſed to comply, alledging their privilege in quality of peers, which they were bound to maintain, as well as the intereſts of the church, according to the oath they had taken to oppoſe all innovations in church and ſtate.

Jeffries, enraged at this anſwer, told them that unleſs they inſtantly retracted their aſſertions, and withdrew their petition, he would ſend them to the Tower, upon which they ſaid, that "having acted agreeable to the laws of their country, the dictates of their conſciences, and the ſacred office with which they were inveſted, they depended on the protection of the king of kings." An order was then drawn for their commitment to the Tower, and directions were given to the crown lawyers to proſecute them for a ſeditious libel.

An alarm being ſpread that the biſhops were to be conveyed by water to the Tower, the ſhore was lined with innumerable ſpectators deploring the fate of thoſe reverend prelates, and earneſtly craving their bleſſings. The biſhops increaſed the general favour by an humble and ſubmiſſive deportment; and conjured the people to fear God, honour the king, and maintain their loyalty. The reſpect even of the ſoldiers who conducted them to priſon, furniſhed a ſtriking proof of the ſentiments of the public.

A. D. 1688. During the confinement of the biſhops, the queen was delivered of a ſon, who was baptized by the name of James. The catholics rejoiced at the event, but the people in general were poſſeſſed with a notion, that the child was altogether ſuppoſitious in order to cut off the princeſs of Orange from the ſucceſſion. In ſhort, the birth of this child, which ſhould have proved the bond of union between the king and his ſubjects, had the very contrary effect, both parties, proteſtants and catholics, labouring under ſuch violent prejudices at this time; it is not to be wondered, if the latter ſtrenuouſly aſſerted the legitimacy of the child, and the former inſiſted that the whole tranſaction was an impoſture.

On the 29th of June came on the trial of the biſhops in Weſtminſter-hall, which was filled with an infinite concourſe of people, amongſt whom were many peers, and numbers of the firſt perſonages in the kingdom. The council for the biſhops defended their cauſe with as much ſucceſs as freedom; and the jury, by pronouncing them "Not guilty," excited an univerſal tranſport. The news of the acquittal of the biſhops no ſooner reached Hounſlow, than the ſoldiers expreſſed their joy by the loudeſt acclamations. James, who was then at dinner with lord Feverſham in his tent, ſent out an officer to enquire into the cauſe of this exultation, and when the officer returned and told him, it was nothing but the rejoicing of the ſoldiers at the acquittal of the biſhops, "Call you that nothing! (ſaid the "king) but ſo much the worſe for them." Having fixed his chief dependance on the army, he determined to put their attachment to an infallible teſt, and with that view ordered lord Litchfield's regiment to be drawn up in his preſence, and commanded all ſuch officers and ſoldiers as would not contribute to the repeal of the teſt and penal laws to lay down their muſquets; when he was equally ſurprized, and incenſed, to ſee the whole battalion ground their arms, except two officers and a very few ſoldiers. After ſome pauſe, he commanded them to take up their arms, telling them with a ſullen air, "that for the future he would not do "them the honour to aſk their advice."

From a variety of concurring circumſtances, the nation was fully convinced that the king was determined to ſubvert the conſtitution both in church and ſtate, ſo that many perſons of eminence and intereſt entered into a ſtrict union for the ſecurity of the kingdom, and inviting over the prince of Orange to head the country party againſt him. Admiral Hubert, who was beloved by the ſeamen, reſigned his commiſſion, and retired to the Hague, where he aſſured the prince of a general diſaffection in the navy. This aſſurance was confirmed by admiral Ruſſel, who paſſed frequently between England and Holland, and ſerved to keep up a conſtant correſpondence between the prince and the Engliſh proteſtants. Henry Sidney, brother to Algernon, went over to the Hague, under pretext of going to the Spa for his health, and had frequent conferences with the Stadtholder. Zuyleſtein, who had been ſent over to congratulate the king on the birth of his ſon, brought back to the prince a formal invitation from moſt of the great men in England. The biſhop of London, the duke of Norfolk, the marquis of Halliſax, the earls of Dorſet, Devonſhire, Nottingham, and Danby; the lords Lovelace, Delamere, Paulet, and Eland, many gentlemen of intereſt, and a great number of ſubſtantial citizens, joined in the application to the prince, engaging with their lives and fortunes to ſupport him in his endeavours to recover their civil and religious liberties.

The prince of Orange conducted the neceſſary preparations with wonderful prudence and policy, and concealed their intention under ſuch pretexts, as eluded for a time the ſuſpicion of the Engliſh court. But the deſtination of a powerful armament could not long remain ſecret. The French ambaſſador acquainted his maſter therewith, who tranſmitted the information to James, and at the ſame time made him a moſt important offer; which the latter, vainly relying on the nature of his own authority, could not be perſuaded to accept. Mean while he ordered his ambaſſador in Holland to preſent a memorial to the ſtates, deſiring to know the deſtination of their extraordinary armament.

He received for anſwer, that they only imitated the king of England, who had lately equipped a powerful fleet, and aſſembled a numerous army without explaining his intentions; and they in their turn deſired to know the nature of his alliance with the king of France

Alarmed at this extraordinary reply, James directed his fleet to be manned and prepared for ſea, ſet on foot new levies, and ſent for ſome regiments from Ireland; appointed the earl of Feverſham general of the land forces, and conferred the command of the navy on the earl of Dartmouth. Whilſt the king was diſtracted with fears and apprehenſions, intelligence arrived from the ambaſſador, that the Hague was filled with Engliſh ſubjects, waiting to embark in the prince's expedition. In this emergency, James aſſembled the biſhops of Wincheſter, Chicheſter, Rocheſter, Peterborough, Ely, Bath, and Wells. The prelates having laid the caſe before the primate, and held ſuch conſultation together as ſo weighty a matter required, attended his majeſty at Whitehall with the reſult of their deliberations. They counſelled the king to put the government of the different counties into the hands of perſons diſtinguiſhed by their birth, and qualified by the laws of the land, to aboliſh the eccleſiaſtical court, to recall all the diſpenſations, by virtue of which, diſqualified perſons had been admitted into civil and eccleſiaſtical employments; to revoke all the licences, by which catholics were permitted to open public ſchools; to deſiſt from all pretenſions to a diſpenſing power, or refer it entirely to the deciſion of parliament; to forbid the four apoſtolic vicars to continue invading the eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction, which belonged to the Engliſh church; to fill up the vacant biſhoprics with men of learning and piety; to reſtore the charters which had been taken from corporations; to aſſemble a free parliament; and conſent that the biſhops ſhould offer ſuch reaſons as might reconcile his majeſty to the church of England.

By theſe very popular meaſures, James, at this alarming criſis, endeavoured, though in vain, to regain the good-will and affections of his ſubjects.

During theſe tranſactions, the prince of Orange applied himſelf with the greateſt aſſiduity to compleat his armament; which finiſhed, he publiſhed a manifeſto, explaining the motives of his expedition. At the ſame time, the ſtates-general publiſhed the reaſons, which had induced them to lend their ſhips and men to the prince of Orange; namely, the invitation which that prince had received from the nobility, gentry, and clergy of England; and the apprehenſion that king James, after he ſhould have enſlaved his own kingdom, would join the French monarch to root out the proteſtant religion, and conquer the United Provinces.

The prince's meaſures were ſo well concerted, that in three days above four hundred tranſports were engaged; the forces quickly embarked and fell down the rivers and canals from Nimeguen; the artillery, arms, ſtores, and horſes, were put on board, and on the twenty-firſt of October, the prince ſet ſail from Helvoetſluice, with a fleet of near five hundred veſſels, and an army of above fourteen thouſand men. Admiral Hubert led the van, the rear was conducted by Evertzen, and the prince commanded in the center, with a flag diſplaying his own arms, circumſcribed, "The proteſtant religion, and the liberties of England. "Underneath, Je maintien drai, i. e. "I will "maintain;" the device that diſtinguiſhed the houſe of Naſſau. The fleet had ſailed but a few leagues when the wind ſuddenly ſhifted to the weſt, and blew a hurricane which laſted two whole days, and ſcattered the ſhips in ſuch a manner, that a whole week elapſed before they could re-aſſemble at their rendezvous. They had ſuſtained very little damage; but, with a view to lull James in ſecurity, orders were given to fill the Dutch gazettes with exaggerated accounts of their loſs, and declarations that the expedition muſt be poſtponed till the enſuing ſpring.

But this loſs being ſoon repaired, the fleet put to ſea again, and ſtood away with a fair wind towards the weſt of England. The prince, after a very proſperous voyage, landed his army ſafely in Torbay on the fifth of November, the anniverſary of the gunpowder treaſon. The Dutch army then advanced to Exeter, where the prince's declaration was inſtantly publiſhed. For ſeveral days not a ſingle perſon joined the prince, deterred from ſo doing by the remembrance of the numerous executions that ſucceeded Monmouth's rebellion. In proceſs of time, however, a croud of Engliſh noblemen and officers haſtened to join him, and there appeared daily inconteſtible proofs of his ſubjects averſion to the principles which had governed the unfortunate James II. as well as his immediate predeceſſors.

Diſtracted and perplexed at theſe alarming events, the king determined to command his army in perſon, and after recommending the city of London to the care of the lord mayor, he ſet out for Saliſbury, where he arrived on the nineteenth of November, and was complimented by his officers, who expreſſed their attachment to him in the warmeſt terms, and their indignation at the deſertion of lord Cornbury, who had revolted to the prince of Orange, with the greateſt part of four regiments. Notwithſtanding theſe aſſurances, he was expoſed to the moſt uneaſy reflections; he ſaw all his ſchemes blaſted, his friends falling off, and his family in danger of immediate ruin. He was even abandoned by his own daughter, Anne, princeſs of Denmark, who eſcaped privately from Whitehall, accompanied by the biſhop of London to Nottingham, from whence ſhe repaired to Oxford, where ſhe was joined by her huſband. When the king found himſelf deſerted by a virtuous child, he burſt into a flood of tears at the unexpected event, and pathetically exclaimed, "God "help me, in the extremity of my grief, my own "children have forſaken me."

Every thing now ſeemed to threaten the moſt fatal conſequences to James. The town of Newcaſtle admitted lord Lumley, and declared for the prince of Orange, and a free parliament. The duke of Norfolk eſpouſed the ſame cauſe. The prince's declaration was read in Oxford by the duke of Ormond, and heartily approved by that univerſity, who likewiſe complimented the prince with an offer of their plate. A very violent declaration was diſperſed in the prince's name, but not with his conſent, in which every one was commanded to apprehend and puniſh all papiſts, who, contrary to law, preſumed either to carry arms, or exert any civil authority.

Thus diſtreſſed on every ſide, without either friend or counſellor, James propoſed to call a free parliament, and the lord chancellor was accordingly directed to iſſue writs for that purpoſe. It was alſo agreed to ſend commiſſioners to treat with the prince of Orange, in conſequence of which the king appointed ed deputies, who delivered to the prince their maſters propoſals in writing. Theſe were, that the ſettlement of the nation ſhould be left to the deciſion of a free parliament, which had been convoked; and that, in the mean time, the two armies ſhould be kept at an equal diſtance from London. The prince, on the other hand, propoſed, that all papiſts ſhould be diſarmed, and diſpoſſeſſed of the employments they enjoyed; that all proclamations againſt himſelf ſhould be re-called; and if any perſons had been impriſoned, on account of their attachment to him, they ſhould be inſtantly ſet at liberty; that for the greater ſecurity of the city, the government of the Tower ſhould be committed to the lord mayor; that if the king ſhould think proper to reſide in London during the ſeſſion of parliament, the prince ſhould likewiſe reſide in the ſame place with an equal number of guards, or that he and the king ſhould reſide at an equal diſtance from London; that the two armies ſhould be removed thirty miles from the city; that no other forces ſhould be brought into the kingdom; that Tilbury fort ſhould be put into the hands of the city magiſtrates; that in order to prevent an invaſion from abroad, the fortreſs of Portſmouth ſhould be intruſted to the charge of ſome perſon equally agreeable to the king and prince; and that his ſerene highneſs's army ſhould be ſupported out of the public revenue till the meeting of the parliament.

The critical ſituation of James induced him to admit of theſe propoſals as moderate and candid, repugnant as they muſt have been to his real principles and diſpoſition. At length he aſſembled the noblemen who were in London, in order to deliberate on the then ſtate of affairs, and addreſſing himſelf to the earl of Bedford, (whoſe ſon the lord Ruſſel he had cauſed to be beheaded in the late reign) "My "lord, (ſaid he) you are honeſt men, have great in"fluence, and can do me ſignal ſervice." Alas!" replied the earl, "I am a feeble old man, incapa"ble of performing any conſiderable ſervices; but "I had a ſon (he added with a ſigh) who, if now "alive, could ſerve your majeſty in a more effec"tual manner." James was ſo ſtruck with this anſwer, that he remained for ſome time ſpeechleſs.

Alarmed every moment with freſh proofs of general diſaffection, agitated by indignation and deſpair, and impelled by fear for his own ſafety, as well as that of his adherents, James precipitately embraced, at the inſtance of ſome attendants about his perſon, a reſolution of withdrawing to France, and accordingly ſent off before hand the queen and infant prince, under the conduct of count Lazun an old favourite of the French monarch. James diſappeared in the night, attended only by Sir Edward Hales, and privately haſtened to a ſhip which waited for him near the mouth of the river.

It is impoſſible to deſcribe the conſternation of the citizens, the court, and, indeed, the whole nation, at the king's flight; and the more to increaſe the confuſion, James had not named any perſon who ſhould direct the helm of government during his abſence. He threw the great ſeal into the river Thames, but it was ſoon after found by a fiſherman, who, carrying it to the lord-chancellor, was handſomely rewarded him for his trouble.

In conſequence of this confuſed ſtate of public affairs, the populace of London aſſembled and pulled down the maſs-houſes, nor did the houſes of the foreign ambaſſadors eſcape their fury, from a notion that many opulent catholics had depoſited in them their moſt valuable effects. Jefferies the chancellor, who had diſguiſed himſelf in the character of a ſailor, in order to facilitate his eſcape, was diſcovered, ſeized by the mob, and treated with ſuch ſeverity, that he died in a ſhort time after.

Amidſt this ſcene of riot and confuſion, news ſuddenly arrived that his majeſty had been apprehended by the populace at Feverſham, while he was making his eſcape in diſguiſe; that he had been very ill treated, till he was known; but the gentry had then interpoſed and ſecured him from inſult, though they would by no means conſent to his leaving the kingdom. This intelligence threw all parties into confuſion. The prince ſent orders to the king, commanding him to approach no nearer than Rocheſter; but the meſſage arrived too late. He had already returned to London, attended by a detachment of the guards, and ſome noblemen ſent down by the peers to eſcort him.

Little attention, however, was paid the king during his reſidence at Whitehall by any perſon of diſtinction; it was therefore evident that his authority was ceaſed, and as he had exerciſed his power while poſſeſſed of it with deſpotic ſway, he relinquiſhed it with puſillanimous deſpair. Having ſent lord Feverſham on a meſſage to the prince, deſiring a conference for ſettling the affairs of the nation, that nobleman was arreſted under pretext of his wanting a paſſport; the Dutch guards were ordered to take poſſeſſion of Whitehall, where the king then reſided, and to turn out the Engliſh; and Hallifax, Shrewſbury and Dalamere were ſent by the prince at midnight, to acquaint the king, that it would be proper for him to retire to Hamhouſe, near Richmond. He begged permiſſion, which he eaſily obtained, to withdraw to Rocheſter, which circumſtance plainly proved that the king, terrified by this harſh treatment, had renewed his former reſolution of leaving the kingdom.

Though he did not intend to return to Whitehall, he continued ſome days at Rocheſter under the protection of a Dutch guard, as if hoping he might yet receive an invitation to take poſſeſſion of the throne; but obſerving that the clergy, the nobility, the gentry, and indeed the whole nation concurred in forſaking him, he yielded to his melancholy fate; and being preſſed by frequent letters from his queen, privately embarked in a frigate he had beſpoke, and arrived at Ambleteuſe in Picardy, from whence he repaired to St. Germains. Lewis gave him an hoſpitable reception; a conduct, which does ſome honour to his generoſity, though a very inadequate return for thoſe ſignal ſervices, which himſelf had received from that family, who, for a number of years, had been gradually ſacrificing their own intereſt and happineſs to their attachment to the French nation.

This was the laſt act of a prince whoſe reign might have been happy and proſperous, had not his bigotry, added to arbitrary principles, hurried him into meaſures obnoxious to his ſubjects, and precipitated him into diſgrace and perpetual exile. Indeed the fate of the Stuart family lives upon record, as a warning to all ſucceeding ſovereigns of theſe realms.

Peers addreſs the prince of Orange. Proclamation in favour of the Proteſtants. Commotions in Ireland. Debates in the convention. William and Mary proclaimed king and queen of England.

A. D. 1688. JAMES the ſecond had no ſooner abdicated the throne and retired to the continent, than the peers, as poſſeſſed of the hereditary juriſdiction of the kingdom, came to a reſolution of acting as guardians of the public, and immediately preſented an addreſs to the prince of Orange, requeſting him to take the adminiſtration of government into his hands, that he would manage the revenue, and regulate the affairs of Ireland, till the ſtates of the kingdom could be convened; and in a ſecond addreſs, they begged him to ſend orders to thoſe places which had a right of electing members, to chuſe, within ten days, repreſentatives who might act as a parliament in ſettling the public affairs. But this meaſure being deſtructive of all the principles of liberty, was prudently rejected by the prince, who, depending on the favourable diſpoſitions of a people that regarded him as their deliverer, was deſirous that the laws ſhould diſpoſe of the government. Accordingly having ſummoned all the members who had ſerved in any of the parliaments during the reign of Charles II. together with the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council of the city of London, they aſſembled at the appointed time, and adjourned to the houſe of commons, where, after ſome debates upon the authority by which they had been convened, they drew up and preſented an addreſs to the prince, deſiring he would ſummon the convention to meet on the twenty-ſecond of January, and in the mean time take charge of the government.

Thus inveſted with regal power, William commanded Barillon, the French ambaſſador, to leave the kingdom. He likewiſe iſſued a proclamation, authorizing all proteſtants, who had public employments to continue in the exerciſe of them till the meeting of the convention, diſmiſſed all the catholic officers from the army, and at the deſire of the queen dowager, releaſed the earl of Feverſham.

A. D. 1689. The abdication of James produced many changes in the affairs of Scotland as well as England; for no ſooner did the news of that event reach Edinburgh, than the chancellor of the kingdom reſigned the great ſeal and abandoned that metropolis. The populace grew outrageous, and inſulted not only the catholics, but the favourers of epiſcopacy. They demoliſhed chapels, and plundered houſes, ſo that the biſhops were obliged to have recourſe to flight, while many noblemen and others repaired to London, to obſerve the progreſs of the prince, and conform themſelves to the conduct of the Engliſh nation.

With regard to Scotland the prince purſued the moſt moderate and prudent conduct. He ſummoned an aſſembly at St. James's, compoſed of about thirty noblemen and eighty gentlemen of that kingdom, whoſe advice he requeſted in the then ſtate of affairs. From thence they repaired to Whitehall, where they deliberated on the anſwer they ſhould make to the prince of Orange; at length, it was unanimouſly agreed, that the prince ſhould aſſume the reins of government in Scotland, and convoke the ſtates of that kingdom for the fourteenth day of March, and this reſolution was received by the prince with the ſame modeſty and candour, as that preſented to him by the Engliſh convention.

In the mean time commotions were raiſed in Ireland, abetted by the earl of Tyrconnel, who commanded an army compoſed of papiſts, ſo that the prince wrote a letter to that nobleman, requiring him to ſubmit to the regulations that ſhould be made in England. Colonel Hamilton undertook to deliver this letter, and enforce it in ſuch a manner, that the earl ſhould be induced to ſubmit; but inſtead of performing his promiſe, he encouraged him to ſet the prince at defiance.

When the convention met according to ſummons, and each houſe had choſen their reſpective ſpeaker, the prince cauſed a letter to be preſented to the following effect: that he had complied with their deſires in re-eſtabliſhing the peace and public ſafety of the kingdom, and now it was their buſineſs to ſecure their religion, laws, and liberties upon a certain foundation. He obſerved, that the ſituation of the proteſtants in Ireland required their immediate notice; that as a delay would be fatal to their foreign connections, he perſuaded himſelf, that beſides the obligation of treaties, they would be ready to aſſiſt the Dutch as proteſtants and friends, who had expreſſed ſuch ardour for the preſervation of the Engliſh conſtitution. The two houſes immediately preſented an addreſs to the prince, in which they acknowledged, that under God, the nation was indebted to him for its deliverance. They approved of his adminiſtration, engaged to pay all poſſible reſpect to his letters, and requeſted him to continue in the management of affairs, till they had occaſion to addreſs him again.

The moſt important queſtions that came before the houſe of commons were, firſt, whether there was an original compact between the king and the people; and ſecondly, whether king James had broke that original compact? Both theſe, after a ſlight oppoſition, were carried in the affirmative. The lords then proceeded to take into conſideration the word "abdicated," and it was carried that "deſerted" was more proper. The concluding queſtion with them was, "Whether ſuppoſing "king James had violated the original contract "between him and his people, and abandoned the "government, the throne was thereby become "vacant?" This queſtion was debated with more warmth than any of the former, and upon a diviſion, the Tories prevailed by eleven voices. Some of the Whig party then moved, that ſuppoſing king James virtually dead, they ſhould acknowledge the prince and princeſs of Orange king and queen of England; but this propoſal was rejected by a ſmall majority. After much debate the houſe of peers concurred with the vote of the commons, "That king James had abdicated the "gover-

During these transactions the conduct of the prince of Orange was highly meritorious. He entered into no intrigues with the leaders of parties, nor took any measures to influence an individual in his favour; but at length, sending for the marquis of Hallifax, the earls of Danby, Shrewsbury, and some other noblemen, he told them he had hitherto kept silence, that he might not interrupt their deliberations. He said, he knew some persons were inclined to a regency, to which he had no objection; but, for his own part, he could not undertake the office. Others, he observed, were desirous of raising the princess to the throne, and that he should reign by courtesy. He declared a profound esteem for the princess, but objected to holding a crown dependent on any woman upon earth, nor would he have any share in the government, unless invested with it for life; nevertheless, if they disapproved of his resolution, he would give them no opposition, but return to Holland, without interfering further in their affairs, but would agree to prefer the right of the children of the princess Anne to the throne, to any he might have by a second marriage, provided he was invested with the sovereignty for life.

The princess herself seconded these views of her husband; the princess Anne also concurred in the same plan, and at length both houses voted that the prince and princess should reign jointly as king and queen of England; and that the administration should be in the hands of the prince alone. On the twelfth day of February the princess of Orange arrived in London, next day the lords and commons went in a body to the banquetting house, where the prince and princess sat in state; and the declaration of Rights being read, the marquis of Hallifax, as speaker of the upper house, made a solemn tender of the crown to them in the name of the peers and commons of England. The offer was accepted in the most obliging manner by their highnesses, and the same day they were proclaimed by the name of William and Mary, king and queen of England.

ON the accession of William III. and his royal consort the princess Mary to the throne of England, the constitution revived, and the contests between prerogative and privilege, which had distracted former reigns, seemed entirely to subside.

A.D. 1689.

The first popular act of this auspicious prince, was a proclamation, continuing all protestants in the offices which they had for some time enjoyed before his accession. The king then chose the members of his council, and appointed the officers of state. Nottingham and Shrewsbury were constituted secretaries of state; the privy seal was bestowed on the marquis of Hallifax, and the earl of Danby was created president of the council. These two noblemen enjoyed the king's confidence; and Nottingham was considered as the head of the church party; but the chief favourite was Bentinck, first commissioner on the list of privy counsellors as well as groom of the stole and privy purse. D'Auverquerque was made master of the horse; Zuylestein of the robes, and Scomberg of the ordinance: the treasury, admiralty and chancery were put in commission; twelve able judges were chosen, and Dr. Burnet, one of the authors of the glorious revolution, obtained the see of Salisbury. Having taken refuge in Holland under the last reign, he had employed his pen and council in the interest of the Stadtholder, who was therefore greatly attached to that eminent divine.

As it appeared necessary either to assemble a parliament, or to give that title to the convention, it was determined, that rather than hazard a new election, the king should change the convention into a parliament, by going to the house of peers, with the usual state of a sovereign, and pronouncing a speech from the throne to both houses. This expedient was accordingly practised, and in a few days the king opened the session of parliament with a most gracious speech, in which he thanked them for the great confidence they had reposed in him by chusing him their sovereign; assured them it should be his study to preserve their good opinion; laid before them the critical situation of affairs in Europe, and particularly in his realms; and concluded with earnestly requesting them to concur in the most speedy and effectual measures for the welfare of the nation.

On the eleventh of April, the king and queen were solemnly crowned by the bishop of London, at his desire, the archbishop of Canterbury being of the disaffected party. Next day the commons waited on their majesties at Whitehall, with a congratulatory address; and William, in order to conciliate the esteem of his new subjects, signified, in a solemn message to the house, his readiness to acquiesce in any measure they should think proper to take for a new regulation, or total suppression of the hearth money; and this tax was afterwards abolished. He received on this occasion an address of thanks from the commons couched in the warmest expressions of duty, gratitude and affection, and declaring that they would take such measures in support of his crown, as would convince the world, that he reigned in the hearts of his people.

In consequence of their attachment to the king's person and government, he obtained supplies both to reimburse the Dutch, who had expended an immense sum on his late expedition, and also to equip a powerful armament. But he perceived with concern, that the commons, by setting bounds to their liberality, were resolved to limit his power, as well as that of his predecessors.

One of the most important and worthy objects of parliamentary attention, was the civil list revenue. Under the late reigns, the revenues assigned to this purpose had been entirely at the disposal of the sovereign; it was therefore now resolved, that a certain sum should be set apart for the maintenance of the king's household, and the support of his dignity; and the rest of the public money should be employed under the inspection of parliament. The commons have ever since applied certain sums to particular services, and the accounts have been submitted to the examination of both houses.

This unprecedented measure was by no means agreeable to a prince of William's liberal and refined sentiments. The Tories did not fail to foment his jealousy against their adversaries; which was confirmed by a fresh effort of the whigs, in relation to a militia. The tories had, through the communication of Nottingham, made offers of service to his majesty, but complained, at the same time, that as they were in danger both with respect to their lives and fortunes, they could take no steps in favour of the crown, without an act of indemnity.

The king, in consequence of this representation, sent a message to the house, recommending a bill of indemnity as the most effectual means of putting an end to all controversies, distinctions, and sources of discord. He desired it might be drawn up with all convenient expedition, and with such exceptions only as should appear necessary for the maintenance of public justice, the safety of him and his consort, and the settlement and welfare of the nation. But the whigs proceeded so slow in the bill, that it could not be brought to maturity before the end of the session.

William, who was equal to most princes in political abilities, and well knew the genius of the people he was to govern, determined, as the most effectual means of preserving peace at home, to find his subjects employment abroad. The grand scheme he had formed when only Stadholder, of a confederacy against France, began about this time to take effect. The princes of the empire importuned the emperor Leopold to declare war against the French king, who had not only violated several treaties entered into with them, but indicated a design of ruling all Europe. The king of England found no difficulty in persuading his subjects to unsheath the sword against their old enemies and rivals; for on the sixteenth of August, the commons unanimously resolved, that they were ready to support his majesty in his most vigorous measures if he chose to undertake a war Thus encouraged by parliament, the king declared war against France on the seventh of May. It was urged as a plea for their conduct, that Lewis had encroached on the fishery of Newfoundland, invaded the Caribbee islands, and Hudson's bay, made captures on the English at sea, disputed the right of the flag, persecuted many English subjects on account of religion, and sent an armament to Ireland in support of the rebels in that kingdom, and in violation of the law of nations.

The kingdom of Scotland was at this time distracted by the rage of faction and party. The convention was appointed for the fourteenth of March, and both parties employed all their interest to influence the election of members. The duke of Hamilton, and all the presbyterians, declared for William; the duke of Gordon maintained the castle of Edinburgh for his old master, but as he neglected to lay in a store of provisions, he depended entirely on the citizens for subsistence. The partizans of James were headed by the earl of Balcaras, and Graham, viscount Dundee, who exerted their utmost efforts to preserve union; confirm the duke of Gordon, who began to waver, in his attachment to their sovereign; and concert measures in such a manner, that the proceedings of the ensuing session might be productive of some benefit to their cause.

The earls of Lothian and Tweedale were sent as deputies, to require the duke of Gordon, in the name of the states, to quit the castle in four and twenty hours, and leave the charge of it to the protestant officer next in command.

Notwithstanding the natural timidity of the duke, lord Dundee prevailed, on him to demand such terms, as the convention would not grant. The negotiation proved ineffectual; the states ordered the heralds to summon him to surrender the castle immediately, on pain of incurring the penalties of high treason, and he, on refusal, was proclaimed a traitor. All persons were forbid, under the same penalties, to aid, succour, or correspond with him; and the castle was blocked up by the troops of the city. On the next day, one Crane, a domestic of the abdicated queen, brought a letter from James, and at the same time, an express arrived with another from king William, to the states of Scotland. William observed, that he had called a meeting of their states, at the desire of the nobility and gentry of Scotland, assembled in London; who requested that he would take on himself the administration of their affairs. He exhorted horted them to concert measures for settling the peace of the kingdom upon a solid foundation; and to lay aside animosities and factions, which served but to prevent their harmony and settlement. He promised them his best endeavours to promote an union between the two kingdoms, of which he professed to have the highest opinion.

King William's letter was universally approved by the states, as appeared from their appointing a committee to draw up a dutiful and affectionate reply. A debate then ensued about the letter from the late king, which they resolved to favour with a reading, after the members should have subscribed an act, declaring, that notwithstanding any thing that might be contained in the letter, for dissolving the convention, or impeding their procedure, they were a free and lawful meeting of the states, and would continue undissolved, until they should have settled and secured the protestant religion, the government, laws, and liberties of the kingdom.

Having adapted this necessary measure for the security of their civil and religious liberties, they proceeded to the reading of James's letter, who conjured them to support his interest as faithful subjects. He promised to afford them such powerful assistance as would enable them to defend themselves from any foreign attempt; and even assert his right against those enemies, who had loaded him with calumny and the vilest aspersions. He offered to pardon all those, who should return to their duty before the last day of the month, and threatened to punish vigorously such as should stand out in rebellion against him and his authority.

But such was the low estimation in which James was generally held, that his messenger was ordered into custody, and afterwards dismissed with a pass instead of an answer. After some debate, the convention dispatched lord Ross with an answer to king William's letter, professing their gratitude to their deliverer; congratulating him upon his success; thanking him for assuming the administration of their affairs; declaring they would take effectual and speedy methods for securing the protestant religion, as well as for establishing the government, laws, and liberties of the kingdom; assuring him they would studiously avoid animosities and contentions, and desiring the continuance of his majesty's care and protection.

The states then peremptorily declared, "that "James being a professed papist, did assume the "royal power, and act as a king without ever "taking the oath required by law; and had, by "the advice of evil and wicked counsellors, in- "vaded the fundamental constitutions of this "kingdom; and altered it from a legal monarchy "to an arbitrary, despotic power; and had govern- "ed the same to the subversion of the protestant "religion, and violation of the laws and liberties "of the nation, subverting all the ends of govern- "ment; whereby he had forfeited the right of the "crown, and the throne was become vacant." They forbid his being acknowledged or assisted, proclaimed king William and queen Mary, and sent commissioners to present to them the act which established their authority, proposing at the same time the form of an oath, confirming, among other articles, a promise of destroying heresy. William hesitated at taking the oaths, from a plea of aversion to persecution, till the commissioners assuring his majesty that this was not their meaning, on that declaration he accepted the crown of Scotland.

The duke of Gordon still held the castle of Edinburgh, which was blockaded by the troops in the town. A regular siege reduced them to extremity, so that the general was at length obliged to capitulate. Lord Dundee, however, still zealous in the cause of James, and refusing to obey the citation of the states, was declared a fugitive, outlaw and rebel; and parties were immediately sent out in pursuit of him and Balcarras. The latter falling into the hands of the pursuers, was committed to a common prison; but Dundee fought his way through the troops that surrounded him, and escaped to the Highlands, where having raised a considerable body of men, he soon returned at their head, attacked the regulars with an heroic ardour, defeated them on the first charge and might have gained a complete victory, had not a random shot extended him on the plain. The rebels by degrees lost their courage. Defeats destroyed their hopes, and they laid down their arms in order to obtain the indemnity offered them. James, however, did not abandon all hopes of being one day able to re-ascend the throne of his ancestors. The French king promised to assist him in the recovery of his crown, and in the mean time, supported him and his household in a proper manner at the castle of St. Germain. But James gave the strongest proofs of pusillanimity, bigotry and superstition. Ever surrounded by jesuits, and unmindful of his own situation and affairs, he incurred the contempt of the French, insomuch that the archbishop of Rheims seeing him come from mass, said with a sneer, "There goes a pious gentleman, "who has sacrificed three crowns for a mass."

Ireland was far from imitating the example of England and Scotland, in acknowledging the title of William to the crown. Tyrconnel, who commanded in that kingdom, was firmly attached to the interest of James, but he thought proper to temporize with William, until he should receive reinforcements from France, which he earnestly solicited by letter.

An army consisting of five thousand French forces, was embarked on board the fleet then lying at Brest, consisting of fourteen ships of the line, six frigates, and a proper number of transports. Lewis supplied him with arms, equipage, provisions, money, and every thing necessary for camp and household. At parting he embraced him with great affection, making use of this remarkable expression, "Farewell brother, the best thing I can "wish you, is, that I may never see you again."

After a passage of eight days, James arrived at Kinsale, whence he repaired, in a short time, to Cork, where he was received by the earl of Tyrconnel, who had collected an army of thirty thousand foot, and eight thousand horse for his service.

Having refreshed his forces he proceeded to Dublin, and entered that city in triumph. The popish bishops and clergy in general received him with the utmost solemnity; the people partook of their zeal, and welcomed the sovereign with the loudest acclamations. On the second day after his arrival, he issued five proclamations; the first seemingly in favour of the protestants, who had abandoned the kingdom, requiring them to return immediately on promise of his protection, and likewise commanding all persons to join him against the prince of Orange. In the second he returned his grateful acknowledgments to his catholic subjects for their vigilance and attachment, and enjoined such as were not actually in his service to retain and lay up their arms until it ſhould be found neceſſary to employ them for his advantage. The third contained an invitation to the ſubjects to ſupply his army with proviſions. By the fourth he raiſed the value of coin; and by the fifth ſummoned a parliament to meet on the ſeventh day of May at Dublin. And lord Tyrconnel, for his great ſervices, was created a duke.

These flattering proſpects of ſucceſs was followed by a ſad and fatal reverſe. Alarmed at the report of a general maſſacre of the proteſtants, the inhabitants of Londonderry ſhut their gates and made a gallant defence. They ſent to England for aſſiſtance, and were accordingly ſupplied with more arms and ammunition, but did not receive any conſiderable reinforcements till the middle of April, when two regiments arrived under the command of Cunningham and Richards. By this time James had reduced Colerain, inveſted Killmore, and was almoſt in ſight of Londonderry. A proteſtant clergyman, named Walker, ſerved the beſieged as commandant, and animated them with that ardent zeal for religion and liberty, which braves death. He maintained his poſt at the long cauſeway a whole night againſt the advanced guard of the enemy, until, overpowered by numbers, he retreated to Londonderry, and exhorted the governor to take the field, and come to a general engagement. Lundy called a council of war, at which Cunningham and Richards aſſiſted, and it was reſolved, that, as they imagined they could not hold the place, the regiments ſhould not be landed; but that the chief officers ſhould retire from the town, whereby they thought the inhabitants would ſecure better terms.

In conſequence of this reſolve, a meſſenger was diſpatched to James with propoſals for opening a negotiation, and lieutenant general Hamilton, who commanded in that prince's ſervice, undertook, that the army ſhould not, during the continuance of the treaty, advance nearer than within four miles of the city. But James, diſregarding the promiſes made by his general, was advancing, at the head of his troops, to the town walls. The inhabitants and ſoldiers in the place were ſo exaſperated at the cowardice of their governor Lundy, and the two colonels Cunningham and Richards, that with difficulty they eſcaped their immediate vengeance. Lundy retired in diſguiſe to Scotland, but was ſoon apprehended, conveyed to London, and ignominiouſly diſmiſſed the ſervice.

James, being obliged to be preſent at the meeting of the parliament in Dublin, left the command of the army to the marquis de Roſene, a man of a moſt haughty and cruel diſpoſition, who, incenſed at the reſiſtance he met with from the garriſon, threatened to reduce the town to aſhes, and put all the inhabitants to the ſword, without diſtinction of ſex or age, unleſs they would immediately ſubmit at diſcretion. The governor treated his menaces with contempt, and publiſhed an order, forbidding any perſon, on pain of death, to talk of a ſurrender. They had now conſumed the laſt remains of their proviſions, and ſupported life by eating the fleſh of horſes, dogs, cats, rats, mice, tallow, ſtarch, and ſalted hides, and even this loathſome food began to fail. Roſene, finding them altogether inflexible, threatened that he would ſtarve all the proteſtants of the country, by driving them to periſh under the walls of Londonderry.

This reſolution was executed with the moſt brutal rigour. Upwards of four thouſand proteſtants, almoſt expiring with famine and cold, were expoſed to the view of the beſieged; but the horrid ſight had a very different effect upon the garriſon, from what Roſene expected. They felt the deepeſt compaſſion for the diſtreſſes of their brethren; but their compaſſion was mingled with indignation againſt the perpetrators of ſo infernal an action, and ſuch apprehenſions of their own fate, if they ſhould fall into his hands, that they unanimouſly determined to periſh rather than ſubmit to ſuch a barbarian.

Concluding themſelves exempt from obligation to obſerve the articles of war, they erected a gibbet in ſight of the enemy, and ſent a meſſage to the French general, importing, that they would hang all the priſoners they had taken during the ſiege, unleſs the proteſtants were immediately diſmiſſed. Convinced by their general behaviour that they would carry their threats into execution, Roſene ordered the proteſtants to be releaſed, after they had been detained three days without any kind of food. Some hundreds died of famine and fatigue, and thoſe who lived to return to their own habitations found them plundered and ſacked; ſo that the greater number periſhed with hunger, or were maſſacred by ſtraggling parties of the enemy. It is ſaid, that James was requeſted by the biſhop of Meath to countermand this order, but without effect.

The intrepid garriſon of Londonderry was reduced from ſeven thouſand to five thouſand five hundred men, and thoſe were driven to ſuch extremity of diſtreſs, that they began to talk of preying upon each other. In this emergency, Kirke ordered two ſhips laden with proviſions to ſail up the river, under convoy of the Dartmouth frigate. One of theſe broke the enemy's boom, with which they blocked up the channel, and all the three, after having ſuſtained a very hot fire from the enemy's cannon, arrived in ſafety before the town, to the inexpreſſible joy of the inhabitants.

The army of James deſpairing now of ſucceeding in their enterprize, raiſed the ſiege that very night, and retired with precipitation, after having loſt about nine thouſand men in the attempt. On the day preceding the relief of Londonderry, the brave Inniſkillingers advanced with a handful of men, and at a place called Newton-Butler, defeated ſix thouſand of James party.

Mean while the Iriſh parliament met at Dublin, purſuant to James's proclamation, and was opened by that prince with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he thanked them for their zeal and loyalty; extolled the generoſity of the French king, who had enabled him to viſit them in perſon; inſiſting upon executing his deſign of eſtabliſhing liberty of conſcience, as the moſt effectual means of promoting the happineſs and welfare of his people; and promiſed to contribute to the public peace, by his concurrence to ſuch laws as they ſhould enact for that purpoſe.

He had no ſooner left the houſe, than an addreſs of thanks was voted to his majeſty, and a bill introduced to recognize his title, and expreſs their abhorrence of the uſurpation by the prince of Orange, as well as the defection of the Engliſh. Next day James publiſhed a declaration, complaining of the calumnies his enemies had ſpread to his prejudice, inſiſting on his great attention to the preſervation of his proteſtant ſubjects; his care in protecting them from their enemies, in redreſſing their grievances, and granting liberty of conſcience; promiſing that he would take no ſtep but with the approbation of parliament; offering a free pardon to to all persons who should desert his enemies, and join him in four and twenty days after his landing in Ireland, and charging all the blood that might be shed upon those who should continue in rebellion. But James soon gave a convincing proof that these promises were never intended to be kept any longer than they answered his convenience; for, two days after, a bill was brought into the house of commons for repealing the act of settlement; by which two thirds of the protestants in the kingdom, who held their fortunes by virtue of that act, were dispossessed of their estates, whilst papists seized on all their properties.

At the same time, an act of attainder was passed against all those who were absent from the kingdom, refused to acknowledge the authority of king James, or had any ways assisted the prince of Orange since the first of August last. By this act no less than three thousand protestants were attainted by name, among whom were two archbishops, one duke, seventeen earls, seven countesses, twenty-eight viscounts, seven bishops, eighteen barons, thirty-three baronets, fifty-one knights, and eighty-three clergy, all of whom were declared traitors, and adjudged to suffer forfeiture and the pain of death.

During these transactions, Lewis the fourteenth, notwithstanding the alliances formed against him, pursued his ambitious schemes with great rapidity. King William had engaged in a new league with the states general, in which former treaties of peace and commerce were confirmed. It was stipulated, that if the king of Great Britain should be attacked, the Dutch should assist him with six thousand infantry, and twenty ships of war.

In consequence of this treaty, the earl of Marlborough was sent over with ten thousand British auxiliaries to join the allied army, which he effected; and at length a smart engagement ensuing, the French, after an obstinate resistance, were putto the rout.

On the meeting of the parliament in the month of October, the king set forth the necessity of a present supply to carry on the war, and desired that they might be speedy in their determinations on this subject; as these would in a great measure influence the deliberations of the princes and states concerned in a war against France, at a general meeting appointed to be held the following month at the Hague. The houses were then prorogued for four days, when they met again, and the commons taking his majesty's speech into consideration, unanimously resolved to assist him in reducing Ireland, and in joining with his allies abroad for a vigorous prosecution of the war against France, for which purposes they voted a subsidy of two millions.

Several motions with regard to grievances having been made in the lower house, and many instances of miscarriage and mismanagement in Ireland produced, they resolved upon a subsequent address, to explain the ill conduct and success of the army and navy; to desire his majesty would find out the authors of these miscarriages, and for the future commit the guidance of affairs to unsuspected persons. By this opposition, which originated from the whig party, they lost much of the king's favour, and he discovered great propensity to abet the tories, especially as they made him most pompous promises of supplies and an assiduous attention to his will and pleasure, provided he would dissolve the then parliament, and call a new one. At length, however, he was so harrassed between the two factions, that he resolved to leave the government in the queen's hands and retire to Holland. But being dissuaded from this resolution by the remonstrances of several noblemen to whom he had communicated it, he determined to go over to Ireland in person to finish the war in that kingdom. This design was far from being agreeable to the parliament, his friends dreaded the climate of that country, which might prove fatal to his weak constitution; both houses, therefore, began to prepare an address against this expedition. To prevent this remonstrance, the king went to the house of peers, and there formally signified his resolution. After this speech, they were prorogued to the second day of April, and on the sixth of February they were dissolved by proclamation, and a new parliament summoned to meet on the twentieth of March. During this session of parliament, the bill of rights was passed into a law, together with the act of settlement.

A. D. 1690. The new parliament met according to the time appointed, and the king opened the session with a speech from the throne, in which he gave them to understand that he still persisted in his resolution of going in person to Ireland; desired they would settle the revenue, or establish it as a fund of credit, upon which the necessary sums for the public service might be immediately advanced: he signified his intention of sending to them an act of grace, with a few exceptions, that he might demonstrate his readiness to extend his protection to all his subjects, and leave no excuse for raising disturbances in his absence, as he knew how busy some ill affected men were in their endeavours to alter the established government. He recommended an union with Scotland, the parliament of which had appointed commissioners for that purpose; he told them that he should leave the administration in the hands of the queen, and desired they would prepare an act to confirm her authority: he exhorted them, for the sake of dispatch, to avoid debates, and hoped that if any business now remained unfinished, they would speedily settle it.

The parliament, sensible of the king's desire to embark for Ireland, dispatched business with the greatest facility, and the royal assent being given to several bills, and among the rest, that for investing the queen with the administration of government, during the king's absence, his majesty put an end to the session by a short speech from the throne.

The necessary preparations being made, the king embarked on the 4th of June, and landed on the fourteenth at Carrickfergus attended by prince George of Denmark, and other persons of distinction. From thence he immediately proceeded to Belfast, where he was met by the duke of Schomberg, major-general Kirke, and other principal officers.

After refreshing his troops a few days at Belfast, William marched to Lisburne, where the duke of Schomberg had fixed his head quarters, ordering his whole army to encamp at Loughbrillen, where upon a review, he found they amounted to thirty-six thousand effective men, well armed and accoutered.

James was no sooner apprized of the arrival of William, than he left Dublin under the guard of the militia, and with a reinforcement of six thousand infantry which he had received from France, joined the rest of his forces, which almost equalled William's in number. He was very ad-vantageouſly poſted, and, contrary to the advice of his generals, determined to hazard a battle. They propoſed to ſtrengthen their garriſons, retire to the Shannon, and wait the iſſue of the operations. They reminded him, that Lewis had promiſed to fit out a powerful armament againſt the Engliſh fleet, and to ſend over a great number of frigates, to deſtroy the Engliſh tranſports, as ſoon as their convoy had returned to England. But James, determined to decide the conteſt by a general battle, refuſed theſe ſalutary counſels, and made the neceſſary preparations for a vigorous engagement.

William was equally prepared to receive him, but thought proper before the battle began to reconnoitre the enemy. Accordingly he advanced to the oppoſite ſide of the river Boyne, where being ſingled out by the enemy, they planted two field pieces againſt his perſon. The firſt ſhot killed a man and two horſes cloſe by his ſide, and the ſecond rebounding from the earth grazed his right ſhoulder, and produced a conſiderable contuſion. The enemy, obſerving ſome confuſion among his attendants, concluded he was killed, and ſhouted aloud in token of their joy. The whole camp reſounded with acclamations, and ſeveral ſquadrons of their horſe were drawn down towards the river, as if they intended to paſs it immediately, and attack the Engliſh army. The report ſoon reached Dublin; from whence it was carried to Paris, where, contrary to the cuſtom of the French court, the people were encouraged to expreſs their joy by bonfires and illuminations.

As ſoon as the ſlight wound he had received was dreſſed, the king returned to ſhew himſelf to his army in order to quiet their apprehenſions. In the evening he called a council of war, and declared his reſolution to attack the enemy in the morning. Schomberg at firſt oppoſed this deſign, but finding the king determined, he propoſed, that a ſtrong detachment of horſe and foot ſhould that night paſs the Boyne at Slanebridge, and take poſt between the enemy and Duleck, in order to cut off their retreat. This council being rejected, it was reſolved, that early in the morning, lieutenant general Douglas, with the right wing of the infantry, and young Schomberg with the horſe, ſhould paſs at Slanebridge, while the main body of foot ſhould force their paſſage at Oldbridge, and the leſs, at certain fords, between the enemy's camp and Drogheda. Every thing being properly diſpoſed for the attack in the morning, the king after riding through the different ranks of his army, retired to his tent.

About ſix the next morning, being the firſt of July, general Douglas, with young Schomberg, and the earl of Portland, marched to Slanebridge, and paſſed the river with very little oppoſition. On gaining the oppoſite bank, they perceived the enemy drawn up in two lines, to a conſiderable number of horſe and foot, with a moraſs in their front; ſo that Douglas was forced to wait for a reinforcement. This being arrived, the foot advanced to the charge through the moraſs, while young Schomberg rode round it with his cavalry to attack the enemy in flank. The Iriſh, inſtead of waiting the aſſault, wheeled about, and retreated with precipitation towards Duleck; notwithſtanding which, Schomberg fell in among their rear, and did conſiderable execution. In the mean time king William's main body, compoſed of the Dutch guards, French refugees, and ſome battalions of the Engliſh, paſſed the river, which was breaſt high, under a general diſcharge of artillery. They were faintly oppoſed by a body of muſqueteers, who were poſted behind ſome hedges; but theſe they ſoon repulſed, and ſeveral battalions landed: though before they could form, they were vigorouſly attacked by a ſquadron of the enemy's horſe, and a ſtrong body of their cavalry and foot, conducted by general Hamilton, advanced from behind an eminence to charge thoſe who were landed, as well as to prevent the reſt from reaching the ſhore. The infantry were routed on the firſt attack, but the cavalry advancing with great impetuoſity, the diſpute was, for ſome time very obſtinate, till at length the Iriſh gave way, leaving their horſe to ſuſtain the whole fury of the combat.

Perceiving the furious attacks made by the enemy, and being informed that the French proteſtant refugees were without a commander, the duke of Schomberg inſtantly croſſed the river, and heading thoſe regiments, pointed to the enemy, ſaying, "Gentlemen, theſe are your perſecutors." Hardly had he pronounced theſe words, when he ſuſtained a violent onſet from a party of king James's guards which had broke through one of the regiments, and were now on their return. The French refugees, miſtaking them for a party of their own troops, ſuffered them to paſs, when ſome of them riding up to the duke, ſurrounded him, and gave him two deſperate wounds on the head. Perceiving their error, and eager to ſave their general, the French refugees made ſuch an indiſcreet fire, that they ſhot the duke dead upon the ſpot. The ſmall part of the enemy's guard were immediately cut to pieces; but this was no recompence for the loſs of a conſummate general, who thus fell in the field of honor at the age of eighty-two, crowned with military glory.

The death of this gallant officer might have been attended with fatal conſequences, had not king William arrived at the critical moment, and decided the action by obtaining a compleat victory. Thus ended the famous battle of the Boyne, in which James was ſuppoſed to have ſuſtained the loſs of about fifteen hundred men, and William about one third of that number, which, conſidering the importance of the atchievement, was very inconſiderable.

Hiſtorians in general, attribute the higheſt honour to king William for the extraordinary proweſs he diſplayed on this memorable occaſion. Even the Iriſh themſelves are ſaid to have declared, "that if the Engliſh would change kings with "them, they would try the fortune of the day "once more."

James, who had continued an inactive ſpectator of this ſcene in which he ought to have taken a principal part, was among the firſt who retired from the field. On his return to Dublin, he reproached the Iriſh with cowardice, ſignified his intention of quitting the kingdom, and after the neceſſary preparations, embarked for France.

The proteſtants, who had now aſſumed the government of the city of Dublin, diſpatched a petition to king William, requeſting him to honour the capital with his preſence. The requeſt was immediately complied with, and William entered the city in triumph, and repaired to the cathedral to return thanks to heaven for the victory.

During the abſence of the king, the queen regent, though greatly embarraſſed by the perpetual oppoſition of her councils, diſplayed the higheſt prudence, and exerted herſelf with uncommon ſpirit.

A French ſquadron of upwards of ſeventy ſail, under the command of vice admiral Tourville, had defeated the combined fleets of England and Holland. Lord Torrington the Engliſh admiral incurred much diſgrace by this action; however, after impriſonment, and being brought to trial, he was acquitted, though his judges were cenſured by the Dutch as having given a partial award.

The late naval defeat, however, did not hinder William from purſuing a war, which eventually fixed him on the throne. He publiſhed an act of indemnity in Dublin; but the Iriſh, animated by their catholic prieſts, paid little regard to it, and the ſucceſs of the French fleet raiſed their ſpirits, and effaced every idea of ſubmiſſion. The king had returned to Dublin with a view of embarking for England; but being informed, that the deſigns of his domeſtic enemies were diſcovered and defeated, that the fleet was refitted, and the French retired to Breſt, he altered his intention, poſtponing his voyage till he had finiſhed the Iriſh war.

A conſiderable reinforcement of Engliſh troops, under the command of the earl of Marlborough, arrived in Ireland to inveſt the city of Cork; ſoon after which that general was joined by five thouſand men, under the duke of Wirtemberg.

The trenches being opened, the batteries played with ſuch fury, that a breach was ſoon effected, and the garriſon having ſurrendered, on Marlborough's preparing for a general aſſault, he took poſſeſſion, and then detached brigadier Villiers with a party of horſe and dragoons, to ſummon the town and forts of Kinſale, and next advanced with the reſt of the forces. The old fort was immediately taken by ſtorm; but Sir Edward Scot, who commanded the other, ſuſtained a ſiege of ten days, and then capitulated on honourable terms. The earl of Marlborough, having accompliſhed this important enterprize in thirty days, returned with his priſoners to England. During theſe tranſactions the commander of the French forces in Ireland lay inactive near Galway, and ſent ſo deplorable an account of his ſituation to the court of France, that tranſports were ſent over to bring home the general and his forces. In theſe he embarked with his troops, and left the command of the Iriſh troops to the duke of Berwick. After the departure of the French general, the Iriſh formed themſelves into ſeparate bodies of free-booters, and plundered the country under the denomination of Rapparees, while the major part of William's troops retired to their reſpective quarters.

The king beſieged Limerick in perſon, but the badneſs of the ſeaſon, joined to the obſtinate reſiſtance of the garriſon, and the ſlaughter of his men, induced him to quit his enterprize, and return to England.

Soon after his majeſty's arrival, both houſes of parliament preſented ſeparate addreſſes of congratulation on his ſucceſſes in Ireland, and on the queen's wiſe and happy adminiſtration during his abſence. The commons, in particular, aſſured him of their readineſs to aſſiſt him to the utmoſt of their power, and, as a proof of their loyalty, voted him a ſupply of four millions, agreeable to an eſtimate of what would be wanted for the enſuing year.

A. D. 1691. Impatient of going to Holland, where the ſituation of affairs were of a critical nature, the king came to the houſe, and having cloſed the ſeſſion with a conciſe but pertinent ſpeech from the throne, as well as adjuſted the affairs of the nation, he embarked with a numerous retinue, under a convoy of twelve ſhips of the line commanded by admiral Rooke. Upon his arrival at the Hague, he received every teſtimony of regard and affection from the ſtates-general, and every token of honour from the foreign miniſters aſſembled in congreſs. On this important occaſion, he ſignalized himſelf both as an orator and a warrior in exciting the allied powers to exert themſelves with vigor againſt the efforts of Lewis, who had ambitiouſly meditated the ſubjection of all Europe. He promiſed them twenty thouſand men for the firſt campaign, and ſent powerful ſuccours to the duke of Savoy, who had declared againſt France; but had the mortification, previous to his return, to ſee Mons fall into the hands of the enemy.

The king no ſooner arrived in England, than he turned his attention to the plan of operations for the enſuing campaign in Ireland, where general Ginckle commanded, which being regulated, he returned to Holland, and began to make preparations for taking the field in perſon. The duke of Luxemburgh, with an army of forty thouſand men, having paſſed the Scheld, took poſſeſſion of Halle, and gave it up to plunder in ſight of the confederates, who were obliged to throw up intrenchments for their preſervation.

Such was the military ſkill of Luxemburgh, that William, at the head of a numerous army, could effect nothing of importance. In vain did he attempt, by divers ſtratagems, to bring them to an engagement; but the French mareſchal avoided it with ſuch dexterity, as baffled all his endeavours. While the king lay encamped at Court-ſur-heure, a ſoldier, corrupted by the enemy, ſet fire to the fuſees of ſeveral bombs, by the exploſion of which, the whole magazine might have been blown up, had not the miſchief been prevented by the courage of the men who guarded the artillery; theſe, even while the fuſees were burning, drew out the waggons from the line, and tumbled them down the ſide of a hill, ſo that the communication was intercepted.

William, ſuſpicious that this deſign was particularly levelled at him, or finding it impoſſible to elude the devices of Luxemburgh, who baffled all his attempts, transferred the command of the army to prince Waldec, and returned to the Hague, where he ſoon after embarked, and landed in England on the nineteenth day of October.

Whilſt William remained with the allied army in the Low Countries, general Ginckle, aided by Mackay, a Scottiſh officer of rank, completed the reduction of Ireland. Athlone was carried by aſſault almoſt before the eyes of the Iriſh army. They were defeated at the deciſive battle of Aughrim; and Tyrconnel, James's principal partizan, died with grief at the ſucceſſes of the king's party.

The taking of Limerick filled up the meaſure of Ginckle's exploits, and his majeſty determined to pay all poſſible regard to his continental connections, ordered that general at all events to finiſh the Iriſh war; whereupon hoſtages were exchanged, for the due execution of the following articles. The catholics were reſtored to the enjoyment of all their liberty in the exerciſe of their religion, which they poſſeſſed in the reign of Charles II. They were admitted to all the privileges of ſubjects, upon taking king the oath of allegiance, without being compelled to that of ſupremacy, and paſſports were provided for thoſe who choſe to retire to France.

The proteſtants exclaimed againſt this treaty, but the neceſſity of it was obvious to the king's general, who was enjoined by his maſter to put a ſpeedy end to the war. Notwithſtanding the indemnity and liberty of conſcience afforded by the tenour of the articles, twelve thouſand Iriſh catholics choſe rather to leave their native country, than ſubmit to the government of king William. France was their aſylum: there they were received with open arms, and gratified with thanks from James or their loyal attachment.

Ginckle was rewarded for his important ſervices, with the title of earl of Athlone, and the thanks of the commons of England. The parliament congratulated William on his ſucceſſes, and the queen on her prudent adminiſtration during his majeſty's abſence.

But notwithſtanding theſe profeſſions of loyalty and affection, a ſecret diſcontent prevailed too much throughout the kingdom. The malecontents inſinuated to the people, that there was no neceſſity for maintaining a ſtanding army; that inſtead of contributing as allies to the maintenance of the war upon the continent, they had embarked as principals, and bore the greateſt part of the burthen, without the leaſt ſhare of profit. They animadverted on the king's partiality to the Dutch; his proud reſerve; his imperious diſpoſition, and particularly inſiſted that the earl of Marlborough's gallant behaviour in Ireland was ill requited by a diſmiſſion from his employments. The commons, however, granted the king a liberal ſupply, ſo that the parliamentary diſputes produced no effects eſſentially injurious to the ſtate.

A. D. 1692. On the 24th of February his majeſty cloſed the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſhort ſpeech, in which he thanked them for the zeal and attachment they had ſhewn to his government, and the liberality and diſpatch with which they had ſupplied the public neceſſities, acquainting them, at the ſame time, with his intention of repairing ſpeedily to the continent.

King William having returned to Holland to direct the operations of the confederates, Lewis renewed his efforts to reſtore the exiled James to the throne of England. His emiſſaries and adherents were exceeding numerous, and laboured aſſiduouſly in his cauſe and intereſt. James publiſhed a declaration, ſtrongly avowing an intended invaſion, and other projected reſolutions; notwithſtanding which, the general animoſity againſt him was much ſtronger than the murmurs againſt his rival.

Colonel Parker, with ſome other officers, enliſted men privately for the ſervice of James, in the counties of York, Lancaſter, and the biſhopric of Durham; and at the ſame time Fountaine and Holman were employed in raiſing two regiments of horſe at London, that they might join their maſter, who, by this time, had repaired to La Hogue, and was ready to embark with his army.

But the violent zeal of his agents betrayed their cauſe, for, having communicated the ſcheme to admiral Carter, on a ſuppoſition of his being diſaffected to the houſe of Orange, he immediately divulged the important ſecret to the queen and council. The queen, being inveſted with the adminiſtration of public affairs in the king's abſence, no ſooner received this intelligence, than ſhe iſſued a proclamation enjoining all papiſts to depart from London and Weſtminſter; a ſecond for aſſembling both houſes of parliament, and a third for apprehending ſeveral perſons on ſuſpicion. The militia took arms, and admiral Ruſſel, reinforced by the Dutch ſquadron, put to ſea with ninety ſail of the line under his command, aſſiſted by Sir Ralph Delaval and admiral Carter.

Tourville the French admiral, though inferior in number, had poſitive orders to engage the enemy at all events, and therefore bore down along-ſide Ruſſel's own ſhip, which he fought at a very ſmall diſtance with great fury ſeven hours, when his rigging being greatly damaged, his ſhip, the Riſing Sun, of an hundred and four guns, was towed out of the line in great diſorder. The fleet, being at length ſeparated by a thick fog, were compelled to lay by till it abated, when the admiral made the ſignal for chaſing the enemy, who were diſcovered ſtanding to the northward. Part of the blue ſquadron came up with them about eight in the evening, and engaged them half an hour, during which, admiral Carter was mortally wounded. Finding his caſe deſperate, he exhorted his captain to fight as long as the ſhip could ſwim, and expired with great compoſure. It muſt be acknowledged that the French fought valiantly on this occaſion, and ſupported the honour of their nation; but their fleet was at length diſperſed, and fourteen large ſhips were burnt in the road of La Hogue.

James, ready to put to ſea, was an eye witneſs to this diſaſter, which affected Lewis with the deepeſt concern, as he had the utmoſt reaſon to apprehend an invaſion of his dominions.

Sir John Aſhby and Callemberg having received the admiral's orders to ſteer for Havre de Grace, with a view to deſtroy the remainder of the French fleet, Ruſſel ſailed back to St. Helens, that the damaged ſhips might be refitted and the fleet furniſhed with freſh ſupplies of proviſion and ammunition. The bodies of admiral Carter and captain Haſtings were interred with great pomp; medals were ſtruck in honour of the action, and thirty thouſand pounds diſtributed among the ſailors, as proofs of the queen's approbation of their conduct.

An expedition was now projected againſt St. Maloe's, Rochfort and Breſt, and accordingly ſeven thouſand men were embarked under the command of the duke of Leinſter; but through ſome neglect the whole ſcheme was laid aſide, on a pretence of the ſeaſon being too far advanced to carry it into execution. Lewis, therefore, withdrew his forces from the coaſt of Normandy, and James returned to St. Germain's, deprived of all hopes of effecting his reſtoration to the throne of England.

The French king was not a little elated by the ſucceſs of his arms in the Low Countries. He took Namur, one of the ſtrongeſt forts in Flanders. Luxemburg, who covered the ſiege, managed with ſuch ſkill and ability, that William, at the head of a numerous army, could neither paſs the river Mehaigne to attack the enemy which lay on the other ſide, nor relieve a place of ſuch importance: ſo that the citadel being thus left expoſed to the approaches of the enemy, could not long withſtand the violence of their operations. The two covered ways were taken by aſſault, and on the twentieth of May, the governor capitulated.

Luxemburg placed a ſtrong garriſon in Namur, pitched his camp in a very advantageous ſituation between Enghien and Steenkirk. Here William reſolved to attack them, but the paſs being much much narrower than was imagined, his army was under a neceſſity of dividing, and began to move in two columns, on the twenty-fourth of July. The prince of Wirtemberg began the attack on the right wing of the enemy, at the head of the Engliſh, Daniſh, and Dutch infantry, and was ſupported by a conſiderable body of Britiſh horſe and foot commanded by lieutenant general Mackay. Though the ground was interſected by hedges, ditches, and narrow defiles, the prince marched with ſuch diligence, that he was in a condition to begin the battle about two in the afternoon, when he charged the French with ſuch impetuoſity, that they were driven from their poſts, and their whole camp was diſordered. Luxemburg, however, put himſelf at the head of the rallied troops, and made ſo furious and deſperate a reſiſtance, that Wirtemberg, in danger of being over-powered by numbers, ſent ſeveral meſſages to count Solmes, deſiring a reinforcement, but that officer diſregarded his requeſt. At length, when the king ſent an expreſs order, commanding the Count to ſuſtain the left wing, he made a motion with his horſe, which could not act while his infantry kept their ground; and the Britiſh troops with a few Dutch and Danes ſuſtained the heat of the battle. They fought with great reſolution, and the event continued doubtful, until Boufflers rejoined the French army with a great body of Dragoons, which turned the fortune of the day.

The earl of Angus, general Mackay, and about three thouſand officers and ſoldiers of the allied army, were left dead on the ſpot; a like number was wounded or taken, with many colours and ſtandards, and ſeveral pieces of cannon. The French reaped no ſolid advantage from their victory, which coſt them about three thouſand men, with many officers of diſtinction. King William retired to his camp, and notwithſtanding all his misfortunes, his genius and courage rendered him a formidable enemy to the French.

The elector of Bavaria having been appointed commander in chief, William embarked for England on the fifteenth of October, and the parliament meeting on the fourth of November, his majeſty in his ſpeech to both houſes, thanked them for their laſt ſupplies, congratulated them upon the victory obtained by ſea; condoled with them on the bad ſucceſs of the campaign by land, repreſented the power of the French, and the neceſſity of maintaining a great armament to oppoſe it, and demanded ſubſidies equal to the occaſion. He intimated a deſign of making a deſcent up France; and declared that the happineſs of his people was his ſole aim, for which he would again willingly expoſe his life.

A ſtrong party under the direction of the earl of Marlborough, was formed in the upper houſe, who began an enquiry into the commitment of the peers that had been lately ſent to the Tower. They voted that the judges and thoſe who had in their cuſtody priſoners accuſed of treaſon, ought to conform to the act of Habeas Corpus, and admit them to bail, unleſs it was declared on oath that there were two witneſſes againſt them, which could not yet be produced. But the king prevented the conſequences of this affair, by ordering the priſoners to be diſcharged. After another warm debate, a formal entry was made in the journals, importing, that the houſe being informed of his majeſty's having given orders for diſcharging the lords under bail in the King's-bench, the debate about that matter had ceaſed. The reſentment of the peers being thus allayed, they proceeded to take his majeſty's ſpeech into conſideration, and a bill for regulating trials in caſes of high treaſon was voted by the commons. They then preſented addreſſes to the king and queen, congratulating them upon their deliverance from the wiles of their open and ſecret enemies, and aſſuring them that they would ſupport government with their beſt advice and aſſiſtance. But previous to their voting any ſupplies, the commons inſiſted upon peruſing the treaties, public accompts and eſtimates, that they might be in a condition to adviſe as well as aſſiſt his majeſty. Some members exclaimed loudly againſt partiality to foreign generals, and particularly inſiſted on the miſconduct of count Solmes, and his late behaviour in the battle of Steenkirk. After ſome warm altercation, they reſolved, that his majeſty ſhould be petitioned, to beſtow the chief command of the Engliſh forces upon an Engliſhman, and to fill ſuch vacancies as ſhould happen among the general officers, with ſuch only as were natives of his dominions. They then voted two millions, to pay the ſubſidies to the electors of Hanover and Saxony, to defray the expences of the continental war, and for the ſubſiſtence of the land forces.

A. D. 1693. On the fourteenth of March, the king put an end to the ſeſſion of parliament by a ſpeech from the throne, and having ſettled the domeſtic affairs of the nation, embarked in a few days for Holland, where he arrived on the third of April. The war in Flanders was now carried on with great vigour. Luxemburg being informed of the great inferiority of the allied army, reſolved to attack them in their camp, or at leaſt to fall upon their rear, ſhould they retreat at his approach. With this view he made a motion towards Liege, as if he intended to inveſt that place, and encamped at Heiliſheim, about ſeven leagues from the allied army.

On the twenty ninth of July he began his march in four columns and paſſed the Sare without oppoſition. King William at firſt imagined that this motion was a feint to cover the deſign upon Liege, but hearing that the whole French army was advancing againſt him, he reſolved to keep his ground, and immediately drew up his forces in order of battle. But his diſpoſition appeared to Luxemburg ſo erroneous, that he exclaimed "Now I believe that Waldeck is dead," alluding to that general's known ſagacity in chuſing his ground for an engagement.

The French appeared on the high ground early the next morning, and ſoon after deſcended in great order into the plain, though the cannon of the allied army played on them very furiouſly. About eight in the morning they attacked the villages of Lare and Neer-Winden with great fury, and twice made themſelves maſter of theſe poſts, from whence they were as often repulſed. At length, the allies maintained their ground; and brigadier Churchill took the duke of Berwick priſoner.

The battle now increaſed and continued till near ſun-ſet, when Luxemburg attacking the confederates at Landen, many of them were ſlain, and the reſt compelled to retreat into the open plain. William who had ſignalized his valour during the fearing all would be loſt, drew off his army, and retreated in as good order as ſo preſſing a ſituation would admit. The French, however, ſuſtained ſuch loſs in the engagement, that they either were not able, or did not think it prudent, to purſue the confederates. The duke of Ormond was wounded in ſeveral places and taken priſoner, and the count of Solmes was mortally wounded.

Nothing remarkable happened during the remainder of this campaign, except the reduction of Charleroy, which, after being inveſted twenty-ſix days, ſurrendered on honourable terms.

The ſame ill fortune attended the Engliſh by ſea this year, as the allies by land. Preparations had been made by the admiralty to protect commerce, and deſtroy the corſairs which infeſted the coaſts. A fleet was fitted out to intercept the enemy's merchantmen in their outward bound paſſage, but they had ſailed before it could put to ſea.

It having been intended to make a deſcent upon Breſt, the fleet aſſembled at St. Helen's about the middle of May; but this deſign being laid aſide, it was expected, that on the junction of the Dutch and Engliſh fleets, ſomething of importance would be attempted; but the admirals were divided in opinion, nor did their orders warrant their executing any ſcheme of conſequence. It was at length determined that Sir George Rooke ſhould convoy the trade bound to the Mediterranean, but through unforeſeen accidents the deſign failed, for they were ſurprized by a ſuperior force of the enemy, and being overpowered by numbers, were obliged to ſubmit, after ſuſtaining the loſs of nine and twenty merchantmen and an Engliſh man of war. The reſult was, the admiral bore away for the Madeiras, where, having ſupplied himſelf with wood, water, and other neceſſaries, he made for Ireland, and arrived at Cork with about fifty ſail, including ſhips of war and trading veſſels.

After the engagement, the French admiral ſtood away for Cadiz, but not ſucceeding in his attemps on that place, he bombarded Gibraltar, where the merchants ſunk their ſhips, that they might not fall into the enemy's hands. They afterwards ſailed along the coaſt of Spain, burnt ſome Engliſh and Dutch veſſels at Malaga and Alicant, and at laſt returned to Toulon. The diſcontents ariſing from this misfortune were greatly increaſed by the failure of an expedition to the Weſt Indies, which was committed to the care of Sir Francis Wheeler. He made an unſucceſsful attempt upon the iſlands of Martinico and St. Domingo, and after a ſucceſſion of ill fortune, in divers places, his deſigns being fruſtrated, and the greateſt part of his men having died during the voyage, he returned with the remains of his ſquadron in a very ſhattered condition to Portſmouth.

The nation in general, in conſequence of ſuch repeated failures, exclaimed againſt the miniſtry, and the marquis of Caermarthen, with the earls of Nottingham and Rocheſter, (who poſſeſſed the moſt lucrative and important offices of the ſtate) were pointed out as the principal defaulters.

France in the midſt of her conqueſts laboured under a moſt dreadful famine, which ſwept away many thouſands, and reduced the nation to ſuch diſtreſs, that Lewis attempted to conclude a ſeparate peace with ſome of the allies; but as his demands were ſtill ſo exorbitant as to afford no proſpect of a juſt and honourable peace, his offers were rejected.

William returned to England the latter end of October, when his firſt care was that of ſilencing the public murmur, by changing his miniſtry. Nottingham was diſmiſſed, and ſucceeded as ſecretary of ſtate by the earl of Shrewſbury. The command of the fleet was beſtowed upon the gallant Ruſſel, and the moſt popular meaſures were adopted in general.

On the meeting of parliament the king in his ſpeech adverted to the ſeveral loſſes the allies had ſuſtained, as well as the miſcarriages of the Engliſh fleet in divers expeditions; promiſed that delinquents upon conviction ſhould be brought to condign puniſhment, and requeſted ſuch aſſiſtance as was eſſential to the ſafety and honour of the nation. After various debates concerning the cauſes of popular complaints, and the inveſtigation of many points relative both to men and meaſures, they granted moſt liberal ſupplies for the enſuing year, which were to be raiſed by annuities, and the taxation of divers articles of commerce and convenience.

A. D. 1694. Sir Francis Wheeler, who had failed in a former expedition, met with a ſingular misfortune on his next appointment. He was ſent out with a number of ſhips under his convoy, part of which were to be left in a certain latitude, and he was to proceed with the reſt to the Mediterranean. He acted according to order, but on his entering the bay of Gibraltar, being overtaken by a dreadful tempeſt under a lee-ſhore, many of the ſhips foundered, and among the reſt that of the admiral, who, together with his whole crew, were buried in the deep. Thus ended at once the tranſactions and life of that unfortunate commander.

Having ſettled the affairs of England, his majeſty embarked at Margate on the ſixth of May, and on the ſeventh in the evening arrived in Holland, where he conſulted with the ſtates general. On the third day of June he repaired to Berthermeabbey near Louvain, the place appointed for the rendezvous of the army, and where he was met by the electors of Bavaria and Cologne. In a few days a numerous army was collected, and every thing ſeemed to promiſe an active campaign.

On the third day of June the dauphin took the command of the French forces, with which Luxemburg had taken poſt between Mons and Maubeuge, and paſſing the Sambre encamped at Fleury; but on the eighteenth he removed from thence, and took up his quarters between St. Tron and Wanheim, while the confederates lay at Roſbeck.

Through an unexpected manœuvre of the French army, William's intention of paſſing the river Schelde was totally defeated; indeed, the only action of importance during this campaign was the reduction of Huy, which, after a ſiege of ten days, ſurrendered to the allies; and the reſult of all was, the return of the Dauphin and the king of England to their reſpective dominions.

A bill paſſed both houſes of parliament this ſummer, empowering the king and queen to incorporate a number of merchants, (who had previouſly ſubſcribed twelve hundred thouſand pounds, as a beginning fund) by the name of the governors and company of the bank of England, under a proviſo, that, at any time after the firſt of Auguſt 1705, upon a year's notice, and the repayment of the capital, the ſaid corporation ſhould ceaſe and determine.

The king, according to cuſtom in opening the ſeſſion of parliament, repreſented the neceſſity of ſuch ſupplies as would enable him to proſecute the war with vigour. They were granted without oppoſition, but the commons not unmindful of what they deemed conducive to the true intereſt of the nation, inſiſted on the triennial bill, to which his majeſty, from motives of preſent expediency, gave the royal aſſent. It exacted that a new parliament ſhould be held every third year, at the expiration of which, the king was obliged to iſſue writs for another.

During theſe tranſactions, Dr. John Tillotſon, archbiſhop of Canterbury, paid the debt of nature. Few prelates conduced more by their lives or writings to the intereſt of real religion. This venerable metropolitan eminently exemplified as a chriſtian, thoſe virtues he ſo forcibly recommended as a divine.

Soon after died queen Mary in the thirty-third year of her age, and the ſixth of her reign. Mary upon the whole was an amiable character. In her perſon ſhe was graceful and commanding, while the complacency and mildneſs of her aſpect tempered the awfulneſs of majeſty, and the affability of her diſpoſition encouraged the moſt timid to approach her. Her treatment both of her father and ſiſter may be deemed blameable; but theſe defects will be counterpoized when placed in the balance with her exalted virtues.

The king cordially regretted the loſs of his royal conſort, who, both in public and domeſtic life, had been an ornament to her eminent ſtation. Her ſtatue, together with that of the king, was erected in the Royal Exchange, in conſequence of a reſolution of the court of common council of London.

The king, as well as the queen, had been ſome time on ill terms with the princeſs Anne their preſumptive heir; but on the demiſe of the latter, the earl of Sunderland effected a kind of reconciliation between his majeſty and the princeſs. She was preſented with great part of her ſiſter's jewels, and aſſigned a reſidence in St. James's palace; but theſe were rather formal tokens of civility than real inſtances of eſteem.

A. D. 1695. The affairs of the continent requiring his majeſty's perſonal attendance, the lord keeper at the royal command prorogued the parliament; and the king nominated the regency that was to act in his abſence. But as both the princeſs of Denmark and her huſband were excluded, the king's diſpoſition towards them was plain and evident.

This campaign was glorious to the allies, whoſe army being ſuperior to that of the French, William determined to ſtrike ſome blow of importance. The great general Luxemburg died the preceeding winter, and was ſucceeded by the mareſchal Villeroy. On the third of July, William inveſted the city of Namur, the garriſon of which conſiſted of near twenty thouſand men, and the fortifications had received ſuch additional repairs that it was deemed impregnable.

Concious of their inferiority the French thought proper to ſecure their late conqueſts, by a new line drawn between the Lys and the Schelde, and made diſpoſition for covering Dunkirk, Ypres, Tournay, and Namur, ſome of which they apprehended would be attacked by the allies. Mean while the confederates formed two great armies in the Netherlands: the firſt, compoſed of ſeventy battalions of foot, and eighty-two ſquadrons of horſe and dragoons, was encamped at Aerſeele, Canehem, and Wanterghen, between Theildt and Deynſe, and commanded by the king in perſon, aſſiſted by the old prince of Vaudemont; the other, compoſed of ſixteen battalions of foot, and one hundred and thirty ſquadrons of horſe, was encamped at Zellich and Ham; under the command of the elector of Bavaria, who was aſſiſted by many experienced officers, at the head of whom were the duke of Holſtein-Plon, and the earl of Athlone.

After the neceſſary diſpoſitions were made, the king directed the baron Heyden, and the earl of Athlone to aſſiſt in the reduction of Namur. The plan of the ſiege being laid, the trenches were opened on the eleventh of July, and next day the batteries began to play with incredible fury. On the eighteenth, five battalions of Scotch and Dutch aſſaulted the enemy's advanced works on the counterſcarp. They were ſuſtained by ſix Engliſh battalions, while major Saliſch, with eight foreign regiments, and nine thouſand pioneers, advanced on the left. The conteſt was deſperate and bloody, the enemy maintaining their ground for two hours with undaunted reſolution; but they were at laſt repulſed, and purſued to the very gates of the town. The king was ſo charmed with the gallantry of the Britiſh troops, that laying his hand on the elector of Bavaria's ſhoulder, he exclaimed with great tranſport, "See my brave Engliſh."

The ſiege was carried on with the utmoſt vigour on the part of the aſſailants, while the place was defended with the moſt heroic bravery by the garriſon.

At length the beſieged were ſummoned to ſurrender, but neglecting to give an immediate anſwer, it was determined to proceed to a general aſſault according to the plan previouſly laid down by the king. The confederates procured and maintained a lodgement near a mile long by this attempt, though it did not ſucceed to their wiſhes.

On this occaſion the elector of Bavaria ſignalized his valour, but he acquired fame at the expence of the lives of many brave ſoldiers, who nobly fell in the heat of action.

The garriſon had indeed made a moſt gallant reſiſtance, till at length reduced from near twenty to ſix thouſand men; and mareſchal Boufflers who commanded, being cut off from all hopes of relief, was under a neceſſity of ſurrendering, and the capitulation was ſigned on the ſecond of September.

According to articles the French garriſon marched out on the fifth, when William cauſed mareſchal Boufflers to be arreſted by way of repriſal for the detention of the garriſons of Dixmuyde and Deynſe, contrary to cartel: but on the reſtoration of thoſe places, he was ſet at liberty.

The king now reſigned the command to the elector of Bavaria, and retired to St. Loo, his uſual receſs; ſoon after which both armies went into winter quarters.

Notwithſtanding the great ſtrength of the Engliſh at ſea, the enemy's privateers found means to ſlip out of their ports and capture a number of merchantmen. Through the neglect of the marquis of Caermarthen, who was ſtationed off Scilly, the Barbadoes homeward bound fleet fell a prey to the French corſairs, as did five ſail of Indiamen, valued at a million ſterling.

On the tenth of October the king arrived from Holland, and was hailed on his return with the triumphant acclamations of his Engliſh ſubjects. With the advice of council, a new parliament was ſummoned by proclamation to meet on the twenty-ſecond of November. William, on his laſt arrival from the continent, began to aſſume an affability of deportment, rather repugnant to the natural reſerve which had rather created diſguſt than conciliated ciliated esteem. He visited several noblemen at their country seats, honoured the universities with his presence, and, by his general behaviour, seemed to court popularity.

The parliament having met according to proclamation, the commons chose Foley again for their speaker. The king in his first speech, extolled the valour of the English forces; expressed his concern at being obliged to demand such large supplies from his people; observed that the funds had proved very deficient, and the civil list was in a precarious situation; recommended to their compassionate regard the miserable state of the French protestants; took notice of the bad state of the coin; desired they would form a bill for the encouragement of seamen, and contrive laws for the advancement of commerce. He expressed his satisfaction at the choice of representatives, and recommended unanimity and dispatch, as their enemies the French were making great preparations to take the field early in the spring.

The commons granted him a supply of six millions, the taxes became enormous, the nation complained of being aggrieved, yet the ministry were not less lavish of the public treasure. This parliament passed a celebrated act respecting trials for high-treason. It was enacted, that persons indicted should receive a copy of their accusation five days before the commencement of the trial; that they should be allowed council to plead in their behalf; that no person should be accused but on the deposition of two respectable witnesses; that the accused should have a list of the witnesses two days before the preparation for trial; and that no accusation should be admitted three years after the commission of the crime, except in case of an actual attempt on the life of the king. The peers added a clause, that a peer should only be judged by the whole body of peers.

The next point agitated was relative to the state of the current coin, and it appearing that it had been greatly debased by fraudulent arts, it was resolved to proceed to a new coinage, so that in less than two years the silver coin came from the Mint the finest and most beautiful in Europe.

A. D. 1696. In the beginning of this year a conspiracy was discovered against the person and government of king William, in order to restore the abdicated James. The earl of Aylesbury, lord Montgomery, and some other persons of distinction, were the contrivers of the project. In the beginning of February, the duke of Berwick had come privately into England, in order to hasten the preparations of the conspirators. While they were labouring to increase their party and assemble forces, James came to Calais with a view to embark; troops were brought to the sea side, and an officer was advancing with a number of ships, which were to join a considerable fleet of transports already at Dunkirk.

Sir George Barclay, a native of Scotland, a man of undaunted courage, cautious and circumspect, but a furious bigot to the church of Rome, came over in order to effect this horrid design. He imparted the secret to the conspirators assembled, when, after various consultations, they resolved to attack the king on his return from Richmond, where he usually hunted on Saturdays, and the scene of the intended tragedy was a lane between Brentford and Turnham-green. But the plot was discovered by captain Fisher, Pendergrass an Irish officer, and La Rue, a Frenchman. The two former gave their information to the earl of Portland, the last to brigadier Levison. The king was at first extremely backward in believing the plot; but finding it confirmed by so many witnesses, he admitted Pendergrass into his presence, and persuaded him to give a list of the assassins. A proclamation was issued for their immediate apprehension; in consequence of which most of them were secured, but Barclay found means to escape.

Measures were immediately taken to dispel the tempest: admiral Russel sailed to the coast of France; the enemy retired at his sudden appearance, and James, disconcerted in his projects, returned in despair to St. Germains.—The two houses of parliament being acquainted with the conspiracy by the king himself, zealously formed an association for his defence, engaging to support his government, and to revenge all attempts against his person: the king assured them he would be always ready at the hazard of his life to resist all those who should endeavour to overturn the laws, religion and liberties of the kingdom.

The methods of raising the supplies was the next business of the parliament. A new bank was established, commonly called the Land-bank, because founded upon land-securities. This scheme was generally believed to be intended to ruin the bank of England. The company of the latter petitioned against the bill, and were heard by their counsel; but their representation had no effect; and the bill, having passed both houses, at last received the royal assent. On the twenty-seventh of April the king closed the session with a short but gracious speech, and the parliament was prorogued to the sixteenth of June. During this session, Pendergrass, Porter, and others gave evidence against several of the conspirators, who were accordingly executed.

The confederates, incensed at the French as abettors of the conspiracy against the person and government of king William, were determined on revenge. Lewis had established a vast magazine at Givet, with a view of striking some stroke of importance early in the campaign, while the allies should be weakened by the absence of the British troops. Upon this magazine the confederates determined to wreak their vengeance, and with this view, the earl of Athlone, and lieutenant-general Coehorn, set out from Namur with forty squadrons, thirty battalions, fifteen pieces of cannon, and six mortars. Athlone, with part of his body, invested Dinant, while Coehorn with the remainder, advanced to Givet. He forthwith began to bombard the town, which in three hours was on fire, and by four in the afternoon wholly destroyed, with the great magazine it contained.

On the fifth of May the king embarked for Holland, having appointed a regency previous to his departure. The French had taken the field early in the spring, but no enterprize of importance was attempted in the course of this campaign. Lewis was obliged to act on the defensive, while the active plans of William were defeated by want of money. All the funds of this year proved defective, the land bank failed, having affected the credit of the former bank, without producing any one good effect.

Lewis now thought seriously of making a peace, and with this view, sent an ambassador to the states general; but the Dutch refused, to enter into any conferences on the subject, until they had obtained the consent of the allies. The French king therefore, in order to expedite this negotiation, pursued offensive measures in Catalonia, where his general the duke de Vendome, attacked and worſted the Spaniards in their camp near Oſtalric, but he was obliged to retreat, after very ſtrenuous efforts againſt their intrenchments, and the action was not deciſive.

Before any treaty could be ſet on foot, the duke of Savoy made a ſeperate truce with France. William, though much chagrined at the information, diſſembled his anger, and liſtened to the miniſter without the leaſt apparent emotion. One of the conditions of this treaty imported, that within a limited time, the allies ſhould evacuate the duke's dominions, otherwiſe they ſhould be expelled by the joint forces of France and Savoy. They offered a neutrality to the confederates, but this being rejected, the contracting powers reſolved to attack the Milaneſe. Accordingly, when the truce expired, the duke, as generaliſſimo of the French king, entered that duchy, and inveſted Valencia, ſo that in one campaign, he commanded two contending armies. A meſſenger from the king of Spain, who conſented to accept of a neutrality for Italy, arrived when the garriſon of Valencia was reduced to the utmoſt extremity.

The allies gained little advantages by land this year, but Lord Berkeley, who commanded the fleet, pillaged and burned the villages on the iſlands of Guoy, Horeal, and Heydic; made prizes of about twenty veſſels, and bombarded St. Martin's on the iſle of Rees.

Soon after, rear admiral Bembow was ſent with a ſmall ſquadron to block up Du Bart in the harbour of Dunkirk; but that bold adventurer found means to eſcape in a fog, and ſailing towards the Baltic, fell in with the Dutch fleet, under convoy of ſix frigates. Theſe he took, together with half the trading veſſels; but meeting with the outward bound fleet, convoyed by thirteen ſhips of the line, he was obliged to part with all his prizes except fifteen, which he carried into Dunkirk, having burnt four of the frigates and turned the other two adrift.

As the ſeaſon was now far advanced the hoſtile operations of this year were concluded, and William embarked for England to open the ſeſſions of parliament. In the courſe of his ſpeech he obſerved, that propoſals had been made for a negotiation, but that the beſt way of treating with France, would be ſword in hand; that he hoped they would quickly raiſe ſupplies for the ſervice of the enſuing year; that the civil liſt could not be ſupported without their aſſiſtance; that he flattered himſelf they would contrive ſome means for the recovery of the national credit; and that the ſafety and welfare of the kingdom could be no way ſo well ſecured as by their unanimity and diſpatch.

The commons aſſured his majeſty in a loyal addreſs, that they would ſupport his perſon and government againſt all enemies foreign or domeſtic. They then deliberated upon the eſtimates, and chearfully granted upwards of ſix millions for the ſervice of the enſuing year. They paſſed a bill for remedying the ill ſtate of the gold coin, and another explaining an act of the preceding ſeſſion, for laying duties on low wines, and ſpirits of the firſt extraction. In order to raiſe the ſupplies of the year, they reſolved to tax all perſons according to the value of their real and perſonal eſtates, their ſtock upon land and in trade, or their income by offices, penſions, and profeſſions. A duty of one penny per week for one year was levied upon all perſons not receiving alms. Not one perſon able to bear any part of the expence was excuſed, on this occaſion, from contributing to the exigencies of the ſtate.

The bank of England having been found of ſingular ſervice to government, the commons voted another million to be raiſed by new ſubſcriptions, in order to ſupport its credit.

The caſe of Sir John Fenwick was now brought into the lower houſe, where, though his guilt was rendered manifeſt, he could not be convicted by common law as one poſitive evidence only appeared againſt him. A bill of attainder, however, after the moſt violent debates, paſſed both houſes; and Fenwick was executed on Tower-hill.

He acknowledged his attachment to king James, but called heaven to witneſs, in his expiring moments, that he never harboured a deſign againſt the life of king William. On cloſing the ſeſſion of parliament the ſixteenth of April, his majeſty thanked them for the liberal ſupplies they had granted him, and expreſſed his ſatisfaction with the meaſures they had taken for the retrieval of the public credit.

A. D. 1697—8. On the 26th of April the king embarked for Holland, in order to direct the negotiations for a general peace, the preliminaries of which were to the following effect: that the treaties of Weſtphalia, and Nimeguen, ſhould be the baſis of the preſent negotiation; that Stratſburgh ſhould be reſtored to the emperor, and Luxembourgh to the Spaniards, together with Mons, Charleroy, and all the places taken by the French in Catalonia, ſince the treaty of Nimeguen; that Dinant ſhould be ceded to the biſhop of Liege, and all re-unions ſince the treaty of Nimeguen be made void; that Lorraine ſhould be reſtored according to the conditions of that treaty; and that Lewis ſhould acknowledge the prince of Orange king of Great Britain without the leaſt reſtriction, or reſervation.

After ſome little altercation concerning the place for holding the general congreſs, the negotiations were agreed to be opened at a village called Ryſwick, a few miles diſtant from the Hague. The conferences began on the twenty-ninth of April, and were nearly being interrupted by the death of Charles XI. of Sweden; but as his ſucceſſor was a minor, the parties reſolved to proſecute the buſineſs, and the plenipotentiary appointed in behalf of the court of Sweden continued in his office. The taking of Barcelona by the duke of Vendome, and the loſs ſuſtained by the Spaniards in America, haſtened the concluſion of the treaty, ſo far at leaſt as it concerned their particular nation.

Several articles were objected to by the imperial plenipotentiary, which protracted the negotiation; however, it was at length reſolved, that the treaty between England, Holland, Spain, and France ſhould be ſigned on the 20th of September, even though the emperor ſhould not concur. But from prudential maxims, he was induced to accede and ſign, and his example was followed by all the princes of the empire. The treaty between England and France imported, that Lewis ſhould not diſturb or diſquiet the king of Great Britain in the poſſeſſion of his crown or government, aſſiſt his enemies, nor favour conſpiracies againſt his perſon; that a free commerce ſhould be reſtored between the two kingdoms; that commiſſioners ſhould be appointed to meet at London, to determine the pretenſions of each crown to Hudſon's bay, taken by the French during the late peace, and retaken by the Engliſh in the courſe of the war; and to fix the limits of places to be reſtored, as well as the proportion of exchanges to be made; that in caſe of a freſh war, ſix months ſhould be allowed to the ſubjects of each crown for removing their effects; that the ſeparate article of the treaty of Nimeguen, relating to the principality of Orange, ſhould be fully executed; and that in three weeks after the day of ſigning the agreement, the ratifications ſhould be exchanged.

William, having thus firmly eſtabliſhed himſelf on the throne, returned to England, and was received in London amidſt the acclamations of the people. On the meeting of parliament, he mentioned among other things in his ſpeech, the expediency of a ſtanding army, a circumſtance by no means agreeable to the commons, ſome of the members of which gave it as their opinion that it tended to introduce deſpotiſm. When the queſtion came regularly before the houſe, it was carried in the negative; however, to compenſate for this deciſion, in oppoſition to the king's opinion, they voted the ſum of ſeven hundred thouſand pounds per annum for the ſupport of the civil liſt, diſtinct from all other ſervices, to be paid his majeſty during life; an indulgence he had often requeſted, but could never before obtain.

The petition of the governor and inhabitants of Londonderry in Ireland now came before the Engliſh parliament. They ſolicited ſuch indemnification for the loſſes ſuſtained by the ſiege of that place, which they had ſo gallantly defended, as might ſeem meet to the members in general. It was recommended by the commons to the conſideration of his majeſty, who engaged to attend to it, but the petitioners obtained no immediate relief.

A reſident of Dublin having aſſerted in a pamphlet the independence of the Iriſh parliament on that of England, a committee was appointed to enquire into the nature and tendency of this performance. It being reſolved, that the book tended to leſſen the dependence of Ireland upon England, an addreſs was preſented to his majeſty, beſeeching him to give effectual orders for preventing any ſuch encroachments for the future, as well as diſcountenancing thoſe who had been guilty of ſuch pernicious attempts. His majeſty promiſed his compliance.

A ſociety for the reformation of manners was now begun, under the king's immediate protection. Conſiderable collections were made for maintaining clergymen to read prayers at certain hours in places of public worſhip, and adminiſter the ſacrament every Sunday.

William prorogued the parliament on the third day of July, thanking them in a ſhort ſpeech for the many teſtimonies of their favour he had received, and, in two days after the prorogation, it was diſſolved.

Advice having been received in England, that the death of Charles II. of Spain was daily expected, William, under pretence of retiring from public buſineſs, embarked for Holland; but his real intention was to ſound the French king as to the ſucceſſion to the throne of Spain. He had appointed a regency to govern the kingdom in his abſence; and, as one of the number, nominated the earl of Marlborough, who had regained his favour, and been appointed governor to the duke of Glouceſter. His majeſty at his departure left ſealed orders with the miniſtry, directing, that ſixteen thouſand men ſhould be retained in the ſervice, notwithſtanding the vote of the commons, by which the ſtanding army was limited to ten thouſand. He alledged, that the apprehenſion of freſh troubles, which might ariſe at the death of his catholic majeſty induced him to tranſgreſs this limitation, and hoped that the new parliament would be more favourable. But they proved as averſe to this meaſure as the former had done.

The French miniſter having, by order of his maſter attended king William at his palace near the Hague to negotiate the treaty of the Spaniſh ſucceſſion, the particulars were tranſmitted to the earl of Portland, and, at the requeſt of the king, communicated by him to the ſecretaries of ſtate, who, by letter, ſignified to his majeſty the iſſue of the deliberation of the regency, though it ſeems they had ſigned the firſt partition before the letter reached Holland.

The chief articles of the partition treaty were the follwing; that in caſe the king of Spain ſhould die without iſſue, the kingdom of Naples and Sicily, with the places depending on the Spaniſh monarchy, and ſituated on the coaſt of Tuſcany, or the adjacent iſlands, the marquiſate of Final, the province of Guipuſcoa, all places on the ſide of the Pyrenees, or the other mountains of Navarre, Alva, or Biſcay, on the other ſide of the province of Guipuſcoa, with all the ſhips, veſſels, and ſtores, ſhould devolve upon the dauphin, in conſideration of his right to the crown of Spain, which, with all its other dependencies, ſhould deſcend to the electoral prince of Bavaria, under the guardianſhip of his father; that the dutchy of Milan ſhould be ſettled on the emperor's ſecond ſon the archduke Charles; that this treaty ſhould be communicated to the emperor, and the elector of Bavaria, by the king of England, and the ſtates general; that in caſe the elector of Bavaria ſhould die before his father, then the elector and his other heir ſhould ſucceed him in theſe dominions; and ſhould the archduke reject the dutchy of Milan, they agreed it ſhould be ſequeſtered, and governed by the prince of Vaudemont.

Lewis, perſuaded that he ſhould never be able to accompliſh his deſigns upon Spain, while the king of England had it in his power to form a confederacy againſt him, determined to amuſe that prince with a treaty in which he ſhould ſeem to act as umpire in the concerns of Europe. The plan ſucceeded, and kept William in the dark as to his real intention.

When his majeſty arrived from the continent he found new mortifications from the parliament he had lately ordered to be ſummoned. Inſtead of ten thouſand men, the number fixed by the laſt parliament, and to which he had given the royal aſſent, he had kept on foot ſixteen thouſand. The commons, in token of their diſapprobation of this meaſure, reduced the troops in pay to ſeven thouſand, and obliged the king to diſmiſs his Dutch guards, of whoſe zeal and attachment he had inſtances of the fulleſt aſſurance. His remonſtrances on this ſubject had no effect. They reminded him of his promiſe to diſmiſs all his foreign troops, and gave him to underſtand that the happineſs and welfare of the kingdom depended on the mutual confidence between king and people, and that this confidence demanded that he ſhould entruſt to his ſubjects the care of his ſacred perſon. The king complied, though with ſome reluctance, and paſſed the bill according to the deſire of his faithful commons, who immediately preſented an addreſs, in which they thanked him for this freſh mark of his royal goodneſs, and ſo lemnly assured him, that they would defend his person and government at the hazard of their lives and fortunes. They then voted fifteen thousand seamen, and a proportionable fleet for the security of the kingdom, and granted one million four hundred and eighty four thousand pounds for the services of the year, to be raised by a tax of three shillings in the pound upon lands, personal estates, pensioners and officers.

A. D. 1699. Notwithstanding the late appearance of affection and zeal that subsisted between the king and parliament, as instanced in their mutual compliance with the requests of each other, his majesty, from some private disgust, came to the house on the 4th of June, prorogued the parliament, and soon after embarked for Holland.

A very powerful party of malecontents prevailed at this time in Scotland. The Scots had formed a trading company, which, animated by the same prospect of gain that had transported so many Europeans into a new world established, at a great expence, a colony on the isthmus of Darien, between North and South America, to which they gave the name of Caledonia. The Spaniards exclaimed that such proceedings were infractions of the last treaty, and the English that they would ruin their commerce. William, therefore, sent orders to the English governors, forbidding all intercourse with the new colony, so that the Scots, disappointed by these means in their hopes and expectations of acquiring wealth, as well as reduced to the necessity of submitting to the Spaniards, breathed nothing but fury against king William, as the author of that destruction which inevitably resulted from his partial and illiberal conduct. Their parliament adopted the sense of the nation. All threatened a revolt, and it was only by time, address, and flattering promises, that the king prevented the most fatal consequences.

Nothing of importance transpired relative to the partition treaty, nor did any event of moment occur during his majesty's last visit to Holland, so that having settled the particular business of the States-general, he embarked for England, whither he arrived on the sixteenth of October. The parliament meeting about the middle of November, the king, in his speech to both houses, advised a further provision for the safety of the kingdom, by sea and land, and the repair of ships and fortifications, exhorted the commons to make good the deficiencies of the funds, discharge the national debt, and provide the necessary supplies. He assured them of his resolution to encourage virtue and punish vice, and that he would decline no difficulties nor dangers where the happiness of his people might be concerned. He then concluded with these words: "Since, therefore, our aims are "only for the general good, let us act with con- "fidence in one another, which will not fail, with "the blessing of God, to make me a happy king, "and you a great and flourishing people."

The American colonies having suffered much from piratical depredations, one Kidd, a desperate adventurer, undertook to suppress them, provided he was furnished with a ship of thirty guns well manned. Being thus equipped by voluntary subscription of several noblemen and gentlemen, he set sail from Plymouth, but instead of cruizing on the coast of America, and apprehending the pirates, he engaged in the same scandalous practices, and afterwards arriving on the coast of New York, was seized, together with his men, by lord Bellamont. An account was transmitted to the English government, and a man of war dispatched to put a stop to those infamous proceedings; but being driven back by stress of weather, the design was frustrated, and the desperadoes suffered to prosecute their ravages.

The commons this session took into consideration the right of the king to dispose of the forfeited estates in Ireland, and discussed the affair in such a manner as indicated motives of caprice and resentment rather than justice and equity.

Having framed and passed a bill of resumption, they directed an account of the whole transaction to be published for their vindication; and resolved, that the procuring or passing exorbitant grants by any member then of the privy council, or by any other that had been a privy counsellor, in this or any former reign, to his own use and benefit, was a high crime and misdemeanor. As the members of the lower house were apprehensive that this bill would be strongly opposed by those of the upper, they annexed it to the money bill, so that the one could not be rejected, without defeating the other. The lords proposed some alterations, but the commons refused to give their consent, and ordered a list of the privy-council to be laid before them.

The general measures of the commons seemed at this time to have been framed in order to thwart those of the king. They enquired into the most minute circumstances of government, rigorously censured the ministry, debated on a motion to address his majesty for the dismission of lord chancellor Somers, and evinced every principle of diffidence and disgust. William was so displeased at these instances of disaffection, that he could not dissemble his resentment, and from this circumstance his enemies employed the most inveterate malice to blacken his character.

In order to perplex and embarrass administration with fresh obstacles, the commons determined to address his majesty, that no person, who was not a native of his dominions, except his royal highness prince George of Denmark, should be admitted into his majesty's councils in England or Ireland. This resolution was levelled against Portland, Albemarle, and Galway; but to obviate that disagreeable business, his majesty prorogued the parliament to the 23d of May.

A. D. 1700. When the houses met according to prorogation, a bill was brought into the commons, purporting that no person born after the twenty-fifth day of March next ensuing, being a papist, should be capable of inheriting any title of honour or estate within the kingdom of England, principality of Wales, or town of Berwick upon Tweed; and that no papist should be capable of purchasing any lands or tenements, either in his own, or in the name of any other person in trust for him. But this bill being defectively framed in many instances, though it received the royal assent, never answered its original design.

The result of the negotiation for a second partition treaty between the contracting parties on the continent was, that in case his catholic majesty should die without issue, the dauphin should possess, for himself and his heirs, the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, the islands of St. Stephano, Porto, Hercole, Orbitello, Telamone, Porto Longone, Piombino, the marquisate of Final, the province of Guipuscoa, and the dutchies of Lorraine, and Barre; in exchange for which the duke of Lorraine should receive the dutchy of Milan; but that the country of Biche should remain in sovereignty to the prince of Vaudemont; that the archduke Charles ſhould inherit the kingdom of Spain, and all its dependencies in and out of Europe; but in caſe of his dying without iſſue, it ſhould devolve to ſome other child of the emperor, excepting him who was to ſucceed as emperor or king of the Romans; that this monarchy ſhould never deſcend to a king of France, or dauphin; and that three months ſhould be allowed for the emperor's conſideration whether he would accede to the treaty.

His majeſty according to annual cuſtom reviſited his native country in the month of July, and on the nineteenth day of the ſame died the young duke of Glouceſter, only ſurviving child of Anne princeſs of Denmark. Her death was much lamented by the greater part of the Engliſh nation, not only on account of his promiſing talents and affable diſpoſition, but alſo as fatal diſputes might happen in conſequence of the ſucceſſion being left doubtful.

The partizans of James conſidered this event as favourable to their wiſhes, of placing the pretended prince of Wales on that throne, which James had abdicated. But the proteſtants turned their eyes on the princeſs Sophia, electreſs-dowager of Hanover, and grand daughter of James the firſt, as neareſt heir in the proteſtant line, after the reſpective deſcendants of the king and the princeſs Anne, and this lineage afterwards eſtabliſhed the right of the houſe of Hanover to the crown of England.

Soon after his majeſty's return from Holland, he received intelligence of the death of the king of Spain. Charles had in his laſt will declared the duke of Anjou, ſecond ſon of the dauphin, ſole heir to the Spaniſh monarchy. In caſe this prince ſhould die without iſſue, or inherit the crown of France, he ordered that Spain ſhould devolve to the duke of Berry; in default of him and his children, to the archduke Charles and his heirs; in failure of whom, to the duke of Savoy and his poſterity.

Lewis who had concerted and executed this politic ſcheme, diſplayed great art and fineſſe in bringing it to a concluſion. After the will was accepted, by the French council, he addreſſed the duke of Anjou in the preſence of the Marquis de Rios, in the following manner, "Sir, the king of Spain has made you a "king. The grandees demand you, the people "wiſh for you, and I give my conſent. Remem-"ber only, you are a prince of France. I recom-"mend to you to love your people, to gain their "affection by the lenity of your government, and "render yourſelf worthy of the throne you are "about to aſcend." The new monarch was congratulated on his elevation by all the princes of the blood; nevertheleſs, the duke of Orleans and his ſon proteſted againſt the will, becauſe the archduke was placed next in ſucceſſion to the duke of Berry, in bar of their right as deſcendants of Anne of Auſtria. The emperor loudly exclaimed againſt the will, as being more iniquitous than the treaty of partion, and threatened to do himſelf juſtice by force of arms. The Spaniards gave themſelves up to the protection of Lewis, ſenſible that they were incapable of defending their own dominions.

William was fired with indignation, at being thus egregiouſly duped by the policy of the French king, but concealed his reſentment until he ſhould have ſounded the opinions of other powers in Europe, and ſeen how far he could rely on his new miniſtry. His chief favourite was the earl of Rocheſter, who was declared lord lieutenant of Ireland. A general change was made in the principal departments of ſtate, but the new miniſtry, conſcious that they had not intereſt ſufficient to procure a majority in the parliament, prevailed on the king to diſſolve it by proclamation, which was accordingly done, and the ſixth of February was appointed for the meeting of a new parliament.

A. D. 1701. At the meeting, on the day appointed, the king in his ſpeech to both houſes, obſerved, that the loſs of the duke of Glouceſter had rendered it abſolutely neceſſary to make ſome farther proviſion for ſettling the ſucceſſion in the proteſtant line; and that the death of the late king of Spain had produced ſuch an alteration in the affairs of Europe, as required their moſt ſerious deliberation. He then, as uſual, demanded ſupplies for the enſuing year; reminded them of the deficiencies and public debt; recommended to their regard the ſtrength of the nation, naval, and military; exhorted them to unanimity in their proceedings, and to employ the poor, by giving all poſſible encouragement to commerce.

The commons waited on his majeſty with an addreſs, in which they aſſured him that they would defend his perſon and government, and take ſuch effectual meaſures as might beſt conduce to the intereſt and ſafety of England, and the preſervation of the proteſtant religion.

The ſtates general, by their ambaſſador, preſented a memorial to king William, in which they acknowledged the duke of Anjou as king of Spain; informed him that France had agreed to a negotiation, in which they might ſtipulate the neceſſary conditions for ſecuring the peace of Europe, and that they were firmly reſolved to do nothing without the concurrence of his majeſty and the other allies; the commons alſo deſired permiſſion to inſpect the treaties between England and Holland.

The king having laid before the houſe the ſeveral articles of the memorial, they referred the matter to his majeſty's known wiſdom and policy, not doubting but he would act in ſuch a manner as would be moſt conducive to promote the grand and principal objects of the negotiation. They then voted, that proviſion ſhould be made from time to time for making good the principal and intereſt due upon all parliamentary funds; and afterwards paſſed a bill for renewing the bills of credit, commonly called the exchequer bills.

His majeſty having recommended the eſtabliſhment of the ſucceſſion of the crown, that affair was brought into the houſe, when, after ſome conſideration, and certain conditions being ſettled as preliminaries, in order to ſecure the privileges of the people, it was voted, "That the princeſs Sophia, "dutcheſs-dowager of Hanover, be declared next "in ſucceſſion to the crown of England, after his "majeſty and the princeſs of Denmark, and the "heirs of their bodies reſpectively." And, "that "the further limitation of the crown be to the "ſaid princeſs Sophia and the heirs of her body, "being proteſtants." The earl of Macclesfield was appointed to acquaint the princeſs, that the act of ſettlement had paſſed in her favour.

After theſe tranſactions, the ſecretary of ſtate, by order of the king, informed the houſe of the demands inſiſted on by Mr. Stanhope, his majeſty's plenipotentiary at the Hague, in conjunction with the ſtate's general, from the French ambaſſador; namely, that for the ſecurity of England, the cities of Oſtend and Nieuport ſhould be delivered into the hands of his Britannic majeſty; that no kingdoms, provinces, cities, lands, or places, belonging to the crown of Spain, ſhould ever be yielded, or transferred to the crown of France on any pretence whatever; that the ſubjects of his Britannic majeſty ſhould retain all the privileges, rights and immunities, with regard to navigation and commerce in the dominions of Spain, which they enjoyed at the death of his late Catholic majeſty; as alſo, all ſuch immunities, rights, and franchiſes, as the ſubjects of France or any other power, either poſſeſs for the preſent, or may enjoy for the future; that all treaties of peace and commerce between England and Spain ſhould be renewed, and that a treaty formed on theſe demands ſhould be guarantied by ſuch powers, as one or other of the contractors ſhould ſolicit or perſuade to undertake that office." But ſo extravagant were theſe demands in the opinion of count d'Avaux, the French ambaſſador, that he ſaid, they could not have been higher, if his maſter had loſt four ſucceſſive battles. He declared, that his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, would withdraw his troops from the Spaniſh Netherlands, as ſoon as the king of Spain ſhould have forces of his own ſufficient to guard the country; but with reſpect to the other articles, he could give no other anſwer, than, that he would immediately tranſmit them to Verſailles. Lewis affected to reſent the propoſals, as highly arrogant, as well as a ſure mark of the hoſtile intention of the allies, and refuſed to give any other ſecurity for the peace of Europe, than a renewal of the treaty of Ryſwick.

The affairs of Spain now engaged the attention of parliament, and the partition treaty became a ſubject of invective. They complained that it had been made without their advice, and tended to the aggrandizement of France. One of the members called it a felony, another compared it to the diſtribution of a booty taken on the highway. They afterwards drew up an addreſs, in which, among other particulars, they begged to lay before his majeſty the ill conſequences that muſt reſult from the treaty of partition to the intereſt of his kingdoms, and the peace of Europe in general. They beſought his majeſty to take the advice of his ſubjects, and believe them more worthy of confidence than foreigners; and added, moreover, that they adviſed him, in all his negotiations with the king of France, to take every precaution that could render them ſafe and uſeful.

Though William was greatly chagrined at theſe proceedings, he diſſembled his reſentment, and replied, that his treaty ſhould have the honour and ſecurity of England for its baſis. Lewis would recede in no point from the treaty of Ryſwick, ſo that the court of London and the ſtate's general prepared for a war, which ſeemed inevitable. The parliament expreſſed their ardor to aſſiſt the Dutch, but could not ſtifle their reſentment againſt thoſe miniſters to whom they attributed the negotiation of the partition treaty. Several noblemen were impeached with as much injuſtice as paſſion by the commons, and being acquitted by the upper houſe, animoſities univerſally prevailed. A memorial now appeared, ſigned LEGION, in which was this forcible expreſſion, "Engliſhmen are no more "to be ſlaves to parliaments than to kings. "Our name is Legion, and we are many."

So much hardineſs in the people was not unuſeful to the king, for the commons promiſed to aſſiſt him in all his meaſures for ſetting bounds to the exceſſive power of France, and voted him about two millions ſeven hundred thouſand pounds, for defraying the expences of the enſuing year.

Former animoſities beginning to revive between the two houſes, the king interrupted their diſputes, by putting an end to the ſeſſion on the twenty-fourth day of June, after having thanked the parliament for their zeal in the public ſervice, and exhorted them to a diſcharge of their duties, in their ſeveral counties.

Though William had acknowledged the new king of Spain, he ſeemed, however, determined to dethrone him; his health now daily declined, but not to diſcourage the allies from engaging in the confederacy, he carefully concealed his indiſpoſition. He conferred the command of the ten thouſand troops deſtined for Holland upon the earl of Marlborough, whom he likewiſe appointed his plenipotentiary to the ſtates general.

Having ſettled the regency, and other matters relative to domeſtic government, his majeſty embarked for Holland in the beginning of July, and, on his arrival at the Hague, aſſiſted at the aſſembly of the ſtates-general, whom he addreſſed in a very affectionate ſpeech, and was anſwered with great cordiality.

Soon after the arrival of William in Holland, d'Avaux, the French miniſter, delivered a letter to the ſtates from his maſter, who complained that they had interrupted the conferences, from which no good fruits were to be expected; but at the ſame time aſſured them, that it wholly depended on themſelves, whether they ſhould continue to receive marks of his ancient friendſhip for their republic. This letter was accompanied by an inſolent memorial, to which the ſtates-general returned a very ſpirited anſwer. As they were now convinced of the hoſtile intentions of France, they hired auxiliaries, increaſed their army, repaired their fortifications, and took every neceſſary precaution for their defence.

Though the confederate parties in general were intereſted in humbling the pride of the houſe of Bourbon, the emperor, who was moſt affected at the acceſſion of the duke of Anjou to the crown of Spain, aſſembled a powerful army, the command of which he beſtowed on prince Eugene, one of the greateſt and moſt fortunate generals then in Europe. That prince began the war in Italy, and ſhewed himſelf worthy of his reputation. Towards the end of the campaign, he took poſſeſſion of all the Mantuan territories, except Mantua itſelf, the blockade of which he formed. He reduced all the places on the Oglio, and kept the field the whole winter, exhibiting repeated marks of the moſt undaunted courage, indefatigable vigilance, and conſummate prudence. In January he had nearly ſurpriſed Cremona, by introducing a body of men through an old aqueduct: they forced one of the gates, by which the prince and his followers entered. Villeroy, the governor, being wakened by noiſe, ran out into the ſtreet, where he was taken, and the town muſt have inevitably been reduced had prince Eugene been joined by another body of troops he had ordered to advance from Parmeſan, to ſecure the bridge; which poſt being previouſly poſſeſſed by an Iriſh regiment in the French ſervice, the prince was compelled to retire, taking with him Villeroy the governor.

King William, having put his navy on the moſt reſpectable footing, the fleet under the command of Sir George Rooke, though they came to no action, kept all their neighbours in awe, during the courſe of this ſummer, while his Britannic majeſty was employed in perfecting the alliances, between the emperor, England, and Holland; ſo that a treaty was concluded at the Hague on the ſeventh of September.

The death of the weak and unfortunate prince James II. who expired at St. Germain's on the 16th of September; brought affairs much ſooner to criſis than was expected before that event. He was privately interred in the church of the Engliſh benedictines in that place. James poſſeſſed, from nature, many good qualities, but his bigotry was ſo great, and he was ſo governed by prieſts, that theſe qualities had no influence when the concerns of the church came under conſideration.

Lewis, elated by his victories, and depending too much on his own power, ſeemed haughtily to brave the ſtorm gathering againſt him, in giving the title of king of England to the ſon of the deceaſed James. His title was likewiſe recognized by the king of Spain, the duke of Savoy, and the pope. William was no ſooner informed of this tranſaction, than he diſpatched a courier to the king of Sweden as guarantee of the treaty of Ryſwic, to complain of this manifeſt violation. At the ſame time, even without an audience of leave, he directed the earl of Manchester to leave Paris.

In vain did Lewis diſperſe a manifeſto throughout Europe, declaring that he had not infringed any article of the treaty, in acknowledging the prince of Wales as king of England, for the Engliſh, already diſpoſed for war, felt themſelves inſulted and breathed only vengeance. One general intereſt now united all parties, and their reſolutions became unanimous.

The city of London, and moſt of the counties of England, tranſmitted addreſſes to his majeſty, declaring a due ſenſe of the indignity offered him by Lewis, and promiſing to ſupport his government againſt him and all his other enemies.

Having concluded the treaty of alliance, William propoſed to return to England, but being detained by the impaired ſtate of his health, he did not arrive till the fifth of November. The firſt thing that engaged his attention, was the expediency of calling a new parliament, which being determined in council, was put into execution, and a new parliament appointed to meet on the thirtieth of December.

On that day the commons having choſen Mr. Harley for their ſpeaker, his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he expreſſed his hope, that they were come together, determined to avoid diſputes and differences, and to act with a hearty concurrence for promoting the common cauſe. He ſaid he ſhould think it a particular bleſſing to England, if they were as much inclined to lay aſide thoſe unhappy animoſities, which divided and weakened them, as he was diſpoſed to make all his ſubjects ſafe and eaſy; even thoſe who had committed the higheſt offences againſt his perſon. At the ſame time he conjured them to diſappoint the hopes of their enemies by their unanimity. As he had always ſhewn, and always would ſhew, how deſirous he was to be the common father of all his people, he deſired they would lay aſide all parties and diviſions, ſo that no diſtinction might be known amongſt them. He concluded with affirming, that by their behaviour, it would be ſeen whether they were really in earneſt to have England hold the balance of power, and be at the head of the proteſtant intereſt.

This ſpeech was univerſally applauded. The peers aſſured his majeſty of their zeal for his perſon and government. The commons expreſſed the ſame ardor, and reſolved on a further addreſs, to his majeſty, that he would be graciouſly pleaſed to inſert an article in all his treaties of alliance, importing, that no peace ſhould be made with France, until his majeſty and the nation had received ſatisfaction for the great indignity offered by the French king, in owning and declaring the pretended prince of Wales, king of England, Scotland, and Ireland. They prepared a bill of attainder againſt the pretender, which being ſent up to the other houſe, paſſed with an additional clauſe of attainder againſt his mother.

A. D. 1702. While William was projecting meaſures for aſſerting his own dignity, and humbling the pride of the ambitious houſe of Bourbon, he was ſeized with an indiſpoſition that overſpread the nation with a cloud of ſorrow. His health had been long upon the decline, and by the advice of his phyſicians he had retired to Hampton-court, where, as he was one day taking the air, he fell from his horſe with ſuch violence as to break his collar bone. The bone, however, being immediately ſet, he returned to Kenſington the ſame evening, and ſeemed to be in a fair way of recovery, till the firſt of March, when a defluxion fell upon his knee, attended with very alarming ſymptons.

As this diſorder prevented his going to the houſe on the ſecond of March, the royal aſſent was given by commiſſion to ſuch bills as had paſſed both houſes, namely, the act of attainder againſt the pretended prince of Wales; and another in favour of the Quakers, enacting, that their ſolemn affirmation and declaration ſhould be accepted inſtead of an oath.

His majeſty was ſo far recovered by the ſeventh day of the month, that he took ſeveral turns in the gallery at Kenſington; but ſitting down on a couch and falling aſleep, he was ſeized when he awoke with a ſhivering which terminated in a fever and diarrhæa. Every remedy that could be thought on by his phyſicians was immediately adminiſtered, but without ſucceſs. He ſaw his laſt moments approach with that firmneſs of mind which had never left him. He thanked Dr. Bidloo for his care and tenderneſs, ſaying, "I know that you and the "other learned phyſicians have done all that your "art can do for my relief; but finding all means "ineffectual, I ſubmit." He was attended in his preparatory devotions by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the biſhop of Saliſbury. Finding his diſſolution near at hand, he enquired for the earl of Portland, who not arriving till after he was ſpeechleſs, the king could only ſhew the warmth of his friendſhip by graſping his hand, and preſſing it with extraordinary ardor to his heart.

His majeſty then reſigned his breath on the eighth of March, in the fifty-ſecond year of his age, and fourteenth of his reign. His body was interred on the twelfth of April, in Weſtminſter Abbey.

As it is the lot of humanity to err, and moſt human characters are tinged with light and ſhade, the mental portrait of king William has been drawn by various pens, in various colours. That prejudice and party zeal which blinded the writers of the laſt century, having now vaniſhed before candour and equity, he is generally conſidered, upon a comparative view, equal at leaſt to any prince that ever ſwayed the ſceptre of England. A reſerved temper, and a natural attachment to his countrymen the Dutch, frequently excited diſguſt, and raiſed jealouſies in the minds of his Engliſh ſubjects, to the mutual prejudice of prince and people. He appears to have had little or no taſte taſte for polite literature, nor to have been actuated by what are called the more refined ſenſations of the ſoul. But if we conſider him as a king and a warrior, and ſurvey his councils in the cabinet and atchievements in the field, no trifling defects can veil ſuch glaring merit. To maintain himſelf on the throne in ſpite of the efforts of the moſt powerful monarch in Europe; to diſcuſs by the moſt profound policy the counſels of foreign courts; to command armies with as much ability as reſolution; to be always formidable even after ill ſucceſs, indefatigable under ſickneſs and fatigue; in ſhort, if to vindicate and aſſert the natural rights of mankind and become the illuſtrious inſtrument in the hands of Providence for reſcuing our forefathers from popiſh ſuperſtition and arbitrary power, are actions worthy the veneration of the world, and the grateful acknowledgment of all Engliſhmen, the name of William Prince of Orange will ever be held ſacred to the lateſt poſterity.

Death and character of queen Anne.

A. D. 1702. ON the demiſe of king William, Anne Stuart, princeſs of Denmark, by virtue of the act of ſucceſſion, aſcended the throne of England, and was acknowledged by all the nation with a joy equally great and unanimous. When the news of the queen's acceſſion reached the kingdoms of Ireland and Scotland, the joy of the people appeared as ſincere as that of the people of England. The parliament, which continued to ſit after the king's death, met immediately and expreſſed the moſt lively zeal for her ſervice.

Anne's firſt act of ſovereignty was to convene the privy council, to whom ſhe declared her concern for the loſs the nation had ſuſtained, in the death of his late majeſty; her regard for the religion and liberties of her country; her deſire to maintain the ſucceſſion in the proteſtant line, and the government in church and ſtate, as by law eſtabliſhed; and finally, her reſolution to curb the inſolence of France, and purſue the true intereſt of England, together with that of the confederates. At the ſame time the queen iſſued a proclamation by which all magiſtrates and officers whether civil or military, were continued in their reſpective functions till further orders.

On the eleventh of March her majeſty went to the houſe of peers, where, after aſſuring her parliament that ſhe relied entirely on their affection and zeal for the eſtabliſhment of her revenues, ſhe promiſed to make the public good the ſole object of her adminiſtration, "As I know my heart," ſaid ſhe "to be entirely Engliſh, the happineſs and proſperity of England ſhall be my grand aim, and you ſhall always find me a ſtrict and religious obſerver of my word." The affable manner in which ſhe received the congratulations of her ſubjects increaſed their confidence and confirmed their loyalty.

Though the death of the late king had been a ſubject of rejoicing to the French, and of conſternation to the Hollanders, it produced a change in the affairs of Europe. The ſtates, animated by her majeſty's aſſurances, at length reſolved to proſecute vigorous meaſures, and the arrival of the earl of Marlborough ſtrengthened their reſolutions. That nobleman was ſent to Holland in quality of her majeſty's ambaſſador extraordinary and plenipotentiary potentiary to the ſtates-general. Every part of Marlborough's negotiation was attended with ſucceſs, and he embarked for England on the third of April, having firſt laid down the plan of operations for the following campaign.

During theſe tranſactions the commons reſolved to ſettle on her majeſty for life, the ſame revenue as had been allowed the late king William. On the thirtieth of March the queen went to the houſe of lords, and gave the royal aſſent to ſeveral public and private bills; at the ſame time, ſhe thanked the commons for continuing the ſame revenue to her as to the late king, told them ſhe would aſſign an hundred thouſand pounds thereof for the public ſervice of the preſent year, and adviſed them to diſpatch the public buſineſs as faſt as poſſible.

After a warm debate in council, whether the Engliſh ſhould engage in the war as principals or only as auxiliaries, the majority gave it in favour of the former, and a declaration of war was ordered to be prepared againſt France and Spain. The queen, however, laid the matter before the houſe of commons, and the comptroller, by her command, communicated to them the convention between her majeſty, the emperor, and the ſtates general. Having obtained the conſent of parliament, the queen cauſed war to be declared againſt France and Spain on the 4th of May, and two days after, the lord Godolphin was appointed lord high-treaſurer.

A bill having paſſed both houſes to impower her majeſty to name commiſſioners for treating with the Scots on the ſubject of an union, they were accordingly appointed, and met for the firſt time at the cockpit, where, after reading both commiſſions, the lord-keeper Wright made a ſhort ſpeech on the ſubject of their meeting, and was anſwered by the duke of Queenſbury. Accordingly, they agreed, that the two kingdoms ſhould be inſeparably united into one monarchy, under her majeſty, her heirs and ſucceſſors, and under the ſame limitations, according to the act of ſettlement: but when the Scottiſh commiſſioners propoſed, that the rights and privileges of their company trading to Africa and the Indies ſhould be preſerved and maintained, inſurmountable difficulties aroſe, and no farther progreſs was then made in the affair.

The campaign in Germany was begun with the ſiege of Keyſerſwaert, which was reduced after a deſperate reſiſtance, by the prince of Naſſau Saarbrugh mareſchal de camp to the emperor. General Coehorn, at the head of a ſtrong detachment, had entered Flanders, demoliſhed the French lines, between the forts of Donat and Iſabella, and laid Chatellaine under contribution.

When Marlborough arrived in Holland he repaired to the army then encamped under the walls of Nimeguen, paſſed the Maeſe on the 16th of July, and encamped within two leagues and a half of the enemy. The French army, under the command of the duke of Burgundy and mareſchal Boufflers, being infererior to that of the allies, and determining to avoid the hazard of a battle, abandoned Spaniſh Guelderland, and left it intirely to their diſcretion, by which means Marlborough took Venlo, Ruremonde and Leige, and prepared himſelf for more memorable expeditions. Thus ended the firſt campaign equally advantageous to the allies and honorary to the earl, who now eſtabliſhed that military fame, for which he ſtands ſo renowned in the annals of hiſtory.

The confederate army being now ſeparated, Marlborough repaired to Maeſtricht, where he embarked that evening on the Maeſe for the Hague, accompanied by general Opdam, and Mynheer Guildermanſer, one of the deputies of the ſtates, together with twenty-five ſoldiers, under the command of a lieutenant to ſerve as convoy. But the boats being ſeparated in the night, a French partizan, with thirty-five men from Gueldres, who was lurking among the ruſhes on the banks of the river, obſerving the boat in which were the earl and his attendants, they ſeized the rope by which it was drawn, diſcharged their ſmall arms, and then ruſhing into it, ſecured the ſoldiers, before they could put themſelves in a poſture of defence. They afterwards rifled the baggage, carried off the guard as priſoners, and allowed the boat to proceed. An account of this tranſaction having reached the Hague, greatly alarmed the inhabitants; but their fears were ſoon diſpelled by the arrival of the earl, whom they now conſidered as their friend and deliverer.

King William, a ſhort time before his death, had formed a deſign to reduce Cadiz, and this ſcheme queen Anne determined to put in execution. The fleet conſiſted of fifty ſail of the line, commanded by Sir George Rooke; and the duke of Ormond was appointed general of the land forces, deſtined for this expedition.

They ſailed from St. Helen's the latter end of June, and anchored about two leagues from Cadiz on the twelfth of Auguſt. On the fifteenth the duke of Ormond landed with his forces in the bay of Bulls, under cover of a ſmart fire from ſome frigates. He ſummoned the governor of St. Catherine to ſurrender; and received for anſwer, that the garriſon were prepared for his reception. The allies raiſed a battery againſt Montagorda fort; but were ſoon obliged to reimbark their troops on failure of the attempt.

While they were on their way for England, admiral Rooke, receiving advice that the Weſt India galleons had put into Vigo under convoy of a French ſquadron, reſolved to ſail thither, and attack them in that poſture. The paſſage into the harbour was defended by batteries, forts, and breaſtworks on each ſide; by a ſtrong boom conſiſting of iron chains, topmaſts, and cables, moored at each end to a ſeventy gun ſhip, and fortified within by five ſhips of the ſame ſtrength, laying athwart the channel with their broadſides to the offing. As the firſt and ſecond rates of the combined ſhips were too large to enter, the admirals ſhifted their flags to ſmaller veſſels. In order to favour the attempt the duke of Ormond landed with twenty five hundred men, at the diſtance of two leagues from Vigo, and attacked a fort and platform of forty pieces of cannon, at the mouth of the harbour, of which he made himſelf maſter.

As ſoon as the Britiſh enſign was diſplayed at the top of this fort, the ſhips advanced to the attack. Vice admiral Hopſon in the Torbay crouding all his ſail, ran directly againſt the boom, which was ſhivered by the firſt ſhock; the whole ſquadron entered the harbour, through a terrible fire from the enemy's ſhips and batteries; and the French, finding themſelves unequal to their antagoniſts, reſolved, after a deſperate engagement, to ſet fire to the galleons and ſhips of war, that they might not fall into the hands of the Engliſh. They accordingly burned and ran aſhore eight ſhips and as many advice-boats; but ten French men of war and eleven galleons were taken. The value of fourteen millions of pieces of eight, in plate and rich commodities, were loſt in ſix galleons that periſhed riſhed; but about half that value was brought off by the conquerors, ſo that this adventure proved a dreadful ſtroke to the enemy, and a noble acquiſition to the allies. Sir George Rooke being joined ſoon after by Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, who had been ſent out with a ſquadron to intercept the galleons, returned home in triumph, leaving Sir Cloudeſley to deſtroy the fortifications, and bring the prizes to England.

But the general joy excited by the ſucceſs of the late expedition, was damped by an event which took place in America. The gallant admiral Bembow was defeated by the French in the Weſt Indies. This brave commander, being of a violent temper, is ſuppoſed to have diſguſted ſeveral of his captains, who baſely deſerted him in the midſt of action. He had a leg ſhot off, and received ſeveral other wounds, notwithſtanding which he refuſed to quit the deck. An officer expreſſing his ſorrow that he had loſt a leg: "I am ſorry too," ſaid Bembow, "but I wiſh I had loſt them both rather "than have ſeen my country thus diſhonoured." Some of theſe traitors were apprehended and executed purſuant to a ſentence of a court martial; and the brave Bembow was ſuppoſed to have fallen a ſacrifice as much to grief of heart, as from the conſequences of his wounds.

The queen by gaining the hearts of her ſubjects, laid the foundation of all the ſucceſſes of her reign. She ſummoned a parliament and addreſſed them in a manner beſt adapted to perſuade. Inſtead of availing herſelf of the royal prerogative, ſhe deſired the commons to examine the public accounts that that they might diſcover the errors of adminiſtration, and puniſh the guilty with juſt ſeverity. She recommended every means of rendering commerce, manufactures and arts more flouriſhing. She declared the love of her people was the ſureſt pledge of their obedience and fidelity, and that as ſhe regarded her intereſt as inſeparable from that of the nation, the public good ſhould be the object of all her efforts.

The commons granted ſupplies for the maintenance of forty thouſand men. They thanked the duke of Ormond and admiral Rooke for the ſingular ſervices they had rendered their country in their reſpective departments. They ſettled on the prince of Denmark a penſion of one hundred thouſand pounds per annum if he ſurvived the queen. Marlborough, created a duke by his royal miſtreſs, received the applauſe he merited. She propoſed to reward his ſervices with a grant of five thouſand pounds a year, iſſuing out of the revenue of the Poſt-office, but this becoming a ſubject of debate in the lower houſe, the duke deſired to decline the favour her majeſty intended him.

A. D. 1703. In the beginning of this year the queen acquainted the commons that the ſtates general had preſſed her to augment her forces, as the only means to defeat the great and early preparations of the enemy. The commons reſolved, therefore, that ten thouſand men ſhould be hired as an augmentation of the forces to act in conjunction with the allies; but on this expreſs condition, that an immediate ſtop ſhould be put to all commerce and correſpondence with France and Spain on the part of the ſtates general. The Dutch conſcious that their intereſt was inſeparable from that of the allies, reſolved to yield a ready compliance, and accordingly, a prohibition of commerce with France and Spain was immediately publiſhed.

The violence of parties ſtill ſubſiſted; the adherents to hierachy availed themſelves of this circumſtance as the beſt means of accompliſhing their favorite purpoſe of extirpating the oppoſite party. With this view, three members were ordered by the houſe of commons to bring in a bill for preventing occaſional conformity.

The debates on this bill were very warm in the lower houſe, but it met with great oppoſition in the upper. Moſt of the peers were of opinion, that beſides the original deſign of ſecuring entirely the election of parliaments, it was intended as a preparatory ſtep towards the repeal of the toleration act. The majority of the biſhops, and amongſt theſe, in particular, Burnet of Sarum, argued againſt it, with that candour, and at the ſame time evident force, which chriſtian charity and ſound learning united never fail to inſpire. The oppoſite party, however, had the ſanction and aſſiſtance of the court intereſt. After long debates and a free conference between the two houſes, the lords adhered to their amendments, the commons perſiſted in rejecting them, the bill miſcarried, and both parties aimed to juſtify their conduct by a publication of their ſeveral proceedings.

As numbers of people had not taken the oath for abjuring the pretended prince of Wales, a bill was brought into the lower houſe, to allow them one year longer to determine if they would take it. The lords added three clauſes, importing, that thoſe perſons who ſhould take the oath within the limited time, might return to their benefices and employments, provided they were not already filled; that any perſon endeavouring to defeat the ſucceſſion to the crown, as now limited by law, ſhould be deemed guilty of high treaſon; and that the oath of abjuration ſhould be impoſed upon the ſubjects of Ireland. The queſtion being put, whether they ſhould agree to the amendments of the lords, it was carried in the affirmative by one voice, and thus was a new ſecurity provided for a proteſtant ſucceſſor; a circumſtance, by which all lovers of their country were filled with the ſincereſt joy.

The Engliſh fleet being joined by twelve Dutch ſhips of the line, ſailed from St. Helen's, the combined ſquadrons amounting to fifty ſeven ſail, having under them a convoy of 200 merchantmen. On the 24th of July, they arrived off the rock of Liſbon, where Sir Cloudeſley Shovel commander in chief, called a council of war, in which the rendezvous was appointed to be held in Altea bay, on the coaſt of Valencia. Having made a deſcent with two thouſand five hundred men, the admiral publiſhed a declaration, intimating, that he came, not to injure the Spaniards, but to protect them from the tyranny of the French, whereupon the Spaniards chearfully ſupplied them with proviſions.

When Sir Cloudeſley arrived before Leghorn, count Lamberg went on board, to inform him that (notwithſtanding the duke of Anjou had been declared ſucceſſor to the late Spaniſh monarch) the archduke of Auſtria, had (by order of the emperor) been proclaimed at Vienna king of Spain, by the name of Charles III.

On the ſeventeenth of November the admiral arrived in the Downs, without having once an opportunity of engaging the French fleet, which kept cloſe in Toulon the whole time the combined ſquadrons were in the Mediterranean.

The military operations of the contending parties were carried on with various ſucceſs. if on one ſide, the duke of Marlborough took Bonne, Huy and Limbourg, Boufflers, on the other, defeated the Dutch general Opdam; the duke of Burgundy made himſelf maſter of Old Briſac; and count Tallard retook Landau, and defeated the prince of Heſſe.

The Engliſh fleet at this time met with a dreadful diſaſter. A moſt alarming tempeſt, by which the houſes even in London were ſhaken, and many thrown down, occaſioned the loſs of thirteen ſhips of war. The damage in London, eſtimated at a million, was only a part of the immenſe loſs ſuſtained by the kingdom in general. Theſe events might have revived the drooping ſpirits of Lewis; but he loſt in his turn two allies, whoſe defection threatened him with great misfortunes. Theſe were the duke of Savoy and the king of Portugal, who, actuated by ſimilar motives of intereſt, determined in favour of the grand alliance.

On the ninth of November the parliament met, and the queen opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech in which ſhe expreſſed the moſt ardent wiſh of ſeeing them in perfect union among themſelves, and deſired they would avoid all heats and diviſions. She deſired of the commons ſupplies to enable her to perform her engagement with the king of Portugal, and the duke of Savoy, as well as her former engagements. She told them, that the funds held out ſo well, and the prizes were ſo conſiderable, that they had defrayed the charge of the expedition to Portugal, and of the augmentation of troops deſired by the ſtates general; that ſhe had, out of her own revenue, contributed to the ſupport of the circle of Suabia, whoſe firm adherence to the intereſt of the allies, under the greateſt preſſures, well deſerved her aſſiſtance. She wiſhed a leſs expenſive way could be deviſed for manning the fleet; and at the ſame time expreſſed an earneſt deſire of ſeeing the intereſt of the allies in a ſtill more flouriſhing ſtate. The commons then came to a reſolution, that the forty thouſand men, which were raiſed to act in conjunction with the forces of the allies, and the additional troops, conſiſting of ten thouſand men, ſhould be continued for the uſe of the enſuing year; that the proportion of land forces to act in conjunction with Portugal ſhould be eight thouſand men, one thouſand whereof to be horſe and dragoons; that five thouſand marines, and forty thouſand ſailors, ſhould be employed, making the whole number, for the following year, upwards of one hundred thouſand.

In conſequence of an intimation given by her majeſty to both houſes, that a plot was forming againſt her in Scotland, abetted by the emiſſaries of Lewis, the lords appointed a committe to examine into the matter, and aſſured her majeſty they would, with their utmoſt zeal, maintain the rights of the crown, and the church of England, in ſuch a manner, as might beſt conduce to further her majeſty's pious deſigns, and promote the happineſs of all her ſubjects; an addreſs to this purport was alſo preſented by the commons.

When Marlborough, in the name of his royal miſtreſs, complimented the archduke of Auſtria, on his advancement to the throne of Spain, he took his ſword from his ſide, and gave it to the duke with a pleaſant aſpect, ſaying to him in French; "I have nothing but my cloak and ſword, and I "hope you will not think it the worſe for one day's "wearing." On the contrary, replied the duke, "it will always put me in mind of your majeſty's "juſt right and title, and of the obligations I lie "under to hazard my life in making you the "greateſt prince in Chriſtendom." Marlborough returned to England in October, and the king of Spain embarking with him under convoy of an Engliſh and Dutch ſquadron, arrived at Spithead on the twenty-ſixth day of December. Having paſſed through the uſual formalities at the court of Windſor, he returned to Portſmouth, from whence on the fifth of January, he ſailed for Portugal, with the grand fleet, commanded by Sir George Rooke; but meeting with a violent ſtorm off cape Finiſterre, wherein they received conſiderable damage, they were, on the twentieth day of the month, obliged to put into St. Helen's; the damage, however, which the fleet had ſuſtained, being repaired, they ſailed with a fair wind on the tenth of February for Portugal, where the king ſafely arrived on the twenty-fifth, and was received with great ſplendour, amidſt the acclamations of the people.

A. D. 1704. When the parliament aſſembled in the beginning of March, the lords exhibited a charge againſt admiral Graydon, for not attacking a ſquadron of the enemy of inferior force, in his way to the Weſt-Indies, as alſo for ſeverities exerciſed towards maſters of tranſports under his convoy, and that officer by her majeſty's command was diſmiſſed the ſervice. With reſpect to the Scottiſh plot, they reſolved, that it appeared evident to that houſe, there had been a dangerous conſpiracy carried on for raiſing a rebellion in Scotland, and invading that kingdom by a French power, with a view to bring in the pretended prince of Wales, to the ſubverſion of her majeſty's government.

The parliament having finiſhed the neceſſary buſineſs of the ſeſſion, her majeſty, on the 3d of April, thanked both houſes for their readineſs to aſſiſt her in the proſecution of the war, and the houſe of commons in particular for the diſpatch of their ſupplies. By this time the emperor's affairs being in a moſt deplorable ſituation, the imperial envoy to the court of London preſented a memorial to the queen, diſplaying the imminent danger of Germany, and imploring her majeſty's aſſiſtance. The ſecretary of ſtate, by command of the queen, informed the envoy, that ſhe had ordered the duke of Marlborough to concert the moſt effectual means to prevent the fatal conſequences apprehended by his maſter. Accordingly the duke embarked for Holland, and arrived at the Hague on the twenty-firſt of April, and by a forcible repreſentation of the ſtate of the empire, brought the Dutch into compliance with the project of lending a body of troops for its immediate relief. The forces allotted for this expedition were ſpeedily aſſembled, and proceeded for Maeſtricht under his grace's command.

Having obtained every thing he wiſhed, Marlborough purſued his rout into the heart of the empire, forced the elector of Bavaria's lines, ravaged the country, and at length joined prince Eugene. Theſe two generals, emulous of glory, and animated by the ſame zeal for the common cauſe, attacked near Hockſted the French and Bavarian army, ſuperior in number, and able, by avoiding a battle, to have reduced the allies through want of forage. Villars, at this time on bad terms with the elector, was employed againſt the revolted proteſtants in the Cevennes. A great general is not eaſily replaced. The mareſchals Tallard and Marſin, leſs ſkilful, though full as brave as Villars, committed errors to which their defeat by ſome writers has been attributed. Such, however, was the proweſs of Marlborough and Eugene in conjunction, that the defeat was ſoon general, the field ſtrewed with dead, and the Danube covered with fugitives, who were drowned in endeavouring to to escape. There remained in the village of Blenheim eleven or twelve thousand of the best troops. Unable to range themselves in order of battle, or force their way through a victorious army, they surrendered themselves prisoners without fighting. In short the allies gained a complete victory. About twelve thousand slain, fourteen thousand prisoners, an hundred pieces of cannon, three hundred colours and standards, and an immense booty, were the trophies of their victory. The duke of Bavaria was obliged to fly, and abandoned his dominions to their mercy. Marlborough signalized himself in this action as much by his valour as his military talents. Mareschal Tallard, his prisoner, having complimented him "on the defeat of the best troops in Europe:" "I hope," replied the duke, "you will except the troops that defeated them." Marlborough was amply compensated for his services. The emperor created him a prince of the empire, Holland shewed him peculiar honours, and that spacious mansion, to which he gave the name of Blenheim, is a monument of the public gratitude. The celebrated Addison did him still greater honour by immortalizing him in his poems.

The confederates afterwards penetrated into Alsace, took Landau, and spread universal terror.

The siege of Landau finished the campaign in Germany, the duke of Marlborough repaired to Berlin, and contracted for a reinforcement of eight thousand Prussians to serve under prince Eugene in Italy during the ensuing campaign. Soon after he embarked for England, where he was received with those demonstrations of joy and gratitude his important services so well deserved.

The principal actions in Flanders were the bombardment of Bruges and Namur by nine thousand Dutch troops, and two attempts on the French lines.

The superiority of the French in Italy over the duke of Savoy gave them great advantages. They reduced Vercelli, Jurea, and Verac, the last of which places sustained a siege of no less than five months. The duke bore his losses with great equanimity, and told the English minister, that though he was abandoned by the allies, he scorned to follow their example.

The operations of the combined fleet at sea were nearly as glorious as those of the allied armies by land, and therefore demand particular attention. Sir George Rooke, having landed king Charles at Lisbon, was ordered by the ministry to cruize in the Mediterranean, and watch the motions of the Toulon squadron. Soon after he received advice, that a strong fleet from Brest had passed Lisbon, in order to join the Toulon division. Sir George soon descried the Brest squadron, and commanded the fleet to tack and stand after them; but the French having the weather gage, and night coming on, he could not bring them to action; he therefore, as soon as they were out of sight, sailed towards the Streights, where he was joined by Sir Cloudesley Shovel, with a large fleet under his command. A council of war was held in the road of Tetuan, on the seventeenth of July, the result of which was that they should sail to make a sudden attempt upon Gibraltar, in consequence of a violation of a clause in the second partition treaty. On the twenty-first, the prince of Hesse landed on the Isthmus with eighteen hundred marines, and summoned the garrison to surrender; but the governor answered, that the place should be defended to the last extremity. Next day the admiral gave orders to cannonade the town, and perceiving that the enemy were driven from the fortifications at the South Molehead, he commanded captain Whitaker to arm all the boats, and attack that quarter. But the captains Hicks and Jumper, who lay next the Mole, pushed on shore with their pinnaces, and entered the fortifications sword in hand. The enemy sprung a mine, by which two lieutenants and about an hundred men were either killed or wounded. Nevertheless, the two captains made themselves masters of the platform, and maintained their ground, until they were supported by captain Whitaker, and the rest of the seamen, who took by storm a redoubt between the Mole and the town. The governor then capitulated, and the prince of Hesse entered the place, amazed at the success of this attempt, considering the strength of the fortifications, which might have been defended by an handful of men against a numerous army. The admiral now returned to Tetuan to take in wood and water, leaving a sufficient number of troops to defend the place, under the command of the prince.

This was no sooner accomplished than the admiral put to sea, and on the 11th of August got sight of the French fleet, which he pursued with all the sail he could make. On the 13th the combined fleets came up with the enemy, as they lay in a line off Malaga, ready to receive them to the number of fifty two ships of the line, and four and twenty gallies, under the command of the count of Thoulouse, high-admiral of France, with the inferior flags of the black and white divisions. The combined fleet consisted of fifty three ships of the line, exclusive of frigates, but were inferior to the French in weight of metal, and in the number of guns and men.

A little after ten in the morning the action began, when the rear and the van commanded by Sir Cloudesley Shovel, and the Dutch admiral Callemberg, immediately pressed forward to a close engagement, and soon compelled the enemy to give way: but the center of the French being remarkably strong, bore hard upon Rooke's division, several of whose ships, having expended their shot, were obliged to leave the line as entirely useless. The fight, however, was maintained till night, when the French bore away to leeward. In the night the wind shifted to the northward, and in the morning to the westward, which gave the enemy advantage over the combined fleet, and at length they disappeared. The loss in this engagement was pretty equal on both sides, though not a single ship was taken or destroyed by either. After the battle Sir George Rooke sailed to Gibraltar to refit, and leaving a squadron with Sir John Leake, set sail for England on the twenty-fourth of August. He arrived in September, and was received by the ministry, and the people in general, with the highest marks of approbation and esteem.

The news of the reduction of Gibraltar no sooner reached the court of Madrid, than Philip, the reigning king of Spain, sent the marquis of Villadartas with an army to retake that important fortress. During a siege of four months, the prince of Hesse displayed great proofs of his military capacity. Gibraltar was supplied with provisions and forces from Lisbon, till that communication was cut off by a strong squadron entering the bay, under the command of Monsieur de Pointis, who, however, retiring at the approach of Sir John Leake and admiral Vanderdussen, the marquis speedily abandoned his attempt.

On the meeting of parliament, the queen in her speech ſpeech, obſerved, that the remarkable ſucceſs with which Providence had crowned her arms had excited ſentiments of joy in all her ſubjects; and that a timely improvement of the preſent advantages would enable them to procure a laſting foundation of ſecurity for England. She deſired of the commons the ſupplies for the enſuing year, and aſſured them they ſhould be carefully managed, at the ſame time recommending a ſpeedy diſpatch. Next day the lords congratulated her majeſty on the ſucceſs of her arms under the conduct of the duke of Marlborough. The commons alſo preſented an addreſs, in which they mentioned the atchievements of admiral Rooke; and aſſured her majeſty, they came diſpoſed to do every thing that was neceſſary, for the effectual proſecution of the war; and that they would ſo diſpatch the public buſineſs, as might enable her majeſty to purſue the advantages ſhe had already obtained over the common enemy.

Soon after the commons, by an unanimous vote, preſented an addreſs, requeſting her majeſty to beſtow her bounty upon the ſeamen and land forces who had behaved ſo gallantly in the ſervice of their country; and received for anſwer, that cognizance ſhould be taken of their requeſt. They then voted the number of forces, and the ſums neceſſary for their ſubſiſtance during the enſuing year.

The parliament having experienced great difficulties attending the northern parts of Britain continuing as a ſeparate kingdom, a bill was brought into the upper houſe, for enabling her majeſty to name commiſſioners for treating with thoſe of Scotland, in order to ſettle an union between the two kingdoms.

A. D. 1705. The duke of Marlborough, on his firſt appearance in the houſe, was honoured with the thanks of the peers, in an elegant ſpeech pronounced by the lord keeper. A committee of the houſe of commons alſo waited on his grace, to give him the thanks of that houſe, and to congratulate him on his ſucceſſes.

But as the moſt exalted minds are liable to prejudice, and the influence of favorites, the queen, (wrought upon by the dutcheſs of Marlborough, whoſe ambition could not bear the idea of any commander naval or military, being placed upon a level with her huſband) treated the gallant Rooke with cold neglect, and, as an inſtance of very reprehenſible partiality, if not injuſtice, appointed Sir Cloudeſly Shovel rear admiral of England.

The commons, in their addreſs to the queen, took particular notice of the deficiency of their allies in furniſhing their reſpective quotas towards carrying on the war, as well by ſea as by land, and beſought her majeſty to uſe her intereſt with them, that next year they might furniſh their complete proportion according to their ſeveral treaties. The queen returned a favourable anſwer to this as well as every other part of the addreſs, and after giving the royal aſſent to the bills that had paſſed, diſſolved the parliament; and ordered a proclamation to be iſſued for calling another.

As no plan appeared more effectual for the improvement of the advantages obtained by the memorable battle of Blenheim, than that of making an impreſſion on the frontiers of France, the Moſelle was pitched on as the ſcene of action. The ſtates general having agreed to the project, Marlborough ſet out for Maeſtricht to aſſemble his army. About the latter end of May, the troops paſſed the Maeſe, and continued their march towards the Moſelle, under the command of general Churchill, while the duke ſet out for Raſtadt, to viſit prince Lewis of Baden. At a conference held, according to appoinmtent, between theſe two great generals, it was reſolved that a ſufficient number of German troops ſhould be left for ſecuring Lauterberg and Stolhoffen, under the command of general Thungen, and that prince Lewis ſhould advance with a ſtrong detachment towards the Saar, to act in concert with the duke. As forage was very ſcarce in that part of the country, and it was therefore impoſſible for the allied army to ſubſiſt long between the rivers Moſelle and Saar, Marlborough ſent repeated remonſtances to quicken the march of the imperialiſts, but neither his remonſtances, nor thoſe of the deputies of the ſtate had any effect. Prince Lewis, inſtead of joining the duke in perſon, repaired to Swalbach, leaving the command of the Imperial troops to the count de Frize.

Whilſt the duke was in this ſtate of ſuſpenſe and diſappointment, the French did not fail to puſh their ſuperiority in the Netherlands. They inveſted Huy, and took it with the caſtle and forts, on the eleventh of June, making the garriſon priſoners of war, and immediately afterwards undertook the reduction of the citadel of Liege. The ſtates general having informed the duke of Marlborough of theſe diſaſters, and repreſented to him the neceſſity of making a powerful diverſion on the Moſelle, or of returning immediately to the defence of their frontiers, he reſolved to abandon his deſign on the river, and return to the Netherlands. Having marched with great expedition, he arrived time enough to ſave the citadel of Liege; and the French, upon advice of his approach, retired to Namur. On the ſixth of July, the allies inveſted Huy, and in a few days the garriſon was obliged to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war. The confederate troops paſſed the French lines with very little oppoſition, but were afterwards attacked by a formidable party of Bavarian cavalry. This occaſioned a ſharp action, but they were ſoon defeated and put to flight, leaving their ſtandards and artillery behind them. Two lieutenant generals were taken priſoners, together with one major general, and ſeventy-four inferior officers. Nothing farther of moment happened in Flanders during the campaign of this year. The duke put his army into winter quarters, and after concerting the operations of the next campaign with the Emperor and the ſtates general, embarked for England, and arrived at St. James's on the thirtieth of December.

No ſignal event was produced by the campaigne on the Rhine. The Imperialiſts were commanded by prince Eugene, the French by the duke de Vendome. The former reduced Druſenheim, and Hagonau, and forced the enemy's lines at the place laſt mentioned. The duke de Feuillade, who commanded a ſeparate army near Turin, reduced Chivas, and inveſted Nice, which ſurrendered in the month of December after a vigorous defence.

The Portugueſe with their allies the Engliſh and Dutch, marched to the frontiers of Spain, and meeting no enemy in the field on that ſide, inveſted Alcantara in the province of Alentejo, which ſurrendered; and the garriſon, conſiſting of ſeven hundred Spaniards, were made priſoners. They afterwards laid ſiege to Abuquerque, which held out a week, and then capitulated on honourable terms. It was afterwards debated, whether they ſhould inveſt Bajadox; but that town being better fortified than either of the former, the deſign was laid aſide.

The marquis de la Minas, who commanded a ſeparate body of the Portugueſe in the province of Beyra, reduced the town of Salvaterra, plundered and burned Sarca, but was obliged to retire to Penamacos, on the appearance of the enemy; which concluded the campaign in that part of the country.

The moſt remarkable atchievements of this ſummer, was the reduction of Barcelona by the earl of Peterborough and Sir Cloudeſly Shovel, who, in the latter end of May, ſailed from St. Helen's with the Engliſh fleet, and on the twentieth of June landed at Liſbon, where they were reinforced by Sir John Leake, and the Dutch admiral Allemonde. On the twenty-ſecond they arrived in the bay of Barcelona, the troops were diſembarked to the eaſtward of the city, where they poſſeſſed themſelves of a ſtrong camp, and were well received by the country people. On the twenty-eighth, Charles (whom the emperor had lately declared king of Spain) landed amidſt the acclamations of an infinite multitude from the neighbouring towns and villages, who welcomed him with the utmoſt tranſport, crying out, "long live the king."

Though the garriſon of Barcelona conſiſted of five thouſand men, commanded by expert and valiant officers, it was determined, after long debates in various councils of war, to proceed to the ſiege. But previous to the attempt, the prince of Heſſe propoſed to lord Peterborough a ſcheme for ſurprizing Montjuic, to effect which the neceſſary preparations were made. At ſix o'clock in the evening a detachment of one thouſand men was ordered to march by the way of Serria, and a thouſand more followed at midnight to ſupport them if there ſhould be occaſion. The outworks were carried by aſſault, with the loſs of the gallant prince of Heſſe, who was ſhot through the head, and expired in a few hours. The earl of Peterborough then began to bombard the body of the fort, and a ſhell happening to fall into the magazine of powder, blew it up, together with the governor and ſome of the principal officers; an accident which ſo alarmed the garriſon, that they ſurrendered without further reſiſtance.

The trenches being open, and the batteries erected againſt the town, it was bombarded with ſuch fury that in a few days the governor, deſpairing of relief capitulated, and on the fourth of October, king Charles entered in triumph. All the other places in Catalonia, except Roſeas, declared for him; ſo that the largeſt and richeſt province of Spain was conquered by an army ſcarce doubling in number the garriſon of Barcelona. Charles wrote with his own hand a letter to queen Anne, containing a circumſtantial detail of his affairs; the warmeſt expreſſions of gratitude, and the greateſt encomiums of the earl of Peterborough and her other ſubjects.

After the capture of Barcelona, it was reſolved in a council of war, that a ſtrong naval force ſhould be ſtationed in the Mediterranean, and at Gibraltar under the command of Sir John Leake and Lord Peterborough. Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, with nineteen ſhips of the line and part of the Dutch fleet, ſailed through the ſtreights, and arrived at Spithead. The Breſt fleet was ſo well obſerved by a ſquadron of the Engliſh, that the French did not think proper to venture out; but the Dunkirk Squadron, under the command of the count de St. Paul, took the homeward bound Baltic fleet, with their convoy of three ſhips of war.

On the twenty-fifth of October, the new parliament met, and the commons choſe Mr. Smith for their ſpeaker. Two days after, her majeſty made a ſpeech to both houſes, in which ſhe repreſented the neceſſity of acting with the utmoſt vigour againſt France, the common enemy of the liberties of Europe; informed them that ſhe had an intention to expedite an union with Scotland; recommended unanimity among themſelves, and aſſured them that thoſe who would concur with her in theſe laudable deſigns, might rely on her favour and protection. Both houſes, in conſequence of this ſpeech, preſented addreſſes in the warmeſt terms of duty and affection. The commons aſſured her majeſty of their aſſiſtance in bringing the treaty of union to a happy concluſion; after which, they proceeded to examine the eſtimates for the ſervices of the enſuing year, and chearfully granted ſuch ſupplies as were wanted.

In the courſe of this ſeſſion, the duke of Marlborough received the thanks of the houſe of commons for his ſignal ſervices in the laſt campaign; the credit of that nobleman was, indeed, exceeding high at this juncture, as was public credit in general. The kingdom was bleſſed with plenty; the forces were well paid, notwithſtanding the great quantity of coin exported for the maintenance of the war; and the face of things wore a pleaſing aſpect.

A. D. 1706. The parliamentary buſineſs being concluded, her majeſty went to the houſe of peers on the 17th of March, and having given the royal aſſent to ſeveral public and private acts, made a ſpeech to both houſes, wherein ſhe expreſſed her acknowledgements for the unanimity and diſpatch with which they had conducted the public buſineſs, and the zeal and affection they had ſhewn for her ſervice, and then prorogued the parliament.

The commiſſioners appointed for forming a conſolidating union of the two kingdoms of England and Scotland met at the cock-pit on the ſixteenth of April. Their commiſſions being opened and read by the reſpective ſecretaries, and introductory ſpeeches being pronounced by the lord keeper of England, and the lord chancellor of Scotland, they agreed to certain preliminary articles, importing, that all the propoſals ſhould be made in writing, and every point when agreed reduced into writing; that no points ſhould be obligatory, till all matters ſhould be adjuſted in ſuch a manner as would be proper to be laid before the queen and the two parliaments for their approbation; that a committee ſhould be appointed from each commiſſion, to reviſe the minutes which might paſs, before they ſhould be inſerted in the books by the reſpective ſecretaries; and that during the whole treaty, the moſt profound ſecrecy ſhould be obſerved with regard to their proceedings.

On the twenty-fourth of April the lord keeper of England propoſed, "That the two kingdoms of "England and Scotland ſhould be for ever united "into one nation by the name of GREAT BRITAIN; "that it ſhould be repreſented by one and the ſame "parliament, and that the ſucceſſion to this mo-"narchy, in failure of heirs of her majeſty's body, "ſhould be ſubject to the limitations mentioned in "an act paſſed in the late reign, entitled an act for "the further limitation of the crown, &c."

Theſe preliminaries were agreed to with this proviſo, "That all the ſubjects of the united "kingdom of Great Britain ſhould have full free-"dom and intercourſe of trade and navigation to "or from any part or place within the united "kingdom, and plantations thereunto belonging;

" and that there ſhould be a communication of all " other privileges and advantages, which do or " may belong to the ſubjects of either kingdom." To this the Engliſh commiſſioners conſented, under ſuch terms as might be found for their mutual advantage in the farther progreſs of the treaty.

Theſe general preliminaries being ſettled, the commiſſioners proceeded to particulars, and at length the following articles were agreed to and ratified, viz. That England and Scotland ſhould, from the firſt of May, one thouſand ſeven hundred and ſeven, be united into one kingdon by the name of Great Britain; that the ſucceſſion ſhould be veſted in the princeſs Sophia and her heirs; that all papiſts, or perſons that married papiſts, ſhould be for ever excluded from inheriting the crown; that the united kingdoms ſhould be repreſented by one parliament; that all ſubjects of Great Britain ſhould enjoy a communication of rights, and all advantages, and be under the ſame reſtrictions and regulations; that Scotland ſhould be exempted from the temporary duties on ſome commodities; that the ſum of three hundred, ninety-eight thouſand, and eighty-five pounds ten ſhillings ſhould be granted to the Scots as an equivalent for ſuch part of the cuſtoms and exciſe, charged upon that kingdom in conſequence of that union, as ſhould be applicable to the payment of the debts of England, according to the proportion which the cuſtoms and exciſe of Scotland bore to thoſe of England; that as the revenue of Scotland might encreaſe, a further equivalent ſhould be allowed for ſuch proportion of the ſaid increaſe, as ſhould be applicable to the payment of the debts of England; that the ſum to be paid at preſent, as well as the money ariſing from the future equivalents, ſhould be employed in reducing the coin of Scotland to the ſtandard and value of the Engliſh coin; in paying off the capital ſtock and intereſt due to the proprietors of the African company, which ſhould be immediately diſſolved; in diſcharging all the public debts of the kingdom of Scotland; and in promoting manufactures and fiſheries under the direction of commiſſioners appointed by her majeſty, and accountable to the parliament of Great Britain; that the laws concerning public right, policy and civil government, ſhould be the ſame thoughout the kingdom; but that no alteration ſhould be made in the laws concerning private property, except for evident utility of the ſubjects within Scotland; that the court of ſeſſion, and all courts of judicature in Scotland, ſhould remain as then conſtituted by the laws of that kingdom, with the ſame authority and privileges as they enjoyed before the union; ſubject, however, to ſuch regulations as ſhould be made by the parliament of Great Britain; that the rights and privileges of the royal boroughs of Scotland ſhould remain entire after the union; that Scotland ſhould be repreſented in the parliament of Great Britain by ſixteen peers, and forty-five commoners, to be elected in ſuch a manner as ſhould be ſettled by the preſent parliament of Scotland; that all the peers in Scotland, and the ſucceſſors to their honours and dignities, ſhould, from and after the union of the peers of Great Britain, have rank and precedency immediately after the Engliſh peers of the like orders and degrees, who might be created after the union; that they ſhould be tried as peers of Great Britain, and enjoy all the privileges of peers of England, and particularly the right and privileges of ſitting in the houſe of lords, and on the trials of peers; that the crown, ſcepter, and ſword of ſtate, the records of parliament, and all other records, rolls and regiſters whatſoever ſhould remain as they were; within that part of the united kingdom called Scotland; and that all laws and ſtatutes in either kingdom, ſo far as they might be inconſiſtent with theſe articles, or any of them, ſhould ceaſe and be declared void by the reſpective parliaments of the two kingdoms. Such was the ſubſtance of that famous treaty which was ſoon after concluded, and formally preſented to her majeſty by the duke of Queenſberry and Dover.

During theſe tranſactions in England, the French had formed a deſign to ſurprize the duke of Marlborough before the Danes and Pruſſians could join him; and accordingly, in the beginning of May, the duke of Bavaria and mareſchal Villars decamped from Tirlemont, and paſſing the Dyle, marched directly towards the confederate army. The duke, by early intelligence, perceiving their drift, diſpatched an expreſs to the Dutch troops to join him, who, by the twenty-ſecond of May, arrived within a league of his camp.

Early next morning the confederates marched towards the village of Ramillies, where the duke was ſurprized with the news, that the enemy were in march to give him battle. They had taken poſſeſſion of a ſtrong camp, their right extending to the Town of Hautemont on the ſide of the Mehaigne; their left to Anderkirk, and Ramillies in the center. The allied army was drawn up, with the right wing near the brook of Yauſe; and their left was poſted near the village of Franqueine.

The village of Ramillies was now attacked by a detachment of the allied army under the command of lieutenant general Schultz, who entered with great vigour and reſolution. The Dutch and Daniſh horſe of the left wing charged with great intrepidity, but were ſo warmly received by the enemy, that they began to fall into diſorder, when the duke ordered them to be ſupported with the body of reſerve, and twenty ſquadrons drawn from the right wing. Before the arrival of the reinforcement which the duke had ordered, the Dutch and Danes had returned to the charge, and the beſt part of the enemy's muſqueteers were cut to pieces. The French king's own regiment of foot begged for quarter, and delivered up their arms and colours to the victors.

They now gave way on all ſides; the horſe took three different routs, but were ſo cloſely purſued that very few eſcaped. The elector of Bavaria and mareſchal Villeroy ſaved themſelves with the utmoſt difficulty. The purſuit was followed till two in the morning, five leagues from the field of battle, and within two of Louvain. In ſhort, the confederates obtained a compleat victory. They took moſt of the enemy's baggage and artillery, about one hundred and twenty colours or ſtandards, ſix hundred officers, ſix thouſand private ſoldiers, and about eight thouſand were killed or wounded. The loſs of the allies did not exceed three thouſand men, including prince Lewis of Heſſe, and colonel Bentinck, who loſt their lives in the engagement.

The battle of Ramillies was immediately followed with the conqueſt of all Brabant, and the principal cities of the Netherlands, which ſubmitted without reſiſtance. This ſo irritated Lewis, that he ſent immediate orders to the duke de la Feuillade to inveſt the city of Turin; but the ſiege, being ill directed, went on ſlowly. The duke of Savoy left the town and joined prince Eugene; they forced the French lines, diſperſed the army commanded by the duke of Orleans, took the proviſions and baggage, and remained

The ACT of UNION presented to QUEEN ANNE by the DUKE of QUEENSBERRY and DOVER.

mained maſters of Piedmont, and ſoon after of the reſt of Italy. Barcelona was beſieged with as little ſucceſs. The mareſchal de Teſſé raiſed the ſiege, leaving a rich booty to the enemy. The earl of Galway took ſeveral Spaniſh towns, penetrated even to Madrid, and proclaimed king Charles, whilſt Philip V. humbled by his misfortunes, had ſcarce a feeble hope remaining.

Lewis XIV. was now under a neceſſity of having recourſe to the moſt humiliating meaſures. He employed the elector of Bavaria to write letters in his name to the duke of Marlborough and the deputies of the ſtates general, containing propoſals for opening a congreſs. But the powers that formed the confederacy were fired by the ambition of making conqueſts, and England was deſirous of being indemnified for the immenſe ſums ſhe had expended. The offers of France were therefore rejected, and the allies determined to exert themſelves with redoubled vigour.

On the ſecond of December the parliament met, and her majeſty in her ſpeech mentioned the glorious ſucceſs of her arms abroad, and recommended to the commons to grant the ſupplies neceſſary for proſecuting the war with vigour, in order to obtain an honourable peace. She acquainted them with the progreſs made in the union, and adviſed the completion of that deſirable undertaking. The commons granted the ſupplies, and expreſſed every token of loyalty and affection to the queen.

The Scottiſh parliament having paſſed an act to preſcribe the method for chuſing the repreſentatives for that kingdom, in the firſt parliament of Great Britain, and paſſed ſeveral other bills, the lord commiſſioner made a ſpeech, and adjourned them to the twenty-ſecond day of April.

An addreſs was preſented to her majeſty by the houſe of lords on the ſeventh of December, requeſting that the honours and titles of the duke of Marlborough ſhould be ſettled upon his poſterity by act of parliament; and they prayed her majeſty's direction therein, to which ſhe was graciouſly pleaſed ſoon after to ſignify her royal aſſent; and a bill being brought in accordingly, paſſed both houſes.

The houſe of commons, ſoon after, addreſſed the queen, intimating, that as ſhe was pleaſed to erect the houſe of Blenheim as a monument of the glorious actions of the duke of Marlborough, their willingneſs to make proviſion for the more honourable ſupport of his dignity to his poſterity, in ſuch a manner as her majeſty ſhould think fit. The queen declared that, having ſettled an annual penſion of five thouſand pounds, out of the revenue of the Poſt Office, on the duke of Marlborough, it would be agreeable to her, if that might be continued to his poſterity for ever. Accordingly an act for that purpoſe was immediately paſſed.

A. D. 1707. On the twentieth of January her majeſty came to the houſe of lords, and after paſſing ſeveral public and private acts, acquainted them that the union being perfected by the parliament of Scotland, ſhe had ordered the ſame to be laid before them for their concurrence in it. She alſo intimated, that Scotland being to have an equivalent for what that kingdom was obliged to contribute towards the debts of England, it was neceſſary to provide for the payment thereof. In the houſe of lords, previous to the entering upon the conſideration of the union, a bill was ordered to be brought in for the ſecurity of the church of England; an act for ſecuring preſbytery in Scotland having paſſed there before the articles of the union. The purport was, that the act of uniformity ſhould be in force for ever; that every king or queen hereafter, at their coronation, ſhould take an oath to preſerve the ſettlement of the church, and the diſcipline thereof; and that this act ſhould be held a fundamental and eſſential part of the union. This act being paſſed, the union was taken into general conſideration, and after long and warm debates the bill for confirming the articles was carried, and ſoon after received the royal aſſent.

The campaign in the Netherlands was barren of events. The time was ſpent in marches and countermarches, till the reſpective armies retired into winter quarters. The ſiege of Toulon was ſo much the object of the attention of the allies, that other matters were greatly neglected. Towards the latter end of June, the duke of Savoy and prince Eugene began their march thither, with an army of between forty and fifty thouſand men; Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, with the combined fleet, and tranſports, having taken on board their heavy cannon, with the proviſions and ammunition neceſſary to carry on the ſiege.

On the arrival of the confederate army before the place, prince Eugene reconnoitred the diſpoſition of the enemy, and perceiving he muſt fight an army intrenched in the outworks, on the heights that ſurrounded the place, and which were furniſhed with great number of guns, was for retreating. The duke of Savoy was, however, determined to purſue the enterprize, and accordingly, the neceſſary diſpoſitions were made for attacking the hill of St. Catherine, which the enemy had fortified; and in this firſt attempt the allies were ſucceſsful. They alſo attacked and carried two ſmall forts near the harbour, but the enemy, whoſe forces were increaſed, attacked their camp, and recovered the hill of St. Catherine.

The impoſſibility of taking Toulon at length appearing to the duke of Savoy, who received intelligence that the enemy had ſixty battalions in their entrenchments, beſides a numerous cavalry, he agreed to deſiſt from the enterprize. However, by way of retaliation for the ruin of his capital city of Turin, he gave directions for the bombarding of Toulon both by ſea and land; and both himſelf and prince Eugene advanced to an eminence to behold the dreadful blaze.

In the mean time Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, with fifteen men of war, ſailed for England, and on the twenty-firſt of October his own ſhip, the Aſſociation, ſtruck upon the rocks of Scilly, wherein himſelf and every creature on board periſhed. The like was the unhappy fate of the Eagle and Romney. The Firebrand was daſhed in pieces on the rocks, but the captain and twenty-four of his men ſaved themſelves in the boat; the Phœnix ran aground, but the crew luckily ſaved themſelves. The reſt of the fleet by tacking with greater expedition ſaved themſelves. The body of the admiral was afterwards found by ſome of the country people, who having ſtript it, buried it in the ſands, but being diſcovered, was taken up, and interred in Weſtminſter-abbey, where her majeſty cauſed a monument to be erected to his memory.

The firſt parliament of Great Britain meeting on the twenty-third of October, the queen, in a ſpeech to both houſes, mentioned the tranſactions in Provence and Spain, repreſenting the neceſſity of making further efforts againſt the common enemy; and exhorted them to be upon their guard againſt thoſe who endeavoured to ſow jealouſies in the commonwealth. The commons, in their addreſs, expreſſed the continuance of their former zeal and devotion towards her majeſty's goverment, but in the houſe of lords, the earl of Wharton expatiated upon the ſcarcity of money, the decay of trade, and the miſmanagement of the navy. He was ſeconded by the lord Somers, and the leaders of all the oppoſite party, who propoſed to conſider the ſtate of the nation, before they proceeded to any other buſineſs.

The deſign of this motion was to place the earl of Oxford once more at the head of the admiralty, and thereby ſubſerve the deſign of a party. A day being fixed for this examination, the houſe received a petition from the ſheriffs and merchants of London, complaining of great loſſes by ſea, for want of cruizers and convoys, and theſe complaints were proved by witneſſes. An addreſs was then moved for, in which the miſcarriages at ſea were alledged to the miniſtry and council, but the motion was overruled. The commons made ſome progreſs in an enquiry of the ſame nature, brought in a bill for the better ſecuring the trade of the kingdom, and at the ſame time chearfully granted the ſupplies for the ſervice of the enſuing year. They alſo reſolved, that there ſhould be but one privy council in the kingdom of Great Britain; that the militia in Scotland ſhould be put on the ſame footing with that of England; that the powers of the juſtices of peace ſhould be the ſame through the whole iſland; that the lords juſticiary in Scotland ſhould go circuits twice a year, and that the writs for electing Scottiſh members to ſerve in the houſe of commons ſhould be directed, and returns made, in the ſame manner as practiſed in England. Her majeſty recommended an increaſe in the aids granted to Charles king of Spain, and the duke of Savoy, at the time ſhe paſſed theſe bills.

A. D. 1708. Lewis, meditating revenge for the invaſion of his dominions, and beſieging a place of ſuch importance to him as Toulon, determined to retaliate the injury. He was invited to it by the evident diſcontent of the Scottiſh nation, occaſioned by the union, where many, in the vehemence of their miſguided zeal, gave oblique hints, that the pretended prince of Wales would be no unwelcome gueſt. The French, therefore, propoſed to fix the ſeat of war in Great Britain, by affording their aſſiſtance to the chevalier de St. George.

To execute this project, a fleet of men or war and tranſports were expeditiouſly fitted out at Dunkirk, and ten thouſand land forces, with many officers, and a great quantity of proviſion and ammunition were put on board. Major general Cadogan, her majeſty's envoy in Holland, ſoon gave notice of theſe preparations; and then went to Bruſſels, and concerted matters in ſuch a manner with monſieur d'Auverquerque, that ten battalions of the Engliſh forces in Flanders were immediately drawn to the coaſt ready to be ſhipped. At the ſame time the admiralty of England uſed ſuch diſpatch in equipping a fleet, that three and twenty ſail of men of war, under the command of Sir George Byng and the lord Durſley, appeared before Dunkirk on the twenty-ſeventh day of February, when the enemy vainly hoped, that the Engliſh had no fleet abroad. The pretender arrived at Dunkirk on the ninth of March, but the ſight of the Engliſh fleet induced the French admiral, monſieur Fourbin, to write back to court for freſh inſtructions.

Lewis ſent peremptory orders to his admiral to come out, ſo that he obeyed and ſailed from Dunkirk at a time that adverſe gales had driven the Engliſh from their ſtation. The fleet was now encreaſed to the number of forty ſail of the line, beſides frigates and tenders. Sir George Byng, having received advice, that the French had left Dunkirk, ſailed immediately in purſuit of them, at the ſame time the forces were ſhipped off at Oſtend, and admiral Baker convoyed them over; theſe forces, together with ſeveral regiments of horſe, marched for Scotland with all expedition. But theſe precautions were rendered uſeleſs by the vigilance of Sir George Byng, who arrived at the Frith of Edinburgh almoſt as ſoon as the enemy, whereupon they took the advantage of a land breeze, and bore away with all the ſail they could crowd.

Next morning at break of day the combined fleets gave chace, but were outſailed, ſo that except the Saliſbury, a man of war formerly taken from the Engliſh, all eſcaped. The French ſhips loitered about ſome time with intent to land at Inverneſs, but having no pilots, and the wind not permitting a frigate, which they had ſent for ſome proviſions, to get aſhore, they ſtood off, and by diſperſing themſelves in that wide ſea and hazy weather, made ſhift to get back to Dunkirk in a moſt ſhattered condition. There were taken priſoners on board the Saliſbury, the lords Griffin and Clermont, and Mr. Middleton, a lieutenant general, his aid de camp, a colonel, two lieutenant-colonels, five captains, two lieutenants, and two hundred and fifty ſeamen, together with all the officers of the ſhip. Thus ended this expedition, in which Lewis reaped only the merit of having formed a daring, though unſucceſsful enterprize.

The parliament was diſſolved by proclamation on the fifteenth of April, ſoon after which, writs were iſſued for calling a new one; at the ſame time a proclamation was publiſhed, commanding all the peers of North Britain, to meet on the ſeventeenth day of June at Holyrood houſe, in Edinburgh, in order to elect ſixteen peers to repreſent them in the enſuing Britiſh parliament, purſuant to a clauſe in the treaty of union.

Prince Eugene and the duke of Marlborough, having agreed to act in conjunction in the Low Countries, during this campaign, took the field about the middle of May. They then marched to the general rendezvous, and having left no other troops at Ghent, and Bruges, than the country militia, thoſe places, on the appearance of a detachment of French troops, ſurrendered without oppoſition. The enemy advanced as far as Dutch Flanders, and laid the whole country under contribution. The dukes of Burgundy and Berry, and the chevalier de St. George, who this year took the field with the duke of Vendome, looked upon themſelves ſo much ſuperior to the confederates, that they reſolved upon the ſiege of Oudenarde, and accordingly inveſted that place on the ninth day of July.

The duke of Marlborough was inſtantly in motion, and marched with all expedition to the relief of Oudenarde. At his approach the French raiſed the ſiege, and began to croſs the Scheld at Gavre, where the duke of Marlborough, and prince Eugene paſſed alſo, reſolving to give them battle, though the number of the enemy greatly exceeded that of the allies. Accordingly, about three in the afternoon the battle began, but could not be deemed a general engagement till ſeven in the evening, when the action became very furious and doubtful on both ſides; for the French being continually reinforced, maintained the fight with great vigour vigour and reſolution for ſome time; at length they were totally defeated, by the ſuperior conduct and courage of Eugene and Marlborough.

The French retreated towards Ghent in the night, having loſt above three thouſand men on the field of battle, together with ſeven hundred officers, ſeven pieces of cannon, and upwards of one hundred ſtandards and colours, while, on the other hand, the loſs of the confederates did not exceed eight hundred and twenty-four killed, and two thouſand two hundred wounded.

Farther to demonſtrate their ſuperiority, the allies determined to lay ſiege to Liſle. There was in the town, which was then one of the moſt finiſhed fortifications in Europe, a garriſon of at leaſt twenty-one battalions, commanded by mareſchal Boufflers, but this did not deter Eugene from undertaking the ſiege.

The prince of Orange attacked it on one ſide, while prince Eugene did the ſame on the other, and the duke of Marlborough covered the ſiege with the reſt of the army. On the twenty-ſecond the trenches were opened, and the dukes of Burgundy and Vendome, having joined the duke of Berwick, marched towards the duke of Marlborough, and for ſeveral days cannonaded his camp, whereupon prince Eugene joined him with a conſiderable body of horſe and foot from the ſiege; but the allies finding the deſign of the French was only to retard the ſiege, the duke of Marlborough intrenched himſelf, and prince Eugene returned to Liſle, where the bravery of the French made the ſiege go on very heavily.

In ſtorming the outworks, on the twenty-firſt of September, the allies ſuſtained conſiderable loſs, and prince Eugene was wounded by a muſquet ball, which grazed upon his ſkull, and confined him to his tent for ſome days, during which the duke of Marlborough had the command both of the ſiege and of the covering army. As ſoon as the prince was recovered of his wound he viſited the trenches and continued his operations with his uſual vigour. The governor omitted nothing that could be expected from a brave and experienced officer, but the allies, after a moſt bloody and obſtinate engagement, made themſelves maſters of the covered way, and prince Eugene cauſed a battery of fifty pieces of cannon to be raiſed thereon, which played with ſuch fury upon the curtain, that in leſs than the ſpace of twelve hours a breach was made full ſufficient for an aſſault. But juſt as every neceſſary diſpoſition was made for beginning an aſſault, mareſchal Boufflers demanded a capitulation for the town. A mutual exchange of hoſtages was made, and prince Eugene, in conſideration of the gallant defence of the French general, left him to propoſe his own terms, promiſing that, if conſiſtent with his honour, they ſhould be literally complied with. On the 25th of October the prince entered the town in triumph, and the French garriſon retired into the caſtle, which ſtill continued to make a vigorous defence. While the allies lay before this place, the duke of Bavaria made an attempt to reduce Bruſſels, which probably he would have effected, had not the army, under the duke of Marlborough, marched to its relief.

At length, however, after a moſt noble reſiſtance the citadel capitulated on the eighth of December, and on the tenth the mareſchal Boufflers marched out with the garriſon, with the uſual honours of war, and was conducted to Douay.

Ghent, Bruges, and many other places opened their gates to the allies. The duke of Savoy was maſter of the paſſes towards Dauphine; the emperor Joſeph, brother to the archduke Charles, held Landau, one of the keys of France. Paris trembled, and the whole kingdom was filled with conſternation.

The emperor had deprived Philip the Spaniſh monarch of Naples and Lombardy. The Engliſh took from him Sardinia for the emperor, and the iſland of Minorca for themſelves. In a word, the allies carried every thing before them.

Commodore Wager, this ſummer, had the good fortune to take a Spaniſh galleon of immenſe value, and would have extended his ſucceſſes, had he not been deſerted by two of his captains, who, in conſequence thereof, were brought to condign puniſhment.

The queen had the unhappineſs to loſe the prince of Denmark her huſband: he was a man of the moſt amiable diſpoſition, without ambition, and contented himſelf with being the firſt ſubject without interfering in affairs of ſtate; though, by his office of high admiral, he might have aſſumed a great ſhare in the political department. He was much eſteemed in life and lamented in death. Her majeſty, in particular, was inconſolable for his loſs, the moſt uninterrupted conjugal affection having ſubſiſted between them.

Several changes were now made in the principal departments of ſtate, and ſuch was the power of faction, as to have a very ſingular influence on the conduct of the queen. Sir Richard Onſlow was choſen ſpeaker of the houſe of commons at the meeting of parliament on the ſixteenth of November. Her majeſty being abſent on account of the late demiſe of her conſort, commiſſioners were appointed to repreſent her royal perſon, in whoſe name the lord chancellor made a ſpeech, in which he recommended a large ſupply for the army in Flanders, and another for the fleet; the proviſion of ſuch laws as might be neceſſary to make the union more perfect, and an improvement of the commerce of the nation.

Both houſes having preſented addreſſes of congratulation for the ſucceſs of the Britiſh arms, and condolence for the death of the prince of Denmark, the commons proceeded to examine the different branches of the ſupply, and voted an augmentation of ten thouſand men as neceſſary to carry on the war with vigour. There paſſed this ſeſſion, an act for naturalizing all foreigners, being proteſtants; and another to aſcertain the privilege of ambaſſadors. In this parliament, the eldeſt ſons of the peers of Scotland were voted incapable of ſitting in the houſe of commons.

After ſeveral enquiries and debates relative to the intended invaſion of Scotland, a bill was brought into the houſe of lords under the title of "An act for improving the union of the two "kingdoms." It referred to trials for treaſon committed in Scotland, which, by this law, were regulated according to the manner of proceeding in England, with very little variation. Notwithſtanding all the efforts of many Scottiſh members, abetted by ſeveral of the Engliſh, the bill paſſed both houſes, and received the royal aſſent. The queen, however, in order to make them eaſy, conſented to an act of grace, wherein all treaſons were pardoned, except ſuch as were committed on the high ſeas, an exception levelled at thoſe who had embarked with the pretender in his laſt expedition.

A. D. 1709. Lewis, having ſignified a diſpo-

ſition for holding a treaty with the allies on the ſubject of a general peace, the lords reſolved to addreſs her majeſty, deſiring her to take care that the French king ſhould be obliged to own her majeſty's title, and the proteſtant ſucceſſion; that her allies be guarantees of the treaty, and that the pretender be removed out of the French dominions. This addreſs being ſent to the commons for their concurrence, they added to it a clauſe, inſiſting on the demolition of Dunkirk.

The duke of Holſtein's envoy, Mr. Petkum, aſſiſted to advance the negotiation, and by his means the allies were prevailed upon to permit the preſident de Rouille to come into the Netherlands, in order to carry on the negotiation on the part of France. Accordingly, in the beginning of the year, that miniſter had ſeveral private conferences with Buys and Vanderhuſſen: the ſtates ſent immediate advice to the emperor and the queen of Great Britain, who diſpatched Eugene and Marlborough to Holland to carry on the conferences on her part.

The demands of the confederates were communicated to the court of France by monſieur de Rouille, and the duke of Marlborough returned to England, to inform the queen of the progreſs made in the negotiation, and to receive her further commands. The duke ſoon after repaired to Holland, with the lord Townſhend, as joint plenipotentiary; and prince Eugene being likewiſe at the Hague, the conferences immediately commenced.

Lewis, whoſe reſources were inferior to thoſe of his enemies, offered to demoliſh Dunkirk, to abandon the pretender, to renounce all pretenſion to the Spaniſh monarchy, to cede to the States-general the barrier they demanded in the Low Countries, and to negotiate with the emperor on the terms of the treaty of Ryſwick. The miniſters of the allies, elated by ſucceſs, made ſuch enormous demands, that the French king, refuſing compliance, the conference ended, Rouille was ordered to quit Holland immediately, and the confederates reſolved to open the campaign without heſitation.

Accordingly, the duke of Marlborough and prince Eugene proceeded to Flanders, and by the end of June the allied army encamped in the plain of Liſle, to the number of one hundred and ten thouſand fighting men. At the ſame time the mareſchal Villars (accounted one of the moſt fortunate generals in France) aſſembled the French forces on the plain of Lens, where he began to throw up intrenchments. The confederate generals, having obſerved his ſituation, and finding they could not attack him without incurring great danger, reſolved to inveſt Tournay, the garriſon of which Villars had imprudently weakened. To conceal their deſign, they made a motion towards Ypres, and while the attention of the enemy was wholly diverted to that quarter, they ſuddenly laid ſiege to Tournay. The town itſelf was eaſily taken, but the citadel was ſo ſtrong by nature and art, that, with only a weak garriſon, the ſiege was ſuſtained for a whole month, by the courage and good conduct of the governor monſieur de Surville.

The confederates proceeding by the method of ſap, their miners frequently met with thoſe of the enemy under ground, and fought with bayonet and piſtol. The volunteers on both ſides preſented themſelves to theſe ſubterraneous combats, in the midſt of mines and countermines big with ruin and deſtruction. Sometimes they fell in by accident, and ſometimes ſprung by deſign, ſo that great numbers of theſe brave men were ſtifled below, and by a ſingle exploſion, upwards of four hundred of the beſiegers met with death.

At length the enemy offering to capitulate, articles were drawn up and tranſmitted to Verſailles; but Lewis refuſing to ratify them, hoſtilities were renewed, with uncommon ardor and animoſity, till the proviſions in the citadel being entirely exhauſted, Surville and his garriſon ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war.

Tournay being thus reduced, the allies determined to inveſt the city of Mons, and for that purpoſe paſſed the Scheld. The prince of Heſſe was detached to attack the French lines from the Haiſne to the Sambre, which were abandoned at his approach. In the mean time the mareſchal de Boufflers arrived in the French camp at Quievrain, and the duke of Marlborough receiving advice that the enemy had detached a large part of their army to attack the advanced body commanded by the prince of Heſſe, left his camp at Havre, and made a motion to the left to ſupport the prince.

On the 9th of September the reſpective armies approached ſo near, that they cannonaded each other. The French army, amounting to one hundred and twenty thouſand men, were poſted behind the woods of La Merte and Franciere in the neighbourhood of Malplaquet. The confederates, nearly of the ſame number, encamped with the right towards Sart and Bleron, and the left on the edge of Lagniere, the head quarters being at Blaregnies. The enemy, deſirous of avoiding an engagement, fortified their camp with tripple intrenchments; ſo that being of itſelf naturally ſtrong, it then ſeemed quite inacceſſible.

On the 11th of September the allies began the attack with the utmoſt fury, and charged the left wing of the enemy with ſuch intrepidity that in leſs than an hour they were driven from their intrenchments into the woods of Sart and Teniers. The prince of Orange attacked the right wing of the enemy advantageouſly poſted and covered with three entrenchments. Both ſides diſplayed the moſt conſummate valour, till the French ſeeing their lines forced, and Villars their gallant general dangerouſly wounded, they retreated in good order under the conduct of Boufflers, leaving to the enemy the field of battle ſtrewed with the carcaſes of the ſlain. The confederates loſt twenty thouſand of their beſt troops, which was but ill repaired by their taking ſixteen pieces of artillery, forty colours and ſtandards, and a great number of priſoners. Prince Eugene was ſlightly wounded in the head, and lieutenant-general Webb received a ſhot in the groin. The prince of Orange had two horſes ſhot under him, but eſcaped unhurt, as did likewiſe the duke of Argyle.

The enemy having thus retreated from the vicinity of Mons, the allies beſieged that city, which capitulated on the twenty-ſixth of October, when both armies retired into winter quarters.

One action only marked the campaign on the Rhine. This was between detached parties of the French and Germans, in which the latter were defeated and afterwards obliged to repaſs the river.

Lewis again made ſome ambiguous overtures of peace. He withdrew his troops from Spain under pretence of obliging the allies, but in reality for the defence of his own dominions. His miniſter Torcy demanded paſſports, that the plenipotentiaries might repair to Holland, but the ſtates neral refuſed his requeſt. They, however, permitted Mr. Petkum, the Holſtein reſident at the Hague, to repair to Verſailles, from whence he brought back a kind of memorial, importing, that the French king would willingly treat of a general and reaſonable peace, but refuſed to confine himſelf to the form of the preliminaries impoſed by the allies; but this being admitted as an additional inſtance of his fallacy, the ſtates determined on a proſecution of the war.

On the 15th of November the parliament of Great Britain aſſembled, when the queen addreſſed both houſes in a ſpeech, in which ſhe told them that the enemy had endeavoured, by falſe appearances and deceitful inſinuations, to create jealouſies and diviſions among the allies; that the Almighty had been pleaſed to crown the arms of the confederates with remarkable ſucceſs; and that France was, therefore, in more need of peace than in the beginning of the campaign. She declared herſelf obliged to aſſiſt her allies in all parts, and proſecute the advantages reſulting from victory with the utmoſt vigour, in order to finiſh the great work of reducing that exorbitant and oppreſſive power, which had ſo long threatened the liberties of Europe. This ſpeech had the deſired ſucceſs; both houſes preſented congratulatory addreſſes, thanked the duke of Marlborough for his ſignal ſervices, and ſix millions for the ſervice of the enſuing year were granted by the commons.

A very extraordinary affair now revived the animoſity of the two contending parties which divided the nation. On the 13th of December a complaint was laid before the houſe of commons by Mr. Dolben againſt Dr. Henry Sacheverel, for having publiſhed two diſcourſes containing dangerous and unconſtitutional tenets. This eccleſiaſtic was a man of narrow and confined ideas, but poſſeſſing the moſt obſtinate bigotry, took every opportunity of exclaiming againſt the diſſenters.

The complaint being ſeconded by Sir Peter King, and the diſcourſes voted malicious, ſcandalous, and ſeditious libels, on the 14th of December, the Doctor was brought to the bar, where he acknowledged himſelf the author of both the ſermons, and declared, that he had received encouragement from the lord mayor, to print that intitled, "The perils of falſe brethren." The lord mayor, who was a member of the houſe, denied that he had ever given ſuch encouragement; upon which the commons ordered Mr. Dolben to impeach the doctor at the bar of the houſe of lords, in the name of all the commons of England, appointed a committee to draw up articles againſt him, and commanded the uſher of the black rod to take him into cuſtody. On the ſeventeenth, he petitioned the houſe that he might be admitted to bail; but the commons, determined to proceed againſt him with the utmoſt rigour, denied his requeſt.

A. D. 1710. This extraordinary trial engroſſed the public attention, and for ſome time ſuſpended all other buſineſs. At laſt, after much virulent altercation, Sacheverel was found guilty by a majority of ſeventeen voices, prohibited from preaching for the ſpace of three years, and his two ſermons were ordered to be burned by the hands of the common hangman, in preſence of the lord mayor and the two ſheriffs of London.

During theſe tranſactions, Lewis had again recourſe to negotiation, and offered to treat upon the plan propoſed by the allies. But this application proved as ineffectual as the former.

To revive their operations with the campaign on the 15th of April Eugene and Marlborough ſet out from the Hague for Tournay, in order to aſſemble the forces which were quartered on the Maeſe, in Flanders, and Brabant. They immediately advanced to Pont-a-Vendin, in order to attack the lines thrown up by the French to cover Douay, and other frontier towns. On their approach, the troops left for the defence of the lines retired, and the allies, having thrown bridges over the Scarpe, the duke of Marlborough with his diviſion paſſed that river, and encamped at Vitri, while prince Eugene inveſted Douay. Mareſchal Villars, having aſſembled all his forces, croſſed the Schelde, and encamped at Bouchain in order to give battle to the confederates; but after viewing their ſituation, thought proper to retreat to the heights of St. Laurence, where he encamped.

On the 26th of June the town of Douay capitulated, as did that of Bethune ſhortly after, which cloſing the campaign, both armies retired to winter quarters.

The campaign on the Rhine was entirely inactive, nor was any thing of moment tranſacted in Piedmont.

The ſpirit of faction now revived with the moſt virulent malignity. A popular ſpirit of averſion to thoſe who favoured the diſſenters had been excited by Sacheverel's trial, and the queen herſelf began to ſhew her diſlike of that party by mortifying the duke of Marlborough, in the diſmiſſion of his relatives and friends from the great offices of ſtate, and the introduction of men of oppoſite principles into their places.

Such ſudden changes ſpread an univerſal alarm among the friends of liberty. The directors of the bank repreſented to the queen the prejudice that would inevitably reſult to public credit from theſe alterations. The emperor and the ſtates-general interpoſed their good offices, and their miniſters at London preſented memorials, explaining the injury that would incur to the common cauſe from the late procedures.

The projected changes, however, began to take place in the month of Auguſt. The earl of Godolphin, a miniſter of equal ability and integrity, was deprived of his office, and the treaſury put into commiſſion under the direction of Mr. Harley, appointed chancellor of the exchequer, and under treaſurer. In ſhort, ſo univerſal a change was made in adminiſtration, that not one of the former party was left in any office of ſtate, except the duke of Marlborough, who would have reſigned his command, had not his particular friends repreſented to him, that ſuch a ſtep could not fail of being prejudicial to the intereſt of his country. The preſent parliament was alſo diſſolved, and ſuch precautions taken as ſufficiently influenced the electors in favour of the other party.

The new parliament met on the 25th of November, when Mr. Bromley was choſen ſpeaker. The queen, in her ſpeech from the throne, recommended the proſecution of the war with vigour, eſpecially in Spain; ſhe declared her reſolution of ſupporting the church of England, and preſerving the Britiſh conſtitution according to the union; and declared that only ſuch perſons as appeared firmly attached to the proteſtant ſucceſſion in the houſe of Hanover ſhould be employed in the ſervice of government.

The lords preſented an addreſs, importing, that they would concur in all reaſonable meaſures for procuring an honourable peace. The addreſs of the the commons diſcovered the ſpirit by which they were actuated; they exhorted her majeſty to diſcountenance all ſuch principles and meaſures as thoſe by which her crown and dignity had been lately endangered.

On the duke of Marlborough's arrival in London her majeſty gave him to underſtand that he muſt not expect the thanks of the parliament as formerly; and added, that ſhe hoped there would be a perfect agreement between him and her miniſters. The duke, with a moderation truly meritorious, expreſſed no reſentment at the alterations which had been made, being reſolved to continue at the head of the army for the good of the public.

A. D. 711. The queen having in a meſſage to both houſes of parliament, intimated the loſs which the Engliſh in particular ſuſtained from an action that had happened in Spain, this opportunity was embraced by the commons for inveighing againſt the late adminiſtration. Animoſity excited them even to the violation of common decency. Marlborough, ſo often extolled by the people, and thanked by their repreſentatives, met with the vileſt treatment, and now became the object of popular contempt and parliamentary cenſure.

Harley, the favourite miniſter, who had been principally acceſſary in ſupplanting the late adminiſtration, loſt his influence with the preſent, becauſe he had too much moderation to adopt their violent meaſures. But a tragical event reſtored at once his favour and reputation. One Guiſcard, a French partizan in the ſervice of England, not thinking himſelf ſufficiently rewarded, reſolved to treat with the court of Verſailles. His letter being intercepted, he was arreſted, and conveyed to the council board for examination. Tranſported with fury, he deſired a private audience of Mr. Secretary St. John, which being refuſed, as St. John was out of his reach, he ſtept up to Harley, crying "Have at thee," then ſtabbed him twice with a pen-knife, and afterwards received himſelf ſeveral wounds which proved mortal. The injurious ſuſpicions entertained of this miniſter vaniſhed, when an enemy to the ſtate had made an attempt on his perſon.

The two houſes in an addreſs to the queen declared it as their opinion, that Mr. Harley's fidelity to her majeſty had drawn upon him the hatred of all the abettors of popery and faction. A proclamation was publiſhed in conſequence of this addreſs, directing the laws to be ſtrictly put in execution againſt papiſts, and Harley was appointed lord treaſurer, and created earl of Oxford. He formed a new trading company to the South ſea, which was to pay the debts of the navy by a fund aſſigned to that uſe; in conſequence of this plan the Engliſh flattered themſelves with obtaining permiſſion to trade to Peru in the Weſt-Indies.

The emperor Joſeph dying without male iſſue, king Charles's immediate aim was to ſucceed his brother on the Imperial throne, and accordingly he was, ſome months afterwards, duly elected.

On the eighteenth of February the duke of Marlborough ſet out for Holland, her majeſty having aſſured him that the payment of the troops ſhould be duly remitted. About the middle of April he aſſembled an army at Orchies, between Liſle and Douay; mareſchal Villars drew together the French forces in the neighbourhood of Cambray and Arras, and encamped behind the river Sanſet, in ſuch an advantageous poſt, that he could not be attacked with any proſpect of ſucceſs.

The duke hereupon paſſed the Scarpe, and pitched his camp between Douay and Bouchain, where he was joined by prince Eugene. This general, however, did not long continue in the Netherlands; for, hearing that detachments had been ſent from the army of Villars, and the neighbouring garriſons, to the Rhine, and that the elector of Bavaria intended to act in the empire, he marched with the imperial and palatine troops, in order to ſecure the German dominions.

Marlborough, repaſſing the Scarpe in the interim, encamped in the plains of Lens; and thence advanced towards Aire, as if he intended to attack the French lines in that quarter. Theſe lines extended along the Sanſet and the Scarpe from Bouchain to Arras, and thence along the upper Scarpe to Canche. They were ſo ſecured by redoubts and other works, that Villars deemed them impenetrable, and called them the Ne plus ultra of Marlborough. But his towering hopes were diſappointed. The Engliſh general, by a march which did equal honour to his diligence and ſkill, ſurprized Villars and forced his lines. He afterwards beſieged Bouchain, an attempt not leſs hazardous but which was attended with ſucceſs; for in twenty days after the trenches were opened, the garriſon were obliged to ſurrender themſelves priſoners of war.

The duke of Argyle having been appointed ambaſſador extraordinary to Charles III. and commander in chief of her majeſty's forces in Spain, his grace landed on the twenty-ninth at Barcelona, where he found the Britiſh troops in the utmoſt diſtreſs for want of ſubſiſtence. All their hopes of ſucceſs were fixed on the campaign in that kingdom, and indeed the army commanded by Vendome was in ſuch a wretched condition, that had Staremberg been properly ſupported by the allies, he might have reduced king Philip to the laſt extremity. The remittances were ſo long delayed, that Argyle was obliged to borrow money on his own credit before the Britiſh troops could take the field, and the campaign ended without any action of conſequence being performed.

In the mean time, prince Eugene at the head of the German forces, protected the electors at Frankfort from the deſigns of the enemy, and Charles was unanimouſly elected emperor.

Colonel Nicholſon, who had taken poſſeſſion of Nova Scotia, came now to England to ſubmit to the approbation of the miniſtry, a plan he had formed for the reduction of Quebec and Placentia in North America. A body of five thouſand men were embarked in tranſports, under the command of brigadier Hill, which being joined on their arrival at Boſton by two regiments of provincials, and about four thouſand irregular troops, it was propoſed that they ſhould march through Canada, while the ſhips ſailed up the river St. Lawrence. But through loſſes ſuſtained by a ſtorm, added to a ſcarcity of proviſions, the ſcheme was rendered abortive, and the whole armament returned to England.

The new miniſtry having been for ſome time diſpoſed for peace, a private meſſage was ſent by lord Jerſey to the court of France, intimating the queen's ſincere deſire of a treaty; and requeſting that Lewis would propoſe to the Dutch a renewal of the conferences. This intimation was highly agreeable to the French court, though they ſeemed averſe to renew conferences with the Dutch. Mr. Prior, well known in the literary world, was therefore ſent to Verſailles to ſignify the demands of the

Engliſh

Engliſh, receive the anſwer of the French king, and know whether Philip of Spain had tranſmitted to his grand-father a power of treating. When Prior arrived at Fountainbleau, he preſented the queen's memorial, in which ſhe demanded a barrier for the Dutch in the Netherlands, and another on the Rhine for the empire, a ſecurity for the Dutch commerce, and a general ſatisfaction to all her allies. She required, that the places taken from the duke of Savoy ſhould be reſtored, and that he ſhould poſſeſs ſuch towns and diſtricts in Italy as had been ceded to him in former treaties; that Lewis ſhould acknowledge queen Anne and the proteſtant ſucceſſion, demoliſh the fortifications of Dunkirk, and conclude a new treaty of commerce; that Gibraltar and Port Mahon ſhould be ceded to the crown of England; that the Britiſh ſubjects trading to Spain ſhould enjoy the advantages granted by that crown to the French; that queen Anne ſhould be put in poſſeſſion of Newfoundland, though the trade of Hudſon's bay might be carried on indifferently by the ſubjects of either crown, and that in America all things ſhould remain in the ſame ſituation in which they ſhould be found at the concluſion of the peace. Soon after, Meſnager, deputy of the council of trade in France, accompanied Mr. Prior to London, with full power to ſettle the preliminaries of the treaty, which were ſigned on the eighth of October, by the ſecretaries of ſtate and the French miniſter.

The emperor and ſtates general who reaped many advantages from the war, remonſtrated with queen Anne againſt theſe pacific meaſures. Her majeſty treated their repreſentations with indifference, and declared that if they did not immediately concur, all delay on their part would be regarded as a refuſal. Intimidated by this declaration, they agreed to open the general conferences at Utrecht on the firſt of January, granted paſſports to the French miniſters, and the biſhop of Briſtol and earl of Strafford were plenipotentiaries for the queen of England.

Her majeſty's, or rather the miniſtry's, reſolution of making peace was violently oppoſed by the members of the late adminiſtration, and all their partizans. A paper war was commenced of conſequence. Pamphlets, libels, and lampoons were to-day publiſhed by one faction, and to-morrow anſwered by another. They contained all the inſinuations of malice, all the malignity of reproach, and all the rancour of recrimination.

The oppoſition, however, did not cauſe the queen to alter her meaſures, for the parliament having aſſembled on the ſeventh of December, ſhe obſerved, in her ſpeech, that notwithſtanding the arts of thoſe who delighted in war, both the time and place were appointed for opening the treaty for a general peace; and that the ſtates general had now expreſſed their entire confidence in her conduct. She declared, her chief concern ſhould be to ſecure the ſucceſſion of the crown in the houſe of Hanover, to procure all the advantages to the nation of an improved commerce, which a tender and affectionate ſovereign could obtain for a dutiful and loyal people, and to procure all reaſonable ſatisfaction for her allies; and added, that the ſureſt way of procuring an advantageous treaty would be to make early preparations for a vigorous campaign.

When the queen retired, a motion was made in the houſe of lords for returning her majeſty thanks for her ſpeech, and the earl of Nottingham propoſed, that a clauſe ſhould be inſerted in the addreſs, "That no peace could be ſafe or honour-"able to Great Britain or Europe, if Spain or the "Weſt Indies were allotted to any branch of the "houſe of Bourbon." This motion occaſioned a violent debate, in the courſe of which the earl of Angleſea repreſented the neceſſity of eaſing the nation of the burthens incurred by an expenſive war. The duke of Marlborough, at whom this reflection ſeemed to be levelled, ſpoke in his own defence; he applied to the queen, who was then in the houſe incognito, whether he did not on all occaſions inform her and her council of all the propoſals offered by the enemy for a peace, and had not deſired inſtructions for his conduct on that ſubject? he declared upon his conſcience, that he was deſirous of a ſafe, honourable, and laſting peace; and very far from entertaining any deſign of prolonging the war for his private emolument, as had been falſely inſinuated by his enemies. At laſt, the queſtion being repeated, which the earl of Nottingham propoſed, it was carried in the affirmative. The ſame clauſe was afterwards rejected by a very conſiderable majority in the houſe of commons.

In the mean time, the enemies of the duke of Marlborough left nothing untried to effect his ruin in the opinion of his royal miſtreſs. They cauſed a charge to be brought againſt him in parliament, by the commiſſioners for examining the public accounts, who reported that they had diſcovered that the duke had received an annual penſion of five or ſix thouſand pounds from a Jew contractor, for bread for the army. The queen, therefore, declared in council, that ſhe thought proper to diſmiſs him from all his employments, that the matter might be ſtrictly and impartially examined; and accordingly, on the thirty-firſt of December, her majeſty ſent his grace a letter written with her own hand, whereby ſhe required him to reſign all his employments.

Finding how ſtrongly the houſe of lords, (amongſt whom the duke of Marlborough had a powerful intereſt) oppoſed the meaſures for a peace, the miniſtry (determined at all events to procure a majority in that aſſembly) perſuaded the queen to venture on an expedient, which no Engliſh prince had ever before attempted. This was the creating of no leſs than twelve new peers; a proſtitution of honours, which reflects equal diſgrace on the queen who conferred them, and ſuch as received them; for, as thoſe who receive peerage for eminent ſervices performed to their country will be eſteemed and reſpected by every reaſonable, reflecting man; ſo, contempt will always attend thoſe, who accept of honours to ſerve the low purpoſe of a party.

A. D. 1712. Upon the diſgrace of the duke of Marlborough, the duke of Ormond was made commander in chief of her majeſty's forces; the duke of Northumberland was appointed captain of the ſecond troop of horſe guards; the earl of Rivers maſter of the ordinance, and the duke of Beaufort captain of the band of penſioners, in the room of the duke of St. Alban's: brigadier Hill was made lieutenant of the Tower, in the room of lieutenant general Cadogan; the duke of Somerſet was removed from his poſt of maſter of the horſe, and the counteſs of Sunderland, and the lady Rialton, two of the duke of Marlborough's daughters, reſigned their places of ladies of the queen's bed-chamber.

During theſe tranſactions, prince Eugene arrived in England with inſtructions from the emperor; but as very little attention was paid by the miniſtry to the memorial with which the prince had been commiſſioned by his maſter, he returned to the continent highly diſguſted.

The parliament now voted the duke of Marlborough guilty of illegal and unwarrantable practices, and proceeded againſt him with a degree of rigour, which ſhould have been tempered at leaſt, by a due conſideration of the eminent ſervices he had rendered his country.

The commons proceeding to the examination of the public accounts, diſcovered, that Mr. Robert Walpole, a zealous partizan againſt the then adminiſtration, had, when ſecretary at war, been guilty of ſome clandeſtine practices with regard to the forage contract in Scotland. Mr. Walpole was therefore voted guilty of corruption, impriſoned in the Tower, and expelled the houſe. He was, however, re-choſen for the borough of Lynn Regis, which he had before repreſented; but the commons voted him incapable of ſerving in the then parliament.

During theſe tranſactions in England, the conferences for a peace were held at Utrecht: but as all the powers, except France, entertained ſentiments very different from thoſe of her Britannic majeſty, they ſeemed to retard rather than accelerate a pacification. Theſe difficulties had been foreſeen by the queen of England, whoſe principal aim was to free her ſubjects from the miſeries attending an unprofitable war, and reſtore to Europe the bleſſings of peace. The miniſtry, perſuaded they could expect nothing but ruin and proſecution for obeying their ſovereign's commands, in caſe death put a period to her exiſtence before the treaty was concluded, the kingdom appeaſed, and the people ſatisfied with their conduct; adviſed the queen to ſet on foot a private negotiation with Lewis, to ſtipulate certain advantages for her ſubjects in a concerted plan of peace; to enter into ſuch mutual confidence with that monarch, as would anticipate all clandeſtine tranſactions to her prejudice, and enable her, in ſome meaſure, to preſcribe terms for her allies. But the precipitate execution of this plan deſtroyed its merit, and fruſtrated its advantages.

The whole tranſaction had well nigh proved abortive by the intervention of unforeſeen occurrences. The dauphin had died of the ſmall pox in the courſe of the preceding year, and his title had been conferred on the duke of Burgundy, who reſigned his breath on the laſt day of February, ſix days after the demiſe of his wife Mary Adelaide of Savoy. Theſe were ſoon followed to their laſt peaceful manſion by their eldeſt ſon the duke of Britany, then in the ſixth year of his age; ſo that none remained alive, except the duke of Anjou, who was then a ſickly infant. As in caſe of his death, the king of Spain might become heir to the crown of France, it was neceſſary he ſhould renounce his right to that crown before queen Anne concluded the treaty, of which the articles had been ſettled between the courts. Gualtier was, thererefore, ſent to Paris with a memorial couched in the ſtrongeſt terms, repreſenting the danger to which the liberties of Europe muſt inevitably be expoſed, if Philip ſhould aſcend the thrones of France and Spain; and demanding, that in conſequence of his pure, ſimple and voluntary renunciation, the title might be transferred to his brother the duke of Berry.

Philip granted what neceſſity demanded of him. Anne agreed to a ſuſpenſion of arms, and ſent orders to the duke of Ormond her general in Flanders to ceaſe hoſtilities. Lewis delivered Dunkirk to the Engliſh, as a ſecurity for performing his engagements, and expected with anxiety the event of ſo critical a campaign. But in conſequence of the deſertion of the Engliſh, or rather their refuſing to act offenſively, prince Eugene's ſchemes were defeated, and the French general Villars retook ſeven towns, and gained many important advantages. Such, however, was the fury of the allies againſt the power of France, that they reſolved with obſtinacy to proſecute the war.

On the ſixth of June her majeſty went to the houſe, and communicated the plan of the peace to her parliament. She firſt obſerved, that the making peace or war was the undoubted prerogative of the crown, and hinted, that the difficulties which aroſe from the very nature of this affair had been increaſed by artful contrivances to obſtruct it.

With regard to the the treaty, ſhe told them, that the proteſtant ſucceſſion, as eſtabliſhed by law in the houſe of Hanover, had been ſecured, and not only acknowledged by France in the ſtrongeſt terms, but, as an additional ſecurity, the pretender was to be removed from the French dominions; that the duke of Anjou ſhould renouce for himſelf and his deſcendants, all claim to the crown of France, ſo that the two monarchies could never be united. She gave them to underſtand, that a treaty of commerce between England and France had been begun; but the exceſſive duties laid on ſome goods, and the prohibition of others, had rendered it impoſſible to put the laſt hand to that treaty; that proviſion was made, that England ſhould enjoy the privileges granted by France to the moſt favoured nations; that the king of France agreed to make an abſolute ceſſion of the iſland of St. Chriſtopher's, which had hitherto been divided between the two nations; that he had alſo conſented to reſtore to England the whole bay and ſtreights of Hudſon; and the electoral dignity of the houſe of Hanover would be acknowledged on the part of France.

As ſoon as the queen retired, a violent debate aroſe in the upper houſe upon taking the ſpeech into conſideration; the majority however agreed to an addreſs, which the commons immediately voted. On the twenty-firſt of June, her majeſty cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which ſhe obſerved, that ſhould the treaty be broken off, the burthens of the nation would be at leaſt continued if not increaſed; that the preſent opportunity would be irrecoverably loſt of Britain's eſtabliſhing a real balance of power in Europe, and improving her own commerce; and that, if any of the allies might gain by ſuch a proceeding, the reſt would ſuffer in the common calamity.

During theſe tranſactions prince Eugene inveſted Queſnoy, and the trenches being opened, the ſiege was vigorouſly proſecuted under cover of the duke of Ormond's forces, till that general declared to prince Eugene and the deputies of ſtates attending the army, that he had received orders from the queen his miſtreſs, to publiſh within three days, a ſuſpenſion of arms for two months, between his army and that of the French.

The duke of Ormond propoſed alſo, that the like ſuſpenſion of arms ſhould be publiſhed in the confederate army; adding, that if they perſiſted in their operations againſt Queſnoy, they muſt take care themſelves to oppoſe the attempts of the enemy, as he could cover the ſiege no longer. The deputies deſired he would delay his march five days, that they might have time to conſult their principals; and prince Eugene obſerved, that his marching off with the Britiſh troops, and the foreigners in the queen's pay, would leave the allies at the mercy of the enemy, but hoped the latter would not obey the duke's orders. This was refuſed by the principal officers, who alledged, that being commanded to act againſt the French they could not recede without expreſs directions from their maſters.

The town of Queſnoy ſurrendered on the third of July, and the garriſon being made priſoners of war, were ſent to Holland. Prince Eugene, having thus reduced Queſnoy, and being deſirous of undertaking ſome bold enterprize, detached major general Groveſtein with fifteen hundred cavalry, to penetrate into the heart of France. Accordingly, this officer, about the middle of July, advanced into Champagne, paſſed the Noire, the Maeſe, the Moſelle, and the Saar, and retired to Treabach with a rich booty and a great number of hoſtages, after having extorted contributions as far as the gates of Metz, ravaged the country, and reduced a great number of villages and towns to aſhes. This irruption ſpread conſternation to the very gates of Paris, and the troops in the neighbourhood of the capital were aſſembled about the palace at Verſailles, Lewis not thinking himſelf ſafe with his ordinary guards.

During theſe atchievements the Britiſh miniſters at the congreſs endeavoured to influence the allies to join in the ſuſpenſion of arms, but without the leaſt effect. Secretary St. John, now created lord viſcount Bolingbroke, was ſent to Paris, in order to remove the obſtructions which retarded the concluſion of the treaty between England and France. Mr. Prior and the abbe Gualtier accompanied him to the court of Verſailles, where he adjuſted with the marquis the principal intereſts of the duke of Savoy, and the elector of Bavaria; and concluded a ſuſpenſion of arms for three months by ſea and land, between the crowns of France and England. Bolingbroke, having finiſhed his negotiation, returned to England, leaving Mr. Prior as reſident at the court of France.

The duke of Marlborough, perceiving his enemies grow daily more implacable, thought proper to retire to the continent. He had already loſt his boſom friend the earl of Godolphin the late treaſurer, who left behind him the character of an upright ſtateſman, as well as a moſt valuable and ornamental member of ſociety.

The earl of Strafford, who had been particularly active in projecting means for terminating the war, now preſented a new plan of peace, in which the queen promiſed to procure to the ſtates general the city of Tournay, and ſome other places, which, on her concluding a ſeparate treaty, they would certainly never poſſeſs.

Their high mightineſſes having conſidered the new plan, and ſenſible of the circumſtances to which they had reduced themſelves by haughtily contemning former propoſitions, determined to comply with the ſolicitations of her majeſty's miniſter, and accordingly acquainted her, "that they held themſelves bound to acknowledge her majeſty's candour in cauſing the overtures to be laid before them by the earl of Strafford, and then declared they were ready to join with her majeſty in the meaſures ſhe had taken, and to conclude and ſign the peace at the ſame time jointly with her, alſo to enter into a new treaty with her majeſty about the ſucceſſion and barrier, and to conclude and ſign it before the peace."

A. D. 1713. The queen cauſed an anſwer to be tranſmitted to the ſtates, wherein ſhe expreſſed the higheſt ſatisfaction in the reſolution they had taken to act in concert with her; and on the nineteenth of January, a new treaty of barrier and ſucceſſion was ſigned at the Hague. By this treaty, the ſtates engaged to aſſiſt and defend the ſucceſſion of the crown of Great Britain according to the act of ſettlement againſt all oppoſers, and her majeſty ſtipulated, that in conſideration of the ſtates garriſoning ſeveral principal towns in Flanders, the revenues of thoſe towns, over and above what was neceſſary for the ſupport of the civil government, ſhould belong to the ſtates for the maintenance of their garriſons. It was alſo agreed, that the Engliſh and Dutch ſhould hold themſelves reciprocally obliged to aſſiſt each other with their whole force, naval and military, in caſe of an attack.

A remonſtrance was ſoon after preſented to the Britiſh miniſters at Utrecht, by the plenipotentiaries of the reſpective confederates, importing, that, in compliance with the requeſt of king William, they had entered into the grand alliance, by a ſolemn treaty concluded at Nimeguen, and afterwards ratified by the then queen of England: that, on their parts, they had punctually performed all the conditions of that treaty, and chearfully borne all the calamities of a bloody and ruinous war, from an entire confidence, that, as ſhe had always declared her ſatisfaction with their conduct and firmneſs, ſhe would not fail remembering them at the concluſion of a peace, but would endeavour to procure them thoſe advantages, which, conſidering the ſervice they had done to the common cauſe, they had a right to expect: that, notwithſtanding theſe juſt expectations, and the repeated aſſurances her majeſty had given them, they had the mortification to hear, that ſhe perſiſted in the opinion, that a general peace might be concluded, without granting them the leaſt benefit from the alliance; that, ſhould this ſcheme take effect, it would involve them in utter ruin: they, therefore, begged leave to addreſs themſelves to the juſtice and goodneſs of her majeſty, to the wiſdom and goodneſs of her miniſters, and to the honour and humanity of the whole Britiſh nation; humbly beſeeching them not to abandon ſuch faithful and zealous allies, nor leave them in their preſent unhappy ſituation.

The anſwer of the Britiſh miniſters to this repreſentation imported, that if they ſhould not obtain what they deſired, they ought to blame themſelves alone, as the authors of their diſappointment: that they had been deficient in furniſhing their proportion of troops and other neceſſaries; and left the whole burden of the war, in the Netherlands, to lie upon the queen, and the ſtates general: that, when a ceſſation was judged neceſſary, they had deſerted her majeſty, to follow the chimerical projects of prince Eugene: that, while ſhe proſecuted the war with the utmoſt vigour, they had acted with coldneſs and indifference; but, when ſhe inclined to peace, they began to exert themſelves in proſecuting hoſtilities with the utmoſt eagerneſs: that, nevertheleſs, ſhe would not abandon their intereſts, but endeavour to procure for them better conditions than, by their abſurd conduct, they had any right to expect.

The

The import of this reply, together with the acquieſcence of the Duch, ſeems to have had a conſiderable influence upon the other powers, for even the emperor's plenipotentiary ſeemed to talk in more moderate terms. Count Zinzendorf declared that his maſter was very well diſpoſed to a peace, and no longer inſiſted on the ceſſion of Spain to the houſe of Auſtria. Philip's plenipotentiaries, together with thoſe of Bavaria and Cologne, were admitted to the conferences; and the Britiſh miniſters began to conſider themſelves as mediators between the ſeveral parties.

But notwithſtanding the apparent acceſſion of the ſeveral parties, the terms of peace were not fully adjuſted. The French raiſed many objections to the offers they had formerly made, and notwithſtanding the utmoſt efforts of the Britiſh miniſtry, who exerted uncommon diligence on the occaſion, the matter was compromiſed, greatly to the diſadvantage of England. This circumſtance was ſo apparent, that even the plenipotentiaries at Utrecht refuſed to ſign the treaty, until they were furniſhed with a new commiſſion; and this they no ſooner received, than they declared to the miniſters of the other powers, that, on the eleventh of April they, and the other plenipotentiaries, would willingly ſign the reſpective treaties.

A delay of as much time as migh be neceſſary for him to conſult his maſter, was now requeſted by count Zinzendorf, who even threatened, that, if the ſtates ſhould ſign the peace contrary to his deſire, the emperor would immediately recall his troops ftom the Netherlands. The miniſters of France agreed with thoſe of England, that his imperial majeſty ſhould have time to conſider whether he would embrace the propoſals, and allowed only a ſhort time for his anſwer.

On the twelfth of April, the peace was ſigned at Utrecht. Many perſons affirm that this tranſaction was clandeſtine, while others aſſert the contrary. It appears, upon the whole, that the treaty was ſigned privately, firſt by the earl of Strafford and the biſhop of Briſtol on the part of her Britannic majeſty, and afterwards by the plenipotentiaries of Savoy, Portugal, Pruſſia, and the States General.

On the ninth of April the parliament met, when the queen, in her ſpeech, informed them that the treaty was ſigned, and the ratifications would in a few days be exchanged.

Addreſſes of thanks and congratulation were immediately preſented by both houſes, and the ratifications of the treaty being exchanged on the fifth of May, peace with Franc was proclaimed in the cities of London and Weſtminſter, with the uſual ceremonies. The commons having preſented an addreſs, entreating her majeſty to communicate to the houſe, in due time, the treaties of peace and commerce with France, the chancellor of the exchequer, delivered the following accordingly:

The French had agreed, by the treaty of peace, to abandon the pretender; to acknowledge the queen and the proteſtant ſucceſſion; to raze the fortifications of Dunkirk within a limited time, on condition of receiving an equivalent; to cede Newfoundland, Hudſon's Bay, and St. Chriſtopher's, to England; but the French were to be allowed to dry fiſh on the coaſt of Newfoundland, and to keep cape Breton.

The emperor was, by ſtipulation, allowed to poſſeſs the Spaniſh Netherlands, the kingdom of Naples, and the dutchy of Milan; it was agreed, that the duke of Savoy ſhould enjoy Sicily with the title of king; that the elector of Bavaria ſhould receive the ſame title, with the iſland of Sardinia, as an indemnification for his loſſes; that the ſtates general ſhould reſtorre Liſle and its dependencies; and that Namur, Charleroy, Luxemburg, Ypres, and Newport, ſhould be added to the other places they already poſſeſſed in Flanders; that the king of Pruſſia ſhould have Upper-Gueldres in lieu of Orange and the other eſtates belonging to that family in Franche Comté, and the king of Portugal was alſo ſatisfied on his part with the treaty.

A free trade was eſtabliſhed by the treaty of commerce, according to the tariff of the year 1664, except in a few commodities, which in 1699 were ſubjected to a new regulation. It was agreed, that the duties impoſed upon the productions of France imported into England, ſhould not exceed thoſe laid on the ſame commodities from other countries; and that matters relative to commerce ſhould be adjuſted by commiſſioners to meet at London.

The treaty being laid before parliament, after many violent debates, was approved, and a public thankſgiving appointed, which was celebrated with great ſolemnity. On the ſixteenth of July the queen put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which ſhe thanked both houſes for the ſervices they had done the public; recommended to them the making her ſubjects truly ſenſible of what they had gained by the peace; and the endeavouring to diſſipate thoſe groundleſs jealouſies which had been ſo induſtriouſly fomented among the people.

About this time the magiſtracy of Dunkirk ſent a deputation with an addreſs to the queen, imploring her majeſty to ſpare the port and harbour of that town, which they repreſented might be uſeful to her own ſubjects. The memorial was printed and diſperſed among the people; but the arguments it contained were ſoon anſwered and confuted by Meſſrs. Addiſon, Steele, and Manwaring; commiſſioners were therefore ſent to Dunkirk to ſee the fortifications demoliſhed, and the harbour filled up.

On the diſſolution of the parliament, the miniſtry managed the elections in ſuch a manner, as to retain the legiſlative power in their own hands; but in conſequence of diſſentions among the miniſtry, the meeting of the new parliament was delayed until the tenth of December.

Her majeſty, who had retired to Windſor, was ſeized with a dangerous inflammatory fever. This accident revived the hopes of the Jacobites; the public funds fell immediately, and ſo great a run was made upon the bank, that the directors ſent one of their members to repreſent to the treaſurer the danger that threatened the public credit. But the recovery of the queen which happened in a few days after, baniſhed thoſe fears that had alarmed the principal perſons in the nation.

A. D. 1714. During the adjournment of the parliament the peace between Great Britain and Spain was proclaimed in London, by which treaty the kingdoms of France and Spain were for ever ſeparated. Philip acknowledged the proteſtant ſucceſſion, and renounced the pretender; agreed to renew the treaty of commerce and navigation concluded in 1667; granted an excluſive privilege to the Engliſh for furniſhing the Spaniſh Weſt Indies with negroes; ceded Gibraltar and the iſland of Minorca to Great Britain, on condition that the Spaniſh inhabitants of the latter ſhould enjoy their eſtates and religion; yielded the kingdom of Sicily to the duke of Savoy, and granted a full pardon to the Catalonians.

Her majeſty, in her ſpeech, on the ſecond of March, in the houſe of lords, acquainted the parliament, that ſhe had obtained an honourable and advantageous peace for her own people, and concluded with ſaying, "I have done, and ſhall "continue to do, my beſt for the good of my "ſubjects. Let it be your endeavour, as it ſhall "be mine, to unite our differences, not by relax-"ing from the ſtricteſt adherence to our conſtitu-"tion in church and ſtate, but by obſerving the "laws yourſelves, and enforcing a due obedience "on others."

The rancour of party now univerſally prevailed, and the ferments of the people were daily inflamed by pamphlets and papers. Sir Richard Steele was brought to the houſe, tried and condemned as the author of two pamphlets, which being voted ſcandalous and ſeditious libels, Steele was accordingly expelled. He was defended by Mr. Addiſon, general Stanhope, and Mr. Walpole, and oppoſed by Sir William Wyndham, Mr. Foley, and the Attorney-general.

A general removal of the friends to the proteſtant ſucceſſion from all offices of ſtate, and the introduction of ſuch as were ſuſpected of attachment to the prerender, greatly alarmed the people. The former maintained a correſpondence with the duke of Marlborough; and the health of the queen being now ſo much impaired, that her life was deſpaired of, they concerted meaſures that might oppoſe all efforts made againſt the proteſtant ſucceſſion on her demiſe.

The ſubject of the ſucceſſion was warmly agitated in the upper houſe, and ſeveral peers, ſpiritual as well as temporal, obliquely hinted their readineſs to concur in bringing to condign puniſhment thoſe miniſters who might be found to have adviſed meaſures repugnant to the civil and religious rights of the people.

Baron Schutz, about this period, demanded of the chancellor a writ for the electoral prince of Hanover to ſit in the houſe of peers as duke of Cambridge. But as the deſign of his coming to England was diſagreeable to the queen, ſhe wrote a letter to the princeſs Sophia, ſignifying her diſapprobation of ſuch a ſtep, At the ſame time her majeſty wrote to the electoral prince, complaining of his having formed ſuch a reſolution without knowing her ſentiments on the ſubject; and aſſuring him, that nothing could be more dangerous to the tranquillity of her dominions, and the right of ſucceſſion in his line, and conſequently more diſagreeable to her, than ſuch a proceeding at this juncture. Theſe letters were printed and publiſhed in England, with a view to inform the friends of the Hanoverian family, why the duke of Cambridge had laid aſide his deſign of reſiding in Great Britain. The publiſher of theſe letters was taken into cuſtody, by command of the queen, who conſidered this ſtep as a perſonal inſult, and an attempt to injure her in the good opinion of her ſubjects.

The princeſs Sophia did not long ſurvive this event, for on the 8th of June ſhe was ſeized with an apoplectic fit, and expired in the arms of the electoral princeſs before any aſſiſtance could be procured. She was the fourth and youngeſt daughter of Frederic, elector Palatine, king of Bohemia, and Elizabeth, daughter of king James the firſt of England.

Her majeſty's conſtitution was now entirely impaired, the anxiety of her mind having completed the ruin of her health. The diſſentions among her miniſters were arrived to ſuch a height, that they ſeemed to meet in council meerly with a view of oppoſing each other, totally regardleſs of their duty either to their country or their ſovereign.

In the mean time the adherents to the Stuart family held frequent conſultations both in Great Britain and Ireland. They reſolved to improve the public diſſentions to the advantage of their party. They had even the preſumption to inliſt men for the ſervice of the pretender.

The earl of Wharton, having diſcovered theſe practices, ſounded the alarm. A proclamation was immediately iſſued, offering a reward of five thouſand pounds for apprehending the pretender, whenever he ſhould land or attempt to land in Great Britain. The commons reſolved upon an addreſs of thanks for the proclamation, and aſſured her majeſty, that they would chearfully aid and aſſiſt her, by granting the ſum of an hundred thouſand pounds, as a further reward to any who ſhould perform ſo great a ſervice to her majeſty and her kingdoms.

In the upper houſe a motion was made for an addreſs on the ſame occaſion, and ſeconded by the earl of Wharton, who, holding the queen's proclamation in his hand, moſt pathetically lamented her majeſty's owning, that her endeavours to remove the pretender from Lorrain had proved ineffectual. "Unhappy princeſs!" ſaid he, "how "much is her condition altered! will poſterity "believe, that ſo great a queen, who reduced "the exorbitant power of France, gave a king "to Spain, and whoſe very miniſters have made "the emperor and the ſtates-general to tremble, "ſhould yet want power to make ſo petty, ſo in-"conſiderable a prince as the duke of Lorrain "comply with her juſt requeſt of removing out of "his dominions the pretender to her crown?" The houſe, approving the motion, voted the addreſs accordingly.

Lord Bolingbroke propoſed a bill, denouncing the penalty of high-treaſon againſt thoſe, who ſhould liſt or be inliſted in the pretender's ſervice. Lord Hallifax obſerved, that ſuch a bill was altogether needleſs, as both the pretender, and all his adherents were already attainted of high-treaſon: and as the pretender was of himſelf inconſiderable, and not to be feared, but only as he was countenanced and protected by the French king, whoſe intereſt and conſtant deſign it was to impoſe him on theſe kingdoms. He therefore moved, that it ſhould be high treaſon for any of her majeſty's ſubjects to liſt or be inliſted in the ſervice of any foreign prince or ſtate, without a licence under the ſign manual of her majeſty, her heirs or ſucceſſors. The bill paſſed with this amendment, and the commons concurred in it.

To foment the animoſities which ſubſiſted between the oppoſite parties, the upper houſe brought on the tapis the treaty of commerce with Spain, and ſeveral merchants being examined at the bar of the houſe, declared, that, unleſs the explanations of the third, fifth, and eighth articles, which had been made at Madrid after the ſigning of the treaty, were reſcinded, they muſt neceſſarily loſe twenty-five per cent. by a continuation of that trade.

After long and vehement debates, they came to a reſolution to addreſs her majeſty, that ſhe would be pleaſed to give orders for all papers relative to the negotiation of the treaty of commerce with Spain, with the names of the perſons who adviſed her majeſty to that treaty, to be laid before the houſe. To this addreſs the queen anſwered, that, underſtanding the three explanatory articles of the treaty were not detrimental to the trade of her ſubjects, ſhe had conſented to their being ratified with the treaty.

Lord Wharton having taken occaſion, from the above circumſtance, to infer the neglect of attention in the miniſtry to the ſenſe of that auguſt aſſembly, moved for a remonſtrance to her majeſty, to lay before her the inſuperable difficulties that attended the Spaniſh trade on the footing of the late treaty, and the houſe approved of the motion. It was likewiſe moved, that the houſe ſhould inſiſt that the perſons who had adviſed her majeſty to ratify the three explanatory articles ſhould be named. But the queen as well as the miniſtry ſeemed to have prevaricated in this matter, as the houſe obtained no ſatisfaction relative to the Spaniſh treaty, nor were indulged with the ſpecification of the names of thoſe perſons who adviſed the ratification of the articles in queſtion.

On the 9th of July her majeſty put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, on which, after thanking them for granting the neceſſary ſupplies, ſhe declared, that her conſtant endeavours were to preſerve the proteſtant religion, the liberty of her ſubjects, and to ſecure the tranquillity of her kingdom; but that ſhe muſt tell them plainly, that theſe deſirable ends could never be attained, unleſs they brought the ſame diſpoſition on their parts; unleſs all groundleſs jealouſies, which created and fomented diviſions among them, were laid aſide, and unleſs they ſhewed the ſame regard for her juſt prerogative, and for the honour of her government, as ſhe had always expreſſed for the rights of her people.

The queen's diſorder was greatly encreaſed by the cabals of the court. Lord Bolingbroke had inſinuated himſelf into the good graces of the favorite lady Maſham, and artfully undermined the credit of Oxford. The earl wrote in ſevere terms againſt a rival whom he painted to the queen as a man equally turbulent and dangerous.

Bolingbroke defended himſelf by accuſing Oxford of a clandeſtine correſpondence with Marlborough, who had left the kingdom. Her majeſty was herſelf witneſs to a diſpute in which Oxford forgot the reſpect he owed her.

The earl was deprived of all his employments, and Bolingbroke ſeemed to triumph in the victory he had gained.

Such confuſion and animoſity, together with the fatigue of attending a long cabinet council, had ſo violent an effect on the ſpirits of the queen, that ſhe was immediately ſeized with a lethargic diſorder. Every aſſiſtance that the healing art could afford was applied in vain. The diſorder gained ground ſo faſt, that the very next day the phyſicians deſpaired of her life. As ſoon as the dangerous ſituation of her majeſty was made known to the privy-council, a committee of that board met at the cock-pit, and thence adjourned to Kenſington. The dukes of Argyle and Somerſet repaired to the palace, and, without being ſummoned, entered the council chamber. The duke of Shrewſbury thanked them for their readineſs to give their aſſiſtance in ſuch a critical juncture, and deſired they would take their places. They then propoſed that the phyſicians ſhould be examined concerning the ſtate of the queen's health, that they might act with propriety on any emergency.

The phyſicians ſoon after declaring that her majeſty was ſenſible, the duke of Shrewſbury was recommended as a nobleman duly qualified to fill the important office of lord high treaſurer. Her majeſty approved the choice, and delivered the white ſtaff to his grace, deſiring he would uſe it for the good of her people. This poſt being filled, the dukes of Argyle and Somerſet propoſed, that all privy counſellors, in an about London, ſhould be invited to attend, without diſtinction of party. The motion was approved, and the lord Somers, with many other friends of the family of Hanover, repaired to Kenſington.

Their firſt conſideration was the ſecurity of the kingdom, and orders were immediately iſſued for four regiments of horſe and dragoons, quartered in remote counties, to march up to the neighbourhood of London and Weſtminſter. Seven of the ten Britiſh battalions in the Netherlands were directed to embark at Oſtend for England, with all poſſible diſpatch: an embargo was laid upon all ſhipping, and directions were given for equipping all the ſhips of war that could ſooneſt be got ready for ſervice.

Nor did the elector of Brunſwick eſcape the notice of the council: a letter was diſpatched to that prince, informing him of the danger of the queen's life, and deſiring him with all ſpeed to repair to Holland, where a Britiſh ſquadron ſhould be ready to convoy him to England immediately on the queen's demiſe.

Inſtructions were alſo ſent to the earl of Strafford, to require the ſtates-general to prepare for performing their guarantee of the proteſtant ſucceſſion. Meaſures were taken to ſecure the ſea-ports, and overawe the jacobites in Scotland; the command of the fleet was beſtowed on the earl of Berkley, and the heralds at arms were kept in readineſs to proclaim the new king, as ſoon as the vacancy of the throne ſhould happen. While theſe precautions employed the care of the council, the queen, after having dozed in a lethargic inſenſibility for near thirty-ſix hours, paid the great debt of nature on the firſt of Auguſt, in the fiftieth year of her age, and thirteenth of her reign.

Few ſovereigns have merited greater praiſe, or left to ſucceſſors brighter examples, than this princeſs. Without giving proofs of ſhining talents, cultivated by a finiſhed education; without that vigour of mind, neceſſary to prevent the too great aſcendancy of favorites, to which muſt be aſcribed all the defects of her reign; ſhe diſtinguiſhed herſelf by the qualities of the heart, a tender affection for her people, and a mildneſs of diſpoſition as well in the affairs of ſtate, as the familiar concerns of life: ſhe paid particular attention to the advancement of religion, and with the pureſt zeal promoted the deſign of erecting churches for that purpoſe. She gave every encouragement to charity ſchools for the ſupport of the indigent youth of her populous capital, that the ſeeds of religion and virtue might be early ſown in their tender minds, and even the univerſities, thoſe celebrated ſeats of learning, always found her an indulgent patroneſs. In ſhort, ſhe was a pattern of conjugal affection, a warm friend, a munificent patron, and a mild and merciful princeſs; and if it is recorded to the honour of the duke of Marlborough, that he made France tremble, the glory of Anne, queen of Great Britain, is memorized as having given peace to Europe, and ſtopt the effuſion of human blood.

Remarkable Occurrences during the Reign of Queen Anne.

A. D.

1702 Semper Eadem firſt uſed as a motto to the arms of England.

1703 Kit-kat-club (a ſociety, conſiſting of about thirty noblemen and gentlemen of diſtinguiſhed abilities) eſtabliſhed, for the purpoſe of promoting the proteſtant ſucceſſion in the houſe of Hanover both in parliament and out of it; which they effected by ſpirited publications, as well as other meaſures. Dr. Garth was one of the firſt members of this famous club, which took its riſe from one Chriſtopher Kat, a paſtry-cook, who lived near the tavern, where they met, in King-ſtreet, Weſtminſter, and who ſerved them with paſtry.

This year there happened a moſt violent ſtorm, which deſtroyed the greateſt part of a fleet of men of war returning home, beſides a great number of merchant ſhips. Upwards of 1500 ſeamen periſhed on the Engliſh coaſts, and in London only the damage was computed at 1,000,000l.

1709 This year there was a ſevere froſt, which laſted from December to March, and was attended with very heavy ſnows.

1707 Sun-fire office inſtituted, which was the firſt introduction of inſurance from fire in England.

1711 This year a proclamation was iſſued, offering a reward of one hundred pounds for apprehending any of the Mohawks. Theſe were a ſet of diſorderly people, who went about the ſtreets of London in the night, and took an inhuman pleaſure in cutting and diſfiguring the men, and indecently expoſing the women.

1712 Apothecaries exempted from ſerving ward and pariſh offices, or ſitting on juries.

During the reign of queen Anne, the greateſt improvements were made in learning and the polite arts. Many of the great men, who had figured in the reigns of the Stuarts and William were ſtill alive, and in the full exerciſe of their faculties, beſides which a new race ſprung up in the perſons of Pope, Swift, lord Bolingbroke, lord Shafteſbury, Arbuthnot, Congreve, Steele, Rowe, and many other excellent writers, both in proſe and verſe, whoſe names need but be mentioned to be admired.

A. D. 1714. ON the death of queen Anne, the crown devolved, purſuant to act of parliament, on George Lewis, elector of Brunſwick, then in the fifty-fifth year of his age. He was a prince of an extenſive capacity and eſtabliſhed reputation, joining military merit to political ability, and wiſely adopted this memorable maxim, worthy of every potentate upon earth; "never to abandon "his friends, to do juſtice to all mankind, and to "fear no man."

As ſoon as the late queen's death was known, the members of the privy council met, and immediately iſſued orders for proclaiming George Lewis king of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the earl of Dorſet, was ſent to Hanover with the news of his majeſty's acceſſion, and to attend him to England.

The lords juſtices finding the fleet and army had been much neglected, ordered ſuch officers as they could truſt to their reſpective ports, and appointed Mr. Addiſon their ſecretary, giving him orders to receive all the diſpatches directed to the ſecretaries of ſtate, whereby lord Bolingbroke was deprived of his power and authority.

Purſuant to the act for regulating the ſucceſſion, the parliament met on the 5th of Auguſt, and the lord chancellor made a ſpeech to both houſes, importing, that the privy council had proclaimed the elector of Brunſwick under the name of king George, as the lawful and rightful ſovereign of theſe kingdoms; that they had taken the neceſſary care to preſerve the public peace; that he hoped they would not be wanting in any thing that might conduce to the eſtabliſhing and advancing public credit; and added, that he would only take the freedom to exhort them, with the greateſt earneſtneſs, to a perfect unanimity, and a firm adherence to the intereſt of their ſovereign, as the method by which the public tranquillity would be moſt effectually preſerved.

Addreſſes were immediately drawn up by both houſes, containing condolances on the death of the late queen, congratulations on his majeſty's happy acceſſion, and the warmeſt expreſſions of duty and affection.

Theſe addreſſes being tranſmitted to his majeſty were moſt cordially received and graciouſly anſwered.

The parliament, in conſequence of his majeſty's expreſſing expreſſing his ſatisfaction at the loyalty and affection of his ſubjects, reſolved upon an addreſs of thanks, and the commons having voted the neceſſary ſupplies for the ſupport of his majeſty's houſhold, and the dignity of his crown, both houſes adjourned to the 23d day of September.

On the 24th of Auguſt the body of the deceaſed queen was buried wtih great ſolemnity, in the ſame vault with her late huſband, prince George of Denmark, in Henry the ſeventh's chapel, in Weſtminſter Abbey.

King George, having committed the government of his dominions in Germany to the care of a council, ſet out with the electoral prince from Herenhauſen, on the thirty-firſt of Auguſt, and in four days arrived at Utrecht, from whence he repaired to the Hague, where he had ſeveral conferences with the ſtates-general. On the ſixteenth of September he embarked for England under convoy of an Engliſh and Dutch ſquadron commanded by the earl of Berkeley, and next evening arrived at the Hope. On the 18th he landed with the prince at Greenwich, where they were attended by all the great officers of ſtate, and a prodigious number of the nobility and gentry.

On the 20th his majeſty made his public entry through the city to St. James's in the moſt magnificent manner, and amidſt the acclamations of innumerable crouds of ſpectators.

A total change in the miniſtry now took place. The great ſeal was committed to lord Cowper, the privy ſeal to the earl of Wharton, and the government of Ireland to the earl of Sunderland. The duke of Marlborough was made generaliſſimo, the duke of Devonſhire ſteward of the king's houſhold, and lord Townſend and Mr. Stanhope appointed ſecretaries of ſtate. The former privy council was diſſolved, and a new one appointed. Mr. Pulteny was made ſecretary at war, and Mr. Walpole paymaſter both to the army and Chelſea hoſpital. The treaſury and admiralty were put into commiſſion, and the title of prince of Wales was given to the prince royal.

Theſe principal changes in the government having taken place, the king aſſembled his council, and made a declaration to the following effect: "That it was his firm reſolution to do every "thing in his power to ſupport and maintain the "churches of England and Scotland as ſeverally "by law eſtabliſhed, and earneſtly endeavour to "render property ſecure, the good effects of which "were ſoon moſt happily experienced."

His majeſty was crowned with the uſual ſolemnities on the twentieth of October, the earl of Oxford and lord Bolingbroke attending the ceremony. The occaſion was diſtinguiſhed by popular rejoicings throughout the kingdom, except in a few places, where the rabble ſhewed their averſion to the proteſtant ſucceſſion by tumults and riots.

The demolition of Dunkirk appearing not to have been compleated, the Engliſh reſident of Paris was ordered to preſent a memorial to haſten that work, as alſo to prevent the canal of Mardyke from being finiſhed. This miniſter receiving an equivocal anſwer, and the council thinking he did not ſufficiently exert himſelf, he was recalled, and the earl of Stair ſent as ambaſſador to Paris, where he proſecuted the affair with becoming vigour.

The ſpirit of rebellion already prevailed in the kingdom. Several cities and principal towns were filled with tumult and diſorder. To animate the people, the cauſe of religion was joined to that of faction. The party cry was, "Down with the "whigs, Sacheverel for ever." At the ſame time, a printed manifeſto was ſent by the pretender to the dukes of Shrewſbury, Marlborough, Argyle, and other noblemen of the firſt diſtinction. The copies of the repreſentation being delivered to the ſecretaries of ſtate, the king refuſed an audience to the marquis of Lamberti, miniſter from the duke of Lorrain, convinced that his maſter was acquainted with and countenanced this tranſaction.

A. D. 1715. His majeſty having, on the 5th of January, diſſolved the parliament, another was ſummoned by a very extraordinary proclamation, in which the king complained of the pernicious deſigns of ſome men diſaffected to his ſucceſſion, and of their having miſrepreſented his principles and conduct. He mentioned the perplexed ſituation of public affairs, the interruption of commerce, the heavy debts of the nation, and expreſſed his hope that his loving ſubjects would elect ſuch perſons as had ſhewn their attachment to the proteſtant religion when it was moſt in danger.

Mr. Spencer Compton was choſen ſpeaker of the houſe of commons, on the fourteenth of March, at the meeting of the new parliament. On the twenty-firſt the king came to the houſe of peers, and delivered to the chancellor a written ſpeech, which was read in preſence of both houſes. The following are the moſt intereſting particulars: "That the happineſs, eaſe, and proſperity of his "people ſhould be the chief care and ſtudy of "his life. That thoſe who aſſiſted him in carrying on thoſe meaſures he ſhould always eſteem "his beſt friends, and that he did not doubt but "he ſhould be able, with their aſſiſtance, to diſappoint the deſigns of thoſe, who would deprive "him of that bleſſing he moſt valued, namely, the "affection of his people."

The commons, in their addreſs, referred particularly to the manifeſto lately publiſhed by the pretender, and declared they would ſtrictly enquire into the nature and cauſes of thoſe pernicious meaſures, and bring the authors to condign puniſhment.

The houſe of commons having reſolved to augment the allowance before granted to his majeſty, for the better ſupport of his houſhold and family, ſo as to make up the yearly ſum of ſeven hundred thouſand pounds, appointed a committee of ſecrecy to enquire into the conduct of the late miniſtry, ordered their report to be printed, and ſent to the returning officers of every city and borough; and came to a reſolution of impeaching Henry viſcount Bolingbroke, (who had ſome time withdrawn to the continent) Robert earl of Oxford, James duke of Ormond, and Thomas earl of Strafford, of high treaſon and other crimes and miſdemeanors. They prepared bills accordingly, which ſoon after paſſed the houſe of lords and received the royal aſſent, and as tumultuous aſſemblies were now become very frequent in London and other places, a bill was prepared to prevent them.

On the 20th of July his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and having required the attendance of the commons, acquainted them that he had received certain advices of an attempt preparing abroad in favour of the pretender; at the ſame time he gave the royal aſſent to the bill for preventing tumultuous aſſemblies, and that concerning the quaker's affirmation inſtead of an oath.

By this time the committee of ſecrecy were ready to deliver their report, and Mr. Walpole the chairman impeached Henry lord viſcount Bolingbroke of high treaſon, as author of the ſeparate treaty with Lewis XIV. Lord Coningſby then roſe up and impeached Robert earl of Oxford: ſome of the members objected to theſe proceedings, but the majority declaring in their favour, a bill of attainder paſſed againſt Bolingbroke and Oxford, and their names were accordingly eraſed from the liſt of peers.

A rebellion was, by this time, actually begun in Scotland under the earl of Mar. This nobleman, at the death of queen Anne, was ſecretary of ſtate for Scotland, and was one of the firſt who made profeſſion of loyalty and attachment to his majeſty. But not meeting with the encouragement he expected, he retired in diſguſt to his own country, where, prompted by reſentment and ambition, he reſolved to make an effort in favour of the pretender. He proſecuted his deſign with ſuch vigour and reſolution, that the pretender's ſtandard was ſet up on the ſixth of September, and ſoon after he was proclaimed in form at Aberdeen, Dundee, Perth, and ſeveral other places, and the number in arms to ſupport his title amounted to about ſix thouſand.

The rebels had formed a reſolution of ſurprizing the caſtle of Edinburgh, but a ſeaſonable diſcovery having been made, the conſpirators were taken in the fact.

This diſappointment, together with the news of the death of Lewis XIV. ſo greatly diſcouraged the rebels, that ſome of them propoſed to defer any further attempts till the pretender ſhould be actually landed in Scotland; but the majority, depending on an inſurrection in England in their favour, reſolved to proſecute the enterprize at all events.

The precautions, however, taken by government, had rendered abortive the deſigns formed by the rebels in the Weſt of England; but that was far from being the caſe in the north. The earl of Derwentwater, Mr. Forſter, and about two hundred and fifty more appeared in rebellion, and rendezvouſed at Plainfield, near Rothbury, being ſoon after joined by the lord Widdrington, with about thirty horſemen, and a party of horſemen from Scotland. They proclaimed the pretender at Warkworth, Morpeth, and Hexham. Upon the approach of general Carpenter, who was ordered to march into thoſe parts with ſeveral regiments of horſe and foot, the enemy was thrown into the utmoſt conſternation, and at Hardwick it was debated whether they ſhould ſtand their ground, or march off. Mr. Mackintoſh was for the firſt, urging the ſuperiority of their number, and that the longer they deferred an engagement, the greater oppoſition they were likely to meet with: but Mr. Forſter, who was then their general, was againſt fighting, till they ſhould be joined by a ſtrong body of horſe, and moſt of the other principal officers being of the ſame opinion, they marched to Langholm Brampton, and to Penrith, Appleby, Kendal, Kirby, Langſdale and Lancaſter, in moſt of which towns they proclaimed the pretender king of England.

At Lancaſter they had ſeized ſeveral pieces of cannon, and conveyed them to Preſton, where being reinforced conſiderably, and not knowing what rout to take, they barricadoed the place, determined to engage the king's forces under the command of general Wills, who coming up to them three days after, and having made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for ſecuring the ſeveral paſſages to the town, began to attack the enemy in form. The king's troops at firſt were much galled by the enemy's ſhot from the windows of the houſes; but upon orders being given by the general to ſet fire to the houſes at each end of the town, and the arrival of a reinforcement to the king's forces, they were ſo diſpirited, that they deſired a ceſſation of arms, and ſoon after ſubmitted themſelves to mercy. About one hundred and thirty men were ſlain on the king's ſide, but how many on the enemy's is uncertain.

The very day on which the rebels were ſubdued at Preſton, the duke of Argyle, with about four thouſand men, engaged the rebel army under the earl of Mar, conſiſting of between eight and nine thouſand men at Sheriff Muir, near Dumblain, about four miles from Stirling. The battle was obſtinate, and both ſides claimed the victory; but from the conduct of the earl of Mar after the action, it ſeems as if the royaliſts had the juſteſt claim to the title of conquerors; for he immediately retreated to Perth, and the deſign he had formed of croſſing the Firth to join his ſouthern friends was entirely fruſtrated.

The rebels now ſuſtained a terrible blow in the loſs of Inverneſs, from which Sir John Mackenzie was driven by Simon Frazer, lord Lovat, who had hitherto adhered to the pretender's intereſt, but now declared in favour of government. By this means a free communication was opened with the north of Scotland, where the earl of Sunderland had raiſed a ſtrong body of vaſſals. The marquis of Huntley and the earl of Seaforth were obliged to abandon the rebel army, in order to ſecure their own territories, and in a little time ſubmitted to the king: a great number of the Frazers, influenced by the example of their chief, lord Lovat, declared againſt the pretender: the marquis of Tullibardine withdrew from the army to defend his own country, and the clans began to diſperſe, as there was no proſpect of another action.

The reſt of November and the whole of the following month, both parties remained in their quarters; the duke of Argyle at Stirling, and the earl of Mar at Perth.

In the mean time, the pretender, notwithſtanding the deſperate ſituation of his affairs in Scotland, reſolved to viſit that kingdom. With this view, he poſted through France in diſguiſe, and embarking in a ſmall veſſel at Dunkirk, landed on the twenty-ſecond of December at Peterhead, with ſix gentlemen in his retinue, one of whom was the marquis of Tinmouth, ſon to the duke of Berwick. He paſſed through Aberdeen incognito to Feteroſſe, where he was met by the earls of Mar and Mariſchal, with about thirty noblemen and gentlemen of quality.

A. D. 1716. From Feteroſſe he repaired Dundee, and from thence to Scone, near Perth, into which he made his public entry on the 9th day of January. Here he publiſhed ſeveral proclamations, one for convening the ſtates, another for his coronation, and exerciſed ſeveral other acts of royalty, which were hardly aſſumed before they were terminated; for about the end of January the duke of Argyle aſſiſted by lieutenant general Cadogan, and other principal officers, a large train of artillery and ſix thouſand Dutch troops, marched from Stirling to attack the rebels at Perth. But the inſurgents at length determined to abandon the place on the approach of the king's army. They retired with the pretender to Dundee, and thence to Montroſe, where, finding they were cloſely purſued, it was reſolved, in a council of war, that the pretender ſhould retire in the evening. There being a ſmall ſhip in the harbour, he accordingly embarked, attended by the earls of Mar and Milford, the lord Drummond, and ſome other chiefs, and through favour of a dark night eluded the vigilance of the enemy, and arrived ſafely at Graveline in France. The rebels no ſooner found that their prince had left them to ſhift for themſelves, than they deſpiſed all order and diſperſed, and returned to their ſeveral habitations. Such was the iſſue of a rebellion that proved fatal to many noble families, and which, inſtead of promoting the intereſt of the Stuart race, ſerved only to ſtrengthen the proteſtant ſucceſſion on the throne of Hanover.

Addreſſes of thanks were ſeverally preſented by both houſes on the ſucceſs of his majeſty's arms in the ſuppreſſion of the rebellion, and the commons determined to proſecute in the moſt rigorous manner, the authors of thoſe deſtructive counſels, which had drawn down ſuch miſeries upon the nation. They began by expelling Mr. Forſter. They impeached the earls of Derwentwater, Nithſdale, Carnwath, and Wintoun; the lords Widdrington, Kenmuir, and Nairn. They all pleaded guilty, except the earl of Wintoun, who petitioned for time to prepare for his defence.

On the 24th of January the king went to the houſe, and gave the royal aſſent to a bill for continuing the ſuſpenſion of the Habeas Corpus act. He told the two houſes, that the pretender was actually in Scotland, and aſſuming the ſtate and title of theſe realms, and demanded from the commons ſuch ſupplies as might effectually diſcourage any foreign power from giving him aſſiſtance.

The lords who had pleaded guilty had ſentence of death paſſed upon them on the 9th of February by the lord chancellor Cowper, who was created lord high ſteward on this occaſion.

While the peers continued under ſentence of death, ſeveral applications were made both to the throne and the parliament for extending to them the royal mercy. The counteſs of Nithſdale, lady Nairn, lady Derwentwater, with her ſiſter, accompanied by the dutcheſſes of Cleveland and Bolton, and ſeveral other ladies of the firſt diſtinction, were introduced, by the dukes of Richmond and St. Albans, into the king's bedchamber, where they implored his majeſty's clemency for their unfortunate conſorts; but no regard was paid to the petition. Next day they went to Weſtminſter, with a ſtill greater train than ever, and petitioned both houſes of parliament, but their ſuit was rejected.

In the houſe of lords, the duke of Richmond delivered a petition from the earl of Derwentwater, to whom he was nearly related, declaring, that himſelf ſhould oppoſe his ſolicitation. The earl of Derby expreſſed ſome compaſſion for the numerous family of lord Nairn. Petitions from the reſt were preſented by other lords, influenced by motives of humanity.

The reading of the petitions was violently oppoſed by lord Townſend and others; but the earl of Nottingham thinking this indulgence might be granted, his opinion had a conſiderable weight: the majority aſſented to the propoſal, and agreed to an addreſs, praying his majeſty would reprieve ſuch of the condemned lords as ſhould deſerve his mercy. To this petition, he anſwered, that, on this and all other occaſions, he would do what he thought moſt conſiſtent with the dignity of his crown and the ſafety of his people. The lords were, however, executed, and the miniſtry, in revenge for Nottingham's interfering in this buſineſs, procured his lordſhip to be diſmiſſed from his poſt of preſident of the council, and ſeveral of his friends and relatives from their reſpective offices.

The 17th day of April was fixed for trying the inferior claſs of rebels in the court of common pleas, when bills of high treaſon were found againſt upwards of twenty in that court: two and twenty were condemned at Liverpool, and more than that number executed at Preſton, Wigan, and Mancheſter: about a thouſand priſoners ſubmitted to the king's mercy, and petitioned for tranſportation.

Several were hanged at Tyburn, particularly colonel Oxburgh, William Paul, a clergyman, and Mr. Hall. The earl of Mar, the marquis of Tullibardine, and ſome others, who fled from Scotland, were attainted by act of parliament.

Though the rebellion was now effectually ſuppreſſed, yet the rigour exerciſed upon the delinquents, rendered the government obnoxious to a very conſiderable part of the people. The miniſtry ſoon perceived the effects their conduct (however neceſſary it might be deemed) had produced. They apprehended ſome troubles and embarraſſments at the meeting of a new parliament, and therefore reſolved, if poſſible, to eſtabliſh their adminiſtration beyond the power of oppoſition, by a ſtep which, though bold, cannot be admitted as ſtrictly conſtitutional.

The duke of Devonſhire repreſented in the upper houſe, that triennial parliaments ſerved to keep up party diviſions, to raiſe and foment feuds in private families, to produce ruinous expences, and give occaſion to the cabals and intrigues of foreign princes. That it became the wiſdom of that auguſt aſſembly to apply a proper remedy to an evil which might be attended with the moſt dangerous conſequences eſpecially in the then temper of the nation, as the ſpirit of rebellion ſtill remained unconquered. He therefore propoſed a bill for lengthening the duration of parliaments.

This bill produced long and very warm debates in both houſes. The independent and unprejudiced members, as well as the public, oppoſed it with all their might: they ſpoke, they wrote againſt it, and by their arguments and diſcourſes proved the danger that might reſult from it beyond all contradiction: the moſt plauſible arguments adduced in the houſe of lords were to the following effect. "The fundamental laws of the kingdom "(ſaid ſome peers) required frequent parliaments; "they were eſtabliſhed by the practice of ſeveral "ages, they intereſted the liberty and glory of the "citizens; what confidence could foreign powers "have in a nation which ſo flagrantly ſacrificed its "moſt precious rights? would not the expences of "elections, and the cabals which they occaſioned, "far from diminiſhing by this new and dangerous "ſyſtem, increaſe with the intereſt individuals "would have in procuring ſeats in a parliament of "ſo long continuance? would not the miniſtry "have both ſtronger motives, and more extenſive "means to corrupt the members? and might not "the parliament after having prolonged its duration, aſpire to render itſelf perpetual, which "would annihilate the privileges of the people and "the conſtitution of the ſtate?"

Not-

Notwithſtanding the force of this manner of reaſoning, it could not prevail againſt the influence of the court. The miniſtry were ſure of a majority; they ſuffered their adverſaries to exhauſt their rhetoric, and when the queſtion came to be finally put in the upper houſe, it was carried by a majority of ſixty-nine voices againſt thirty-ſix. Twenty-four proteſted againſt it. The majority in the lower houſe was two hundred and ſixty-four againſt one hundred and twenty-one. Thus paſſed and received the royal aſſent, the famous ſeptennial act, whereby this and future parliaments were continued ſeven years (unleſs ſooner diſſolved by prerogative of the crown) inſtead of three, to which they were limited by the triennial act paſſed in the reign of William III.

The rebellion being now entirely quelled, and the public tranquillity reſtored, his majeſty reſolved to viſit his German dominions; but as he was reſtricted from leaving the kingdom by the act for the farther limitation of the crown, this clauſe was repealed in a new bill, which paſſed through both houſes without oppoſition. On the twenty-ſixth day of June his majeſty cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech to both houſes, in which he told them, that he was highly ſatisfied with the proceedings of the parliament; that he hoped the wholeſome and neceſſary laws they had made would anſwer the great and important ends, which it was evident they had in view, namely, thoſe of defeating the deſigns and ſubduing the ſpirit of the diſaffected, and encouraging the friends of the preſent eſtabliſhment and the proteſtant ſucceſſion; that he deſigned to make uſe of the approaching vacation to viſit his German dominions, and that the better to provide for the ſecurity of the kingdom, he had conſtituted his beloved ſon, the prince of Wales, guardian of the realm during his abſence. Such were the proceedings of the firſt ſeſſion of this parliament, which, by its vigorous and reſolute meaſures, in a great degree defeated the hopes of his enemies, and eſtabliſhed his majeſty on the throne.

The diſaffected party diſtinguiſhed themſelves, by wearing white roſes on the tenth of June, the anniverſary of the pretender's birth day. The Oſonians, too, could not let ſlip ſuch a favourable opportunity of diſplaying their principles. They had even the inſolence to attack ſome officers of the army who were peaceably celebrating the king's birth day; and they drew up a remonſtrance, which they preſented to parliament, becauſe the officers repulſed them in a ſpirited manner.

Soon after the prorogation of parliament, his majeſty embarked at Graveſend, and proceeded directly to Pyrmont to drink the waters. But he had ſcarce left England, before the two parties that divided the nation broke out into freſh animoſities. The diſorderly multitude, always ready to follow the example of their ſuperiors, formed themſelves into ſocieties, and became the abettors and partizans of what were then denominated "High Church and Low Church." They were guilty of the moſt flagrant outrages, murder not excepted; till at length ſome of them were apprehended by a party of the guards, tried, convicted, and executed as examples to the reſt.

The king was induced to make a voyage to the continent, in order to ſecure his German dominions from the king of Sweden, and Great Britain from the deſigns of the pretender. Charles was highly incenſed at his Britannic majeſty for having joined in the confederacy, which deprived him of Bremen and Verden, and for having afterwards purchaſed theſe dutchies of the king of Denmark. The pretender, laying hold of this opportunity, prevailed upon the Swede to eſpouſe his intereſt, and even to form a regular deſign of advancing him to the Britiſh throne.

To prevent the effects of this gathering ſtorm, his majeſty determined to form new alliances abroad. He knew the duke of Orleans cheriſhed the ambition of aſcending the throne of France, in caſe the young king, who was very ſickly, ſhould die without iſſue. He was ſenſible, at the ſame time, that Philip of Spain would powerfully conteſt that ſucceſſion, notwithſtanding his renunciation; and he believed the regent would think an increaſe of his intereſt with England and Holland worthy his notice.

George therefore had the addreſs to conclude a private treaty with the duke of Orleans, regent of France, and the States-general. By this treaty, which was known by the name of the triple alliance, the duke of Orleans engaged that the pretender ſhould be immediately removed from Avignon to the other ſide the Alps, and never be permitted to return to Lorrain or France, on any pretence whatſoever; that no refuge ſhould be given to the rebellious ſubjects of either of the parties; that the treaty of Utrecht, with reſpect to the demolition of Dunkirk, ſhould be fully executed, to the ſatisfaction of his Britannic majeſty. The treaty contained a guarantee of all places poſſeſſed by the contracting powers, of the proteſtant ſucceſſion on the throne of England, as well as that of the family of Orleans to the crown of France, and a defenſive alliance, aſcertaining the proportion of ſhips and forces to be furniſhed to that power, if it ſhould be diſturbed by invaſions from abroad, or commotions at home.

This treaty was no ſooner made public, than it excited great diſcontents both in France and England; but theſe clamours were little regarded by the king and the regent, who had each ſecured their principal point.

In the mean time negotiations were endeavoured to be carried on with Charles of Sweden, but as he inſiſted as peremptorily on the reſtoration of Bremen and Verden, as George claimed them from purchaſe, the breach between thoſe monarchs became wider, and of courſe more prejudicial to the trade of England. Indeed, it had nearly been attended with an invaſion, much more formidable that which had ſo lately been defeated. The Swediſh miniſters at London, Paris, and the Hague, maintained a correſpondence with the diſaffected party in England. A ſcheme was laid for Charles's landing on this iſland with a body of twelve thouſand men, where he was to be joined by the malecontents of the united kingdoms. The Swede reliſhed the project, which flattered his vanity and revenge; nor was it diſagreeable to the Czar of Muſcovy, who was provoked at king George's offer to join Charles againſt the Ruſſians, provided he would renounce all pretenſions to the dutchies of Bremen and Verden.

A. D. 1717. But notwithſtanding the ſecrecy with which theſe negotiations were carried on, the king was informed of the deſigns of his enemies: he therefore returned to England about the latter end of January, and ordered colonel Blakeney, with a detachment of foot guards, to ſecure count Gyllenburgh, the Swediſh ambaſſador, with all his papers. At the ſame time, Sir Jacob Banks, formerly a member for Minehead, and Charles Cæſar, late treaſurer to the navy, were taken into cuſtody.

Theſe

These proceedings alarmed the foreign miniſters, who complained of it to the miniſtry as an outrage committed againſt the law of nations. They received a general anſwer that, in a day or two, they ſhould be fully informed why the court had taken this ſtep. Accordingly, the ſecretaries of ſtate wrote circular letters to them, giving an account of the motive which led to theſe meaſures. Orders were alſo diſpatched to the Britiſh envoy at the Hague to apply, with the utmoſt ſecrecy, to the ſtates for leave to arreſt baron Gortz the Swediſh reſidentiary in Holland. The baron owned, and even boaſted, that he had planned the invaſion: a deſign, he pretended, which was juſtified by the conduct of king George, who had aided the princes in confederacy againſt the king of Sweden, who had aſſiſted the king of Denmark to reduce Bremen and Verden, and then purchaſed theſe dutchies of the conqueror, and who had, in the courſe of this very ſummer, ſent a ſquadron of ſhips to the Baltic, where it joined the Danes and Ruſſians againſt the Swediſh fleet.

On the 20th of February the parliament of Great Britain aſſembled, when the king, in a ſpeech from the throne, informed them "that the inveterate rancour of a faction had again prompted the ſtirring up foreign powers to diſturb the peace of their native country, inſomuch that it ſeemed they choſe rather to make Britain a ſcene of blood and confuſion, than give over their darling deſign of impoſing a popiſh Pretender." The letters of baron Gortz and count Gyllenburg were laid before the houſe, and ſoon after publiſhed by his majeſty's command.

Both houſes addreſſed the king upon this occaſion, and, in ſuitable terms, expreſſed their loyalty and affection for his perſon and government, as well as reſentment at the late flagrant meaſures of a diſappointed and diſaffected party. All commerce with Sweden was prohibited, a ſquadron of thirty-two ſail was immediately fitted out, which blocked up the Swediſh fleet in their own harbours, and prevented the execution of their long projected deſign.

The commons voted twenty ſeven thouſand pounds for the payment of four battalions of Munſter, and two of Saxe-Gotha, which the king had taken into his ſervice, to ſupply the place of ſuch as, during the rebellion, might be drawn from the garriſons of the States-general, to the aſſiſtance of England. The tax on malt, and a land tax of three ſhillings in the pound were voted to raiſe the ſupplies.

The ſums given being deemed inſufficient for the ſervice of the current year, Mr. ſecretary Stanhope brought a meſſage from his majeſty, demanding an extraordinary ſupply, that he might be the better enabled to ſecure his kingdoms againſt the danger with which they were threatened from Sweden; and he moved that a ſupply ſhould be granted to his majeſty for this purpoſe.

This unexpected meſſage occaſioned violent debates. It was ſtrenuouſly urged, that to aſk money for alliances, without firſt acquainting the houſe with the particulars, was no ways agreeable to the methods of parliament, and many courtiers, who had before diſtinguiſhed themſelves in a remarkable manner by their zeal for the intereſt of his majeſty, convinced that this method was unparliamentary, argued againſt it. Mr. Robert Walpole was ſilent upon the occaſion; at length, however, it was voted by a majority of only four voices, that a ſum not exceeding two hundred and fifty thouſand pounds ſhould be granted to his majeſty on this occaſion.

It appeared from the earneſtneſs with which this meaſure was oppoſed that the miniſtry was divided within itſelf. A ſhort time, however, produced an almoſt total change. Lord Townſhend was removed from the viceroyſhip of Ireland, and the duke of Bolton appointed to that high office. The duke of Devonſhire was removed from being preſident of the council; new commiſſioners were nominated for the management of the treaſury and admiralty, and the earl of Sunderland and Joſeph Addiſon, Eſq. were appointed principal ſecretaries of ſtate.

On the 26th of April the lower houſe of convocation took under conſideration ſome poſitions advanced by Dr. Hoadley, biſhop of Bangor, in a pamphlet entitled "A preſervative againſt the principles and practices of the Non-jurors." The work was cenſured as tending to ſubvert the authority of the church, and call in queſtion the royal ſupremacy and legiſlative authority in matters eccleſiaſtical. But government prudently interpoſed and thereby prevented the iſſue of their determinations.

His majeſty went to the houſe of peers on the ſixth of May, and informed the parliament, that the fleet under Sir George Byng, which had ſailed to the Baltic to obſerve the motions of the Swedes, was ſafely arrived in the Sound; an event, which he hoped, would effectually ſecure the kingdom againſt any immediate danger of an invaſion; that this likewiſe afforded him an opportunity of making a conſiderable reduction in his land forces; an opportunity which he embraced with the greateſt pleaſure, having eſtabliſhed it as a rule with himſelf, to conſult, in every thing, the eaſe of his people, as far as was conſiſtent with their ſafety; and, for his own part, as he ſhould always place his greatneſs in the proſperity of his ſubjects, ſo ſhould he ever deſire that his power might be founded in their affections; that, for theſe reaſons, he had given orders for the ſpeedy diſbanding of ten thouſand men; that he had likewiſe given directions to prepare an act of grace, and, however this favour might be received by thoſe who were obſtinately bent upon the ruin of their country, he flattered himſelf it would raiſe a due ſenſe of gratitude in all ſuch as had been artfully miſled into treaſonable practices againſt his perſon and government, and preſerve them from ſtanding in need of the like mercy for the future, when ſuch an inſtance of clemency might not be ſo conſiſtent with the public welfare, as it would be agreeable to his own inclinations; and added, that he hoped they would take proper meaſures for reducing the public debts, with a juſt regard to parliamentary credit, and compleat the public buſineſs with unanimity and diſpatch.

The grand object of reducing the national debt had already occupied the thoughts of the principal financiers in the kingdom. It was comprehended under the two heads of redeemable and irredeemable incumbrances. The firſt had been contracted with a redeemable intereſt; and theſe the public had a right to diſcharge; the others conſiſted of long and ſhort annuities, granted for a greater or leſſer number of years, which could not be altered without the conſent of the proprietors. Mr. Robert Walpole, when at the head of the treaſury, had projected a ſcheme for leſſening the intereſt, and and paying the capital of these national debts. He proposed, in the house of commons, to reduce the interest of redeemable funds, and offer an alternative to the proprietors of annuities. Walpole's plan had met with approbation; but on his resignation, the new ministers thought proper to make some alterations in it, with which he was by no means satisfied.

The South-sea company and the Bank having agreed to provide money for such creditors as should be willing to receive their principal and interest, the house came to the following resolutions: that all the public funds redeemable by law, which did not exceed five pounds per cent. per annum should be redeemed, according to their respective provisoes or clauses of redemption, contained in the acts of parliament for that purpose, or (with the consent of the proprietors) should be converted into an interest or annuity, not exceeding five pounds per cent. per annum, redeemable by parliament: that his majesty should be enabled to borrow of any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, such sum or sums of money, as should be requisite to redeem the said redeemable funds, at any rate not exceeding five pounds per cent. per annum, or to secure the same upon the funds so to be redeemed: that the annuity of one hundred and six thousand, five hundred and one pounds, thirteen shillings and five pence, payable to the governor and company of the bank, by virtue of several acts of parliament which had been passed in that behalf, for the principal sum of one million, five hundred and seventy-five thousand, twenty-seven pounds, seventeen shillings, and ten pence halfpenny, by them advanced, should be redeemed, or (by consent of the said governor and company) be converted into an interest or annuity, not exceeding five pounds per cent. redeemable by parliament: that so much of the fund, commonly called the Aggregate fund, settled by an act of parliament in the first year of his present majesty, as is applicable to the interest, circulation, exchanging, or cancelling the present exchequer bills, should also be redeemed: that his majesty should be enabled to authorize the high treasurer, or the commissioners of the treasury, for the time being, to treat and agree with any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, for circulating such a number of exchequer bills, at a rate not exceeding four pounds ten shillings per cent. per annum, for interest, exchange, and circulation, as might be charged and secured upon that part of the Aggregate fund so to be redemed: that the annuities of six hundred thousand pounds, and eight thousand pounds, payable to the governor and company of merchants of England, trading to the South-sea, should likewise be redeemed: that the annuities payable by an act of parliament of the reign of king William the third, to certain patentees therein named, their heirs and assigns, out of the weekly sum of three thousand seven hundred pounds charged on the excise, should also be redeemed: that the several terms of years remaining on the duties appropriated by the two lottery acts, passed in the ninth year of the reign of her late majesty queen Anne, and by the two lottery acts, passed in the tenth year of her said late majesty, should be made perpetual: that the said duties comprehended in the said four lottery acts should be made one fund for the future: that the proprietors of the orders, grounded on the said lottery acts, should, within a limited time, make their election, either to accept annuities after the rate of five pounds per cent. per annum, redeemable by parliament, out of such general fund, or to be paid so much as remained due to them upon their orders respectively: that in all cases where the proprietors should choose to have their principal, the five per cent. per annum thereby saved should be established as another fund towards answering such sums of money as should be advanced (for discharging the principal) by loans, or such other securities as should be thought proper: that his majesty should be enabled to give power for receiving voluntary subscriptions from any person or persons, intitled to any of the annuities issuing out of the public funds, for the residue of the respective terms of 99, 96, 89, or 32 years formerly purchased therein, (not being subject to redemption,) who should be willing to accept, in lieu thereof, perpetual annuities redeemable by parliament, and to agree to some other regulations mentioned in the resolution of the house: that all savings, which should arise upon any of the present funds by the proposed redemption and reduction, should, after all deficiencies that might happen upon any of the said funds were made good, be reserved and applied towards discharging and reducing the national debt: and that all the said duties now in being, or to be continued, should immediately cease and determine, after the said national debts should be discharged and paid off. The three bills, called the South-sea-act, the Bank-act, and the General-fund-act, were founded on these resolutions.

The original-stock of the South-sea company did not exceed nine millions four hundred and seventy-one thousand three hundred and twenty-five pounds; but, as the funds granted were sufficient to answer the interest of ten millions at six per cent. the company made up that sum to the government, for which they received an interest or annuity of six hundred thousand pounds, and eight thousand pounds a year for management. By this act, they declared themselves willing to receive an annuity of five hundred thousand, and eight thousand pounds a year for management. It was enacted, that the company should continue a corporation, until the redemption of their annuity, towards which not less than a million should be paid at a time. They were likewise required to advance a sum not exceeding two millions towards discharging the principal and interest due on the four lottery funds of the ninth and tenth years of her late majesty.

The substance of the bank act was as follows: the governor and company declared themselves willing to accept an annuity of eighty-eight thousand seven hundred and fifty-one pounds, seven shillings and ten pence halfpenny, or the principal of one million, seven hundred, and seventy-five thousand, twenty-seven pounds, thirteen shillings and ten pence halfpenny, in lieu of the present annuity, amounting to one hundred and six thousand five hundred and one pounds, thirteen shillings, and five-pence. They likewise declared themselves willing to discharge, and deliver up to be cancelled, as many exchequer-bills as amounted to two millions, and to accept of an annuity of one hundred thousand pounds, being after the rate of five per cent. redeemable after one year's notice; to circulate as many of the remaining exchequer-bills as amounted to two millions, and to accept of an annuity of one hundred thousand pounds, being after the rate of five per cent. redeemable after one year's notice; to circulate the remaining exchequer-bills at three per cent. and one penny per day. It was enacted, that the former allowances ſhould be continued to the enſuing Chriſtmas; after which, the bank ſhould have for circulating the two millions five hundred and ſixty-one thouſand twenty-five pounds remaining exchequer-bills, an annuity of ſeventy-ſix thouſand eight hundred and thirty pounds fifteen ſhillings, at the rate of three pounds per cent. till redeemed, over and above the one penny per day for intereſt. By the ſame act the bank was required to advance a ſum not exceeding two millions five hundred thouſand pounds, towards diſcharging the national debt, if wanted, on condition that they ſhould have five pounds per cent. for as much as they ſhould advance, redeemable by parliament.

The general fund act recited the ſeveral acts of parliament, that had paſſed for eſtabliſhing the four lotteries in the reign of the late queen, mentioned the terms of years for which theſe revenues were granted, and ſtated the annual produce of the ſeveral funds, amounting in all to ſeven hundred twenty-four thouſand eight hundred forty-nine pounds, ſix ſhillings and ten-pence halfpenny. This was the general fund, the deficiency of which was to be made good, annually, out of the firſt aids granted by parliament. For the regular payment of all ſuch annuities as ſhould be made payable by this act, it was ordained, that all the duties and revenues mentioned therein ſhould continue for ever; with the proviſoe, however, that the revenues rendered by this act perpetual, ſhould be ſubject to redemption. This act contained a clauſe, by which the ſinking fund was eſtabliſhed. The reduction of intereſt to five per cent. producing a ſurplus or exceſs upon the appropriated funds, it was enacted that all the monies ariſing from time to time, as well from the ſurplus by virtue of the acts for redeeming the funds of the bank and of the South-ſea company, as alſo from the ſurplus of the duties and revenues by this act appropriated to make good the general fund, and the overplus monies of the ſaid general fund, ſhould be appropriated and employed for the diſcharging the principal and intereſt of ſuch national debts as were incurred before the twenty-fifth of December of the preceeding year, in ſuch manner as ſhould be ordered or appointed by any future act of parliament, to be diſcharged out of the ſame, and for none other uſe, intent, or purpoſe whatſoever.

The earl of Oxford, who had been confined in the tower about two years, took advantage of the diſputes which prevailed among parties, and cauſed a petition to be preſented to the houſe of peers, praying that his impeachment might not be indefinite, but that he might be admitted to trial. The moſt violent debates took place in both houſes on the manner in which it was proper to proceed. The upper houſe inſiſted on their right to regulate the matter of trial both as to time and form; but the commons found means to protract the term for ten days longer than the ſpace preſcribed by the lords.

On the twenty-fourth of June the earl was brought to the bar of the court in Weſtminſter-hall, where, after an introductory ſpeech from the lord high ſteward, Mr. Hampden recapitulated the charge againſt the priſoner, but was interrupted by lord Harcourt, who carried a motion for adjournment to the houſe of peers. His lordſhip there obſerved, that, as much time would be required to diſcuſs the ſeveral articles, he deemed it expedient to move, that the commons be not permitted to proceed any farther in their charge againſt the earl of Oxford, till judgment ſhould be given as to the article of high treaſon.

The peers having agreed to this motion, a more violent debate than ever enſued between the two houſes, each claiming their reſpective rights and privileges. At length, however, the lords ſent a meſſage to the commons, peremptorily informing them, that they intended forthwith to proceed to the trial of the earl of Oxford. The commons paid no regard to this intimation, but adjourned to the third of July. The lords, therefore, repairing to Weſtminſter-hall, took their places, ordered the earl to be brought to the bar, and made proclamation for his accuſers to appear. Having waited a ſhort time, and the commons not appearing, they returned to their houſe, where the queſtion being put, whether the earl ſhould be acquitted? it paſſed in the affirmative, the lord high ſteward made a formal declaration of the ſame, and Oxford was immediately diſcharged. But the lower houſe, fired with reſentment, preſented an addreſs to the king, deſiring he might be exempted from the intended act of grace. His majeſty complied, and the earl was forbid the court.

On the 15th of July his majeſty went to the houſe and gave the royal aſſent to ſeveral bills, among which was the act of grace, from which Prior and ſome others were excepted by name; after which his majeſty cloſed the ſeſſion with a moſt gracious ſpeech from the throne.

An unforeſeen event now delivered the king of England from all apprehenſions on the part of Sweden. Charles the XIIth, who was on the point of entering into an alliance with the Czar, was killed at the ſiege of Frederickſhall in Norway, and the dominions, which had been taken from him, remained with the then poſſeſſors. King George had not yet received the inveſtiture of the duchies of Bremen and Verden. This induced him to preſerve meaſures with the emperor Charles the VIth, and offer to ſupport him againſt the efforts of Spain. Philip invaded and conquered Sardinia on pretences rather ſpecious than ſolid. His miniſter, cardinal Alberoni, ever forming immenſe projects, drew on the Spaniſh monarchy a ſtorm, which good policy would rather have endeavoured to avert. The emperor, France, England and Holland concluded a treaty, and this quadruple alliance regulated the partition of ſome diſputed territories. Philip was diſſatisfied, and all parties prepared for war.

The parliament fixed the number of troops at ſixteen thouſand men, and paſſed a bill to puniſh mutiny and deſertion. This bill, by reſtoring martial law, took from the civil magiſtrate the cognizance of crimes committed by the ſoldiers and officers of the army; and, however contrary it might be to the genius of the Engliſh, it then appeared neceſſary to the maintenance of military diſcipline.

On the 2d of November the princeſs of Wales was delivered of a prince, who on the 28th, was baptized by the name of George William. This affair was unhappily productive of a difference between the king and the prince of Wales. The cuſtom, it ſeems, on ſuch an occaſion, was, that, when the child was a boy, and the king ſtood godfather, the place of ſecond god-father was ſupplied by one of the principal lords of the court, commonly the lord-chamberlain for the time being. The prince, who was ignorant of the cuſtom, intended, that his uncle, the biſhop of Oſnaburgh, ſhould ſhould ſtand god-father. The king, who had been at the pains to inform himſelf of the matter, appointed the duke of Newcaſtle, then lord-chamberlain, to ſtand, not as repreſenting the biſhop of Oſnaburgh, but in his own proper name and perſon. As ſoon as the ceremony was ended, the prince expreſſed the higheſt reſentment againſt the duke.

His majeſty commanded the prince to confine himſelf within his own apartments, and afterwards ſignified his pleaſure that he ſhould quit the palace of St. James's. The prince immediately complied, and took up his reſidence at Leiceſter houſe, whither he was accompanied by the princeſs his conſort. Notice was given to all peers and peereſſes, and all privy counſellors and their wives, that in caſe they viſited the prince and princeſs, they ſhould forbear coming into his majeſty's preſence; all who enjoyed poſts and places under both king and prince, were left to their choice which they choſe to relinquiſh, and after this affair, when his majeſty went abroad, he committed the adminiſtration of government to the power of lords juſtices.

On the 21ſt of November the parliament met, when the king, in his ſpeech, informed them, that he had reduced the army to very near one half ſince the beginning of laſt ſeſſion; that he heartily wiſhed all thoſe, who were friends to the then happy eſtabliſhment, might unanimouſly concur in ſome proper method for the greater ſtrengthening the proteſtant intereſt; of which, as the church of England was unqueſtionably the main ſupport and bulwark, ſo would ſhe reap the principal benefit of every advantage accruing from the union and mutual charity of all proteſtants; and that as none could recommend themſelves more effectually to his favour and countenance, than by a ſincere zeal for the juſt rights of the crown and liberties of the people, he was firmly determined to encourage all thoſe, who acted agreeable to the principles on which his government was founded, and to the conſtitution of Great Britain.

Both houſes of parliament having preſented addreſſes of thanks, the commons proceeded to take into conſideration the eſtimates and accounts, in order to ſettle the eſtabliſhment of the army, navy, and ordnance. Ten thouſand men were voted for the ſea ſervice; and the ſum of two hundred and twenty-four thouſand, eight hundred and fifty-ſeven pounds, fourteen ſhillings and eleven pence, was granted for defraying the expences of the navy.

When the commons came to take into conſideration the ſupply neceſſary for the army, high debates aroſe on the number of troops that ought to be maintained. Sir William Wyndham, Mr. Shippen, and Mr. Walpole endeavoured to prove that twelve thouſand men were fully ſufficient. They were anſwered by Mr. Craggs, ſecretary at war, and Sir David Dalrymple, who affirmed, that ſixteen thouſand were abſolutely neceſſary.

In the courſe of the debate, Mr. Shippen, among other vehement and unguarded expreſſions, ſaid, "that the ſecond paragraph of the king's ſpeech ſeemed more calculated for the meridian of Germany than of Great Britain; and that it was a great misfortune the king was a ſtranger to our language and conſtitution." Theſe words gave offence to ſeveral members, ſome of whom affirmed, that part of his ſpeech was a ſcandalous invective againſt the king's perſon and government, and moved, that the member who uſed it ſhould be ſent to the Tower. Mr. Shippen refuſing to retract, or excuſe what he had ſaid, was voted to the Tower by a great majority.

A. D. 1718. In the beginning of this year, one James Shepherd, a youth of eighteen, by frequenting diſaffected aſſemblies, and reading inflammatory productions, was worked up to ſuch a height of enthuſiaſm, that he actually wrote to Mr. Leake, a nonjuring miniſter, propoſing a ſcheme for aſſaſſinating the king. He was immediately apprehended, brought to his trial, and owned the deſign of which he was accuſed, declaring he had harboured it for three years paſt, nor did he think there was any ſin in carrying it into execution. He was accordingly condemned and hanged at Tyburn, upon his own confeſſion.

The marquis of Paleotti, an Italian nobleman, brother to the ducheſs of Shrewſbury, underwent the ſame fate. He had, in a tranſport of paſſion, killed his own ſervant, and ſeemed, indeed, to be diſordered in his intellects. After ſentence of death had been paſſed upon him, ſtrong applications were made to the king for a pardon, as well by his ſiſter the ducheſs, as by many other people of the firſt diſtinction; but the common people became ſo clamorous for juſtice, that it was thought dangerous to ſave him, and he, therefore, ſuffered the puniſhment of the law.

Several changes in the miniſtry took place at this time. Lord chancellor Cowper, who had been advanced to the dignity of an earl, reſigned the great ſeal, which was at firſt put into commiſſion, but afterwards given to lord Parker, as high-chancellor. The earl of Sunderland was conſtituted preſident of the council and firſt commiſſioner of the treaſury. The earl of Holderneſs was placed at the head of the board of trade. The lord Stanhope and Mr. Craggs were appointed ſecretaries of ſtate; and the title of earl was ſoon afterwards given to lords Stanhope and Cadogan.

One grand object of the quadruple alliance was to oblige the king of Spain to make peace with the emperor, to whom the duke of Savoy was to cede Sicily, in exchange for Sardinia. This treaty, too advantageous to the houſe of Auſtria, was rejected by the court of Spain, and cardinal Alberoni having equipped a formidable armament, the king of England, to ſupport his mediation, ordered a fleet of twenty ſail of the line to the Mediterranean, under the command of Sir George Byng.

The admiral arrived at Cape St. Vincent on the thirtieth of June, when he diſpatched his ſecretary to Cadiz, with a letter to colonel Stanhope, the Britiſh miniſter at Madrid, deſiring him to acquaint his moſt Catholic majeſty with the admiral's arrival in thoſe parts, and ſubmit to his inſpection the following articles of inſtructions.

"As a ſuſpenſion of arms is abſolutely neceſ"ſary for opening conferences and conducting "the negotiations, you are to make inſtances with "both parties to ceaſe from uſing any further acts
"of hoſtility; but, in caſe the Spaniards do ſtill
"inſiſt, with their ſhips of war and forces, to at"tack the kingdom of Naples, or other the ter"ritories of the emperor in Italy, or to land in "any part of Italy, which can only be with a de-
"ſign to invade the emperor's dominions, againſt
"whom they have declared war by invading Sar"dinia; or, if they ſhould endeavour to make
"themſelves maſters of the kingdom of Sicily,
"which muſt be with a deſign to invade the king"dom of Naples; in ſuch a caſe, you are, with "all your power, to hinder and obſtruct the ſame.

"If

" If it ſhould ſo happen, that, at your arrival, " with the fleet under your command, in the Me- " diterranean, the Spaniards ſhould already have " landed any troops in Italy, in order to invade " the emperor's territories, you ſhall endeavour " amicably to diſſuade them from perſevering in " ſuch an attempt, and offer them your aſſiſtance " to help them to withdraw their troops and put " an end to all farther acts of hoſtility. But in " caſe theſe your friendly endeavours ſhould prove " ineffectual, you ſhall, by keeping company with, " or intercepting their ſhips or convoy, or, if it " be neceſſary, by openly oppoſing them, defend " the emperor's territories from any further at- " tempt."

On the peruſal of theſe inſtructions, cardinal Alberoni told colonel Stanhope, with ſome warmth, that his maſter would run all hazards, and even ſuffer himſelf to be driven out of Spain, rather than recall his troops, or conſent to a ſuſpenſion of arms. Mr. Stanhope having put into his hands a liſt of the Britiſh ſquadron, the cardinal, with evident emotion, threw it on the ground. Mr. Stanhope then intreated him to conſider the ſincere regard which the king his maſter had always ſhewn for the honour and intereſt of his Catholic majeſty, of which it was impoſſible to give ſtronger proofs than he had done by his unwearied endeavours, through the whole courſe of the preſent negotiation, to procure for Spain the moſt advantageous conditions poſſible; and that in theſe endeavours he had ſucceeded beyond the expectations of any reaſonable, unprejudiced perſon: that though, by the treaty of Utrecht, his majeſty was obliged to defend the emperor's dominions, when attacked, he had hitherto acted only as a mediator; that even now, when it was impoſſible for him to delay any longer the ſending his fleet into the Mediterranean, it appeared, by the admiral's inſtructions, which he had communicated to his excellence, and by the orders which he himſelf had received, that his majeſty had nothing more at heart than that the fleet might be employed in promoting the intereſts of the king of Spain: and therefore he hoped his Catholic majeſty would not, by refuſing to recall his troops, or conſent to a ſuſpenſion of arms, put it out of his power to give him ample proof of the undoubted ſincerity of his friendſhip.

The cardinal, at length, promiſed he would lay the admiral's letter before the king, and let the envoy know his majeſty's reſolution. This, however, he thought proper to delay for more than a week, probably with a view of giving the Spaniſh forces time to ſecure a firm footing in Sicily. At laſt, he ſent back the admiral's letter to Mr. Stanhope, with a note, importing, that the chevalier Byng might, if he pleaſed, proceed agreeable to his inſtructions.

The Britiſh admiral's inſtructions having no weight with the Spaniſh monarch, and being treated with the moſt haughty contempt by his prime miniſter, Sir George took his departure and proceeded to Minorca, where he relieved the garriſon of Port-Mahon. From thence he ſailed for Naples, where he arrived on the firſt day of Auguſt, and had an interview with the vice-roy, count Daun, by whom he was treated with the moſt diſtinguiſhed reſpect, and informed that the Spaniſh army, amounting to thirty thouſand men, commanded by the marquis de Leda, had landed in Sicily, reduced Palermo and Meſſina, and was then employed in the ſiege of the citadel belonging to this laſt city: that the Piedmonteſe garriſon would ſoon be obliged to ſurrender, if not relieved: and that an alliance was on the carpet between the emperor and the king of Sicily, which laſt had deſired the aſſiſtance of the Imperial troops, and agreed to receive them into the citadel of Meſſina.

The admiral, hereupon, came to an immediate reſolution of ſailing thither, and took under his convoy a reinforcement of two thouſand Germans for the citadel, under the command of general Wetzel. He forthwith departed from Naples, and on the ninth day of Auguſt, came in ſight of the Faro, off Meſſina. Sir George Byng, purſuant to orders, then propoſed a ceſſation of arms, but that being abſolutely refuſed, he immediately ſailed in queſt of the Spaniſh fleet, which, from intelligence received, he knew was departed from the harbour of Meſſina, and about noon came in ſight of them. This fleet conſiſted of twenty-ſeven ſail of the line, with fire ſhips, bombs, gallies and veſſels laden with ſtores and proviſions. The commander in chief was Don Antonio de Caſtaneta, under whom were four rear admirals.

As ſoon as they deſcried the Engliſh ſquadron, they ſtood away at large, but in order of battle. Sir George gave chace all that day and the ſucceeding night. In the morning, being the eleventh of Auguſt, the marquis de Mari, with ſix ſhips of war, the gallies, fire ſhips, bomb-ketches, and ſtore ſhips, ſeparated from the main fleet, and ſtood in for the Sicilian ſhore. The Engliſh admiral detached captain Walton, with ſix ſhips, in purſuit of them; and they were ſoon engaged. He himſelf continued to chace their main fleet; and, about ten o'clock, the battle began. The Spaniards ſeemed to be diſtracted in their councils, and acted in confuſion. They made a running fight, and their commanders behaved with reſolution, in ſpite of which they were all taken except Cammock, who, with three ſhips of war, and three frigates, eſcaped to Malta.

On the eighteenth a letter was brought to the admiral from captain Walton, importing, that he had taken four Spaniſh ſhips of war, together with a bomb ketch, and a veſſel laden with arms; and that he had deſtroyed two ſhips of war, a fire ſhip, and a bomb veſſel.

But notwithſtanding this victory, the Spaniards continued the ſiege of the citadel of Meſſina with ſuch vigour, that the governor ſurrendered the place by capitulation, on the twenty-ninth day of September; and the garriſon was tranſported to Syracuſe and Reggio. A treaty was now concluded at Vienna, between the emperor and the duke of Savoy. They agreed to form for the conqueſt of Sardinia in behalf of the duke, who, in the mean time, engaged to evacuate Sicily; but until his troops could be conveyed from that iſland, he conſented that they ſhould co-operate againſt the common enemy, with the German forces.

During the greateſt part of the winter, Sir George Byng continued to aſſiſt the Imperial forces in Sicily, by clearing the ſeas of the Spaniards, and preſerving a free communication between the German forces and the Calabrian ſhore, from whence they were ſupplied with proviſions. He conferred with the viceroy of Naples, and the other Imperial general, about the operations of the enſuing campaign; and count Hamilton was diſpatched to Vienna, to acquaint the emperor with the reſult of their deliberations. The admiral then ſet ſail for Mahon, that his ſhips might be refitted, and put in a condition to take the ſea in the ſpring, while while his ſon remained at Naples to manage his affairs with the viceroy, and communicate to the court of England any thing remarkable that might happen.

The king of Spain, enraged at the late victory obtained over his grand fleet, which had, in a degree, deſtroyed the naval force he had been at ſo much trouble and expence to raiſe, did not fail to ſhew his reſentment. In the beginning of September, rear admiral Gulvara, with ſome ſhips under his command, entered the port of Cadiz, and made a ſeizure of all the Engliſh veſſels in that harbour, which was no ſooner known here, than repriſals were made on our part. As war was not declared, Spain exclaimed againſt the attack of the Spaniſh fleet as a violation of the right of nations. But whatever irregularity there might be in the proceedings, or whoever commenced hoſtilities, the action was not only beneficial to the common cauſe, but abſolutely neceſſary to diſappoint the deſigns of cardinal Alberoni, who aimed at nothing leſs than exciting a general war in Europe, which had been ſo lately delivered from that dreadful calamity.

At the meeting of parliament on the 11th of November, his majeſty informed them, that the court of Spain, having rejected all amicable propoſals, and violated the moſt ſolemn engagements, he was perſuaded a Britiſh parliament would reſent ſuch treatment. An addreſs of congratulation on the ſucceſs of his majeſty's arms being moved for by lord Carteret, it occaſioned warm debates, but at length being carried in the affirmative, was accordingly preſented. The commons voted thirteen thouſand five hundred ſailors, and twelve thouſand four hundred and thirty-five men for the land ſervice. The whole eſtimate amounted to two millions, two hundred and fifty-ſeven thouſand, five hundred and eighty-one pounds, nineteen ſhillings. The bills for the land and malt tax were preſented and paſſed in one day; an inſtance of diſpatch, which no other parliament ſince the revolution had equalled.

A rupture with Spain had, for ſome time, been conſidered as inevitable. His majeſty therefore ſent a maſſage to both houſes, intimating, that it became neceſſary to declare war againſt Spain, as his endeavours to procure redreſs for the injuries his ſubjects had received were ineffectual.

A motion was hereupon made for an addreſs to aſſure his majeſty, that they would chearfully ſupport him in the proſecution of the war, till Spain ſhould be obliged to accept of reaſonable terms of peace, and agree to ſuch conditions of trade and commerce, as the Engliſh were entitled to expect by virtue of their ſeveral treaties. Some members of the lower houſe, and Mr. Walpole in particular, who was not then in favour, cenſured with the utmoſt warmth, the meaſure propoſed by his majeſty, alledging the injury which ſo precipitate a rupture muſt do to trade in general. But their arguments had little effect, the addreſs was carried, and ſoon after a declaration of war againſt Spain was publiſhed with the uſual ceremonies.

In the interim, Alberoni uſed his beſt endeavours to provide againſt the impending ſtorm. He cauſed new ſhips to be built, the ſea ports to be put in a poſture of defence, ſuccours to be ſent to Sicily, and proper meaſures to be taken for the ſafety of Sardinia. Conſcious, however, that with all his preparations, he ſhould be utterly incapable to reſiſt the united efforts of the three greateſt princes in Europe, he reſolved to have recourſe to ſtratagem and intrigue. By means of the prince de Cellamare, the Spaniſh ambaſſador at Paris, he caballed with the malecontents of that kingdom, who were numerous and powerful. A ſcheme was actually laid for ſecuring the perſon of the young king, ſeizing the regent, and entirely changing the face of government. Every thing was in readineſs for executing this plot, and the conſpirators only waited for their laſt orders, when intimation was given to the Engliſh monarch, who immediately appriſed the duke of Orleans of the tranſaction, and ſuch meaſures were taken at the French court as ſoon brought the whole intrigue to light. The prince de Callamare, ambaſſador from Philip V. to the court of Verſailles was put under an arreſt, and Cardinal Alberoni, the projector of this ſcheme, had the mortification to find that he had, without deriving any advantage from it, violently offended a power, whoſe reſentment could not but prove exceeding prejudicial not only to himſelf but the whole Spaniſh monarchy. The regent declared war againſt Spain on the twenty-ninth of December, and an army of thirty thouſand men, commanded by the duke of Berwick marched towards that kingdom in the month of January.

This failure, however, did not prevent the ambitious and perfidious cardinal from purſuing another ſcheme, which he had formed for placing the Pretender on the throne of Great Britain. The duke of Ormond, repairing to Madrid, held conferences with his excellence, and meaſures were concerted for raiſing another rebellion in England.

The chevalier de St. George left Rome in a private manner, and embarking at Netuno, landed at Cagliari in the beginning of March. From thence he took paſſage to Roſes in Catalonia, and proceeded to Madrid, where he was received with great expreſſions of friendſhip, and treated as king of Great Britain. An armament had been equipped of ten ſhips of war, and a great number of tranſports, having on board ſix thouſand regular troops, and arms for twelve thouſand men.

The duke of Ormond took the command of this fleet, with the title of captain-general of his moſt Catholic majeſty's forces. He was furniſhed with a declaration in the name of that king, importing, that, for many good reaſons, he had ſent part of his land and ſea forces into England and Scotland, to act as auxiliaries to king James; that what had induced him to take this ſtep, was the certain intelligence he had received, that many inhabitants of the two kingdoms, notwithſtanding their ſtrong inclination to acknowledge that prince for their ſovereign, durſt not openly declare for him, becauſe they did not ſee him ſupported by any of the ſtates of Europe that had either the will or power to aſſiſt him; that, in order to remove this difficulty, he declared he was determined to exert his utmoſt endeavours for his reſtoration to the throne of a kingdom, which, he ſaid, belonged to him by undoubted right.

A. D. 1719. No ſooner was information received at the court of London of this deſign, than the moſt effectual means were taken for defeating it. A fleet was immediately ordered to be got ready: a proclamation was iſſued for apprehending James Butler, late duke of Ormond, with a promiſe of five thouſand pounds and an embargo was alſo laid upon all ſhipping. On the 10th of March his majeſty went to the houſe, and acquainted his parliament with the repeated advices he had received touching the projected descent, whereupon they promised to support him against all his enemies, desired him to augment his forces by sea and land; and assured him they would make good the extraordinary expence. Two thousand men were landed from Holland, and six battalions of Imperialists from the Austrian Netherlands. The regent of France made an offer of twenty battalions; but these it was not thought proper to accept, and, indeed, as it fortunately happened, there was but little occasion for those already arrived.

Ormond sailed from Cadiz, and proceeded with a fair wind as far as Cape Finistere, where his fleet was dispersed and disabled by a violent storm, which entirely defeated the purposed expedition. Two frigates, however, which had sailed from Port-Passage, arrived on the coast of Scotland, with the earls of Marischal and Seaforth, the marquis of Tullibardine, some field officers, three hundred Spaniards, and arms for two thousand men. They took possession of Donan castle, being joined by about sixteen hundred highlanders.

General Wightman, with a small body of regular troops, marched against them from Inverness. They made themselves masters of the pass of Glenshiel, but at the approach of the king's forces, retired to the pass at Strachell, which they resolved to defend. They were attacked and driven from one eminence to another till night, when the rebels dispersed; and next day the Spaniards surrendered prisoners of war. Marischal, Seaforth, and Tullibardine, with some other officers, retired to one of the western isles, leaving their followers to provide for themselves.

The extraordinary promotion of peers in the late reign so greatly offended the lords, that they had long been exercising their invention, in order to find out some effectual remedy against the like evil for the future.

The duke of Somerset represented in the upper house, that the number of peers being very much encreased, especially since the union of the two kingdoms, it was absolutely necessary to take some steps for preserving the dignity of the peerage, and therefore moved, that a bill might be brought in to settle and limit the peerage to a certain number. The motion was supported by the duke of Argyle, then lord steward of the household, and the earls of Carlisle and Sunderland. It was opposed by the earl of Oxford, who said, that as it tended to take away the brightest gem from the crown, it was matter of wonder to see it supported by those, who, by the great employments they enjoyed, seemed under the strictest obligation to take care of the royal prerogative: that he therefore apprehended there must be some secret meaning in this motion; but, for his own part, though he expected nothing from the crown, yet he would never give his vote for lopping off so valuable a branch of the prerogative, as such a restriction would prevent the king from rewarding merit in a proper manner.

So compliant was the king with the desire expressed in the motion of the noble duke, that, on the day set apart for the debate, earl Stanhope delivered a message to the house, importing that, as they had under consideration the state of the British peerage, his majesty had so much at heart the settling it upon such a foundation as might secure the freedom and constitution of parliaments in all future ages, that he desired the consideration of his prerogative might not be suffered to have any weight in the arguments.

But the debates now ran higher than before. Earl Cowper affirmed, that part of the bill relating to the Scottish peerage was a manifest violation of the treaty of union, as well as a flagrant piece of injustice. He urged, that the Scottish peers, if excluded from a certain number, would be ina worse condition than any other subjects in the kingdom: and that a species of oppression, which must certainly inflame them with the highest resentment and indignation, might prove the occasion of some dangerous commotion. These objections, however, were over-ruled: resolutions were taken agreeable to the motion; and the judges were ordered to prepare and bring in the bill.

The generality of the Scottish peers were greatly alarmed at this proceeding, as well as many English commoners, who saw themselves precluded from the hopes of ever arriving at dignity and title; and they did not fail to exclaim against it, as a violent encroachment upon the constitution of the kingdom. A national clamour began to arise, when earl Stanhope observed in the house, that as the bill had raised strange apprehensions, he thought it adviseable to delay the further consideration of it till a more proper opportunity. It was accordingly dropped, and the parliament prorogued to the eighteenth day of April, when his majesty made a speech to both houses, thanking them for every instance of their loyalty, zeal and affection.

On the eleventh of May his majesty set out for his German dominions, where, being arrived, he concluded a peace with Sweden, for the queen and her council having consented to the cession of Bremen and Verden to the elector of Hanover, the objection to a ratification was effectually removed. During his continuance abroad, the king offered his mediation between Sweden, the Danes, the Russians and the Poles.

But his mediation was rejected by the Czar, who, determined to pursue his schemes of conquest, sent his fleet to the Scheuron or Batses of Sweden, where his troops landed to the number of fifteen thousand men, and committed dreadful ravages; but Sir John Norris, who commanded the fleet in those seas, having orders to support the negotiations, and oppose any hostility that might be committed, the Czar recalled his fleet, fearing the same fate that had befel the Spanish navy.

Sir George Byng continued in the Mediterranean, powerfully assisting the imperialists in finishing the conquest of Sicily. The court of Vienna had resolved to send a strong body of forces to compleat the reduction of that island; and the command of this fleet was entrusted to the count de Merci, an experienced and gallant officer.

The Spanish forces, under the command of the marquis de Leda, were attacked in their camp at Villa Franca by the imperial commander, who was repulsed with the loss of eight hundred men killed, and two thousand four hundred wounded, himself having received a musquet ball in the reins. Here his army was reduced to great straits for want of provision, and had it not been for the assistance received from the English navy, they must have perished.

As soon as admiral Byng was apprized of the misfortune at Villa Franca, he sent two battalions under convoy through the Faro, to reinforce the Imperial army. He afterwards assisted at at a council of war with the German generals, who, in conſequence of his advice, laid ſiege to the town of Meſſina.

Sir George Byng therefore went back to Sicily, and aſſiſted at the ſiege of Meſſina. The town ſurrendered on the eighth day of Auguſt, the garriſon retired into the citadel, and the remains of the Spaniſh navy, which had eſcaped at Paſſaro, were now deſtroyed in the Mole.

The emperor, having acquainted the Britiſh admiral that he had diſpatched orders for ſending the troops deſigned for Sardinia to Vado, in order to be tranſported into Sicily, Sir George took upon himſelf the conduct of this important affair. After encountering numberleſs difficulties, he ſailed for Vado, ſaw the troops embarked, and convoyed them to Meſſina, the citadel of which ſurrendered about ten days after their arrival; but the Germans paid dearly for this conqueſt in the loſs of five hundred of their men.

The admiral, to ſecure the imperialiſts in the iſland of Sicily during the winter, undertook to convey them by ſea to Trapani, where they could enlarge their quarters in a plentiful country, and be better able to annoy the enemy. It was the ſecond of March before the laſt embarkation of the Imperial troops was effected. The whole army being brought together, amounted to fourteen thouſand foot, and three thouſand cavalry, beſides the garriſons of Meſſina, Melazzo, Syracuſe, and the adjacent towns.

The approach of the Germans alarmed the marquis de Leda, who retreated to Alcamo, from whence he ſent his mareſchal du camp to the count de Merci and the Engliſh admiral, with overtures for evacuating Sicily. But Sir George Byng declared, that not a Spaniard ſhould quit the iſland till the concluſion of a general peace, and accordingly continued hoſtilities till he received advice from the earl of Stair at Paris, that the marquis de Beretti Landi, the Spaniſh ambaſſador at the Hague, had ſignified his diſpoſition to accede to the quadruple alliance, the conſequence of which was that the negotiations immediately began, and a convention was ſigned in leſs than a week. The Germans were put in poſſeſſion of Palermo on the tenth of May, and the Spaniſh army marched to Termin, a town on the ſea coaſt, from whence they were tranſported to Barcelona.

The Britiſh admiral, however, continued in the Mediterranean until he had ſeen the iſlands of Sicily and Sardinia evacuated by the Spaniards, the emperor eſtabliſhed in the ſecure poſſeſſion of the former, and the duke of Savoy in that of the latter. Upon the whole, the admiral's conduct during the war in Sicily was ſuch as entitled him to the general admiration of the victors and the vanquiſhed, ſo that when he waited on his majeſty at Hanover, he met with a very gracious reception, and, in reward for his ſervices, was appointed to the treaſurerſhip of the navy, and made rear-admiral of Great Britain. Soon after he was enobled by the title of viſcount Torrington, declared a privy counſellor, and made knight of the Bath.

During theſe tranſactions the duke of Berwick advanced to Port-Paſſage, on the frontiers of Spain, where he burnt ſix Spaniſh men of war on the ſtocks, together with naval ſtores to an immenſe value, and ſoon after inveſted and reduced ſeveral places belonging to the Spaniards in the Bay of Biſcay.

The miniſtry, having propoſed the conqueſt of Corunna, and alſo of Peru in South America, four thouſand men, under the command of lord Cobham, were embarked at the iſle of Wight, and ſailed on the twenty-firſt day of September, under convoy of five ſhips of war, conducted by admiral Mighels, who was to be joined by captain Johnſon, then cruizing off Fontarabia.

But as that officer was detained by ſome accident, and it was dangerous to continue on the coaſt at this ſeaſon, Cobham, embracing the opportunity of a fair wind, determined to attempt the reduction of Vigo. The ſcheme ſucceeded, for in five days the citadel capitulated. Here they found a great quantity of braſs artillery, ſmall arms and military ſtores, which had been intended for the invaſion of England, and the very troops that garriſoned theſe places were a part of thoſe to have made the deſcent.

The Spaniſh monarch, who had found himſelf unable to reſiſt the united efforts of ſo many powerful enemies, and acceded, from compulſion, to the terms of the quadruple alliance, at the inſtance of the ſeveral parties, diſmiſſed his miniſter Alberoni, whoſe ambitious projects had engaged and urged him to a continuance in ſo fatal a war, which, however, was thus at length happily terminated.

On the fourteenth of November, the king returned to England, and on the twenty-third opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech, wherein he expreſſed his ſatisfaction in meeting them ata juncture when negotiations abroad had, in general, met with ſucceſs; hinted at the many troubles he had encountered during the ſhort courſe of his reign; obſerved, that our diviſions at home had been ſo managed abroad that ſome foreign powers were encouraged to treat us in ſuch a manner as the crown of Great Britain ſhould never ſubmit to while he filled the throne; that the trouble and expence which this had brought upon the nation had been loudly complained of by thoſe who were the occaſion of them, and concluded with declaring, that all his views had, and ever ſhould, center in the intereſt and happineſs of his people.

Addreſſes were made in the moſt grateful, and received in the moſt affectionate terms; and his majeſty concluded the ſeſſion on the eleventh of June, with a ſpeech in which he ſignified his intention of viſiting his German dominions.

His majeſty having earneſtly recommended to the commons the conſideration of proper means for reducing the national debt, ſeveral propoſals were laid before the parliament by the directors of the Bank and South ſea companies. The commons, at length, determining in favour of the latter, their ſtock had ſo rapid a riſe that the public at large reſorted to Exchange-alley from an illuſive idea of inſtantaneouſly acquiring fortunes. Under various pretences the infamous herd of ſtock-jobbers drew in unguarded perſons to part with their money, ſo general was the inclinations of the public to deal in the funds. Their inſidious ſcheme went by the name of bubble, a proper appellation for ſuch deteſtable practices, for it was computed that near one million and a half ſterling was won or loſt by theſe unwarrantable means.

The firſt hint of theſe injurious plans ſeems to have been taken from the famous Miſſiſſippi ſcheme, which juſt before ruined France. But as avarice, like all other paſſions, is too blind to profit by example, the event of the French bubble did not warn our wiſe countrymen from being gulled by a fantaſtic deluſion which originated in their own clime.

led

On the 11th of June the king cloſed the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech from the throne, and on the 15th ſet out for his electoral dominions. A few days before his departure, he was reconciled to the prince of Wales, which deſirable event was brought about chiefly by the mediation of the duke of Devonſhire and Mr. Robert Walpole, who were received into favour and re-aſſociated with the miniſtry.

A. D. 1720. While his majeſty was in Germany, the South ſea ſcheme produced a kind of national phrenzy, and nothing now claimed the attention of the nation but ſtock-jobbing.

The company cauſed a report to be propagated that Gibraltar and Port Mahon would be exchanged for ſome places in Peru; by which means the Engliſh trade to the South ſea would be protected and enlarged. This rumour, diffuſed with great induſtry, inſpired the people with the moſt ſanguine and extravagant hopes. In five days after the paſſing of the bill, the directors opened their books for a ſubſcription of one million, at the rate of three hundred pounds for every hundred pounds capital. Perſons of all ranks crowded to the houſe in ſuch numbers, that the firſt ſubſcription amounted to above two millions of original ſtock. In a few days the ſtock advanced to three hundred and fifty pounds, and the ſubſcriptions were ſold for double the price of the firſt payments.

This infatuation continued to prevail till the 8th of September, when ſtock began to fall faſter than it had riſen, ſo that by Michaelmas day it had ſunk to one hundred and fifty. Some of the leading men of the nation, who were deeply concerned in theſe fraudulent practices, employed all their intereſt with the bank to ſupport the South-ſea. This the directors were, at firſt, inclined to do; but finding, at length, that inevitable ruin muſt attend the ſcheme, they renounced their agreement, and the South-ſea company, being deprived of this ſupport, ſunk under its own weight.

Dire though natural were the effects. Their projects, the offſpring of an avaricious and fraudulent diſpoſition were totally defeated, the payments ceaſed, the public credit diſſolved in air, families without number ſaw themſelves plunged in indigence, and the cries of deſpair ſucceeded to the intoxication of a light and ſenſeleſs joy.

Succeſſive expreſſes having been diſpatched to Hanover, repreſenting to the king the ſtate of affairs, and earneſtly preſſing him to haſten his return, he accordingly ſhortened his intended ſtay in Germany, and arrived in England on the eleventh day of November.

When the parliament aſſembled on the eighth of December, his majeſty, after having acquainted them with his negotiations abroad, expreſſed his concern for the unhappy turn of affairs which had ſo deeply affected the public credit at home; and earneſtly deſired them to conſider of the moſt effectual and ſpeedy methods to reſtore and ſecure the credit of the nation.

A. D. 1721. After the uſual addreſſes, it was moved in the lower houſe, that the directors of the South-ſea company ſhould lay before them an account of their proceedings. A committee of ſecrecy was likewiſe choſen by ballot to examine all books, papers and proceedings relative to the execution of the South-ſea act. A ſufficient diſcovery being made to convince the world that a ſcene of the deepeſt villainy had been tranſacted; the commons came to ſeveral ſevere, though juſt, reſolutions againſt the delinquents, and a bill was prepared for the relief of the unhappy ſufferers from the confiſcation of their eſtates. The creditors being by theſe means indemnified as far as the conjuncture admitted, the outrages of the people were appeaſed, and the public credit in ſome degree reſtored.

On cloſing the ſeſſion, on the tenth of Auguſt, his majeſty declared, that he entertained a moſt ſincere concern for the ſufferings of the innocent, and a juſt indignation againſt the guilty, in the affair of the South-ſea ſcheme: that he had readily given his aſſent to ſuch bills as they had preſented to him, for puniſhing the authors of the late misfortunes, and for obtaining reſtitution and ſatisfaction to thoſe who had been injured by them in ſo notorious a manner: that they could not fail to have obſerved, that the diſcontents, occaſioned by this unhappy event, had been induſtriouſly fomented and inflamed by wicked and ſeditious libels; but he doubted not, but by their prudent conduct in their ſeveral counties, they would diſappoint the enemies of the government in their ſeditious views and intentions.

A. D. 1722. When the new parliament met at Weſtminſter, the king, in his ſpeech, informed them of freſh deſigns againſt his government; and that the conſpirators had made, by their emiſſaries, the ſtrongeſt ſolicitations to foreign powers for aſſiſtance, but were diſappointed in their expectations; notwithſtanding which, confiding in their numbers, and not diſcouraged by their former ill ſucceſs, they reſolved once more upon their own ſtrength to attempt the ſubverſion of government, and that ſome of the conſpirators had been taken up and ſecured, and endeavours uſed for the apprehending of others.

On this occaſion, both houſes preſented addreſſes expreſſive of their firm attachment to his majeſty, and their indignation againſt the authors of the preſent conſpiracy.

The parliament gave attention to concerting meaſures for defeating the intended conſpiracy. A bill was introduced into the upper houſe for ſuſpending the Habeas Corpus act for a whole year, and paſſed both houſes by a conſiderable majority, but not without violent oppoſition.

The earl of Orrery, the biſhop of Rocheſter, and the lord North and Grey were committed to the Tower for high treaſon, and the duke of Norfolk, who had been apprehended by his majeſty's order, was, with the conſent of the houſe of peers, ſent to the ſame place.

A bill was prepared by the commons for raiſing one hundred thouſand pounds upon the real and perſonal eſtates of all papiſts, or perſons educated in the popiſh religion, towards defraying the expences occaſioned by the late rebellion and diſorders. This bill was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by the friends of the papiſts, as a ſpecies of perſecution; but, notwithſtanding all their objections, it was carried by a conſiderable majority, and ſent up to the lords, together with another, obliging all perſons, being papiſts, in Scotland, and all perſons in Great-Britain, refuſing and neglecting to take the oaths appointed for the ſecurity of the king's perſon and government, to regiſter their names and real eſtates. Both bills paſſed through the upper houſe without amendment, and received the royal aſſent ſoon after.

On the twenty-firſt of November, Mr. Layer was tried in the court of king's bench, and convicted victed of having enliſted men for the pretender's ſervice, in order to ſtir up a rebellion, and received ſentence of death. He was reprieved for ſome time, and examined by a committee of the houſe of commons; but, as he refuſed to make any diſcovery, he was executed at Tyburn, and his head fixed on Temple bar.

This conſpiracy was ſo artfully carried on under fictitious names, that it required much application to come to the true knowledge of ſome of the perſons concerned. The committee of the houſe of commons, however, at length delivered it as their opinion, that a deſign had been formed by perſons of figure and diſtinction at home, in conjunction with traitors abroad, for placing the pretender upon the throne of theſe realms; that his firſt intention was to have procured a body of foreign troops to invade the kingdom at the time of the late elections; but the conſpirators being diſappointed in this expectation, reſolved to make an attempt at the time, when it was generally believed the king intended to go to Hanover, by the help of ſuch officers and ſoldiers as could paſs into England unobſerved from abroad, under the command of Ormond, who by agreement was to have landed in the river with a great quantity of arms, provided in Spain for that purpoſe; at which time the Tower was to have been ſeized: that this ſcheme being alſo defeated by the wiſe and vigorous meaſures of government, they deferred their enterprize till the breaking up of the camp; and, in the mean time, employed their agents to corrupt and ſeduce the officers and ſoldiers of the army, and depended ſo much on this defection, as to entertain hopes of placing the pretender on the throne, though they ſhould obtain no aſſiſtance from abroad, which, nevertheleſs, they continued to ſolicit.

After mature conſideration of theſe ſeveral particulars, the commons reſolved, that a deteſtable and horrid conſpiracy had been formed and carried on by perſons of diſtinction at home, and their agents and inſtruments, in conjunction with traitors abroad, for raiſing a rebellion, ſeizing the Tower and city of London, laying violent hands upon the perſons of his moſt ſacred majeſty and the prince of Wales, and to place a popiſh pretender on the throne, with a view to ſubvert the eſtabliſhment in church and ſtate.

Bills were brought in, and paſſed, for inflicting pains and penalties upon John Plunket and George Kelly, who were, by theſe acts, to be kept in cloſe cuſtody, during his majeſty's pleaſure, in any priſon in Great-Britain; and, if they attempted to eſcape, were liable to ſuffer death.

A motion was made for a ſimilar bill againſt Dr. Francis Atterbury, biſhop of Rocheſter. This was immediately brought into the houſe, though oppoſed by Sir William Wyndham, who affirmed there was no other evidence againſt him, than what was founded on conjecture. The biſhop denied the juriſdiction of the lower houſe, and declared, he would make his defence only before his peers. Council being heard for the bill, it was laid before a grand committee on the ſixth day of April, when it was moved, that the biſhop ſhould be deprived of his office and benefice, baniſhed the kingdom, be guilty of felony if he returned, and that it ſhould not be in the king's power to pardon him without conſent of parliament, but that his effects ſhould not be confiſcated.

This bill occaſioned a warm conteſt in the houſe of lords. Earl Pawlet ſaid, "that ſwerving in ſuch an extraordinary manner from the maxims of juſtice could not fail being attended with fatal conſequences to the conſtitution."

The biſhop of Saliſbury, in reply, affirmed, "that as deſperate diſeaſes required deſperate remedies, ſo, when the ſtate was in danger, the legiſlature ſhould exert itſelf againſt ſuch offenders as the common law could not reach."

Lord Bathurſt declared, "if ſuch extraordinary proceedings were countenanced, he ſaw nothing for him and others to do, but to retire to their country houſes, and there, if poſſible, quietly enjoy their eſtates with their own families, ſince the leaſt correſpondence, the leaſt intercepted letter, might be made criminal."

In ſupport of this argument he quoted a paſſage from De Retz's memoirs, relating to cardinal Mazarine, who boaſted, that, if he had but two lines of any many man's writing, he could, by means of a few circumſtances atteſted by witneſſes, deprive him of life at pleaſure.

The duke of Argyle, the earl of Seafield, and lord Lechmere, ſpoke in ſupport of the bill, the laſt of whom, though he had, on ſeveral other occaſions, expreſſed his diſlike of ſuch extraordinary proceedings, declared, he thought the evidence was ſufficient.

Earl Cowper obſerved, neceſſity was the beſt argument that could be urged in behalf of the bill; but he ſaid, he ſaw no neceſſity that could juſtify ſuch an unprecedented and dangerous proceeding, as the conſpiracy had, above twelve months before, been happily diſcovered, and the effects of it prevented: that the known rules of evidence, as laid down at firſt, and eſtabliſhed by the laws of the land, were the birth-right of every ſubject in the nation, and ought to be conſtantly obſerved, not only in the inferior courts of judicature, but alſo in both houſes of parliament, till altered by the legiſlature: he commended the biſhop's noble deportment in declining to anſwer before the houſe of commons, whoſe proceedings, in this unprecedented manner, againſt a lord of parliament, was ſuch an encroachment on the prerogative of the peerage, that, if they ſubmitted to it, by paſſing this bill, they might be termed the laſt of Britiſh peers, for giving up their ancient privileges. After a violent debate, the queſtion was carried in the affirmative by a majority of forty voices, though a proteſt was entered againſt the proceedings by ſeveral of the peers.

Francis Atterbury, biſhop of Rocheſter, was hereby deprived of all offices, benefices, and dignities, and rendered incapable of enjoying any for the future; he was baniſhed the realm, and ſubjected to the pains of death, in caſe he ſhould return, as were all perſons that ſhould correſpond with him during his exile. Doctor Friend, who was a member of the houſe, and had exerted himſelf with great zeal in the biſhop's favour, being ſuſpected of treaſonable practices, was taken into cuſtody.

A. D. 1723. On the 23d of February the princeſs of Wales was delivered of a daughter at Leiceſter houſe, who was baptized by the name of Mary. On the 27th of May the king cloſed the ſeſſion, and in conſideration of the ſervices of Mr. Robert Walpole, created his ſon a peer; he alſo made a number of other promotions, admitted the impriſoned lords and gentlemen to bail, granted a pardon to lord Bolingbroke, ordered the biſhop of Rocheſter to be conveyed to the continent, and then ſet out for Hanover on the third day of June, leaving the government in the hands of a regency, from which the prince of Wales was ſtill excluded. Lord Harcourt, a warm friend of the late miniſtry, was one of the number of regents.

The parliament of Ireland, which aſſembled this year, paſſed an act for accepting the affirmation of Quakers inſtead of an oath; and granted three hundred and forty thouſand pounds towards diſcharging the national debt.

A. D. 1724. The death of Philip duke of Orleans and regent of France, which happened at this time, gave his majeſty great concern, as a mutual eſteem had long ſubſiſted between them. Apprehenſive that this event might produce an alteration in the ſentiments of the French court prejudicial to the intereſts of England, the king determined to return as ſoon as poſſible, but being detained ſome time at Helvoetſluys by contrary winds, he had the ſatisfaction of receiving the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of the diſpoſition of the French miniſtry to confirm the union between the two crowns upon the plan which had been fixed by their late regent.

On the nineteenth of December his majeſty arrived in London, and the parliament meeting on the ninth of January (A. D. 1724) he congratulated them on the ſucceſs of their endeavours during the laſt ſeſſion to promote the ſafety, intereſt, and honour of the kingdom. He recommended to the commons the care of public debts; and expreſſed his ſatisfaction at ſeeing the ſinking fund improved and augmented, ſo as to afford a proſpect of diſcharging the national debt.

Both houſes having addreſſed his majeſty, the commons proceeded to conſider the eſtimates for the enſuing year. They voted ten thouſand ſeamen; and the majority, though not without violent oppoſition, agreed to maintain four thouſand additional troops, which had been raiſed in the courſe of the preceding ſummer, the whole number of effective men amounting to eighteen thouſand two hundred and ſixty-four. The malt tax and a land tax of two ſhillings in the pound, were appropriated to defray the expences.

The truſtees appointed to ſecure and diſpoſe of the eſtates and effects of the late South-ſea directors delivered in their accounts to the parliament this ſeſſion, by which it appeared, that the ſum of nine million, four hundred and ſeven thouſand, two hundred and eighty pounds, and upwards, had been raiſed by them. The commiſſioners of the forfeited eſtates in Scotland alſo delivered in their accounts amounting to ſixty thouſand, two hundred and thirty-ſix pounds. The public buſineſs being finiſhed, the king cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech on the twenty-fourth day of April, and on the 3d of June ſet out for his German dominions.

At the meeting of parliament on the twelfth of November, they continued the former eſtabliſhment of the land and ſea forces, and readily granted the neceſſary ſupplies. The chief object, which engaged their attention during this ſeſſion, was the trial of the earl of Macclesfield, lord chancellor of England, whoſe venal practices excited the murmurs of the nation. Loaded with the public odium, he voluntarily reſigned the ſeals. But this ſtep did not protect him. He was impeached for having wronged the widow, and the orphan, ſold places in chancery, and ſuffered his officers to retain in their hands large ſums belonging to ſuitors, to enable thoſe officers to gratify his own rapacity. Convicted of thoſe and other fraudulent practices, he was ſentenced to pay a fine of thirty thouſand pounds, and to remain in priſon till it was paid.

A. D. 1725. The king now entered into a new treaty. This tranſaction was in conſequence of two treaties, one of peace, the other of commerce, concluded between the emperor and Philip V. who, on the demiſe of his ſon, had reſumed the ſovereign rule. The treaty of commerce was deemed highly prejudicial to the intereſt of Great Britain, as the Oſtend company, which the emperor had eſtabliſhed, was to be ſupported by it. Another probable conſequence was the giving up Gibraltar and Port Mahon to the Spaniards. Theſe conſiderations alarmed his majeſty, who, in order to counteract the deſigns of the new allies, projected the defenſive treaty between England, France, and Pruſſia, known by the name of the treaty of Hanover. This alliance was limited to the term of fifteen years, and contained a mutual guarantee of the dominions poſſeſſed by the contracting parties, their rights and privileges, thoſe of commerce in particular, with an agreement to procure ſatisfaction for the proteſtants at Thorn in Poland, who had been oppreſſed by the papiſts, contrary to the conditions of a former treaty.

Guy's hoſpital in Southwark was built at this time at the ſole expence of Mr. Thomas Guy, formerly a bookſeller of London, afterwards member of parliament for Tamworth, who left a benefaction of two hundred thouſand pounds for its ſupport.

On the fifth day of December the princeſs of Wales was delivered of a princeſs, who was chriſtened by the name of Louiſa, and afterwards married to the king of Denmark.

The order of the knights of the Bath was revived; their fixed number was thirty-eight, including the ſovereign. Sir Robert Walpole, who had been one of the revived knights of that order, was now honoured with the badge of the garter.

The famous duke of Wharton having, by his extravagancies, ruined his fortune, repaired to the court of Vienna, from whence he proceeded to Rome, and offered his ſervice to the pretender, where he received the order of the garter, and the title of duke of Northumberland. He was ſent by the pretender with credentials to the court of Madrid, where king George was no ſooner informed of his arrival, than he diſpatched a meſſenger with a letter under the privy ſeal, commanding him, upon his allegiance, to return immediately to England. This letter being delivered to him, he loudly exclaimed againſt the inſolence of a Britiſh officer of juſtice, in executing a ſummons upon him within ſight of his Catholic majeſty's palace. He even threatened to preſent a memorial on the ſubject to the court of Spain, and demand juſtice againſt the Engliſh meſſenger; but Philip, being privately acquainted with the matter, abſolutely refuſed to interpoſe his authority. The duke afterwards abjured the proteſtant religion, married a lady of the queen of Spain's bedchamber, and was made a lieutenant colonel in the army of his Catholic majeſty.

The king, having taken all neceſſary precautions for the ſecurity of his German dominions, ſet out on his return to England in the middle of December, and, after having encountered a moſt furious ſtorm, landed with great difficulty at Rye, from whence he proceeded by land to London.

A. D.

A. D. 1726. The parliament being aſſembled on the twentieth day of January, the king, in his ſpeech to both houſes, informed them, that the diſtreſſed condition of ſome of their proteſtant brethren abroad, and the negotiations and engagements contracted by ſome foreign powers, which ſeemed to have laid the foundation of new troubles and diſturbances in Europe, and to threaten his ſubjects with the loſs of ſeveral of the moſt advantageous branches of their trade, had obliged him to concert, with other powers, ſuch meaſures as might give a check to the ambitious views of thoſe, who were endeavouring to render themſelves formidable, and put a ſtop to the further progreſs of ſuch dangerous deſigns; that, with this view, he had entered into a defenſive alliance with the kings of France and Pruſſia, to which ſeveral other powers, and particularly the ſtates-general, had been invited to accede; that the enemies to his government were already very buſy, by their inſtruments and emiſſaries, in thoſe courts, whoſe meaſures ſeemed moſt to favour their purpoſes, in ſoliciting and promoting the cauſe of the pretender; but he perſuaded himſelf, notwithſtanding the countenance and encouragement they might either have received, or expect to receive, that the proviſion made by his parliament for the ſafety and defence of his kingdoms, would effectually ſecure them from all danger of foreign invaſion, or domeſtic inſurrection; that, when the world ſhould ſee, that they would not ſuffer the Britiſh crown and nation to be inſulted with impunity, thoſe, who moſt envied the tranquillity and happineſs of this kingdom, and were endeavouring to make it ſubſervient to their ambitious projects, would have ſome regard to their own intereſt and circumſtances, before they preſumed to make any attempt upon ſo brave a people, ſtrengthened and ſupported by powerful alliances, and, however deſirous of peace, able and ready to defend themſelves againſt all aggreſſors; that ſuch reſolutions, and ſuch meaſures, if timely taken, would, he was ſatisfied, be the moſt effectual means of preventing a war, and ſecuring to his people all the bleſſings of peace."

The treaty of Hanover being laid before the houſe of commons, occaſioned very warm debates, the iſſue of which was, a conſiderable majority in its favour, and an addreſs was preſented to his majeſty on the occaſion.

On the 24th of May the king went to the houſe of peers, gave the royal aſſent to ſeveral bills, and then put an end to the ſeſſion.

When the tax upon malt in Scotland was firſt laid, it had been apprehended that the collection of it would be attended with ſome difficulty; and it ſoon appeared that theſe apprehenſions were but too well founded.

The exciſemen at Edinburgh, indeed, were ſuffered to take an account of the ſtock of malſters; but thoſe at Glaſgow were obliged to apply to the commiſſioners of exciſe for protection and aſſiſtance, the malſters threatening their lives if they preſumed to enter their houſes.

Major general Wade, who commanded the forces in Scotland, being applied to by the commiſſioners, ordered captain Buſhel with two companies of foot to march to Glaſgow, where they arrived on the twenty-fourth day of June. At their entrance into the town, they were met by a great mob of men, women, and boys, who loaded them with the moſt opprobrious epithets, and ſaluted them with repeated vollies of ſtones, exclaiming all the while, "no malt tax, no malt tax." The rabble having locked the guard room, and carried off the key, the captain was obliged to hire a public houſe by way of guard room.

Being informed, about eleven at night, that a great crowd of people, amounting to ſeveral thouſands, had ſurrounded the houſe of Mr. Daniel Campbell, member of parliament for Glaſgow, and threatened to plunder and raze it to the ground, he immediately acquainted the provoſt, and offered his aſſiſtance to quell the rioters.

In anſwer thereto, the provoſt alledged that his men were too few in number, and that he could not think of employing them with any regard either to their own ſafety or that of the citizens. The rabble, meeting with no reſiſtanee, nor even the leaſt appearance of oppoſition, forced open the doors, broke into the houſe, turned out the ſervants, (the gentleman and his lady having the day before retired into the country) and totally deſtroyed and carried off whatever they could find.

The mob remained quiet till next day about four in the afternoon, when they began to re-aſſemble. The captain, ſuſpecting their intention, ordered the ſoldiers to keep near the guard-room, of which he had now taken poſſeſſion; and he ſoon found that this was a prudent and neceſſary precaution. In a little time the rabble began to advance againſt the ſoldiers, exclaiming all the way, "drive "the dogs out of town; we will cut them to "pieces."

Having therefore ordered the ſoldiers under his command, to hold themſelves in readineſs, he requeſted the inſurgents to abſtain from violence, obſerving that if they continued to act in that manner he ſhould not be able to reſtrain his men from firing upon them. Perceiving, however, that his advice was diſregarded, and that the rabble ſtill continued to preſs forward on the ſoldiers, ſeveral of whom were deſperately wounded, he ordered his men to fire over the crowd, hoping to terrify them ſo as to make them deſiſt.

The mob paying no regard to the firing, but ſtill perſiſting to attack the guard-room, and repeating their vollies of ſtones with redoubled violence, the ſoldiers were induced to fire among them, in conſequence of which three or four were killed and ſeveral others wounded. The populace, incenſed by the death of their companions, began to collect all the arms that could be found in the place, and the captain, conſcious of his own inability to reſiſt ſuch a numerous and enraged multitude, thought proper to retreat to Dunbarton, the rabble purſuing him ſix miles towards that place.

As ſoon as general Wade was acquainted with theſe proceedings, he got together a conſiderable body of forces, and, being accompanied by Duncan Forbes, lord advocate, took poſſeſſion of Glaſgow. The magiſtrates were apprehended and conveyed priſoners to Edinburgh, where the lords-juſticiary having taken cognizance of the affair, declared them innocent. Some of the rabble, however, were puniſhed for the riots, and ſentence of whipping and tranſportation paſſed againſt four of them.

A petition being preſented to the commons by Mr. Daniel Campbell, praying that he might be indemnified for the damage he had ſuſtained from the mob, a bill paſſed in his favour, granting him a certain ſum to be raiſed by an impoſition of two pennies Scots upon all beer and ale brewed within the city of Glaſgow. Nevertheleſs, the malt-tax was ſo ſenſibly felt in Scotland, that the convention of the royal boroughs preſented an addreſs by the hands of John Campbell, member for Edinburgh, wherein, though they diſavowed the conduct of the Glaſgow rioters, they ſtrongly remonſtrated againſt that tax, as a heavy burthen which the country could not bear: and the ſeveral ſhires throughout the kingdom preſented petitions of the like kind.

was

Peter the Great, Czar of Muſcovy, was now dead, and ſucceeded on the throne by the empreſs Catherine, who, having conceived a diſtaſte to the Britiſh court, was perſuaded, by ſome minions about her, that it would be no difficult matter to ſet up the ſon of the late king James, and ſo overturn the government of Britain. The Britiſh court was no ſooner informed of this ſcheme than it was reſolved to ſend a fleet into the Baltic under the command of Sir Charles Wager. A Daniſh ſquadron having joined the Engliſh fleet at Copenhagen, Sir Charles directed his courſe towards Stockholm, where, having had an audience of his Swediſh majeſty, he ſailed for Revel, and ſent a lieutenant to Cronſlot with a letter to the empreſs from the king of Great Britain.

In his letter to the Czarina, the king expoſtulated very freely on the ſubject of the armament by ſea and land, which ſhe had been for ſome time preparing, and likewiſe on the intrigues which her miniſters had lately entered into with the agents of the Pretender.

The Ruſſian court, enraged at the appearance of a Britiſh fleet upon their coaſts, was at firſt inclined to reſent it; but, upon ſerious reflection, waving their determination, the empreſs wrote an anſwer to his Britannic majeſty, in which ſhe expreſſed her ſurprize, that ſhe had not received his majeſty's letter, until his fleet was at anchor before Revel, ſince it would have been more agreeable to the cuſtom eſtabliſhed among ſovereigns, and to the amity which had ſo long ſubſiſted between her and the crown of Great Britain, to expoſtulate with her on her armament, and expect her anſwer before he had proceeded to ſuch a violent and offenſive meaſure. She aſſured him, that nothing was further from her thoughts, than to diſturb the repoſe of the north; that, on the contrary all her care and attention was employed in its ſecurity and preſervation; and that with regard to the Pretender, it was a frivilous and ſtale accuſation, which had frequently been uſed as a pretext to cover all the unkind ſteps lately taken againſt the Ruſſian empire. Sir Charles Wager continued in his ſtation till October, when, having received intelligence that the Ruſſian gallies were laid up in their winter quarters, he returned to England.

That our attention might not ſeem to be wholly directed towards the north, two other ſquadrons were fitted out this year, one of which was deſtined for the Weſt Indies, under admiral Hoſier, the other under Sir John Jennings, having on board a body of land forces, ſailed from St. Helens on the twentieth day of July, entered the Mediterranean, alarmed the coaſts of Spain, and cruized for ſome time between Cadiz and cape St. Vincent, but carefully abſtained from committing any act of hoſtility.

Admiral Hoſier, who had ſailed in April for the Spaniſh Weſt Indies, with orders to block up the galleons in the ports of that country, or, ſhould they preſume to come out, ſeize and bring them to England, arrived at the Baſtimentos, near Porto Bello, in the beginning of June; but, before he reached that place, an advice boat having given notice of his deſtination, the treaſure, amounting to twenty-ſix millions of pieces of eight, had been unloaded and carried back to Panama.

This admiral lay inactive on that ſtation, till from the terror he rather became the jeſt of the Spaniards, when, towards the cloſe of the year, he ſailed to Jamaica, where he reinfored his crew and then ſtood over to Carthagena. The Spaniards had, by this time, ſeized the Engliſh South ſea ſhips at La Vera Cruz, together with all the effects belonging to that Company. Hoſier, finding it in vain to demand reſtitution, took ſome Spaniſh ſhips by way of repriſal; after which he continued cruizing in thoſe ſeas, until the greater pars of his men periſhed by the diſeaſes of that unhealthy climate, and his ſhips were entirely ruined through want of repair.

A. D. 1727. His majeſty, in his ſpeech to both houſes of parliament, which met on the ſeventeeth of January, took notice of the diſagreeable ſituation of affairs at this juncture; and obſerved that, however difficult and hazardous the enterprizes formed againſt them might appear, their being aſſured that they were really projected, would, he was perſuaded, be ſufficient to induce them to put themſelves in a condition to reſiſt and defeat ſuch daring deſigns: that, if preſerving a due balance of power in Europe; if defending the poſſeſſions of the crown of Great Britain, was of infinite advantage to her trade and commerce, againſt dangerous and unlawful encroachments; and if the then eſtabliſhment, the religion, liberties and properties of a proteſtant people were any longer conſiderations worthy the care and attention of a Britiſh parliament, he need not ſay more to incite his loyal and faithful houſes of parliament to exert their beſt abilities in defence of them.

Addreſſes of thanks were preſented by both houſes, expreſſive of the utmoſt reſentment at the inſolent deſigns of his majeſty's enemies, and the moſt entire approbation of the meaſures he had taken in order to defeat and diſappoint them. The commons voted twenty thouſand ſeamen, and twenty-ſix thouſand men for the land ſervice, during the current year.

The debates this ſeſſion ran very high in the houſe of lords, concerning the letters and memorials between the miniſters of Great Britain, France, and Spain, and the papers relating to the treaty of Hanover. Lord Bathurſt, after having pointed out the inconveniences of the war, obſerved, that in ſome papers laid before the houſe mention was made of great ſums diſtributed in divers places to bring certain meaſures to bear; he ſaid that, for his own part, he had touched neither Spaniſh nor Engliſh gold; he was neither a Spaniard nor a Frenchman, but a true Engliſhman; and as long as he had the honour to ſit in that houſe, he would ſpeak and act for the good of his country: that, therefore, he would ſum up all with earneſtly deſiring their lordſhips ſeriouſly to conſider the matter before them, which was one of the laſt conſequence to the nation. "What, ſaid he, can we "get by war, if it be ſucceſsful? I will ſay it in "one word, Nothing. What can we loſe, if it "be unproſperous? I will ſay it in a ſyllable, "All."

Lord Townſend, in anſwer to this ſpeech, ſaid, "that as the treaty of Hanover was purely defenſive, it had made no alteration in the treaties ſubſiſting before, either between the contracting parties, ties, or other ſtates and princes: that the ſole aim and intention of that alliance, was a reciprocal guarantee, for maintaining the dominions and countries, both in Europe and the Indies, of which each of the allies were actually poſſeſſed at the ſigning the treaty: that, notwithſtanding high provocations, his majeſty ſhewed his inclination and diſpoſition to an accommodation; and, with this view, it was intimated to the courts of Vienna and Madrid, that, if the emperor would remove the Oſtend company to Trieſte, or any other place in his dominions, which did not formerly belong to the Spaniſh monarchy, Great Britain would quietly acquieſce; but, inſtead of agreeing to this propoſal, thoſe two courts not only ſeemed reſolved to ſupport the Oſtend trade, but Spain, in the memorial preſented by their ambaſſador, inſiſted on the ſpeedy reſtitution of Gibraltar, by virtue of a pretended promiſe, that no where exiſted: and that, from theſe and many ſuch circumſtances, he hoped it would evidently appear, that his majeſty was under an abſolute neceſſity of purſuing the reſolutions he had already adopted."

After long debates it was reſolved, that the meaſures, which his majeſty had thought fit to take, were honourable, juſt, and neceſſary, for preventing the execution of the dangerous engagements entered into in favour of the Pretender; for preſerving the dominions belonging to the crown of Great Britain by ſolemn treaties; particularly of Gibraltar and the iſland of Minorca; and for maintaining to his people their moſt valuable rights and privileges of commerce, and the peace and tranquillity of Europe. A proteſt againſt this reſolution was entered by ſeveral of the peers.

In the houſe of commons ſeveral objections were raiſed by the oppoſite party, who obſerved that, as his majeſty's ſpeech contained many points of the higheſt moment, ſo he expected not only the ſupport but likewiſe the advice of that houſe; that they ought maturely to deliberate on theſe ſeveral heads, which could not be done before ſome papers were communicated to them, as they ſeemed abſolutely neceſſary to ſtate ſeveral facts relating to theſe important matters. But theſe objections were ſet aſide by the majority, and the houſe concurred in an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty, in which they approved of the ſteps he had already taken, and promiſed to ſupport him in all his meaſures to promote the welfare of his ſubjects.

The king's ſpeech drew on him a kind of public challenge to prove the truth of his aſſertions. The count de Palms, the emperor's miniſter at London, had orders to publiſh a remonſtrance, in which the king was charged with having advanced as certain ſeveral matters that were either wreſted, miſrepreſented, or void of all foundation. He declared the article relating to the Pretender was no offenſive alliance between the emperor and Spain, and, finally, he demanded, in the name of his Imperial majeſty, that ſuitable reparation might be made to his honour, for the injury it had ſuſtained by theſe groundleſs imputations.

The parliament in an addreſs to his majeſty expreſſed their indignation and reſentment at this affront, and the count de Palms was ordered to leave the kingdom. Virulent declarations were preſented by the miniſters of the emperor and the kings of Great Britain and France to the diet of the empire at Ratiſbon; and ſuch perſonal reflections retorted between theſe potentates, that there appeared to be no proſpect of a reconciliation.

His majeſty contracted new engagements with France, Sweden, Denmark, and the Prince of Heſſe-Caſſel. He procured allies in Germany, but at an immenſe expence to England.

The king having obtained all he aſked of parliament, what remained to be conſidered was the application of the ſupplies, a point on which they had ever ſhewn an extreme caution.

The ſecretary to the treaſury moved in the lower houſe; "that they ſhould inſert a clauſe in the malt bill, impowering the king to apply ſuch ſums as ſhould be neceſſary for defraying the expences and engagements, which had been or ſhould be made before the 25th of December enſuing, and in concerting ſuch meaſures as he ſhould think moſt conducive to the ſecurity of trade and navigation, and reſtoring the public peace.

Violent debates enſued upon this motion. It was alledged on the one hand, that his majeſty was ſo unwilling to put his ſubjects to any extraordinary expence, that he had aſked no more ſupplies in this ſeſſion than what he judged neceſſary for the ſervice of the year; but, in the then poſture of affairs, ſome unforeſeen accidents might require a further expence, for which no eſtimates could then be made, becauſe ſome treaties, which his majeſty had thought fit to enter into were not yet fully completed: that, therefore, they ought to enable him to anſwer ſuch contingencies: that the houſe had frequently repoſed in him ſuch a confidence, which he had never abuſed: and that the time was very ſhort to which the preſent demand was limited.

The members in oppoſition did not fail to obſerve, "that the wiſdom of parliament had always taken precaution againſt the miſapplication of the public money; that ſuch an unlimited and conſequently dangerous power, ought never to be given in a free government; that the conſtitution could not be preſerved but by a ſtrict adherence to theſe eſſential parliamentary forms of granting ſupplies upon eſtimates, and of appropriating thoſe ſupplies to ſervices and occaſions publicly avowed and judged neceſſary: in ſhort, that if they departed from eſtabliſhed maxims and uſages, and ſuch examples became frequent, the crown and the miniſters would acquire an abſolute power to raiſe taxes, and the Engliſh conſtitution would ſoon be annihilated. This oppoſition, however powerful as it might appear, was too weak to counter-balance the court party, and the bill paſſed both houſes.

Sir William Younge, on the day following, moved, that towards the ſupply granted to the king, the ſum of three hundred and ſeventy thouſand pounds, ſhould be raiſed by loans on exchequer bills, to be charged to the ſurplus of the duties on coal and culm, which was reſerved for the diſpoſal of the parliament.

Sir Joſeph Jekyll and Mr. Pulteney, in oppoſition to this motion, repreſented that, by ſeveral votes and acts of parliament, all the exceedings or ſurpluſſes of public funds were to be applied towards diſcharging the public debts or encreaſing the ſinking fund: that this diſpoſition could not be altered without wounding public credit, which was already extremely low, ſince the taking off any part of the mortgage could not but weaken the ſecurity of the debt: that it was ſomewhat ſtrange that ſuch a motion ſhould be made by thoſe very perſons who had the honour of being in the adminiſtration, and who could not have forgot what his majeſty had ſo ſtrongly recommended from the throne at the opening of the ſeſſion; "that the " produce of the ſinking fund might be imme" diately applied to the uſes for which it was ſo

" wiſely contrived, and to which it ſtood at pre-
" ſent appropriated:" and finally, that this motion was ſtill the more ſurprizing after the large and unlimitted power, which his majeſty had lately received from the parliament.

To this it was replied, that the ſurplus of the duty on coals could not be conſidered as a part of the ſinking fund, ſince it had never been appropriated, but was reſerved for the diſpoſal of the parliament. This reaſon was deemed ſatisfactory, and the motion was accordingly carried without any farther oppoſition.

His majeſty cloſed the ſeſſion on the fifteenth of May, with a ſhort ſpeech, in which he thanked the parliament for the zeal, liberality and diſpatch, with which they had furniſhed the neceſſary ſupplies, obſerved that the projected ſiege of Gibraltar proved the end and deſign of the engagements entered into by the emperor and the king of Spain, but that the preparations made for the defence of that place, and the bravery of his troops, would, he doubted not, convince them of the raſhneſs and folly of that undertaking. He alſo acquainted them that the crown of Sweden had acceded to the treaty of Hanover, and that the convention between his moſt Chriſtian majeſty and the king of Denmark was actually ſigned.

During theſe tranſactions the trenches were opened before Gibraltar by the condé de las Torres, at the head of twenty thouſand men well provided with artillery and ammunition, as the Spaniards expected a deſperate reſiſtance from the garriſon. The Engliſh miniſtry, having received previous intelligence of this deſign, ordered a ſquadron to be fitted out under the command of Sir Charles Wager. The earl of Portmore, governor of Gibraltar, though far advanced in years, embarked on board the admiral's ſhip, determined to defend the place to the laſt extremity. The fleet arrived in the month of April, when the troops were landed with a great quantity of ammunition, warlike ſtores, and twenty-four pieces of cannon. About the ſame time five hundred men arrived from Minorca, ſo that the garriſon now conſiſted of ſix thouſand effective men, who, being conſtantly ſupplied with freſh proviſions from the coaſt of Barbary, ſet at defiance all the efforts of the beſiegers, who, after having inveſted the fortreſs four months and ſuſtained the greateſt loſſes, relinquiſhed the deſign as impracticable.

Some time had now elapſed ſince his majeſty viſited his German dominions; he therefore determined to embrace the preſent opportunity. Accordingly, having appointed a regency, he embarked at Greenwich on the third of June, and, landing in Holland, ſet out on the ſeventh on his journey to Hanover. On the road he was ſtruck with a paralytic diſorder, which terminating in a lethargy, he was carried in a ſtate of inſenſibility to Oſnaburg, where he expired at his brother's palace on Sunday the eleventh of June, in the ſixty-eighth year of his age and thirteenth of his reign. He was interred at Hanover among his anceſtors.

George I. had great qualities, much genius, diſcernment and political knowledge, with a happy talent for negociation. He was an enemy to pageantry, plain in his perſon, and grave in his deportment, though eaſy, familiar and facetious in his hours of relaxation; before he aſcended the throne of Great Britain, he acquired the character of a circumſpect general, a juſt and merciful prince, who perfectly underſtood, and ſteadily purſued his trueſt intereſt. He regarded civil liberties as the natural rights of mankind; though the advice of venal miniſters ſometimes led him perhaps beyond the bounds of thoſe prudent meaſures, he would, of himſelf, have purſued. In a word, George I. ſeems to have wanted nothing to make him one of the beſt kings that ever filled a throne, but a thorough knowledge of the conſtitution of the realm he was called to govern.

Remarkable Occurrences during the Reign of George I.

A. D.

1715 On the 22d of April, there happened a total eclipſe of the ſun, when the darkneſs was ſo great, that the ſtars faintly appeared, and the birds went to rooſt about ten o'clock in the morning.

Aurora Borealis, or the northern lights, firſt obſerved.

1716 The privileges of the two houſes of Convocation of the Engliſh clergy taken away, ſince which they have met as a matter of formality every ſeſſion, but have never ſince had any power or authority in matters of a religious nature.

The river Thames laid dry, both above and below bridge, by a ſtrong weſterly wind, which drove back the tide.

A long froſt, which was ſo ſevere, that the Thames was entirely frozen, and fairs kept on it, with a variety of diverſions.

1717 Gnineas reduced by act of parliament from 22s. and 6d. to 21s.

All papiſts obliged to regiſter their names and eſtates.

1721 Inoculating for the ſmall-pox firſt tried in England on ſeven condemned criminals.

1723 Nonjurors double taxed, and obliged to regiſter their eſtates.

1725 This year Orator Henley, the ſon of a worthy divine, ſet up a new ſect, under the title of an Oratory: to promote which he informed the public, that on the 4th of July the Oratory would be opened; that the fundamental authority of this inſtitution, conſidered as a church, would be the ſame with that of all modern churches: that is, " a legal liberty of private judgment in religion, which is the very principle of the reformation, the baſis of all the proteſtant intereſt, and the moſt valuable branch of the freedom of our conſtitution." At the ſame time, in order to prevent any diſturbance that might ariſe on account of his ſeparation from the church, in which he had been ordained a prieſt, he reſolved to place himſelf under the canon of the toleration act; for which purpoſe he took the oaths of abjuration and allegiance before the bench of juſtices at Hicks's-hall. The firſt place he adapted for his oratory was no leſs ſingular than the novelty of its inſtitution, being a ſort of wooden booth built over the ſhambles in Newport-market, near Leiceſter-fields, formerly uſed for a temporary meeting-houſe of a Calviniſtical congregation: after which he moved near the weſt entrance into Clare-market. Notwithſtanding his private fortune was greatly increaſed by money paid for admiſſion into his oratory for upwards of 35 years, yet he could never form an eſtabliſhed congregation; nor does it appear that his religion gained him one proſelyte; his whole ſyſtem and conduct for that time exhibiting nothing more than ſatire, burleſque, and grimace.

A. D. 1727. AS ſoon as the demiſe of his late majeſty was known in England, Sir Robert Walpole waited on the prince and princeſs of Wales at Richmond to notify that melancholy event. On their arrival at Leiceſter-houſe, where they had for ſome time kept their court, they were received by ſeveral members of the privy-council, and many other perſons of diſtinction, who ſigned an inſtrument for proclaiming his royal highneſs king of theſe realms, and the next morning the ceremony was performed with the uſual ſolemnities.

His majeſty afterwards declared in council, that he was firmly reſolved to maintain the religion, laws, and liberties of the kingdom, and to adhere to the alliances, which his father had contracted, and which had contributed, in a great meaſure, to reſtore the tranquillity of Europe. Next day the parliament met, in purſuance of the act of the fourth of queen Anne; but was prorogued, by commiſſion, to the twenty-ſeventh of the month. His majeſty's ſpeech, at the opening of the ſeſſion, gave an early omen of that paternal care, which he ever after exerted for the happineſs and welfare of his people, and of his tender regard for their rights, privileges, and poſſeſſions. The ſyſtem of politics eſtabliſhed in the reign of his father was firmly adhered to: Sir Robert Walpole kept poſſeſſion of the treaſury, and moſt of the other great officers of ſtate were continued in their reſpective places.

The commons having preſented their addreſſes of condolence and congratulation, took into conſideration a motion for the eſtabliſhment of the civil liſt. Sir Robert Walpole obſerved, that the annual ſum of ſeven hundred thouſand pounds, which had been ſettled on the late king, had fallen ſhort every year; that the houſe had been obliged to make up the deficiencies; and that his preſent majeſty's expences were likely to encreaſe, by reaſon of the largeneſs of his family. He therefore moved, to ſettle on the king, during life, the entire revenues of the civil liſt, producing about eight hundred and thirty thouſand pounds.

Mr. Shippon, an avowed enemy to the reigning miniſtry, and a ſhrewd, ſarcaſtic ſpeaker, oppoſed the motion with great vehemence. He launched out into high encomiums on the frugality and diſintereſtedneſs of queen Anne's adminiſtration, and drew a diſagreeable parallel between that and the preſent government.

Without a reply to the member who ſpoke laſt, the houſe agreed to the motion, and a bill for the better ſupport of his majeſty's houſhold was brought in. A meſſage being ſent to the commons from the king, deſiring them to make farther proviſion for the queen, they reſolved, that, in caſe ſhe ſhould ſurvive his majeſty, the ſum of one hundred dred thouſand pounds ſhould be ſettled upon her for life, charged upon the revenues of the civil liſt, together with his majeſty's palace of Somerſet-houſe, and the lodge and lands of Richmond Old Park. A bill was formed agreeable to this reſolution, which, as well as the other, paſſed both houſes, and received the royal aſſent on the ſeventeenth day of July; when the king, in a ſhort ſpeech to both houſes, expreſſed his ſatisfaction of their conduct; thanked them for the proviſion they had made for the ſupport of his family and houſhold, and congratulated them upon the wealth and glory of the nation, by which it had acquired ſuch weight in holding the balance of Europe. The lord chancellor then prorogued the parliament to the twenty-ninth day of Auguſt: but, on the ſeventh of that month, it was diſſolved by proclamation, and writs were iſſued for calling a new parliament.

During theſe tranſactions ſome changes were made in different departments of the civil œconomy. George Ryng, lord viſcount Torrington, was placed at the head of the admiralty; the earl of Weſtmorland was appointed firſt lord commiſſioner of trade and plantations, Philip Dormer Stanhope, earl of Cheſterfield, was nominated ambaſſador at the Hague. The privy council being diſſolved, another was appointed, and the duke of Devonſhire was dignified with the place of preſident, and the lord Carteret obtained the poſt of lord lieutenant of Ireland. The king and queen were crowned at Weſtminſter, with great ſolemnity, on the eleventh of October.

A. D. 1728. On the 23d of January the new parliament met, and choſe for their ſpeaker Arthur Onſlow, Eſquire, a gentleman of diſtinguiſhed abilities, and unblemiſhed integrity; grave, eloquent, venerable, and every way qualified for the diſcharge of that dignified and important office.

His majeſty, in his firſt ſpeech to the new parliament, obſerved, that he was very ſenſible of the diſagreeable and uneaſy ſituation in which their affairs were at preſent placed, and had been greatly concerned to ſee many of the inconveniencies of a war attending his ſubjects, without any opportunity of reſenting the injuries they had ſuſtained, or gaining, in return, any of thoſe advantages which the vigorous proſecution of ſo juſt a cauſe, and the ſucceſs of his arms, might probably have ſecured to them; that many difficulties had occurred to impede the execution of the preliminaries; and, though there was great reaſon to believe that the congreſs would ſoon be opened, and all obſtructions removed, yet was it abſolutely neceſſary to continue their warlike preparations, which had hitherto prevented a general rupture in Europe, and procured to the Engliſh nation many advantages, which would be entirely loſt through a diſcontinuance of their armaments: that he was extremely deſirous of reducing the national expences, and would not fail to ſet about this neceſſary and important work, as ſoon as the intereſt of his people would permit: that he begged leave to recommend to their conſideration the increaſe and encouragement of ſeamen in general, that they might be invited, rather than compelled, to enter into the ſervice of their country; a conſideration, he ſaid, well worthy the repreſentatives of a people great and flouriſhing in trade and commerce: he hoped they would make an addition to the fund of Greenwich hoſpital; and proceed in all their deliberations with ſuch unanimity, zeal, and diſpatch, as to convince the world, that none of them could be induced, from any views or motives whatever, to wiſh the diſtreſs of their country, or to fruſtrate their expectations from abroad, by exciting and fomenting jealouſies and diviſions at home.

Both houſes preſented moſt loyal addreſſes to his majeſty. The commons voted twenty-two thouſand, nine hundred and fifty-five men for the land ſervice, and fifteen thouſand ſeamen. They granted two hundred and thirty thouſand, nine hundred and twenty three pounds, for the maintenance of twelve thouſand Heſſian troops; a ſubſidy of fifty thouſand pounds to the king of Sweden; and another of half that ſum to the duke of Wolfenbuttle. The expences of the year amounted to three millions, ſeven hundred and ninety-nine thouſand four hundred and fifty four pounds, ſixteen ſhillings, raiſed by the land tax, the malt tax, and by a loan from the bank, of one million, ſeven hundred and fifty thouſand pounds, for which annuities, to the amount of ſeventy thouſand pounds, were granted to the city of London, to be raiſed by the duty on coals.

The number of land forces occaſioned a debate on the danger ariſing from the military eſtabliſhment; and the Heſſian auxiliaries were not allowed without a violent conteſt. When the loan of the bank came under conſideration, Mr. William Pulteney alledged, that the ſhifting of funds was but perpetuating taxes, and putting off the evil day, and that the ſinking fund, of which ſuch mighty expectations had been formed, was no other than a pompous project, which had increaſed the national debt from its firſt beginning.

A petition was preſented by the lord mayor, aldermen, and common-council of London, ſetting forth, that the duties already laid upon coals and culm imported into London, affected the trade of that city only; that the inequality of the burden was a great diſcouragement to their manufactures, and an hardſhip upon the trading inhabitants; and praying the houſe would give them ſuch relief, as, in their wiſdom, they ſhould think proper. As a compliance with this requeſt would have entirely defeated the loan, the petition was rejected, and the tax impoſed.

On the 4th of March the commons took into conſideration the ſtate of the national debt. The houſe, having reſolved itſelf into a grand committee, examined the accounts, and interrogated the proper officers, when a court member moved for the following reſolution, "That it appears to this houſe, that the monies already iſſued and applied towards diſcharging the national debts, together with the ſum of ſix hundred and fifty-five thouſand pounds to be iſſued at Lady-day next, amount to ſix millions, ſix hundred forty-eight thouſand, ſeven hundred and ſixty two pounds, five ſhillings, and one penny farthing.

The intent of this motion was evidently to appeaſe the clamour which had been raiſed by an aſſertion of Mr. W. Pulteney, that the public debts had increaſed ſince the eſtabliſhment of the ſinking fund: as this was the moſt plauſible topic of declamation againſt the miniſtry, and the point in which the public were moſt deeply intereſted, the anti-courtiers attempted to defeat the motion by the utmoſt exertion of their abilities.

Their ableſt ſpeakers declaimed, in the warmeſt terms, againſt the profuſe management of the public money. They inſiſted, that notwithſtanding the very liberal grants which had been made by parlia-parliament, during the laſt and preſent reigns; notwithſtanding the eſtabliſhment of the ſinking fund, the national debt was annually increaſing, even in a time of profound peace and tranquillity: that ſuch a circumſtance yielded but a very melancholy proſpect, inaſmuch as, at this rate, the public debts muſt increaſe ſtill faſter, in caſe of a foreign war or domeſtic commotion; ſo that the heavy and numerous taxes, with which the people were burthened, would be entailed on them to lateſt poſterity.

Several arguments were adduced to ſupport theſe aſſertions, notwithſtanding which the miniſterial party carried their point, and the firſt motion was agreed to without a diviſion.

Though Sir Robert Walpole had enſured a majority in parliament, yet he wiſely determined to retrieve his character and eſtabliſh his credit with the nation. In order to accompliſh this deſign, he made, as a miniſter, an appeal to the king, by cauſing a repreſentation to be drawn up, containing a particular detail of the national debt diſcharged and incurred ſince the 25th of December, 1716, with the ſtate of the ſinking fund and of the public credit. This performance began with ſome ſevere but juſt reflections againſt the inſidious arts that had been practiſed in order to miſlead the people in that important point. It ſet forth, that this prevailing miſchief called for an immediate remedy, and made it neceſſary to enter into a ſtrict diſquiſition of the truth and certainty of theſe matters, that his majeſty might be thoroughly informed of the real ſtate of affairs, and his faithful and loyal ſubjects have the ſatisfaction to ſee how groſly the world had been deceived by the artful miſrepreſentations of ill-deſigning men; and that his enemies might be convinced, that the wealth and power of Great Britain were not ſo exhauſted, as to render the nation, under his majeſty's happy government, leſs conſiderable and leſs formidable, than in the time of any of his royal predeceſſors. Having then ſtated the whole of the national debt, it inconteſtibly appeared, that, ſince the twenty-fifth day of December, 1716, two millions, ſix hundred and ninety eight thouſand, four hundred, and ſixteen pounds, nine ſhillings, and ſeven pence three farthings of theſe debts had been actually diſcharged, and concluded with this inference: If, notwithſtanding the embroiled condition of the affairs of Europe, we have been able to diminiſh the national debt ſo much already; may we not hope for a ſpeedy diſpatch in the future? An addreſs being preſented to his majeſty on this occaſion, repreſenting the facts, he told them by way of reply, "that he was highly pleaſed with this repreſentation, which could not fail to give general ſatisfaction to all his people, by removing thoſe groundleſs jealouſies and apprehenſions, which had been propagated and diſperſed throughout the kingdom: that the happy effects of the flouriſhing ſtate of the public credit were too ſenſibly felt and ſeen, not to be confeſſed and acknowledged by every impartial perſon: that the proviſion made for gradually diſcharging the national debt was now become ſo certain and conſiderable, that nothing but ſome unforeſeen event could alter or diminiſh it; a circumſtance that afforded the faireſt proſpect of ſeeing the old debts diſcharged without the neceſſity of incurring new incumbrances: and that they might be well aſſured, that it ſhould ever be his particular care and ſtudy to maintain and preſerve the public credit, to be cautious of laying new burdens upon his people, and to increaſe the ſinking fund."

During this ſeſſion the parliament were chiefly employed in examining copies of ſeveral treaties and alliances, which the king had laid before them; they likewiſe made an attempt to amend the ſtatute of limitations, which, however, miſcarried in the ſequel. They paſſed the mutiny bill, together with thoſe relating to the public ſupplies, and ſome others of a private nature. Theſe reſpective bills having received the royal aſſent, the king cloſed the ſeſſion on the twenty-eighth day of April, when he thanked the members for their zeal, unanimity, and diſpatch, and particularly for having empowered him to borrow a certain ſum for the diſcharge of wages due to ſeamen employed in the navy.

On the 3d of Auguſt his majeſty's uncle Erneſt Auguſtus, prince of Brunſwic and biſhop of Oſnaburg, died at his palace, and was ſucceeded in the biſhopric by the elector of Cologn according to the agreement by which Oſnaburg is alternately poſſeſſed by the houſe of Brunſwick, and that elector.

Prince Frederic, eldeſt ſon to his majeſty, who had hitherto lived at Hanover, arriving in England in the beginning of December, was introduced into the privy-council, and created prince of Wales. Signior Como, reſident from the duke of Parma, was ordered to quit the kingdom, becauſe his maſter had paid the honours due to the king of Great-Britain to the pretender, whom he had invited into his dominions.

On the 29th of June the congreſs had been opened at Soiſſons. Never did ſuch a numerous train of plenipotentiaries aſſemble on a ſimilar occaſion. Not a power in Europe but had an ambaſſador. But it proved eventually a meer form; for after producing their reſpective credentials, and ſpending ſix months in ceremony, pageantry and amuſement, they broke up and ſeparated without adjuſting any one material point in diſpute.

A. D. 1729. On the 21ſt of January the parliament met, when his majeſty acquainted both houſes, "that the plan of a proviſional treaty had already been approved by him and his allies; but that no ſatisfactory anſwer had as yet been returned by the courts of Vienna and Madrid: that this circumſtance created a ſtate of uncertainty, which gave him great uneaſineſs; but he hoped they would believe, that nothing but a regard for the eaſe and intereſt of his people could have prevailed upon him, rather to ſuffer ſome temporary inconveniences, with the daily proſpect of obtaining a ſafe and honourable peace, than precipitately to kindle a war in Europe, and plunge the nation into ſtill greater and more enormous expences: that he was ſorry to find, that the ſtate of affairs obliged him to continue the public expences, in order to enable him, as events might require, to act with vigour, and in concert with his allies, who had all of them reſolved to make the ſame preparations, and to keep on foot all their extraordinary forces; that he had ſome reaſon to believe, that the courts of Vienna and Madrid had been encouraged in their dilatory proceedings, by the hopes, which were given them from hence, of creating diſcontents and diviſions among his ſubjects; but he was perſuaded, that their known affection for him, and a juſt regard for their own honour, and for the intereſt and ſecurity of the nation, would determine them effectually to diſcourage the unnatural and pernicious practices of ſome few, who did all in their power to diſtreſs their native country, and then magnified the very diſtreſſes which themſelves had brought about.

The lords unanimouſly agreed to an addreſs; and the party among the commons, who were for pacific meaſures, extolled the wiſdom and prudence of his majeſty in induſtriouſly avoiding all occaſion of a war, of which the iſſue was, at the beſt, but precarious.

During theſe tranſactions the Spaniards continued their depredations on our ſhips and ſettlements in America, which greatly exaſperated the public in general. But the miniſtry, who ſeemed entirely devoted to peace, urged, that as ſomething deciſive muſt happen very ſoon, and the nation had already waited ſo long, it was thought more adviſeable to wait a little longer before they ſhould reſolve to commence hoſtilities. Taking advantage of the popular ſentiments, the oppoſition expoſed and reviled government, who, they ſaid, ſacrificed the honour and intereſt of their country.

To counteract the deſigns of the oppoſition a motion was made in the lower houſe for an addreſs to his majeſty, acknowledging his great goodneſs and wiſdom, in endeavouring to avoid all difficulties and delays, by concerting the moſt expeditious methods of bringing the negotiations at Soiſſons to a ſpeedy and honourable concluſion: expreſſing their grateful ſenſe of his majeſty's watchful care for the eaſe and intereſt of his people, in declining to plunge the nation into an expenſive war, as long as there was any proſpect of obtaining a ſafe and honourable peace; and, finally, aſſuring him, that the houſe, in an entire confidence of his majeſty's tender regard for his own honour, and that of the nation, reſted fully ſatisfied, that, as ſoon as neceſſity required, he would not fail to take the firſt opportunity of doing juſtice to himſelf and the nation, and of ſecuring the trade and commerce, on a ſolid and ſure footing.

Irritated at this motion, the members in oppoſition retorted on the miniſtry, and endeavoured to render them obnoxious to the trading part of the kingdom, by moving, that his majeſty ſhould be addreſſed not to ſecure, but to reſtore the commerce of the kingdom. This cavil was evidently below the notice of criticiſm, yet it gave the anti-courtiers an excellent handle for declaiming on the depredations of the Spaniards, a circumſtance which it was entirely out of the power of the miniſtry either to excuſe or palliate.

Sir William Younge, in anſwer to their arguments, endeavoured to prove, that the diſcrimination between reſtoring and ſecuring commerce was a diſtinction without a difference; becauſe ſuppoſing, which he did not admit, that the Britiſh commerce was ruined, it muſt be reſtored before it could be ſecured. He ſaid, that whatever was juſt in the outcry againſt the Spaniſh depredations, was, in a great meaſure owing to the intolerable avarice of ſome Engliſh interlopers, who carried on an unlawful traffic with the ſubjects of Spain in America, to the great injury of the fair Britiſh trader, and in defiance of treaties and the law of nations.

The antiminiſterial party was, on this occaſion, greatly ſtrengthened by Sir Joſeph Jekyll, maſter of the rolls, who had acquired the character of an upright judge and an uncorrupt ſenator. But the queſtion being at laſt put whether the addreſs ſhould ſtand in its original form, it was carried by a large majority.

A motion being made for continuing the ſame number of land forces which had been allowed the preceding year, it occaſioned a warm diſpute. The principal ſpeakers in oppoſition endeavoured to prove, from hiſtory and experience, the dangers into which a ſtanding army brought the conſtitution. It was alledged, that the court of Vienna, having readily agreed to the preliminaries for a pacification, there ought to be a reduction of the augmentation of the army, which the differences lately ſubſiſting between the houſe of Auſtria and the crown of Great Britain had occaſioned. It was obſerved, in reply, that, as no definitive reſolution had been taken by the courts of Vienna and Madrid, a reduction of the national troops, during ſuch a ſtate of indeciſion, would only encourage the Imperialiſts and Spaniards to inſiſt upon higher terms, and make the latter, in particular, more inſolent and outrageous in the American ſeas. The queſtion was then put for continuing the army upon the ſame footing, and carried by a great majority.

In the mean time the upper houſe, having taken into conſideration the poſitive demand made by the court of Spain, for the reſtitution of Gibraltar, founded on a letter written by the late king to his Catholic majeſty, a copy of which was laid before the houſe, they moved to reſolve, "that effectual care ſhould be taken in the treaty now depending, that the king of Spain do renounce all claim and pretenſions to Gibraltar and the iſland of Minorca in the plaineſt and ſtrongeſt manner."

Though the court party ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the motion, and through their influence put a negative on it, they thought it imprudent to paſs by a matter of ſuch importance. The commons were invited to a free conference on the ſubject in the painted chamber, and, in conſequence of an addreſs to the king from both houſes, his majeſty was pleaſed to promiſe them, "that he would take care to ſecure his undoubted right to Gibraltar and the iſland of Minorca."

The Spaniards having, about this time, ſeized ſome of our ſhips engaged in a lawful trade, the indignation of the public could not be any longer reſtrained. Petitions were preſented to the houſe of commons by the merchants of London, Liverpool, and Briſtol, complaining of the interruption they had ſuffered in their trade for ſeveral years, by the depredations of the Spaniards in the Weſt-Indies.

When the proper informations were obtained, the houſe enquired into particulars, examined evidence, and drew up an addreſs to his majeſty, deſiring he would be graciouſly pleaſed to uſe his utmoſt endeavours for preventing ſuch depredations, for procuring juſt and reaſonable ſatisfaction, and for ſecuring to his ſubjects the free exerciſe of commerce and navigation to and from the Britiſh colonies in America. His majeſty aſſured them, that nothing ſhould be wanting on his part to anſwer the deſires and expectations of his people.

When the commons had proceeded farther in their enquiry, and the merchants had preſented freſh petitions to them, they agreed to the following reſolutions; that ſeveral ſhips, merchandizes, and effects, belonging to the merchants of this kingdom trading to Spain, Portugal, and Italy, had been taken by the Spaniards, in manifeſt violation of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two crowns, for which no reſtitution had, as yet, been made; and that the maſters and crews of ſeveral of the ſaid ſhips had been barbarouſly and inhumanly humanly treated; that, in order to take the neceſſary care of the intereſts and properties of his majeſty's ſubjects, and thoſe of his allies, who were deeply concerned in the cargoes and effects belonging to the flota and galleons; and to the end that the ſaid treaſure ſhould not be employed in carrying on and ſupporting dangerous meaſures and engagements againſt his majeſty and his allies, the orders and inſtructions given to vice admiral Hoſier, to block up the flota and galleons, and to endeavour to ſecure and detain them, without embezzlement, until juſtice and ſatisfaction ſhould be given to his majeſty and his allies, were juſt, prudent and neceſſary, tending very much to prevent an open rupture, and to preſerve the peace and tranquillity of Europe. Theſe reſolutions were communicated in an addreſs to his majeſty, who was again requeſted to uſe his endeavours to procure ſatisfaction to the unhappy ſufferers; and he again promiſed that no endeavours ſhould be wanting on his part to effect their wiſhes.

The keepers of priſons, and their myrmidons, having committed the moſt cruel acts of barbarity and oppreſſion upon the unfortunate perſons under their cuſtody, a member of the houſe of commons moved for an examination into the ſtate of the gaols of this kingdom.

The firſt viſit was to the fleet priſon, whither they went in a body, and found Sir William Rich, baronet, loaded with irons, by order of Bambridge the warden, to whom he had given ſome ſlight cauſe of offence. They made a diſcovery of many inhuman barbarities committed by that ruffian, and detected the moſt iniquitous ſcenes of extortion, villainy, and fraud of every kind.

The houſe reſolved, upon a report of the committee, that Thomas Bambridge, acting warden of the fleet, had wilfully permitted ſeveral priſoners to eſcape; had been guilty of the moſt notorious breaches of truſt, great extortions, and the higheſt crimes and miſdemeanours in the execution of his office: that he had arbitrarily and unlawfully loaded with irons, and put into dungeons, priſoners for debt, under his charge, treating them in the moſt barbarous and cruel manner, in high violation of the laws of the kingdom.

A reſolution of the like kind was paſſed againſt ſeveral others, who had been their accomplices in theſe barbarities. The houſe preſented an addreſs to the king, deſiring he would order his attorney-general to proſecute theſe delinquents, who were committed to Newgate. A bill was prepared for diſabling Bambridge to execute the office of warden; another for the better regulating the Fleet priſon, and for more effectually preventing and puniſhing arbitrary and illegal practices of the warden of the ſaid priſon.

A grant of one hundred and fifteen thouſand pounds being wanted to make good the deficiency in the civil liſt, it met with a warm oppoſition in both houſes. It was alledged, "that, inſtead of a deficiency in the civil liſt revenues, there was a conſiderable ſurplus; that this new grant was a new burden on the people; that by this precedent not only real deficiencies, but alſo ſupplies were to be given for arrears ſtanding out at the end of every year; that the revenues of the civil liſt were variable in their own nature, and even where there was no deficiency in the produce, there might be arrears in the receipt: theſe might eaſily be increaſed by the management of deſigning miniſters, by private directions to receivers, and by artful methods of ſtating accounts." But theſe arguments were totally rejected, and the grant was fully confirmed.

The papers relating to the Spaniſh depredations being under the examination of the lords, many ſevere reflections were thrown out againſt the conduct of the miniſtry, and a motion was made to reſolve, that the expence of the ſquadron ſent to the Weſt-Indies, under the command of vice admiral Hoſier, having been borne by this nation alone, though deſigned to prevent the Spaniards from ſeizing the effects belonging to his majeſty's allies, as well as his ſubjects, which were on board of the flota and galleons, and from applying the treaſure to diſturb the peace, and invade the liberties of Europe, had been an unreaſonable burden on this kingdom. This motion, after conſiderable debates, was likewiſe rejected, and a proteſt was entered by ſome of the peers.

The very tedious and complicated buſineſs of this ſeſſion being at length concluded, his majeſty, on the 14th of May, went to the houſe of peers, when, after a ſhort ſpeech, in which he ſignified his intention of viſiting his German dominions, he ordered the chancellor to prorogue the parliament.

The queen being appointed regent, his majeſty ſet out for Hanover on the twentieth day of the ſame month, in order to remove a ſlight miſunderſtanding, which had happened between that electorate and the court of Berlin. Some Hanoverian ſubjects had been preſſed or decoyed into the ſervice of Pruſſia, and the regency of Hanover had ſeized ſome Pruſſian officers in return.

The negotiations at Soiſſons were ſeemingly all this time at a ſtand, till at length it was agreed to open conferences at Seville between the plenipotentiaries of England, France, and Spain; and a treaty was concluded on the ninth day of November, importing, "that all former treaties and conventions between the crowns of Great Britain and Spain, ſhould be as amply confirmed as if they had been expreſsly repeated: that their Britannic and Catholic majeſties ſhould guaranty to each other their reſpective dominions; and, in caſe of either of them being attacked, the other ſhould furniſh to the party ſo invaded a body of twelve thouſand men; that all ſuch engagements contracted by his Britannic majeſty, in conſequence of the treaty of Vienna, as were inconſiſtent with the treaties ſubſiſting between the crowns of England and Spain, antecedent to the year 1725, ſhould be rendered void and invalid: that the commerce of the Engliſh and French nations, both in Europe and the Indies, ſhould be reſtored to its former footing, and orders ſhould be inſtantly diſpatched on all ſides for that purpoſe; that his Catholic majeſty ſhould make reparation for all the damages that had been done by his ſubjects to thoſe of the other two parties; that commiſſaries ſhould be nominated with ſufficient powers on the part of their Britannic and Catholic majeſties, who ſhould aſſemble at the court of Spain, within the ſpace of four months after the exchange of the ratifications, or ſooner, if poſſible, to examine and decide whatever concerned the ſhips and effects taken on either ſide; that the ſaid commiſſaries ſhould likewiſe examine and decide, according to the treaties, the reſpective pretenſions, which related to the abuſes that were ſuppoſed to have been committed in commerce, as well in the Indies as in Europe, and all other reſpective pretenſions in America, America, founded on treaties, whether with reſpect to the limits, or otherwiſe; that the ſaid commiſſaries ſhould likewiſe diſcuſs and decide the pretenſions, which his Catholic majeſty might have, by the treaty of 1721, to the reſtitution of the ſhips taken by the Engliſh fleet in 1718: that the ſaid commiſſaries, after having examined, diſcuſſed, and decided the above mentioned claims and pretenſions, ſhould make a report of their proceedings to their Britannic and Catholic majeſties, who, by the preſent treaty, promiſed, that, within the ſpace of ſix months after making the ſaid report, they would cauſe to be executed, punctually and exactly, what ſhould have been ſo decided by the ſaid commiſſaries; that ſix thouſand of his Catholic majeſty's troops ſhould, without loſs of time, be ſent to garriſon Leghorn, Porto-Ferraro, Parma, and Placentia; which troops ſhould ſerve for the better ſecuring and preſerving the ſucceſſion of the ſtates, in favour of the infant Don Carlos, and ſhould be ready to withſtand any enterprize or oppoſition that might be formed to the prejudice of what had been regulated touching the ſucceſſion: that the contracting powers ſhould take the ſofteſt and moſt effectual means of perſuading the dukes of Tuſcany and Parma to admit theſe garriſons upon their promiſing to take an oath to be faithful to the reigning powers in every thing that ſhould not be contrary to the right of ſucceſſion, reſerved to the infant Don Carlos; and upon their engaging not to meddle, directly or indirectly, in the government of the places where they ſhould be garriſoned, and to pay to the dukes of Tuſcany and Parma all the honours that are due to ſovereigns in their own dominions; that his Catholic majeſty ſhould withdraw his troops from the ſaid garriſons, as ſoon as the ſucceſſion of thoſe territories ſhould be quietly ſettled in the perſon of Don Carlos: that the contracting powers ſhould become guarantees to Don Carlos for the quiet poſſeſſion and enjoyment of the ſaid ſtates of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia, after he had once obtained them: that the kings of Great Britain and France ſhould ratify and guaranty all the particular regulations that ſhould be concerted between his Catholic majeſty and the two dukes of Tuſcany and Parma, relating to the ſaid garriſons; and that the States-general of the United Provinces ſhould be invited to accede to the treaty, the ratifications of which ſhould not exceed ſix months."

This is the ſubſtance of the famous treaty of Seville, which, aided by other events that ſoon after happened, produced ſuch a conſiderable change in the ſtate of affairs in Europe.

A. D. 1730. On the 3d of January his majeſty, who had returned to England in the month of September, opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech, in which he acquainted them that he had concluded an abſolute peace with Spain, and thereby prevented the miſeries and calamities inſeparable from war. He aſſured them, that the peace was agreeable to the purport and intention of former treaties, and calculated to render effectual the ſtipulations of the quadruple alliance: that ſufficient proviſion had been made for the indemnification and future ſecurity of the trading intereſt; and that he had given orders for making an immediate reduction both of his land and ſea forces. He then concluded with recommending to their conſideration the ſtate of the public credit, and the hardſhips of the manufacturing and labouring poor.

Both houſes having, after violent and unintereſting debates, voted and preſented addreſſes of thanks and congratulations to his majeſty, the lords took the treaty of peace into conſideration, and very ſevere animadverſions were paſſed upon it. It was obſerved, by thoſe in oppoſition, "that the ſubjects of Great Britain were liable to many inconveniences by being obliged to make proof of their loſſes at the court of Spain; that they thought it very extraordinary Great Britain ſhould conſent to ratify and guarantee whatever agreement ſhould be made between the king of Spain and the duke of Parma and Tuſcany concerning the garriſons once eſtabliſhed in their countries: that the treaty of Seville, ſo far from confirming other treaties, was contradictory to the quadruple alliance, particularly in the introducing Spaniſh troops into Tuſcany and Parma in the room of neutral forces, ſtipulated by the former alliance."

On the other hand the miniſterial party inſiſted, that there neither was nor could be any eſſential difference, if the emperor was ſincerely and honeſtly reſolved to fulfil the terms of the quadruple alliance, with regard to the eventual ſucceſſion of the dutchies of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia; that introducing Spaniſh inſtead of neutral troops into the garriſons of thoſe dominions could make no material difference, eſpecially as the treaty had, in the ſtrongeſt manner, ſtipulated the recalling thoſe troops as ſoon as the ſucceſſion to the dutchies, which was a main object of the quadruple alliance, ſhould be ſecured: and finally, that though there was an immaterial difference, which might give umbrage to the court of Vienna, between the treaty in queſtion and the quadruple alliance, yet the preſervation of the tranquillity of Europe, and the obtaining ſatisfaction and ſecurity to our commerce, were conſiderations far more worthy notice, than what the emperor's pride or ambition might induce him to ſay or do on the ſubject.

The oppoſition undertook to prove, "that the introduction of Spaniſh troops would be really prejudicial to the empire, even according to the methods of reaſoning adopted by the advocates for this meaſure, they having plainly intimated that the deſign of the treaty of Seville was to reſtrain the emperor's power in Italy; and conſequently it was his intereſt to defeat that deſign, however it might be the intereſt of others to put it in execution; and added, that his Imperial majeſty appeared to diſapprove of the meaſure by peremptorily refuſing to conſent to it."

They alſo mentioned the miniſtry's having omitted to oblige the crown of Spain to make a formal renunciation of all claim to Gibraltar and Minorca.

Every argument was adduced by the lords of the ſide of adminiſtration to confute thoſe of their opponents, till at length, after much altercation, lord Bathurſt moved, "that in the agreement of the treaty of Seville, to effectuate the introduction of Spaniſh troops into Tuſcany and Parma, was a manifeſt violation of the fifth article of the quadruple alliance, tending to involve the nation in a dangerous and expenſive war, and to deſtroy the balance of power in Europe." This motion was rejected by a majority of eighty-ſix againſt thirty-one.

The ſecond motion of the oppoſition was, "that Great-Britain's right of ſovereignty, dominion, poſſeſſion, and claim to Gibraltar and the iſland of Minorca, was not aſcertained, ſo as to extinguiſh the claims and pretenſions which the Spaniards had ſet up, and which had been followed by an actual ſiege, ſince the ceſſion of thoſe valuable places by the treaty of Seville, for repairing the loſſes of the Britiſh merchants, were inſufficient and precarious; but this alſo was rejected by a majority.

The lords in favour of the miniſtry then propoſed, "that the treaty of peace, union, and friendſhip, concluded at Seville, did contain all neceſſary ſtipulations for maintaining and ſecuring the honour, dignity, rights and poſſeſſions of the crown; and that all due care was taken therein for the ſupport of the trade of the kingdom, and for repairing the loſſes ſuſtained by the Britiſh merchants. After long debates the queſtion being put, it was reſolved in the affirmative, upon which ſeveral lords entered their proteſts.

In the acceſſion of the States general to the treaty, they were to furniſh only four thouſand foot and one thouſand horſe, and in caſe they ſhould be attacked on account of their preſent acceſſion, the other acceding powers were to lend them their aſſiſtance.

In the mean time his Imperial majeſty was not ſo paſſive as the Britiſh miniſter and his friends had repreſented him. So far from looking upon the introduction of Spaniſh garriſons into Tuſcany and Parma as a trifling variation from the quadruple alliance, he repreſented both the matter and the manner of it in the ſtrongeſt terms as an infraction of treaties, derogatory to his honour and dangerous to his intereſts, as well as the rights of the empire. Neither did he ſeem to expreſs his reſentment by words only, for he made actual preparations for ſending a number of forces into Italy, with orders to oppoſe the execution of the treaty of Seville; but being in want of money, he ſet a negotiation on foot in England to raiſe a loan of four hundred thouſand pounds.

Theſe proceedings greatly alarmed the miniſtry, who began to conſider the probable conſequences of this loan; they imagined that the money was to be employed either againſt the tranquillity of England, or, at leaſt, in a war, which muſt certainly affect his majeſty's electoral dominions. In order to prevent theſe dangerous conſequences, a bill was brought into the houſe of commons, to prevent any ſubjects of Great-Britain from advancing any ſums of money to foreign princes or ſtates, without having obtained licence from his majeſty, under his privy ſeal, or ſome greater authority. This, however, was not to extend to prohibit any ſubſcription to the public funds or trading companies of foreign kingdoms.

This bill was violently oppoſed on the ſecond reading. Mr. Daniel Pulteney, who, in foreign affairs, was conſidered as the oracle of the party, ſpoke againſt it with great vehemence. He ſaid, "that it would make Holland the market of Europe, and the mart of money to the nations of the continent: that the article of lending money was ſo advantageous, that the Dutch, when themſelves were engaged in war with the Spaniards, who treated them as rebels, lent money, arms and ammunition to the enemy: that the bill would diſable the Britiſh merchants from lending money to his Portugueſe majeſty; a reſtriction that might be attended with very bad conſequences to the nation: that the act, in any event, armed the miniſtry with too great and extenſive a power; and that the licenſing buſineſs might produce twenty, thirty, or forty thouſand pounds a year, to the miniſter."

But the moſt weighty argument againſt this bill was, that while it reſtrained the merchants from aſſiſting the princes and powers of Europe, it permitted the ſtock jobbers to trade in their funds without interruption. Mr. Pulteney, laying hold of this circumſtance, ſaid, that he well knew for whoſe benefit this compliance was intended; but jobbing abroad in the ſtocks of foreign nations was what the government ſhould leaſt encourage, and what they ought principally to prohibit; for the nation had ſuffered ſeverely by thoſe means already; nor had the miniſtry ever given them any relief or aſſiſtance; that the Engliſh had been egregiouſly deceived by the French in the affair of the Miſſiſſippi, by receiving paper inſtead of ſpecie: and the miniſtry had been inexcuſably negligent in that particular; for they had never even endeavoured to procure redreſs to the ſufferers.

In anſwer to theſe objections it was obſerved, "that if the emperor could have borrowed money in Holland at three per cent. he never would have applied for it in England where he muſt pay four; that if the Dutch, when at war with the Spaniards, had actually furniſhed them with money, arms, and ammunition, it was a very bad and a very impolitic meaſure, and could not fail of incurring the cenſure of all Europe; that as to his Portugueſe majeſty, it was ſtill in the power of the crown to enable any ſubject to lend money to a friend; nor could the licenſing trade poſſibly be attended with ſuch exorbitant profits as had been inſinuated. The chief defect in the bill, and that of which the miniſtry were moſt apprehenſive, was, that it allowed of any dealings in the funds of foreign nations; becauſe, while ſuch dealings were ſuffered, it would be eaſy for any Engliſhman, inclined to lend his money to the emperor, to elude the force of the act. The oppoſers of the bill, however, did not puſh their objection ſo far as it might have been carried; fearful, perhaps, leſt it ſhould deſtroy their popularity.

The neceſſity of the meaſure at that particular time was, therefore, the argument that Sir Robert Walpole conſtantly uſed in his ſpeeches in ſupport of this bill. An exception being propoſed, by which the prohibition ſhould be reſtricted to the emperor ſolely, without extending to other powers, Sir Robert ſaid, that the circumſtance of any prince, ſtate, or potentate, being equally intended with the emperor, was no objection to the bill in queſtion: that the deſign of it, indeed, was to prevent a war with that prince; but to name him in the preſent caſe, diſtinctly from others, would amount to a full declaration of war; and, beſides, one prince might borrow money for another, and elude the ſpirit of the law: that, with regard to the king of Portugal, or any other prince in alliance with Great Britain, his majeſty would readily grant his permiſſion for loans to his faithful allies: that after all, the law would not be put in execution, but in caſe of apparent neceſſity: if the emperor gave his majeſty reaſon to oppoſe his intentions, it might produce a future proclamation: this, however, was eventual: it might or it might not happen; and, if ever it ſhould happen, no ſubject of Great Britain, no Britiſh merchants abroad, could offend through ignorance of ſuch a proclamation: the bill was drawn with a blank, to be filled with a proper limitation of time, before the law ſhould take place; and that limitation might be ſo large and extenſive, that merchants abroad might be fully informed of the terms, which the law had preſcribed. He added, that, for his own part, he was not ſo converſant in the law as ſome other gentlemen, who could juſtly ſupport the bill in its proviſion for a proper diſcovery of evidence by precedents; he was a ſtranger to that particular; he himſelf remembered the act to prevent the ſubjects of Great Britain from trading in the Oſtend company: that there the ſame method of diſcovery was provided; and ſhould not the public detect ſuch a criminal commerce with a powerful and national enemy, when they were allowed to do ſo againſt a little interloping company? that the bill was far from ſetting up a court of inquiſition, or laying other hardſhips or ſeverities upon any man; it was only to prevent the fraudulent conducting of concealed tranſactions: it involved the party in no other penalty than one, which he could not incur but through conſcious guilt; and at the ſame time, one which he might eaſily avoid, by purging himſelf of the crime: that this penalty, beſides, was ſtill to be limited by the authority of the houſe, and had no other end than to be ſuch a tax upon loans as might make it unprofitable to advance them for the higheſt premiums or intereſt; that the proclamation provided in the bill was the ſame as by law had been uſual in the caſe of quarantine, in apprehenſions of a peſtilence, and as a prevention of any contagious diſtempers; that, it was a reaſonable remedy on all ſuch appearances of danger: that nevertheleſs, it would not be employed, except the grievances that were dreaded rendered it neceſſary.

Mr. Plummer, a candid, diſpaſſionate, and diſintereſted ſpeaker, declared, that he was far from diſapproving of the bill: he only thought it gave too much power to the miniſtry, and that it ought not to be carried into execution by a proclamation, a method which had an arbitrary look, and had, during the reign of the Stuarts, given great diſſatisfaction.

Mr Pelham, the ſecretary at war, replied to this, that the friends to the bill had no intention to make the miniſtry judges in matters that could be decided by the houſe: that it was in tenderneſs to the people, that a proclamation was propoſed, as being a more expeditious method, than any other, to put them upon their guard: that it was to be hoped the affair might yet be adjuſted without a proclamation; and if the houſe, inſtead of making it eventual, would conſent to paſs it immediately, that method ſhould meet with no oppoſition from him.

Mr. John Barnard poſitively declared, "that he would never conſent to a bill, which he deemed a violation of our fundamental laws, and a grievous hardſhip on individuals."

At length, after a moſt obſtinate ſtruggle between the contending parties, this bill, which was ſupported by the whole weight of miniſterial influence, not only paſſed through the houſe, but was afterwards enacted into a law.

Having examined the eſtimates for the enſuing year, the commons voted ſeventeen thouſand ſeven hundred and nine men for the land ſervice. They continued the ſubſidies to the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, and the duke of Brunſwic Wolfenbuttle; and granted two millions, two hundred and eighty thouſand pounds, to defray theſe and other expences.

Theſe meaſures were ſtrongly oppoſed by the anti-miniſterial party who made ſeveral motions which they were certain, if agreed to, would render the miniſter uneaſy, and, if rejected, would make him unpopular. The two following were the principal: firſt, "that an addreſs be delivered to his majeſty, humbly to repreſent, that that houſe having, in conſideration of the ſtate of public affairs, voted ſuch a number of land forces for the current ſervice of the year, aſſured themſelves, that his majeſty, from his juſt regard to the conſtitution of the kingdom, as well as his earneſt deſire to eaſe his people of every charge not abſolutely neceſſary, would take the firſt opportunity to make a farther reduction of thoſe forces, if the ſtate of affairs would admit, before the concluſion of this or the beginning of next ſeſſion of parliament. This motion was rejected by the houſe of commons without a diviſion.

The ſecond motion was to bring in a bill for making more effectual the laws in being for diſqualifying perſons from being choſen members of parliament, who had any penſion during pleaſure, or for any number of years, or any office, held in truſt for them, from the crown, and as a wiſe and neceſſary precaution it was propoſed, that every member of the houſe ſhould take the following oath:

"I do ſolemnly and ſincerely ſwear, that I have "not, directly, or indirectly, any penſion du- "ring pleaſure, or for any number of years, or "any office either in whole or in part, from the "crown, held for me, or for my benefit, by any "perſon whatever: and I do ſolemnly and ſincerely "promiſe and ſwear, that I will not receive, ac- "cept, or take, directly or indirectly, during the "time of my being a member of this preſent par- "liament, any penſion during pleaſure, or for any "number of years, or any gratuity or reward "whatſoever, or any office from the crown, to "be held for me, or for my benefit, in whole or "in part, by any perſon whatſoever, without ſig- "nifying the ſame to this houſe, within fourteen "days after I have received or accepted the ſame, "if the parliament be then ſitting, or within four- "teen days after the next meeting of parliament."

The violation of this oath was to be deemed and puniſhed as wilful and corrupt perjury; and the ſeats of all members refuſing to take it were to be vacated, as if they had been actually dead. A penalty of thirty pounds was inflicted upon every member, for every day he ſhould ſit in the houſe, without taking the oath, beſides an incapacity ever after to enjoy any place of profit or truſt under the king or his ſucceſſors, or to ſit in parliament, or ſerve the crown in any way whatever.

Theſe were the contents of this bill, which has ſince been ſo often renewed, but never enacted into a law.

The oppoſers of the bill urged, that even ſuppoſing the commons to be in good earneſt to expel the member, who thus declared he held a place or a penſion in defiance of this act, yet ſtill, this would be highly unconſtitutional and indecent, becauſe it implied a power to be lodged in one houſe of parliament, to condemn the juſt and unqueſtionable prerogative of the crown, in making a gift which it had a power to make. This muſt be attended, ſaid they, with moſt unconſtitutional conſequences, as the houſe of commons would then take upon themſelves to ſit as an inquiſition upon the proceedings and prerogative of the crown; by which, as in the laſt century, the crown itſelf would be endangered.

But theſe, it was obſerved, were not all the ill effects of this bill. The member was obliged to ſwear, that he was not, directly, or indirectly, to accept of any penſion, gratuity, or reward, or any place in truſt, from the crown. The word indirectly might make a member liable to the penalties of the bill, if the crown ſhould think proper to extend its favour to any of his family or relations.

It was further urged, that the exerciſe of any part of the prerogative, even the moſt ſalutary and neceſſary, ſuch as granting pardon for offences; the remitting fines and forfeitures; the granting patents, and the like, ſome time or other might be conſtrued into an indirect influence. The crown had ſufficient powers which it could avow, and which were in no degree affected by the bill, to create as much influence in the houſe of commons, as a miniſter might have occaſion to employ; and, unleſs all great offices and places, as well as penſions, became diſqualifications, the end propoſed by the bill would never be effected.

Notwithſtanding the ſtrength of theſe arguments they were wholly diſregarded. The cry of corruption was become ſo general, that many, who in their hearts diſapproved of this bill, were yet induced to vote for its paſſing; a conceſſion which they thought they might make with the greater ſafety, as they had no doubt but that the houſe of peers would reject it.

The queſtion was carried in favour of the bill by a great majority, notwithſtanding which, after many debates, it was thrown out by the houſe of lords, and in conſequence of this proceeding, a proteſt was entered by twenty ſix peers.

Several acts in favour of the ſubject were paſſed this ſeſſion, among which were the following: an act for appropriating one million of the ſurplus ariſing from the ſinking fund, towards the diſcharge of the national debt. An act for aboliſhing the duties upon ſalt. A third for the better regulation of juries, and a fourth for explaining and amending an act, entitled, "An act for the relief of debtors with reſpect to the impriſonment of their perſons." An act was alſo made, allowing the inhabitants of the colony of Carolina to export rice directly to any part of Europe ſouthward of Cape Fineſterre, provided the trade was carried on in Britiſh bottoms; and they permitted ſalt from Europe to be imported into the colony of New York.

On the fifteenth of May, his majeſty went to the houſe, and put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, which he concluded in the following words: "My "lords and gentlemen, I am very glad, that, for "the general ſatisfaction, you entered into a par- "ticular conſideration of the ſtate of the nation; "and it is a great happineſs to ſee, after ſo many "unjuſt and unreaſonable clamours, raiſed with "all poſſible art, induſtry and malice, that, upon "mature deliberation, and the moſt ſolemn de- "bates, you were ſo far from finding any thing "worthy of blame or cenſure, that all matters "that came under your cognizance met with your "approbation. This muſt inſpire all mankind "with a juſt deteſtation of thoſe incendiaries, who, "from a ſpirit of envy and diſcontent, continually "labour, by ſcandalous libels, to alienate the af- "fections of my people, and to fill their minds "with groundleſs jealouſies and unjuſt complaints, "in diſhonour of me and my government, and in "defiance of the ſenſe of both houſes of parlia- "ment. But I entirely rely on your prudence "and concern for the peace and happineſs of your "country, to diſcountenance all ſuch ſeditious "practices, and to make my people ſenſible, "that theſe wicked proceedings have no other "view and end than to create confuſion and "diſtraction among us." The parliament was then prorogued to the fourteenth day of July.

The people of Ireland were ſtill under the government of their lord lieutenant, lord Carteret. Their parliament aſſembling in the month of September, they employed themſelves with unwearied diligence in promoting the intereſt and welfare of their country. They eſtabliſhed funds for the diſcharge of their national debt, and for defraying the expences of government; they enacted wholeſome laws for the encouragement of trade and agriculture; and regulated their civil œconomy in the moſt effectual manner.

Notwithſtanding the popular clamour, and the torrent of perſonal invective poured forth againſt the miniſter, ſuch was his influence and power, as not only to ſtem the tide of oppoſition, the moſt powerful ever known in hiſtory, but to carry all meaſures he propoſed through means of the ſucceſſion of his friends to every vacant office of government. His brother, Horatio Walpole, was made cofferer of the houſhold, in the room of the late earl of Clinton: Mr. Pelham was appointed pay-maſter of the forces in the room of Spencer Compton, now lord Wilmington, who was entruſted with the cuſtody of the privy ſeal; the lord Trevor was preferred to be preſident of the council. The earl of Cheſterfield was conſtituted ſteward, lord Hervey vice-chamberlain, and Sir Conyers D'Arcy comptroller of the houſhold. The duke of Dorſet ſucceeded lord Carteret as lord lieutenant of Ireland. The earl of Weſtmoreland was made firſt commiſſioner of trade and plantations; and lord Torrington firſt lord of the admiralty.

A. D. 1731. On the 21ſt of January the parliament met again, when his majeſty informed them, "that the then critical juncture ſeemed, in a very particular manner, to deſerve their attention; that as the tranſactions then depending in the ſeveral courts of Europe were upon the point of being determined, the great event of peace or war might be much affected by their firſt reſolutions, which were expected, by different powers, with the utmoſt impatience. That the continuance of that zeal and vigour with which they had hitherto ſupported him and his engagements muſt, at this time, be of the greateſt weight and importance both with regard to the allies and to thoſe who might be diſpoſed before the ſeaſon of action, to prevent, by an accommodation, the fatal conſequences of a general rupture."

As ſoon as the commons were retured to their houſe, a motion was made for a loyal addreſs to his majeſty; but the anti-courtiers inſiſted on reſtricting it to a ſimple promiſe to aſſiſt him only in all ſuch meaſures as ſhould be abſolutely neceſſary for procuring ſatisfaction to his allies, and providing for the intereſts of his people. After a very obſtinate diſpute the addreſs was voted in its original form, and the peers voted one of a ſimilar nature, but not without much altercation.

The Spaniards ſtill continuing their depredations in the Weſt Indies, occaſioned complaints from a number of merchants in different parts of the kingdom; and their petitions were referred to the conſideration of a grand committee. Their complaints, upon examination, appeared to be juſt. A motion was made for an addreſs to his majeſty, deſiring he would be graciouſly pleaſed to continue his endeavours to prevent ſuch depredations for the future, and to procure full ſatisfaction for the damages already ſuſtained; and to ſecure to the Britiſh ſubjects the full and uninterrupted exerciſe of their their trade and navigation to and from the Britiſh colonies in America.

This motion would not ſatisfy the minority. They, therefore, propoſed an amendment, to repreſent, that, notwithſtanding the former applications of this houſe to his majeſty, in relation to the depredations made by the Spaniards upon the effects of his majeſty's trading ſubjects, and his endeavours to procure ſatisfaction for the ſame, and to prevent the like for the future; and notwithſtanding the treaty of Seville, it appeared to the houſe, that the Spaniards had continued their depredations, and treated his majeſty's ſubjects with the utmoſt barbarity; and, therefore, moſt humbly to beſeech his majeſty, that he would effectually prevent the like for the future, by the vigour of his proceedings.

After a great debate, the amendment was rejected, and the addreſs preſented in its original form. Attention was paid this ſeſſion to the exorbitant rates exacted by the charitable corporation from the induſtrious poor, for the money with which they ſupplied them upon goods pledged, &c. This affair being referred to a committee, it appeared that the corporation had taken ten per cent. under pretence of reaſonable coſts and charges, upon which a bill paſſed the houſe for regulating the lending of money upon pledges and for preventing uſury and extortion. Such were the principal tranſactions of this ſeſſion of parliament, which was cloſed, in the month of May, by a ſpeech from tht throne.

The depredations of the Spaniards in America, and their backwardneſs in executing the treaty of Seville, had provoked the Engliſh miniſtry to ſuch a degree, that they made propoſals to the court of Vienna for a private negotiation, which was ſpeedily agreed upon.

The emperor ſtill exclaimed againſt the treaty of Seville, which he inſiſted was an inſult upon him as head of the empire. He ſaid, that Don Carlos ought to have been eſtabliſhed in Italy, and the ſucceſſion of his dominions ſecured to him, by his receiving the inveſtiture of them from the emperor, and by the conſent of the empire; both which which were ready when demanded: and he alledged, that the acceſſion of Don Carlos to the duchies of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia, was not the ultimate view of the court of Madrid, which the event afterwards ſhewed to be true.

About the ſame time the duke of Parma died. In his will he declared that his dutcheſs was three months advanced in her pregnancy, for which reaſon he entreated the powers of Europe to have compaſſion upon his people, and defer the execution of their projects, until his conſort ſhould be delivered. In caſe the child ſhould be ſtill-born, prove a female, or, if a male, die after the birth, he bequeathed his dominions and eſtates to the infant Don Carlos of Spain, and left the government of his dutchy to five regents.

A body of Imperial horſe, notwithſtanding this will, took inſtant poſſeſſion of Parma and Placentia, under the command of general Stampa, who declared, they ſhould conduct themſelves with all poſſible regularity and moderation; and leave the adminiſtration entirely to the regents, whom the duke had appointed. They publicly proclaimed in the market place, that they took poſſeſſion of theſe dutchies for the infant Don Carlos: and that, if the ducheſs-dowager ſhould not be delivered of a prince, the ſaid infant might receive the inveſtiture from the emperor, whenever he pleaſed, provided he came without an army.

In conſequence of theſe ſteps an immediate war was expected; but the king of Great Britain and the ſtates general interpoſed their mediation ſo effectually with the emperor, that he deſiſted from the proſecution of his deſigns: and the ſecret negotiation between London and Vienna was perfected into a treaty on the ſixteenth of May.

This agreement implied a mutual guarantee of the territories belonging to the contracting powers, and a general guarantee of the pragmatic ſanction in favour of the female heirs of the emperor. His Imperial majeſty engaged to recall his forces from the duchies of Tuſcany, Parma, and Placentia, and to conſent to the introduction of Spaniſh troops into thoſe dominions.

He alſo engaged that the Oſtend company ſhould be totally aboliſhed: and that the Engliſh, with regard to their commerce in the kingdom of Sicily, ſhould be treated on the footing of the moſt favoured nation. The ſtates general were included as one of the contracting parties in this treaty; but their acceſſion could not be immediately obtained, as the nature of their government would not admit of ſo ſpeedy a reſolution.

Such was the ſubſtance of the negotiation of Vienna, which was repreſented by the minority in England, as crude, contradictory, and inconſiſtent with former treaties.

General Stampa, having, in conſequence of a declaration made by the relict of the late duke, that ſhe was not pregnant, taken formal poſſeſſion of Parma and Placentia, and the treaty of Vienna having been acceded to by Spain and the great duke of Tuſcany, Britain engaged to furniſh an armament for conveying Don Carlos to his new dominions. Accordingly, Sir Charles Wager ſailed with a ſtrong ſquadron from Portſmouth, on the twenty-ſixth day of Auguſt; and in September arrived at Barcelona. His Catholic majeſty, however, thought proper to diſcharge Sir Charles, deſiring him to convoy, together with his own admiral, the Spaniſh troops to Italy, which having done, our ſquadron returned to England.

Don Carlos paſſed through part of France, and embarking at Antibes on board the Spaniſh gallies, landed at Leghorn in December. The Imperial general was no ſooner informed of his arrival, than he withdrew his forces into the Milaneſe; and Don Carlos took quiet poſſeſſion.

A. D. 1732. The parliament met on the 13th of January, when the king, in his ſpeech, ſaid, that the general tranquillity of Europe was now reſtored and eſtabliſhed, and all his expectations on that head fully anſwered: that the ſhare of credit and influence which the crown of Great Britain had in accompliſhing that difficult and diſagreeable work, and which redounded ſo much to the honour and intereſt of the nation, as it was univerſally confeſſed abroad, would, he was confident, be agreeable to his people, and acknowledged with gratitude by his parliament: that, from the time of concluding the quadruple alliance, the ſeveral courts of Europe had been employed in finding means to execute the meaſures, which the contracting powers had concerted for ſecuring the ſucceſſion of Tuſcany and Parma in favour of the infant of Spain; but the various jarring and contending intereſts, hard to be reconciled and united, in effectuating a point of ſo much importance; the ambitious views and hopes of of obtaining on every ſide farther advantages; and the natural jealouſies and ſuſpicions ariſing among the ſeveral powers concerned; all theſe oppoſite principles and purpoſes had kept in ſuſpence and unexecuted what the court of Spain had very much at heart, and had occaſioned ſuch troubles and diſturbances as embarraſſed the affairs of Europe for many years, and particularly affected the intereſt of this nation: that the preſent happy ſituation of affairs would, he promiſed himſelf, inſpire them with ſuch temper and unanimity, and ſuch ardent zeal for the public welfare as became a parliament ſenſible of the great bleſſings they enjoyed; that the duty and affection of his ſubjects was all the return he deſired for his paternal care and concern for them: that his government had no ſecurity but what was equally conducive to the happineſs and to the welfare of his people, and their happineſs had no foundation but in the defence and ſupport of his government: "Our ſafety," ſaid he, "is mutual: our intereſts are inſeparable."

Addreſſes being preſented to his majeſty by both houſes, the commons immediately took the ſupplies into conſideration, when the ſecretary at war moved for ſeventeen thouſand, ſeven hundred men for the ſervice of the current year. This motion occaſioned warm and very tedious debates. Strong and powerful arguments were made uſe of by the oppoſition for a reduction of the land forces then employed in the ſervice of government; notwithſtanding which, when the queſtion was put, it was carried by a great majority, "that the ſtanding army ſhould be maintained without reduction."

In the laſt ſeſſion ſome complaints had been made to the houſe againſt the charitable corporation, which affair now became very ſerious. This company was firſt eſtabliſhed in the year 1707. Their profeſſed intention was to lend money at legal intereſt to the poor, upon ſmall pledges; and to perſons of higher rank upon an indubitable ſecurity of goods impawned. Their capital was at firſt limited to thirty thouſand pounds, but by licences from the crown, they encreaſed it to ſix hundred thouſand pounds, though their charter was never confirmed by act of parliament. In the month of October, George Robinſon, eſquire, member for Marlow, the caſhier, and John Thompſon, warehouſe-keeper of the corporation, diſappeared in one day. The proprietors, alarmed at this incident, held ſeveral general courts, and appointed a committee to examine the ſtate of their affairs. This committee, after a ſtrict ſcrutiny, reported, that for a capital of five hundred thouſand pounds, no equivalent was found; that the major part of their effects were embezzled, and what remainded were not worth thirty thouſand pounds.

Hereupon a petition was preſented to the houſe of commons by the proprietors, ſetting forth, that, by the moſt notorious breach of truſt in ſeveral perſons, to whom they had committed the management of their affairs, the corporation had been defrauded of the greateſt part of their capital: and that many of the proprietors were reduced to abſolute beggary; they, therefore, intreated, that as they were unable to detect the combinations of thoſe who had ruined them, or to bring the delinquents to condign puniſhment, without the aid and aſſiſtance of parliament, the houſe would be pleaſed to inquire into the ſtate of the corporation, and the conduct of the managers, and give ſuch relief to the petitioners, as the houſe ſhould think proper.

The commons appointed a committee to conduct the enquiry, who ſoon diſcovered a moſt iniquitous ſcene of fraud which had been acted by Robinſon and Thompſon, in concert with ſome of the directors, for embezzling the capital, and cheating the proprietors. Some members of parliament were deeply concerned in this infamous conſpiracy; and met with the fate which their villainy deſerved. Sir Robert Sutton and Sir Archibald Grant were expelled the houſe, as having had a conſiderable ſhare in theſe fraudulent practices; and a bill was brought in to reſtrain them, together with their accomplices, from leaving the kingdom, or alienating their effects.

The committee, in the interim, received a letter from ſignior John Angelo Belloni, a banker at Rome, informing them, that Thompſon was ſecured in that city with all his papers, and confined in the caſtle of St. Angelo; and that the papers were tranſmitted to his correſpondent at Paris, who ſhould deliver them up, on granting to the priſoner certain favourable conditions.

This letter was conſidered as an artifice to inſinuate a favourable opinion of the pretender, as if he had taken meaſures for ſecuring Thompſon from his zeal for juſtice and affection to the Engliſh nation. The propoſals were therefore rejected with diſdain, and both houſes concurred in an order, that the letter ſhould be burned by the common hangman at the Royal Exchange; and the lower houſe reſolved, "that it was an inſolent audacious libel, attempting, by falſe and inſidious inſinuations, to impoſe upon the parliament and people of Great Britain; and, by ſpecious pretences, and profeſſions of eſteem, affection, and compaſſion, to amuſe the unhappy ſufferers of the Charitable Corporation, with vain and deceitful hopes of relief; that the ſaid letter was, in itſelf, abſurd and contradictory, conceived, at the beginning, in terms, and in the ſtile of power and authority, or as proceeding from ſome extraordinary intereſt and influence, but concluding in the perſon and character of a private banker at Rome, who agreed upon certain conditions in behalf of John Thomſon to deliver certain books and papers belonging to the ſaid Thompſon; that the conditions required and demanded in favour of Thompſon ſeemed at the ſame time to be vague, evaſive, and uncertain, tending to procure advantages and indemnity to himſelf and his accomplices, without any proſpect of benefit to the corporation: and that the whole tranſaction appeared to be a ſcandalous artifice, calculated purely to delude the unhappy and to diſguiſe and conceal the wicked practices of the profeſſed enemies to his majeſty's perſon, crown and dignity."

George Robinſon, Eſq; was expelled the houſe on account of the part he had acted in the charitable corporation, as he and Thompſon had neglected to ſurrender themſelves, according to the terms of a bill which had paſſed for that purpoſe. The parliament having granted the neceſſary ſupplies, his majeſty, on the firſt of June, gave the royal aſſent to the bills that were ready, and informed both houſes that the States-general had acceded to the treaty of Vienna, that he had determined to viſit his German dominions, and to leave the queen regent in his abſence; after which he put an end to the ſeſſion, and in a few days ſet out for Hanover.

His majeſty granted his perpetual charter this year for eſtabliſhing a ſettlement at Georgia, ſituated to the ſouthward of Carolina in America; and accordingly Mr. Oglethorpe, the principal perſon who ſet this ſcheme on foot, embarked at Gravelend with a number of poor families to plant that colony.

The friendſhip between Great-Britain and Vienna ſeemed to be ſincere; but that court carried its perſecutions againſt its proteſtant ſubjects to ſuch a height of cruelty, that the king of England was obliged to interpoſe in their behalf. France, by the bigotry of cardinal de Fleury, and the blind deference of the ſovereign to that miniſter, ſtill continued to be diſtracted with religious diſſentions, which rendered her unable to diſturb the repoſe of her neighbours, at the ſame time that they deſtroyed her own internal tranquillity.

The diſpute that had long ſubſiſted between the king of Pruſſia and the young prince of Orange, touching his ſucceſſion to the eſtates poſſeſſed by William III. as head of the houſe of Orange, was at laſt adjuſted by a formal treaty, ſigned at Berlin and Dieren. In the courſe of this year the prince royal (now king of Pruſſia) eſpouſed the princeſs of Bevern; and thus purchaſed his father's favour by a match very diſagreeable to himſelf.

A. D. 1733. His majeſty being returned from Hanover, the ſeſſion of parliament was opened on the 16th of January by a ſpeech from the throne, wherein the king declared, "that the ſituation of affairs both at home and abroad rendered it unneceſſary for him to lay before the two houſes any other reaſons for calling them together, than the ordinary diſpatch of public buſineſs, and his deſire of receiving their advice in ſuch affairs, as might require the care and conſideration of parliament. In this, as in many ſeſſions paſt, party diſputes ran very high. When an addreſs of thanks was propoſed, importing the entire ſatisfaction of the houſe with the then ſituation of affairs, the anti-miniſterial party oppoſed it, obſerving, that there was very little reaſon for the nation to be ſatisfied with the preſent poſture of affairs; as it was well known that the French were actually employed in repairing the fortifications of Dunkirk, in direct violation of the moſt ſolemn treaties; that the Britiſh merchants were ſtill left expoſed to the cruel and inſolent depredations of the Spaniards; that the commerce of England daily decreaſed, and that every ſeſſion of parliament opened a new ſcene of villainy and impoſition. The court party, however, carried the motion for the addreſs by a great majority.

This ſeſſion Sir Robert Walpole laid before the houſe his long projected ſcheme for a general exciſe. The Spaniſh depredations in America ſtill continued to encreaſe: the penſion-bill had been ſeveral times rejected in the houſe of lords: a bill for ſecuring the freedom of parliaments, by limiting the number of officers in the houſe of commons, had met with the ſame fate: ſuch, likewiſe, had been the iſſue of a motion to bring in a bill to repeal the act for ſeptennial parliaments, and limit their continuance to the term of three years. In a word, the miniſter was, by theſe and like methods, rendered ſo unpopular, that even without examination, all his ſchemes were condemned.

Notwithſtanding theſe concurring circumſtances in favour of the oppoſition, the miniſter entered upon his deſign by taking notice of the arts which had been uſed to prejudice the people againſt his plan before it was known. He affirmed, that the clamours occaſioned by theſe prejudices owed their riſe originally to ſmugglers and fraudulent dealers, who had enriched themſelves at the expence of the public; and that thoſe had found ſtrenuous ſupporters in another ſet of men, fond of every opportunity to ſtir up the people to mutiny and ſedition. He expatiated on the frauds committed in that part of the revenue ariſing from the duties on tobacco; upon the hardſhips to which the American planters were ſubjected by the heavy duties payable on the importation as well as by the ill uſage they received from their factors and correſpondents in England, who, from being their ſervants, were now become their maſters: upon the injury done to the fair trader, and upon the loſs ſuſtained by the public with reſpect to the revenue. He aſſerted that the ſcheme he was going to propoſe would remove all theſe inconveniences, prevent innumerable frauds, perjuries, and falſe entries, and add two or three hundred thouſand pounds annually to the public revenue. He entered into a long detail of frauds practiſed by the knaviſh dealers in thoſe commodities; and recited the ſeveral acts of parliament relating to the duties on wine and tobacco. He declared he had no intention to promote a general exciſe, and endeavoured to obviate ſome objections that might be made to his plan, the nature of which he at length explained. He propoſed to join the laws of exciſe to thoſe of the cuſtoms: that the farther ſubſidy of three farthings per pound charged upon imported tobacco ſhould be ſtill levied as formerly at the Cuſtom-houſe, and payable to his majeſty's civil liſt: that then the tobacco ſhould be lodged in warehouſes to be appointed for that purpoſe by the commiſſioners of exciſe: that the commiſſioner of each warehouſe, appointed likewiſe by the commiſſioners, ſhould have one lock and key, and the merchant importer another; and that the tobacco ſhould be thus ſecured until the merchant found vent for it, either by exportation or home conſumption: that the part deſigned for exportation ſhould be weighed at the Cuſtom-houſe, diſcharged of the three farthings per pound at its firſt importation, and then exported without farther trouble: that the portion deſtined for home conſumption ſhould, in the preſence of the warehouſe-keeper, be delivered to the purchaſer, upon his paying the inland duty of four-pence per pound to a proper officer appointed to receive it; by which means the merchant would be eaſed of the inconvenience of paying the duty on importation, or of granting bonds, and finding ſecurity for the payment before he had found a market for the commodity: that all penalties and forfeitures, ſo far as they formerly belonged to the crown, ſhould, for the future, be applied to the uſe of the public: that appeals in this as well as in all other caſes relating to the exciſe ſhould be heard and determined by two or three of the judges to be named by his majeſty, and in the country by the judge of exciſe upon the next circuit, who ſhould hear and determine ſuch appeals in the moſt ſummary manner, without the formality of proceedings in the court of law or equity.

Such was the ſum and ſubſtance of the famous exciſe ſcheme, the propoſing of which occaſioned a moſt violent debate, which was ſtrenuouſly maintained by the moſt able ſpeakers on both ſides the queſtion. The motion, however, was at length carried by a majority of ſixty-one voices. Several reſolutions were founded on the propoſal, and to thoſe the houſe at length agreed, though not without another violent conteſt.

Theſe reſolutions produced a bill, againſt which petitions were preferred by the lord-mayor, aldermen, men, and common-council of London, as likewiſe by the towns of Coventry and Nottingham. A motion was made that council ſhould be heard for the city, but it was rejected by the majority, and the petition was ordered to lay upon the table till the ſecond reading of the bill.

The whole nation was now alarmed and clamoured againſt the exciſe bill. The populace, crouding about Weſtminſter-hall, blocked up the avenues to the houſe of commons, inſulted thoſe members who had voted in favour of the miniſtry; and Sir Robert, apprehenſive for his perſonal ſafety, thought proper to drop the deſign by moving that the ſecond reading of the bill, which was to have been on the 11th of April, might be poſtponed till the 12th of June; but it was never reſumed. The miſcarriage of this ſcheme was celebrated with public rejoicings in London and Weſtminſter, and the miniſter burned in effigy by the populace.

His majeſty had, for ſome time paſt, reflected, with the utmoſt concern, upon the low ſtate of the proteſtant intereſt in moſt of the nations of Europe. He ſaw that the French had obtained a dangerous influence in the United Provinces, and that all the alliances between England and Holland would thereby, in ſome meaſure, be rendered ineffectual, unleſs ſuch an intereſt could be raiſed among the Dutch, as might counter-balance that of the court of Verſailles. In order the better to accompliſh this, having reſolved to beſtow his eldeſt daughter, the princeſs royal, upon the prince of Orange, he ſent a meſſage to the commons on the eighth day of May, importing, that having received from the prince of Orange propoſals for a marriage between the princeſs royal and the ſaid prince, he had thought proper to communicate the affair to his faithful commons; and as he made no doubt but this match would be to the general ſatisfaction of all his good ſubjects, he promiſed himſelf the aſſiſtance and concurrence of the houſe, in enabling him to give ſuch a portion to his eldeſt daughter as ſhould be ſuitable to the occaſion; and might contribute towards ſupporting, with honour and dignity, an alliance, that would tend ſo much to the farther ſecurity of the proteſtant ſucceſſion on the throne of theſe realms, and ſupporting the proteſtant intereſt on the continent of Europe.

The commons returned a moſt warm and affectionate addreſs to this meſſage, and immediately voted, that out of the money ariſing from the ſale of the lands in the iſland of St. Chriſtopher, his majeſty ſhould be empowered to apply the ſum of eighty thouſand pounds as a marriage portion for his daughter; a reſolution, which was afterwards confirmed by act of parliament.

The public buſineſs being all brought to a concluſion, his majeſty, on the 11th of June, put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſhort, but ſevere ſpeech againſt the authors and abettors of thoſe heats and animoſities which had been ſo univerſally ſpread throughout the nation.

The vacancy which now happened in the throne of Poland involved Europe in freſh troubles. The death of Auguſtus II. threw the neighbouring powers into great commotion. Staniſlaus, whoſe daughter the French king had married, and the elector of Saxony ſon to the late king, declared themſelves candidates for the ſucceſſion. The former was ſupported by Lewis XV. the latter by the Emperor, the Czarina, and the king of Pruſſia. The Imperial and Ruſſian troops encamped on the frontiers of Poland, and the king of France ordered the duke of Berwick to aſſemble an army on the Rhine, in order to enter Germany, in caſe the Imperial forces made any attempt to diſturb the election at Warſaw.

On the 25th of June the diet of the elections was opened with the uſual ceremonies, and Staniſlaus, being unanimouſly choſen king, appeared in the electoral field, where he was received with the loudeſt acclamations. The Saxon party, however, ſoon increaſed to ten thouſand men, proteſted againſt the election, and joined the Pruſſian army. Staniſlaus, finding himſelf unable to oppoſe ſuch powerful antagoniſts, retired to Dantzick, attended by the primate and French ambaſſador, and ſoon after the elector of Saxony was proclaimed king of Poland under the title of Auguſtus III.

Lewis XV. having concluded a treaty with Spain and Sardinia, the duke of Berwick paſſed the Rhine, and reduced fort Kehl. The king of Sardinia declared war againſt the emperor, and, being joined by a body of French troops, drove the Imperialiſts out of the Milaneſe. So powerful a confederacy induced the emperor to have recourſe to his Britannic majeſty, under whoſe mediation he offered to compromiſe all differences with the court of Spain. But Philip rejected the emperor's propoſals, and at the ſame time communicated to king George the motives of his reſolutions. In the mean time he detached a powerful army into Italy, and made ſeveral important conqueſts.

In the latter end of the foregoing year the prince of Orange had arrived in England, in order to eſpouſe the princeſs royal, and the marriage, which was for ſome time delayed on account of his being taken ill, was at laſt celebrated on the fourteenth day of March with great pomp and magnificence.

Several changes happened about this time. Lord Cheſterfield reſigned his place of lord-ſteward of his majeſty's houſhold. The duke of Montroſe relinquiſhed his office of lord privy ſeal of Scotland; and his example was followed by the lord Clinton, who parted with his places as one of the gentlemen of his majeſty's bedchamber, and lord lieutenant of the county of Devon.

Mr. Talbot, ſolicitor-general, one of the moſt accompliſhed lawyers and upright judges in the kingdom, was conſtituted lord chancellor of England, and created baron Talbot of Henſoll; Sir Philip Yorke, attorney-general, was advanced to the office of lord chief juſtice of the King's-bench, and honoured with a peerage, by the title of lord Hardwick. Mr. John Willes ſucceeded the latter, and Mr. Dudley Rider the former.

A. D. 1734. On the 17th of January the parliament met, and the ſeſſion was opened by a ſpeech from the throne, in which his majeſty told them, "that though he was no ways concerned in the war which had broke out in Europe, except by the good offices he had employed among the contending powers, he could not remain an idle ſpectator of the preſent events, or be indifferent about the conſequences of a war undertaken and ſupported by ſuch a powerful confederacy. He ſaid, he had thought proper to take time to examine the facts alledged on both ſides, and to wait the reſult of the councils of thoſe powers, which were more immediately intereſted in the conſequences of the rupture. He declared he would concert with his allies, more particularly with the ſtates-general of the United Provinces, ſuch meaſures as ſhould be thought thought moſt adviſeable for their common ſafety, and for reſtoring the peace of Europe; that he ſhould order the eſtimates to be laid before them, of ſuch ſervices as demanded their immediate care: that the augmentation, which would be propoſed for the ſea ſervice, would be very conſiderable; but he was confident they would think it reaſonable and neceſſary: that he muſt particularly recommend to their care the debt of the navy, which had every year been laid before them; but, from the preſent circumſtances of the times, he believed, they would be perſuaded that it now required ſome proviſion to be made for it: a thing that could not well be longer poſtponed, without manifeſt detriment to the public ſervice: that, as theſe extraordinary charges and expences were unavoidable, he made no doubt but they would effectually raiſe the ſupplies neceſſary for defraying them, with that readineſs and diſpatch, and with that juſt regard to the true intereſt of his people, which this parliament had hitherto ſhewn upon all occaſions: that he hoped they would proceed in all their deliberations with ſuch temper and unanimity, and ſuch expedition in the public buſineſs, as might give him the ſooner an opportunity of taking the ſenſe of a new parliament: that he flattered himſelf his preſent reſolutions would meet with their hearty concurrence and approbation; and, whatever reflections might be thrown out againſt the conduct of government, he was confident a little time would effectually remove all groundleſs jealouſies, and make it appear, that Great-Britain ought to conſult its own honour and intereſt on all occaſions."

The ſame ſpirit of oppoſition ſtill prevailed: however, addreſſes of thanks, after ſome debates and trifling objections ſtarted in both houſes, were voted by a very great majority. On the 23d of January, it was agreed in the lower houſe to addreſs his majeſty for a copy of the treaty of Vienna in 1731, with the ſecret and ſeparate articles and the act of concurrence of the ſtates general. On the ſame day Sir John Ruſhout moved for another addreſs, deſiring that the letters and inſtructions of the treaty of Seville ſhould be ſubmitted to the inſpection of the houſe.

The latter motion occaſioned long and violent debates, in which the ſpeakers ſometimes exceeded the bounds of decorum: however, the queſtion being put, the motion was negatived by a great majority. This fate attended many other propoſals made by the members in oppoſition, who ſeemed induſtriouſly to have ſought occaſion for diſplaying their eloquence and embarraſſing adminiſtration.

Sir Robert Walpole, on the twenty-eighth day of March, delivered a meſſage to the houſe, importing, "that, as the war, which had lately broke out in Europe, ſtill continued to rage, his majeſty hoped he might be enabled to augment his forces, if ſuch augmentation ſhould be found neceſſary, between the diſſolution of this parliament and the election of another." This meſſage was received with great ſurprize by a part of the houſe, but all oppoſition was vain, for an addreſs was voted and preſented to his majeſty, ſignifying the compliance of his faithful commons with his royal requeſt; and, in conſequence of another meſſage, the houſe prepared and paſſed a bill, impowering his majeſty to ſettle an annuity of five thouſand pounds for life on the Princeſs Royal.

It had been conſtantly aſſerted by the oppoſition, that the miniſter exerted an undue influence in the election of the Scottiſh peers. In order, therefore, to remedy this evil three ſeveral motions were made and defended with great ability; but, as all of them ſeemed to reflect upon the conduct of the adminiſtration, they were rejected by the majority, but conſtantly proteſted againſt.

On the ſixteenth of April, his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and having given his aſſent to ſuch bills as were ready, made a ſhort ſpeech to both houſes, importing, that it would be a great ſatisfaction to him, to ſee a perfect harmony reſtored among thoſe, who were guided by one and the ſame principle: that he wiſhed there might be no other diſtinction, but of ſuch as meant the ſupport of the then happy conſtitution in church and ſtate, and ſuch as wiſhed to ſubvert both: that this was the only diſtinction, which ought to prevail in this country, where the intereſt of the king and people were inſeparably connected, and where they could not ſubſiſt, but by being kept in that cloſe relation: that if religion, liberty and property, were never at any time more fully enjoyed, without not only an attempt, but even the ſhadow of a deſign, to alter or invade them, he begged thoſe ſacred names might not be employed as artful and plauſible pretences to undermine the then eſtabliſhment, which alone could preſerve them ſafe and inviolate: that he had nothing to wiſh, but that his people might not be ſeduced or miſguided: he appealed to their own conſciences for the regularity of his conduct; and hoped, that his people would make choice of ſuch repreſentatives as were moſt fit to be truſted with the care and preſervation of the proteſtant religion, and all the religious and civil rights of Great Britain. The parliament was then prorogued, and afterwards diſſolved by a proclamation. which alſo convoked a new one.

During theſe tranſactions at home, the war was carried on with great vigour abroad by the confederate powers againſt the emperor. The Ruſſian and Saxon armies laid ſige to Dantzick, in hopes of ſecuring the perſon of king Staniſlaus. The inhabitants at firſt made ſome ſhew of reſiſtance, but finding all their efforts ineffectual, they were at laſt obliged to ſurrender. Staniſlaus eſcaped into the Pruſſian territories: the Poliſh lords, who had followed his fortune, ſubmitted to Auguſtus: and that prince returned in triumph to Dreſden, having overcome his rival, and firmly eſtabliſhed his authority.

The ſucceſs of the French in Germany was uninterrupted, but they ſuſtained an irreparable loſs in the death of the duke of Berwick, who was killed in viſiting the trenches, which he had opened before Philipſburgh on the twenty-ſixth day of April. The command then devolved on the marquis D'Arfeldt, who carried on the operations of the ſiege with equal vigour and capacity. Prince Eugene exerted all his military talents to relieve the beſieged; but finding it impoſſible to ſucceed, the governor capitulated, after having made a noble defence, and obtained the moſt honourable conditions.

Equal ſucceſs attended the allies in Italy as in Germany. The French, having reduced the caſtle of Milan, and ſeveral other fortreſſes, advanced into the Modeneze: while Don Carlos, at the head of his own and his father's forces, took poſſeſſion of Naples, and inveſted the towns of Gæta and Capua. The Imperialiſts in thoſe parts were commanded by count Merci: the Spaniards by the count de Mortimar; and theſe two generals, having come to an engagement in the neighbourhood of Bitonto, the Spaniards obtained a compleat victory over the imperial army.

The battle of Parma was fought on the twenty-ninth day of June, in which the German army ſuſtained a total defeat from the French, who killed the imperial general, a great number of principal officers, and above five thouſand private ſoldiers. In conſequence of this event, the whole kingdom of Naples ſubmitted to Don Carlos, who began to make preparations for attacking Sicily, where ſome Spaniſh troops had already been landed.

The doubtful behaviour of ſome of the allies at this juncture induced our miniſtry to leave nothing omitted towards putting the nation in a poſture of defence. The court of Spain ſuffered the eldeſt ſon of the pretender to ſerve in the army of Don Carlos, who did not ſcruple to declare, that when the ſituation of affairs would permit, he would ſupport the cauſe of the abdicated family with all his power and intereſt.

The French court likewiſe paid ſo little regard to Great Britain, that they publiſhed an edict, by which all its ſubjects in France were obliged to enliſt in their armies, or forthwith to leave that kingdom.

A ſharp memorial on this ſubject was preſented by the earl of Waldegrave, the Britiſh miniſter at Paris; and the French miniſtry excuſed themſelves, by alledging, that they only meant to execute their edict againſt Britiſh and Iriſh vagabonds, and ſuch as had no ſettled place of abode, or viſible means of ſubſiſtence.

A. D. 1735. On the fourteenth of January the new parliament met, and again made choice of Mr. Onſlow for their ſpeaker. On the twenty-third his majeſty, in his ſpeech, informed both houſes, "that having undertaken, in concert with the ſtates general, to mediate between the powers at war, he had ſuch good ſucceſs, that a plan would ſpeedily be offered to the conſideration of both parties engaged in the war, as a baſis for a general negotiation of peace: that he had concluded a treaty with the crown of Denmark, a matter, he conceived, of great importance in the preſent conjuncture, and which, being attended with ſome expence, he would order to be ſubmitted to the conſideration of the commons: that he hoped they would approve of the ſteps he had taken for the ſecurity of the nation: and that it would, at all events, be good policy to keep this nation in a poſture of defence, while a war continued to rage in Europe.

An addreſs of thanks, after the uſual debates, having been voted and preſented, the commons went on the buſineſs of ſupply. A motion being made for encreaſing the number of ſeamen for the ſervice of the current year to thirty thouſand, the minority affirmed, that the number employed the preceding year was fully ſufficient: that the unneceſſary naval armaments of Great Britain, during laſt ſummer, had occaſioned the ruin of Dantzick, inaſmuch as they prevented the French from ſailing in time to relieve it: that the Spaniards, believing the Engliſh fleet, which was then fitted out, to be deſigned to act againſt them in the Mediterranean, had obliged the French miniſtry to keep their ſhips at Breſt, inſtead of ſailing to Dantzick, until the deſtination of the Engliſh ſquadron ſhould be known.

In anſwer to theſe obſervations the miniſtry endeavoured to prove, that the French never had any intention to relieve Dantzick, or to aſſiſt Staniſlaus in aſcending the throne of Poland: they ſaid, it was true, they had laſt year equipped a fleet, under pretext of relieving Dantzick, and had circulated a report, that this was their real intention: that, nevertheleſs, it was certain that the French fleet was not only detained at Breſt all the ſummer, but orders were given, by the courts of Verſailles and Madrid, to fit out in their ports, all the ſhips that could poſſibly be got ready: that theſe orders had obliged his majeſty to encreaſe his ſea forces with the additional number of ſeven thouſand men; an expedient, which, in all probability, defeated the deſigns, which the French and Spaniards had formed againſt theſe kingdoms: that both theſe powers, far from relaxing in their preparations, were ſtrengthening their marine with the utmoſt induſtry; ſo that the addition of ſeven thouſand men to the marine of Great Britain was but a reaſonable augmentation, and that this meaſure would appear the more neceſſary, when it was conſidered, that in a free country, like Great Britain, where there was no regiſter for ſeamen, by which the fleet might be inſtantly manned, the government was obliged, upon any ſudden emergency, to have recourſe to preſſing, a moſt diſagreeable expedient in a country of liberty. Many other arguments were adduced to the ſame effect, after which, the queſtion being put, was carried in the affirmative for thirty thouſand ſeamen, including the office of ordnance.

This buſineſs being thus ſettled, the remainder of the ſeſſion was ſpent in debates on various ſubjects, and on the fifteenth of May the king prorogued the parliament, after thanking them for the ſupplies granted, and declaring his intention of viſiting his German dominions.

The affairs of Europe were very critically ſituated at this period. The emperor expreſſed the utmoſt ſurpriſe at the moderation of his Britannic majeſty, who, he had all along flattered himſelf, would eſpouſe the cauſe of his quarrel. The king, however, gave the world an inſtance, that it was not from any perſonal diſlike to the emperor that he took no part in his affairs relative to the war now carrying on; for having received certain advice that the French had formed a ſtrong party at the Ottoman court, who were labouring to perſuade the Divan to declare war againſt his Imperial majeſty, he ſent orders immediately, in conjunction with the ſtates-general, to their reſpective miniſters at that court to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to counteract the French in their deſigns. And theſe miniſters laboured ſo effectually, that the Grand Signior was perſuaded to lay aſide all thoughts of attacking the emperor.

With equal ſucceſs alſo did the Engliſh miniſtry intereſt themſelves in preventing the flames of war from ſpreading into other parts of Europe. A miſunderſtanding having lately happened between the courts of Madrid and Liſbon, the king of Spain began to make ſuch preparations for war, that his Portugueſe majeſty had recourſe to his uſual ſupport in time of diſtreſs, the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh nation. The miniſtry lent a favourable ear to his application, and reſolved to afford him that relief which he ſeemed ſo much to want. Accordingly, towards the latter end of May, Sir John Norris ſet ſail with a fleet of twenty-eight ſhips of war, and, in a few days, arrived at Liſbon, where he was received by the inhabitants as their guardian and deliverer. The court of Spain affected to be highly enraged at this bold ſtep of the Engliſh miniſtry, and threatened immediately to invade Portugal with a numerous army; but, in the end, iſſued orders for countermanding their military preparations, inſtead of carrying their threats into execution.

During theſe tranſactions the belligerent powers on the continent became heartily tired of the war, though neither cared to own their ſentiments. At length, by the good offices of the Britiſh miniſtry and the ſtates-general, a ceſſation of arms was procured, and conferences were opened for a general pacification, by which certain preliminary articles were ſoon after concluded on.

A. D. 1736. His majeſty returned from Hanover in the month of November; and on the fifteenth day of January opened the parliament with a ſpeech; in which he told them, that the plan of a pacification formed by the French and Imperialiſts, was, in ſubſtance, the ſame with that which had been concerted between him and the ſtates general, though they had thought proper to communicate it as a new project; that he had agreed to this plan, which had been imparted to the kings of Spain and Sardinia, who, it was hoped, would likewiſe be perſuaded to accede to it; that he had already given orders for a reduction of his forces, both by ſea and land; but he flattered himſelf they would think it reaſonable to continue ſome extraordinary ſupplies, till the final eſtabliſhment of the peace of Europe.

On the 27th of April a marriage was celebrated between the prince of Wales and the princeſs of Saxe-gotha, and on the 25th of May the king put an end to the ſeſſion of parliament, ſoon after which he embarked for his German dominions.

The moſt remarkable event that diſtinguiſhed this year happened at Edinburgh, where John Porteous, who commanded the guard of that city, was, while attending the execution of a ſmuggler, ſo far provoked by the inceſſant inſults of the populace as to order his men, without uſing the previous formalities of the law, to fire with ſhot among the croud, by which raſh conduct ſeveral innocent perſons loſt their lives. Porteous was indicted for murder, convicted, and received ſentence of death, but her majeſty thought proper to grant him a reprieve. This lenity was ſo highly reſented by the common people, that they determined to execute the ſentence themſelves on the very day fixed by the judges for that purpoſe. Accordingly about ten o'clock at night they aſſembled in different bodies, locked the gates of the city to prevent the admiſſion of the troops, ſurprized and diſarmed the town-guard, broke open the priſon, dragged Porteous from thence to the place of execution, and leaving him hanging by the neck on a dyer's pole, quietly diſperſed to their ſeveral habitations.

The ſeveral contending powers in Italy had, by this time, agreed to the preliminaries of peace concluded between the emperor and France. The duke of Lorraine had married the emperor's eldeſt daughter Maria Thereſa, and ceded Lorrain to France, even before he ſucceeded to Tuſcany. Don Carlos was crowned king of Sicily: and Auguſtus was univerſally acknowledged ſovereign of that kingdom. The preliminaries were approved and ratified by the diet of the empire; the provinces of Italy ſubmitted to the houſe of Auſtria, and the king of Spain commanded his troops to evacuate Tuſcany.

During the courſe of this year died at Vienna, in the 74th year of his age, the renowned prince Eugene, leaving behind him the character of an accompliſhed general and conſummate politician. Lord chancellor Talbot, univerſally revered for his ability and integrity, paid the great debt of nature about the ſame time, and was ſucceeded in his important office by lord Hardwicke.

A. D. 1737. His majeſty being indiſpoſed, in conſequence of the fatigue he had ſuffered in a tempeſtuous paſſage from Holland, the parliament was opened by commiſſion, on the firſt day of February. The lord chancellor made a ſpeech, in his majeſty's name, to both houſes, in which he acquainted them, that though the great work of re-eſtabliſhing the general tranquillity of Europe was far advanced, common prudence dictated attention to the final concluſion. He ſaid his majeſty could not but expreſs his ſurprize and concern at the prevalence of riots and tumults in obſtruction of the execution of the laws, and in violation of the public peace; and, in the king's name, recommended them to the conſideration of effectual means for their ſuppreſſion.

A reward of two hundred pounds having been offered by proclamation in Edinburgh for the diſcovery of any perſon concerned in the execution of Porteous, without bringing one individual to juſtice, a bill was brought into the upper houſe to diſable Alexander Wilſon, Eſq; lord provoſt of Edinburgh, from enjoying any place or office in the magiſtracy of that city, or elſewhere; for impriſoning the ſaid Alexander Wilſon, and for impoſing a fine of two thouſand pounds upon the corporation of Edinburgh for the benefit of the widow of the late captain Porteous. Some amendments being made to this bill, it paſſed both houſes, and received the royal aſſent. Another bill paſſed this ſeſſion to limit the number of play-houſes, to ſubject all writings intended for the ſtage to the inſpection of the lord chamberlain, and to compel authors to take out a licence for every production, before the piece could be publicly repreſented.

His majeſty went to the houſe of peers on the twenty-firſt day of June, and put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he ſaid, that he was extremely concerned to obſerve the licentiouſneſs of the times: that, under the colour and diſguiſe of liberty, they could not be inſenſible what ſcandal and offence it gave to all honeſt and ſober men, and how abſolutely neceſſary it was to reſtrain ſuch licentiouſneſs, by a due and vigorous execution of the laws: that a defiance of all authority, a contempt of magiſtracy, and even a reſiſtance of the laws, were become too general, though equally prejudicial to the prerogative of the crown, and the liberties of the people; the ſupport of the one being inſeparable from the protection of the other: that he had ever made the laws of the land the invariable rule of his actions, and he thought he might with reaſon expect in return all that ſubmiſſion to his government and authority, which he would take care to make as much the intereſt of his ſubjects, as the laws had made it their duty.

An open breach in the royal family now engroſſed the attention of the public. The princeſs of Wales had advanced to the very laſt month of her pregnancy, before the king and queen were informed of her being with child. She was twice conveyed from Hampton-Court to the palace of St. James's, when her labour pains were ſuppoſed to be approaching; and at length was delivered of a daughter, the princeſs Auguſta, about two hours after her arrival.

As ſoon as his majeſty was acquainted with this event, he ſent a meſſage by the earl of Eſſex to the prince, expreſſing his diſpleaſure at the conduct of his royal highneſs, as an indignity offered to himſelf and the queen. The prince endeavoured to appeaſe his majeſty's anger in ſeveral ſubmiſſive letters, and implored the queen's mediation. The princeſs joined her intreaties to thoſe of his royal highneſs; but no happy conſequence aroſe from their repeated acts of humility and ſupplication.

His majeſty gave the prince to underſtand, that till he ſhould withdraw his confidence from thoſe at whoſe inſtigation and advice he was directed and encouraged in his unwarrantable behaviour to himſelf and the queen, and return to his duty, he ſhould not reſide in the palace. Accordingly the prince, in obedience to this order, retired to Kew, and made freſh efforts to be reſtored to his majeſty's favour, but without effect. He was not even admitted into the preſence of the queen his mother, to expreſs his duty in her laſt moments, and receive her bleſſing. She died of a mortification in her bowels, on the twentieth day of November, in the fifty-fifth year of her age, regretted as a princeſs of uncommon penetration, extenſive generoſity, a pattern of conjugal fidelity and affection, a generous patroneſs of learning and learned men, and devout in the performance of all her religious duties.

A. D. 1738. On the twenty-fourth of January, his majeſty opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſhort ſpeech, recommending the diſpatch of the public buſineſs with prudence and unanimity. Each houſe preſented a warm addreſs of condolance on the queen's death, with which the king appeared to be deeply affected. An enquiry into the Spaniſh depredations was the firſt and principal buſineſs which came before the parliament during the courſe of this ſeſſion.

This ſubject had been referred by the king to a committee of the privy council, where the merchants endeavoured to make good their allegations. Their cauſe was plauſible and popular; the public readily eſpouſed their quarrel; they were befriended by the oppoſition in both houſes, who wanted to force the miniſtry into a war with Spain: and, encouraged by all theſe favourable circumſtances, they delivered a very ſpirited petition to the lower houſe, repreſenting, "that the free and lawful trade to the Engliſh plantations in America had been greatly interrupted for many years paſt, not only by their ſhips being ſtopped and ſeized on the high ſeas by Spaniſh veſſels fitted out to cruize under the plauſible pretence of guarding their own coaſt, but the commanders had been ſo far from conforming themſelves to theſe orders, that they had ſeized ſeveral Engliſh ſhips, and carried them into ſome of the Spaniſh ports, where they were condemned with their cargoes, in manifeſt violation of the treaties ſubſiſting between the two crowns."

This petition, enforced by others of the like nature from moſt of the trading towns in the kingdom, had ſuch an influence upon the houſe, that a motion was made to addreſs his majeſty for copies of all the repreſentations ſent by the miniſtry of England to that of Spain, ſince the firſt day of November laſt, and of ſuch anſwers to the ſaid repreſentations as had been received.

This motion occaſioned a long debate, in which the cruelties of the Spaniards, and the tameneſs of the Engliſh miniſtry were ſtrongly diſplayed. Every ſpeaker of note on each ſide diſtinguiſhed himſelf on this occaſion, and Sir Robert Walpole, who adhered to his pacific plan, inſiſted that every method ſhould be tried to bring Spain to terms if poſſible, before we proceeded to forcible meaſures. He approved of the former part of the motion, but thought it would be dangerous to comply with the latter: in fine, the motion was rejected by a great majority.

In the mean time the lords were no leſs buſy than the commons in enquiring into the ſubject of the Spaniſh depredations. After ſeveral members had delivered their ſentiments and reaſoned in a very powerful and concluſive manner, the houſe unanimouſly agreed in preſenting an addreſs to his majeſty. In anſwer to which his majeſty ſaid, "that he was ſenſibly touched with the many hardſhips and injuries ſuſtained by his trading ſubjects in America, from the cruelties and unjuſt depredations of the Spaniards; that they might be aſſured of his care to procure ſatisfaction for the injuries they had already ſuffered, to ſecure the freedom of navigation for the future, and to maintain to his ſubjects the full enjoyment of all the rights to which they were entitled by treaty and the laws of nations: and that he doubted not but that in the ſteps he ſhould take for this neceſſary purpoſe, he ſhould have the aſſiſtance of the houſe." Thus ended an enquiry, which, ever ſince the meeting of parliament, had wholly engroſſed the attention of the public.

The parliamentary buſineſs being concluded, the king went to the houſe on the 20th of May, and put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he obſerved, that, agreeable to what had appeared to be the concurrent opinion of both houſes of parliament, he had given orders to repeat, in the ſtrongeſt and moſt preſſing manner, his demands at the court of Spain for obtaining ſatisfaction for the many injuries and loſſes ſuſtained by his trading ſubjects in America, and for effectually ſecuring their rights for the future; and he hoped, from the juſtice and equity of the Catholic king, to procure and eſtabliſh a free and uninterrupted exerciſe of trade and navigation between the ſubjects of the two crowns, agreeable to the law of nations, and to treaties ſubſiſting between the two powers.

In a few days after the concluſion of the ſeſſion, her royal highneſs the princeſs of Wales was delivered of a ſon, who was baptized by the name of George, and is at preſent our moſt auguſt ſovereign. His birth was celebrated with uncommon rejoicings: addreſſes of congratulation were preſented to the king by the two univerſities, and almoſt all the cities and corporations in the kingdom. But the prince of Wales ſtill laboured under the diſpleaſure of his majeſty, who had ordered the lord chamberlain to ſignify in the gazette, that no perſon, who viſited the prince, ſhould be admitted into his majeſty's preſence at any of the royal palaces.

A ſpirit of riot and confuſion diſcovered itſelf among the lower claſs of people in different parts of the kingdom during the courſe of this year. The moſt dangerous of theſe tumults happened in the weſt of England, where a number of journeymen weavers roſe, and, in a riotous manner, committed the moſt terrible outrages againſt the perſons and properties of thoſe maſters who had incurred their reſentment. In order to quell theſe diſturbances, and prevent the flames of ſedition from ſpreading into other counties, a body of troops was quartered at Bradford, Trowbridge, Melkſham, Chippenham, and parts adjacent.

About the ſame period a moſt dangerous inſult was committed upon juſtice, by a party of ſailors, at Wapping, who cut down from the gibbet, and brought brought to life, one Buchanan, who had been condemned for murder; and, notwithſtanding the atrociouſneſs of the crime, and the danger of the example, the offenders were, by ſome means or other, effectually ſcreened from juſtice.

A. D. 1739. His majeſty opened the ſeſſion of parliament on the firſt day of February with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he ſaid, that, ſupported by the concurrent advice of both houſes of parliament, he had loſt no time in making preparations to do himſelf and his people juſtice, if the conduct of the court of Spain had laid him under that neceſſity: that he had, at the ſame time, in the ſtrongeſt manner, repeated his inſtances for obtaining ſuch reparation for the many injuries and loſſes already ſuſtained, and ſuch effectual ſecurity for the future, as might prevent the conſequences of an open rupture: that he had now the ſatisfaction to acquaint them, that the meaſures purſued had been ſo ſucceſsful, that a convention was concluded and ratified between him and the king of Spain, by which, upon a ſtrict examination of the demands on both ſides, that prince had obliged himſelf to make reparation to the Britiſh ſubjects, by the payment of a certain ſtipulated ſum: that plenipotentiaries were likewiſe named and appointed, for regulating, within a limited time, all thoſe grievances and abuſes, which had hitherto interrupted the Britiſh commerce and navigation in the American ſeas; and for ſettling all matters in diſpute, in ſuch a manner, as might, for the future, prevent and remove all new cauſes and pretences of complaint, by a ſtrict obſervance of our mutual treaties, and a juſt regard to the rights and privileges, belonging to each nation: and finally, he promiſed that he would order the convention to be laid before his parliament.

The principal point now with the miniſtry was to influence the two houſes of parliament to approve of the convention, and obtain an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty for laying it before them, which would be conſidered as giving a ſanction to their meaſures. This motion met with a moſt ſtrenuous oppoſition, but was, however, at length carried in the affirmative.

An excellent law paſſed during this ſeſſion for the encouragement of the woollen manufacture; and two bills in behalf of the ſugar colonies; one, permitting them, for a limited time, to export their produce directly to foreign parts, under proper reſtrictions: the other making more effectual proviſions for ſecuring the duties laid upon the importation of foreign ſugars, rum and molaſſes, into Great Britain and his majeſty's plantations in America.

The powers of the commiſſioners too, appointed to ſuperintend the building of Weſtminſter bridge, were conſiderably enlarged by another act; and a lottery was eſtabliſhed for raiſing money to defray the expence of this great and valuable work.

On the 14th of June the king went to the houſe of peers, and put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſhort ſpeech, in which he recommended unanimity among themſelves as the only ſure means of fruſtrating the attempts of their enemies.

Notwithſtanding the parliamentary ſanction the convention had received, the rumour of a war with Spain began to revive. The continuance of depredations and inſults on the part of the Spaniards put a ſtop to the conferences, and Mr. Keene, the Britiſh miniſter at the court of Madrid, preſented, by order of his maſter, a very ſpirited declaration againſt thoſe proceedings. This was followed by an order of council for granting letters of marque and repriſals to our merchants.

His Catholic majeſty, in anſwer to the declaration of the Britiſh miniſter, ſaid, that he looked upon the orders which had been iſſued for repriſals, as acts of hoſtility; and that he hoped, with the aſſiſtance of heaven and his allies, he ſhould be able to ſupport a good cauſe againſt his adverſaries.

The land forces were now augmented, ſeveral ſhips were put in commiſſion, an embargo was laid upon all merchant-men, and every other meaſure purſued that ſeemed to give confidence to the earneſt hopes and expectations of the nation. The orders for making repriſals had been very prudently diſpatched above a month before their publication in London to commodore Brown, who commanded a ſquadron at Jamaica, to afford him an opportunity of availing himſelf of the intelligence, before the Spaniards, in that quarter, had any ſuſpicion of the deſigns of the Engliſh cabinet. A reſolution was alſo formed for endeavouring to preclude the Spaniards from the reſources of their riches in the Weſt Indies and the South ſeas.

The greateſt hopes of the nation were placed on the brave admiral Vernon, who was ſent to the Weſt-Indies to aſſume the command in thoſe ſeas, and annoy the trade and ſettlements of the Spaniards. He was eſteemed a good officer, and as he had once commanded a ſquadron in the Weſt-Indies, was perfectly well acquainted with thoſe ſeas: In a debate in the houſe of commons on the Spaniſh depredations, he happened to affirm, that Porto-Bello on the Spaniſh main might be eaſily reduced, nay, he even declared, that he would undertake to reduce it with only ſix ſhips, on the forfeiture of his head. The miniſter, deſirous of removing ſo troubleſome a cenſor from the houſe, appointed him to the undertaking.

A declaration of war againſt Spain was publiſhed at London with the uſual ſolemnity on the nineteenth of October. Many Engliſh merchants began to equip privateers, and arm their trading veſſels, with a double view of annoying the enemy and protecting their own commerce.

His majeſty, in his ſpeech to both houſes of parliament, at their meeting on the fifteenth day of November, informed them, that he had augmented his forces by ſea and land; and expreſſed his apprehenſion, that the heats and animoties, which had been induſtriouſly raiſed in the kingdom, had encouraged Spain to act in ſuch a manner, as rendered it neceſſary for him to have recourſe to arms.

A. D. 1740. His majeſty, having, by a meſſage, informed the commons of his intention of giving the princeſs Mary in marriage to prince Frederic of Heſſe; and expreſſed his hope, that the commons would enable him to give a ſuitable portion with his daughter, they unanimouſly agreed to grant forty thouſand pounds for that purpoſe; and preſented an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty, for having communicated his royal intentions to the houſe.

During theſe tranſactions a ſhip arrived from the Weſt-Indies, diſpatched by admiral Vernon, with an account of his having taken Porto-Bello, on the iſthmus of Darien, with ſix ſhips only, and demoliſhed all the fortifications of the place. The two houſes of parliament preſented a joint addreſs of congratulation upon this ſucceſs of his majeſty's arms; and the nation, in general, was elated elated by this exploit. This ſeſſion was cloſed on the twenty-ninth day of April, when the king thanked the commons for the ſupplies they had ſo liberally granted; recommending unanimity and concord to both houſes; and expreſſed his hopes, that the preparations, which he was making for carrying on the war in the moſt vigorous and effectual manner, would be attended with that ſucceſs which the juſtice of his cauſe deſerved.

The ſeſſion of parliament being concluded, his majeſty appointed a regency, and ſet out for Hanover. About the ſame time a ſloop arrived with freſh diſpatches from admiral Vernon, who, ſince his fortunate adventure at Porto Bello, had made a fruitleſs attempt on Carthagena, but had reduced the fort of San Lorenzo in the neighbourhood of his former conqueſt.

Great and dreadful were the afflictions of the poor throughout the greater part of the preceding winter, in conſequence of a ſevere froſt, which began in December, and continued till the end of February. The Thames was ſo frozen over, that it was as much crowded in ſome places with ſhops and people, as the ſtreets. This calamity was the more deeply felt, as the poor could not afford to ſupply themſelves with coals and fuel, which were advanced in price in proportion to the ſeverity and continuance of the froſt. The induſtrious labourers could not procure work to employ themſelves, and an almoſt total ſtop was put to the various manufactures.

Many hundred families of the poorer ſort muſt have totally periſhed through the extremity of their diſtreſs, had not thoſe of opulent fortunes been inſpired with a remarkable ſpirit of charity and benevolence. Pity for the poor became now the reigning paſſion among the great, the rich, and the happy. The munificence of his majeſty and the royal family ſet the example to the nobility, who were readily followed in ſo laudable a work by all ſuch as had the power of relieving the wants of their fellow creatures. Societies for the more equal diſtribution of private charities were every where formed; and ſome of the moſt diſtinguiſhed perſonages in the kingdom entailed on themſelves immortal honour, by giving to, and collecting money for, the poor, and acting as ſtewards in the diſtribution of it.

Intelligence being received that a ſtrong ſquadron of Spaniſh ſhips of war waited at Ferrol for orders to ſail to their American ſettlements, Sir John Norris ſailed with a fleet of twenty ſhips from Spithead, with a view of attacking them in the harbour; and the duke of Cumberland ſerved as a volunteer in this expedition; but, after divers fruitleſs efforts, he was, by contrary winds, obliged to lie inactive for the greateſt part of the ſummer in Torbay; and the deſign againſt Ferrol was finally laid aſide, upon advice that the French and Spaniſh fleets were ſailed in conjunction to the Weſt Indies.

A ſmall ſquadron of ſhips, under the command of commodore Anſon, ſet ſail for the South ſea, in the month of September, in order to attack the enemy's colonies, and co-operate, occaſionally, with admiral Vernon acroſs the iſthmus of Darien: the ſcheme was well laid, and though it failed in its principal purpoſe, was afterwards productive of very conſiderable national advantages, and great honour to the commander.

In order, however, to proſecute the war with vigour in the Weſt Indies, two regiments of foot, with ſix of marines were ordered to embark for that quarter. A conſiderable fleet was aſſembled at Portſmouth, commanded by Sir Chaloner Ogle, conſiſting of one and twenty ſail of the line with twelve thouſand ſeamen on board, together with the above regiments and other detachments, lord Cathcart a nobleman of approved valour, being appointed commander in chief of the land forces. They were likewiſe furniſhed with hoſpital ſhips, and ſtore ſhips loaded with proviſions, ammunitions, all ſorts of warlike implements, and every kind of convenience, but, through ſome unaccountable cauſes, the event of this mighty undertaking did not anſwer the public expectation.

This year was rendered remarkable by the demiſe of three crowned heads. The king of Pruſſia, who was ſucceeded on the throne by his eldeſt ſon Frederick, the reigning king of that realm. Charles the ſixth, emperor of Germany, the laſt prince of the houſe of Auſtria, who expired at Vienna on the ninth day of October, and was ſucceeded in his hereditary dominions by his eldeſt daughter, Maria Thereſa, married to the grand duke of Tuſcany; and the empreſs of Ruſſia, who by her will appointed prince Ivan, ſon of the duke Anthony Ulric of Brunſwic-Lunenburgh-Bevern, and the princeſs Anne of Mecklenburgh her ſucceſſors. She appointed the duke of Courland regent of the empire, and even guardian of the young Czar, though his own parents were living, but this diſpoſition was ſoon ſet aſide.

In the beginning of November his majeſty returned from his German dominions, and on the 18th opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which, among other things, he obſerved, "that the court of Spain, having already felt ſome effects of the reſentment of the Engliſh, began to be ſenſible, that they ſhould be no longer able, by their own ſtrength, to defend themſelves againſt the efforts of the Britiſh nation: that, if any other powers, agreeable to ſome late extraordinary proceedings, ſhould interpoſe, and attempt to preſcribe or limit the operations of the war againſt his declared enemies, the honour and intereſt of his crown and kingdoms muſt call upon his parliament to loſe no time in putting the nation in ſuch a condition, as might enable him to repel any inſults, and fruſtrate any deſigns formed againſt him, in violation of the faith of treaties; and he hoped any ſuch unprecedented ſteps, under what colour or pretence ſoever they might be taken, would inſpire his allies with a true ſenſe of the common danger, and would unite them in ſupport and defence of the common cauſe: that the great and unhappy event of the death of the late emperor opened a new ſcene in the ſtate of affairs of Europe, in which all the principal powers might be immediately or remotely concerned: that it was impoſſible to determine, with any degree of certainty, what courſe the policy, intereſt, or ambition of the ſeveral courts might lead them to purſue in this critical conjuncture; it ſhould be his care ſtrictly to obſerve and watch their motions; to adhere to the engagements which he had formerly contracted for maintaining the balance of power, and the liberties of Europe; and, in concert with ſuch powers as were under the ſame obligations, to act in ſuch a manner, as might moſt effectually tend to avert thoſe dangers which threatened the public tranquillity." A motion being made in the houſe of peers by the duke of Argyle for an addreſs to his majeſty, violent debates enſued on the form in which it ſhould be couched; but on the queſtion being put, that propoſed by the court party was approved by a great majority.

A. D. 1741. His majeſty went to the houſe of peers on the eighth day of April, and paſſed ſome acts that were ready for the royal aſſent. He then, in a ſpeech to both houſes, obſerved, "that the war which had lately broke out and been carried on in part of the Auſtrian dominions, and the various and extenſive claims, which were publickly made on the late emperor's ſucceſſion, were events, which required the utmoſt care and attention; the rather, as they might involve all Europe in a bloody war, and, in conſequence, expoſe the dominions of ſuch princes as ſhould take part in ſupport of the Pragmatic Sanction, to imminent and immediate danger; that the queen of Hungary had already made a requiſition of the twelve thouſand men expreſsly ſtipulated by treaty: and, in order to fulfil his engagements, he had demanded of the king of Denmark, and of the king of Sweden, as landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel, their reſpective bodies of troops, conſiſting of ſix thouſand men each, that ſo they might be in readineſs to march forthwith to the aſſiſtance of her Hungarian majeſty: that he was concerting ſuch farther meaſures, as might obviate and diſappoint all the dangerous deſigns and attempts that might be formed or carried on in favour of any unjuſt pretenſions to the prejudice of the houſe of Auſtria in this complicated and uncertain ſtate of things; that during the time when, by reaſon of the approaching concluſion of the preſent parliament, it might be impoſſible for him to have their advice and aſſiſtance, many incidents might ariſe, which might render it neceſſary for him to incur ſtill greater expences for maintaining the Pragmatic Sanction; and that, therefore, in a conjuncture ſo critical, he had thought it proper to lay theſe important conſiderations before them, and to deſire the concurrence of his parliament, in enabling him to contribute, in the moſt effectual manner, to the ſupport of the queen of Hungary, the preventing, the ſubverſion of the houſe of Auſtria, and the fixing the liberties of Europe on the moſt ſolid and permanent oundation."

Affectionate addreſſes were preſented by both houſes, who promiſed that they would effectually ſupport his majeſty againſt all inſults and attacks which might be made on any of his territories, though not belonging to the crown of Great Britain; and that they would contribute, in the moſt effectual manner, to the ſupport of the queen of Hungary, and to the defence of the liberties and independency of Europe.

The parliament having diſpatched the various important affairs for which they met, they were prorogued on the twenty fifth day of April, and afterwards diſſolved by royal proclamation. The king, having appointed a regency, ſet out in May for his German dominions.

The Britiſh armament in the Weſt-Indies had, by this time, begun their hoſtilities. Sir Chaloner Ogle, who had ſailed from Spithead on the ninth of October, was overtaken by a tempeſt in the Bay of Biſcay, by which the fleet, conſiſting of about one hundred and ſeventy ſail, were ſcattered and diſperſed. Notwithſtanding this misfortune, he proſecuted his voyage, and anchored in the neighbourhood of Dominica, with a view of providing himſelf with wood and water in that neutral iſland, where the intended expedition ſuſtained a terrible ſhock in the death of the gallant lord Cathcart, who was carried off by a dyſentry, from which event the command of the land forces devolved upon general Wentworth.

As the fleet was paſſing by the iſland of Hiſpaniola, on its way to Jamaica, four large ſhips of war were diſcovered, and Sir Chaloner immediately detached lord Auguſtus Fitzroy with an equal number to ſpeak with them; but proving to be French, and war not yet being declared againſt that kingdom, they ſeparated in the morning after having kept up a ſmart fire during the whole night. Sir Chaloner in the mean time purſued his courſe to St. Chriſtopher's, the place of general rendezvous, where he was joined by the reſt of the fleet, which had been ſeparated in the late ſtorm. Having thus collected his fleet, he ſailed for Jamaica, by which admiral Vernon being greatly animated, he determined to carry his long meditated deſign of an attack on Carthagena into execution. But the attempt, through the extreme ſtrength of the fortifications, and a miſunderſtanding which aroſe between the admiral and general, miſcarried, and (after having only taken the fort of Bocca Chica) all hopes of reducing Carthagena vaniſhed like a dream. Thus ended an expedition which had alarmed all Europe, and coſt the Engliſh nation an immenſe ſum; but we have too frequently experienced diſappointment and diſgrace from leaders forming ſeparate intereſts and cabals inſtead of uniting in the ſervice of their country.

In the month of July the fleet which, as well as the land forces, was greatly reduced, ſailed again from Jamaica, in order to attack the town of St. Jago de Cuba. Here the troops were landed, but remained totally inactive till the month of November, when general Wentworth, declining the attempt, the ſoldiers were re-embarked and carried back to Jamaica. Thus was diſgrace added to diſgrace.

In the month of October the king returned to England, and on the firſt of December opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech from the throne. But it was ſoon evident that the miniſter's party was greatly weakened, and that Sir Robert ſeemed to totter on the brink of ruin. He well knew that the majority of a ſingle vote might be attended with dangerous conſequences, and he alſo ſaw that his ſafety could only be ſecured by dividing the oppoſition.

A. D. 1742. Sir Robert Walpole, however, determined previouſly to try his ſtrength in the houſe of commons with regard to the diſputed election of Chippenham in Wiltſhire, but had the mortification to find a majority of one voice againſt him. Irritated at this proceeding, he declared he would never more ſit in that houſe, and accordingly, the next day, the king adjourned the parliament to the eighteenth of the following month.

During the interval Sir Robert was created earl of Orford and reſigned all his employments. He now had recourſe to the plan he had formed of dividing the oppoſition, and transferring the popular odium from himſelf to his adverſaries. In order to this, a coalition was propoſed between the diſcontented whigs, and thoſe of the ſame denomination who acted under the miniſtry. Some were gratified with titles and places, and aſſurances given to all that a new ſyſtem of politics would be adopted according to the plan they themſelves ſhould adopt. Mr. Sandys was appointed one of the lords of the treaſury, and chancellor of the exchequer. Lord Harrington was created an earl and and declared preſident of the council. Lord Carteret was made ſecretary of ſtate. Mr. Pultney was ſworn a member of the privy council, and afterwards created earl of Bath. The earl of Winchester was placed at the head of the admiralty in the room of Sir Charles Wager, and the earl of Stair appointed field marſhal of all his majeſty's forces, and ambaſſador extraordinary to the ſtates general.

The firſt happy effect of this change in the miniſtry was a reconciliation between the king and the prince of Wales, who now waited on his majeſty at St. James's attended by a great concourſe of nobility and other perſons of diſtinction. He was received in a very gracious manner, and a guard immediately appointed to attend upon his perſon.

This happy event, together with that of a change in the miniſtry, was celebrated with public rejoicings in many parts of the kingdom. It was alſo expected that a new ſyſtem of adminiſtration would be adopted, but it ſoon appeared that the removal of the late miniſter cauſed no material alteration in the meaſures purſued by the new miniſtry. Indeed, it was evident beyond a doubt, that thoſe who had declaimed the loudeſt for the liberties of this country, had been ſolely actuated by the more ſordid views of ſelf intereſt.

On the 18th of February the parliament met at Weſtminſter purſuant to adjournment, when petitions that had been preſented by the merchants of London and divers cities and corporations, complaining of the loſſes they had ſuſtained by the bad conduct of the war, were taken into conſideration. The parliament touched by their juſt complaints reſolved to purſue the moſt vigourous meaſures for the better protection of the Britiſh commerce in future. Accordingly, a number of frigates were appointed to cruize in the channel, to ſecure the merchant ſhips from the inſults of the Spaniſh privateers. In the mean time, the miniſtry, in order to ſooth the reſentment of the people, and, if poſſible, conciliate their affection, paſſed a bill for excluding certain officers from their ſeats in the houſe of commons. Another bill was paſſed for encouraging the linen manufacture, and a third to prevent the marriage of lunatics. The houſe likewiſe voted the ſubſidies for the ſervice of the current year, and ſixteen thouſand effective men for the aſſiſtance of the queen of Hungary.

By this time the Engliſh miniſtry had come to a reſolution to keep no farther meaſures with France. The conduct of the French admiral in the Mediterranean was ſo ſtrong a demonſtration of the intentions of his court, that all their pretexts to a neutrality were become abſolutely ridiculous.

Admiral Haddock, partly from the fatigues of ſervice and the impaired ſtate of his conſtitution, reſigned the command of the fleet in the Mediterranean to commodore Leſtock, who lately arrived from the Weſt Indies and was ſent with ten ſail of the line to reinforce the Britiſh fleet in the ſtreights. On the change of the miniſtry Leſtock was promoted to the rank of rear admiral of the white, but as it was determined to ſtrike ſome bold ſtroke in the Mediterranean, in the courſe of this ſummer, the chief command of the fleet was beſtowed upon Thomas Matthews, Eſquire, who was promoted to the rank of vice admiral of the red, and appointed his majeſty's miniſter plenepotentiary to all the princes and ſtates of Italy.

No miniſtry perhaps took a more impolitic ſtep than in joining theſe two admirals in command, it being well known, that there had long ſubſiſted between them an inveterate diſlike to each other. Matthews declared, on his appointment, that he accepted the command merely on condition that Leſtock ſhould be ſpeedily recalled. However, the latter was continued in command till the honor of the nation was ſhamefully ſacrificed to the gratification of private reſentment.

Soon after admiral Matthews's arrival in the Mediterranean, he detached captain Norris in the Kingſton of fifty guns, with the duke fire ſhip to burn five Spaniſh gallies which had taken refuge in the Bay of Tropez, a French port in the Mediterranean, and this order was effectually executed.

But no action of this commander proved ſo agreeable to the people of England as that of ſending captain Martin as commodore with a ſquadron of ſhips and bomb-veſſels to Naples, to demand, from the king of the two Sicilies, a promiſe in writing to withdraw his troops from acting in conjunction with thoſe of Spain, and alſo not to give them for the future any kind of aſſiſtance. If this demand ſhould be refuſed, the commodore had orders to bombard the city of Naples. The conſternation of the inhabitants was incredible at the ſight of the formidable force Martin brought with him, and the peremptory manner in which he made the demand: and however his Sicilian majeſty might diſlike this inſult upon his dignity, his private reſentment was obliged to ſubmit to the intereſt of the ſtate, which was in no condition to defend itſelf.

Accordingly, after ſeveral meſſages between the commodore and the duke de Montealegre, the Sicilian miniſter, the latter in his maſter's name gave a written promiſe that his troops ſhould be immediately withdrawn out of Lombardy, and that he ſhould not in any manner whatever aid or aſſiſt thoſe of Spain during the preſent war in Italy. The promiſe was inſtantly performed, and by this bold but ſucceſsful ſtep of the Britiſh admiral the queen of Hungary was ſaved from apparent deſtruction.

Not long after this, Matthews having received intelligence, that the Genoeſe had ſo far favoured the Spaniards as to provide for their uſe magazines of corn at Araſſa, ſent thither captain Martin, who, about the firſt of September, deſtroyed them entirely; while the admiral himſelf took up his ſtation at Hieres Iſlands, where his ſhips lay in an excellent road, and commanded every veſſel that might attempt to enter or quit the harbour of Toulon. The Britiſh fleet being now joined by admiral Rowley, was rather ſuperior to the united ſquadrons of France and Spain; the latter therefore kept cloſe in the harbour.

On the 16th of November, the parliament, being aſſembled, his majeſty acquainted them, that he had augmented the Britiſh troops in the Low-Countries, with ſixteen thouſand Hanoverians and the Heſſian auxiliaries, in order to form ſuch a force, in conjunction with the Auſtrian armies, as might be of ſervice to the common cauſe; he extolled the magnanimity and firmneſs of the queen of Hungary, as well as the reſolute conduct of the king of Sardinia, and was happy in the ſtop that had been put to the Spaniſh invaſion of Italy, to which the Britiſh fleet had in a very eminent degree contributed.

A. D. 1743. The houſe of commons now began to conſider the eſtimates, and ſettle the ſupplies. They voted five hundred and thirty-four thouſand ſeven hundred and ſixty-three pounds for the the pay of the Britiſh troops in Flanders. They fixed the number of land-forces at twenty-three thouſand ſix hundred and ten effective men, for guards, garriſons, and other ſervices; and, for defraying the charge of theſe troops, and other ſervices in Great Britain, the Weſt Indies, Guernſey and Jerſey, they granted the ſum of ſix hundred and forty-ſeven thouſand eight hundred and ſixty two pounds five ſhillings and two pence.

When theſe mattters were adjuſted, his majeſty went to the houſe, on the twenty-fifth of April, and concluded the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he obſerved, "that,, to the end that the Britiſh nation, and the common cauſe might reap the moſt beneficial fruits from the vigorous reſolutions of his parliament, he had, at the requiſition of the queen of Hungary, ordered his army, in conjunction with the Auſtrian troops, to paſs the Rhine, as auxiliaries to her Hungarian majeſty, to oppoſe any dangerous meaſures, that might affect the balance and liberties of Europe, or hinder the re-eſtabliſhment of the public tranquillity from being ſettled on juſt and ſolid foundations: that he had continued a ſtrong ſquadron in the Mediterranean, and another in the Weſt-Indies, in order to proſecute the great work of diſtreſſing his enemies, the Spaniards, and compelling them to agree to ſafe and honourable terms of peace: and that, from the former of theſe ſquadrons, his allies in Italy had lately received, and ſtill continued to receive, the moſt ſeaſonable and effectual ſupport." By his majeſty's order the lord chancellor then prorogued the parliament.

Having formed a reſolution to head his troops in perſon in the approaching campaign, the king, immediately after the prorogation of parliament, ſet out for Germany, attended by his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland and ſeveral officers of diſtinction.

In the mean time the troops which had been aſſembled by the king of Great Britain in the Netherlands, under the command of the earl of Stair, began their march for the Rhine, and in May encamped near Hoeſht on the river Mayne. Their intention was to join the Auſtrian forces under prince Charles of Lorraine; but the manœuvres of the enemy prevented this junction. The marſhal Noailes, having aſſembled a numerous army, paſſed the Rhine, and poſted himſelf on the eaſt ſide of that river above Frankfort. The earl of Stair advanced towards him and encamped on a plain between the river Mayne and the foreſt d'Armſtadt, from which place he made a motion to Aſchaffenburg with an intention to ſecure the navigation of the Upper Mayne, but the enemy, who lay on the other ſide, had taken poſſeſſion of the poſts in ſuch a manner as to intercept all ſupplies. At the ſame time time they found means to cut off all communication by water between Frankfort and the confederates.

On the ninth of June his Britannic majeſty arrived at the camp, where he found his army reduced almoſt to a ſtarving condition, for want of proviſions; inſomuch that having received intelligence that twelve thouſand Hanoverians and Heſſians had reached Hanan, he determined to march thither in order to join thoſe forces and procure proviſions for his army. Accordingly, on the 26th of June, he decamped, but had hardly quitted Aſchaffenburg before it was ſeized by the French, and after marching about three leagues he perceived the enemy to the number of thirty thouſand had paſſed the river and were drawn up in order of battle. Before them lay a narrow paſs, a morafs was in the center, a wood on the left, and the village of Dettingen on their right.

Thus hemmed in, they might eaſily have compelled the confederates either to ſubmit at diſcretion, or to fight at a very great diſadvantage, had not the duke of Gramont, who commanded the enemy, been prompted by the natural fire of his temper, to paſs the defile, upon which a battle immediately enſued.

The French horſe charged with great impetuoſity, and threw ſome regiments of the Britiſh cavalry into confuſion, but the infantry of the allies behaved with ſuch courage and reſolution as ſoon determined the fate of the day; the French were obliged to give way, and repaſs the Mayne with great precipitation, having loſt about ſix thouſand men killed, wounded or taken priſoners.

The allies loſt near three thouſand men in this action. The generals Clayton and Monroy were killed: the duke of Cumberland was ſhot through the calf of the leg: the earl of Albemarle, general Huſke, and ſeveral other officers of diſtinction were wounded. The king expoſed his perſon to a ſevere fire of cannon as well as muſquetry; he rode between the firſt and ſecond lines with his ſword drawn, and encouraged the troops to fight for the honour of their country.

As ſoon as the action was ended, his majeſty continued his march to Hanau, where he was joined by the Heſſian and Hanoverian forces. The two armies continued on different ſides of the river Mayne till the 12th of July, when the French commander receiving intelligence that prince Charles of Lorraine was directing his march towards the confederate army, with an intent to place him between two fires, he reſolved to prevent this deſign by decamping in the night, having firſt deſtroyed his magazines. Nothing effective was done during the remainder of the campaign, and in October the king of England returned to Hanover, and the army ſeparated. The troops in Engliſh pay marched back to the Netherlands; the reſt took the route to their reſpective countries.

Admiral Matthews continued all this time to watch the combined ſquadrons of France and Spain off the harbour of Toulon, and, by turns, to cajole and intimidate the Genoeſe. The cruizers, however, did great damage to the coaſts of the enemy, and made prizes of ſome of their richeſt veſſels. The courts of Verſailles and Madrid having now formed a ſcheme for delivering their fleets from their confinement, Matthews ſent an account of this project to the Engliſh miniſtry, and deſired that an immediate and proper reinforcement might be ſent him.

In the Weſt-Indies, commodore Knowles, by order of Sir Chaloner Ogle, who was left in command on the return of Admiral Vernon, attacked La Guira, on the coaſt of Carraccas, but met with ſuch a warm reception, that he was obliged to abandon the enterprize, and make the beſt of his way for the Dutch iſland Curacoa, where he repaired the damage he had ſuffered. The ſhips being refitted, he made another attempt upon Porto-Cavello, in April, which, like the former, proved abortive.

On the firſt of December the parliament met, when his majeſty informed both houſes of the events of the late campaign in Germany, and concluded with obſerving, "that, as in order to promote the re-eſtabliſhment of the tranquillity of Europe, vigorous and reſolute meaſures were neceſſary, he relied on their zealous, chearful and effectual tual ſupport. Many debates enſued, and great objections were made to the continuing Hanoverian troops in the pay of Great Britain.

A. D. 1744. The diſſentions and diſputes in the Britiſh parliament induced the French miniſtry to believe that the nation was ripe for a revolt. This opinion was confirmed by the aſſertions of their emiſſaries in Great Britain and Ireland. Cardinal de Tencin, who had ſuceeeded Fleury as prime miniſter of France, gave it as his opinion that a deſcent on England might be attended with ſucceſs, and be the means of placing the chevalier de St. George on the throne of that kingdom.

Preparations were therefore made for carrying the ſcheme into execution. Count Saxe, a ſubtle and experienced general, was appointed commander in chief, and the troops for this expedition, which amounted to fifteen thouſand men, began their march to Picardy, while a great number of veſſels were aſſembled for their embarkation at Dunkirk, Calais and Boulogne. It was determined they ſhould land in Kent under convoy of a ſtrong ſquadron equipped at Breſt and commanded by M. de Roquefeuille. Theſe preparations were ſuperintended by Charles Edward, the Pretender's eldeſt ſon, who, in the month of December, had paſſed through Italy in the diſguiſe of a Spaniſh courier; embarked at Final, and landed at Antibes, from whence he proceeded to Paris, where he was indulged with an audience of the French king.

As ſoon as the Britiſh miniſtry received intelligence of the young chevalier's being arrived in France, they at once comprehended the deſtination of the armaments, which had been prepared at Breſt and Boulogne. They therefore ſent orders to Mr. Thompſon, the Engliſh reſident at Paris, to make a remonſtrance to the French miniſtry, on the violation of thoſe treaties, by which the Pretender to the crown of Great Britain was excluded from the territories of France. He was told in reply, that his moſt Chriſtian majeſty would not explain himſelf upon that ſubject, until the king of England ſhould have given ſatisfaction concerning the repeated complaints which had been made to him, touching the infractions of thoſe very treaties, which by his own ſubjects had been ſo frequently violated.

On the 6th of January, Monſieur de Roquefeuille ſailed from Breſt, directing his courſe up the the Engliſh channel, with eighteen ſhips of war. They were preſently deſcried by an Engliſh cruizer, which ran into Plymouth, and the intelligence was diſpatched to the board of admiralty. Sir John Norris was immediately ordered to take the command of the ſquadron at Spithead, with which he ſailed round to the Downs, where being joined by ſome ſhips of the line from Chatham, he found himſelf at the head of a fleet conſiderably ſtronger than that of the enemy.

Several regiments marched to the ſouthern coaſt of England: all governors and commanders were ordered to repair to their reſpective poſts: the forts at the mouth of the Thames and the Medway were put in a poſture of defence; and directions were given to aſſemble the militia of Kent, that in caſe of an invaſion they might be ready to defend the coaſt.

On the 15th of February the king ſent a meſſage to both houſes of parliament, intimating the arrival of the Pretender's ſon in France, the preparations at Dunkirk, and the appearance of a French fleet in the Engliſh channel.

In anſwer to this both houſes joined in an addreſs to his majeſty, declaring their indignation and abhorrence of the inſolent deſign that had been formed againſt his kingdoms; and profeſſing their fixed and determined reſolution, at the hazard of their lives and fortunes, to ſupport his perſon and government, and the proteſtant ſucceſſion in his royal houſe, in oppoſition to the pretender, and all his other enemies whatſoever. Addreſſes of the ſame kind were preſented by the city of London, both univerſities, the principal towns of Great Britain, the clergy, the diſſenting miniſters, the quakers, and almoſt all the corporations and communities in England.

The Habeas Corpus act was ſuſpended for ſix months, and ſeveral perſons of diſtinction were apprehended on ſuſpicion of treaſonable practices; a proclamation was iſſued for putting the law in execution againſt papiſts and non-jurors, who were commanded to retire ten miles from London; and every precaution which prudence could ſuggeſt for ſecuring the peace and tranquillity of the nation, was taken.

In the interim, the French court proceeded with their preparations at Dunkirk and Boulogne, under the eye of the young Pretender; and ſeven thouſand men were actually embarked. M. de Roquefeuille ſailed up the river, as far as Dungeneſs, a promontory on the coaſt of Kent, after having detached M. de Barreil, with five ſhips, to haſten the embarkation at Dunkirk.

While Roquefeuille was at anchor, he perceived, on the twenty-third day of February, the Britiſh fleet under Sir John Norris, doubling the South Foreland, from the Downs; and, though the wind was contrary, taking the opportunity of the tide of flood, to come up and engage the French ſquadron.

A council of war was called, in which it was reſolved to avoid an engagement, weigh anchor at ſunſet, and make the beſt of their way to their own coaſts. This reſolution was accordingly executed; and their eſcape was favoured by a hard gale of wind, which ſprung from the North-Eaſt, at the time of their ſetting ſail, and carried them down the channel, at the rate of four leagues an hour.

This ſtorm which in all probability ſaved their fleet from deſtruction, entirely defeated the deſign of the invaſion: a great number of their tranſports were driven aſhore and ſhattered to pieces; and the reſt were ſo much damaged, that they could not be repaired for a conſiderable time. The Engliſh were now maſters of the ſea, and kept the whole French coaſt in alarm. The deſign, therefore, was totally abandoned; the pretender haſtened to the place of his former reſidence, and the French general returned to Paris.

This diſappointment ſo exaſparated the court of France, that the Britiſh reſident at Paris was given to underſtand they would now proceed to open hoſtilities, and accordingly, a declaration of war was actually publiſhed at Paris on the twentieth day of March. On the thirty-firſt of the ſame month a ſimilar declaration againſt France was publiſhed at London, to the great ſatisfaction of the people, who teſtified their joy by repeated acclamations. France, likewiſe in the beginning of April, declared war againſt the queen of Hungary, who, in May, returned a like declaration againſt that kingdom.

On the fifteenth of May the king went to the houſe of peers, and in a ſpeech acquainted the parliament, liament, "that the French king had declared war againſt him on the moſt injurious as well as fallacious pretences; that in conſequence, he had declared war againſt that monarch; and that in the proſecution of a juſt cauſe he relied on the divine protection and the vigorous ſupport of his parliament. He concluded with expreſſing an earneſt deſire, that the members of both houſes, on their return to their reſpective counties, would be particularly careful, at this critical juncture, to preſerve the peace and tranquillity of the kingdom." The lord chancellor then, by order of his majeſty, prorogued the parliament.

During theſe tranſactions an engagement happened in the Mediterranean between our fleet under the command of admiral Matthews and the combined ſquadrons of France and Spain, which he had ſo long blocked up in the harbour of Toulon. On the ninth of February they were perceived ſtanding out of the road, to the number of twenty-eight ſhips of the line: the Engliſh admiral immediately weighed for Hieres-bay, and on the eleventh part of the fleet were engaged. Matthews in the Namur, and captain Cornwall in the Marlborough, bore down together upon the Spaniſh admiral Don Navarro, whoſe ſhip, the Real, was a firſt rate, mounted with no leſs than one hundred and fourteen guns. Rear-admiral Rowley ſingled out M. de Court, who commanded the Frence ſquadron; ſome of the Engliſh captains followed the example of their commanders; but vice-admiral Leſtock, with his whole diviſion, remained above five miles a-ſtern: and ſeveral captains, who were immediately under the eye of Matthews, behaved in ſuch a manner, as reflected diſgrace on their country.

The Spaniſh admiral's ſhip the Real, being quite diſabled, and like a wreck upon the water, Mr. Matthews ſent a fireſhip to deſtroy her; but the expedient did not take effect. Four Spaniſh ſhips, which had been ſuffered to paſs Leſtock, attacked the fireſhip with ſuch fury, that, before ſhe could reach the Real, ſhe was blown into the air.

The Podea, a ſhip of the line, belonging to the Spaniſh ſquadron, ſtruck to captain Hawke, who ſent a lieutenant to take poſſeſſion of her: ſhe was afterwards retaken by the French ſquadron, but was found ſo diſabled, that they deſerted and left her, and ſhe was next day burned by order of admiral Matthews. Night coming on put an end to the action; and the admiral found his own ſhip ſo much ſhattered, that he was obliged to move his flag on board the Ruſſel, commanded by captain Long. On the morning of the 12th many ſhips of the combined fleets were deſcried from the maſt head: Leſtock gave chace, but as he approached, the commander in chief threw out a ſignal to deſiſt, and afterwards bore away to Port Mahon to refit, while the French ſquadron anchored in the road of Alicant, and Don Navarro made for the harbour of Carthagena. The loſs on the late occaſion was very inconſiderable, except in the death of captain Cornwall of the Marlborough, who aſſiſted the admiral in attacking the Real, and ſuſtained, for ſome time, the whole fire of that floating battery; and who, after giving repeated proofs of the moſt heroic courage, had both his legs carried off by a chain ſhot, which put a period to his life. A noble monument was erected to his memory in Weſtminſter-abbey, by a vote of the Britiſh parliament, and at the public expence; an honour to which he was juſtly entitled from his courageous and gallant behaviour, on this, and ſeveral other occaſions.

As ſoon as the Engliſh fleet reached the iſland of Minorca, Matthews ſuſpended Leſtock, accuſed him of miſbehaviour in the engagement off Toulon, and ſent him priſoner to England.

Theſe two officers had long entertained a moſt implacable hatred and reſentment againſt each other; and to this mutual animoſity was evidently owing the eſcape of the enemy's fleet; for, had Leſtock advanced, as he might eaſily have done, to engage the enemy, in conjunction with Matthews, the combined ſquadrons of France and Spain might have been utterly deſtroyed: on the other hand, had Matthews afterwards permitted Leſtock to continue the chace, and attack the enemy, while retiring in diſorder, the ſame advantage might ſtill have been obtained; but ſuch was their irreconcileable antipathy, that, rather than not gratify their private revenge, they ſacrificed the intereſt of their country, while they tarniſhed their own honour.

It is no wonder that a miſcarriage of ſuch importance ſhould be thought a ſubject worthy the moſt ſtrict enquiry. The commons preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, deſiring that a court-martial might be appointed to try the delinquents. By this time, Leſtock had preferred a charge againſt Matthews, and all the captains of his diviſion, who miſbehaved in the day of battle.

In conſequence of the opinion of the court martial, ſeveral commanders of ſhips were caſhiered; vice admiral Leſtock was honourably acquitted; and admiral Matthews rendered incapable of ſerving for the future in his majeſty's navy. Matthews, it is true, can by no means be juſtified; but Leſtock certainly was more guilty. Yet the latter triumphed on his trial; and the former narrowly eſcaped with his life. Such deciſions are not to be accounted for, except by prejudice and faction.

In the month of June commodore Anſon returned to England, having been abſent three years and nine months, during which he had circumnavigated the terraqueous globe. He had ſurmounted the moſt terrible difficulties, and been ſeparated by ſtreſs of weather at different times from the reſt of the ſhips in his ſquadron. However, his pains and labour were amply compenſated by two moſt fortunate exploits. The firſt was the ſurpriſing the city of Paita, belonging to the Spaniards, towards the equator. This was effected by fifty eight of his own ſeamen, under the command of a lieutenant, who on entering the town through favour of the night, ſet up a loud ſhout, which ſo terrified the inhabitants, that they precipitately abandoned the place, after which the ſailors carried off a large ſum of money that was lodged in the cuſtom houſe, belonging to the Spaniſh merchants, and intended to be ſhipped on board a veſſel in that port. The other fortunate exploit was the capture of the manilla galleon bound for the port of Acapulco, having on board treaſure with other effects to the amount of three hundred and thirteen thouſand pounds ſterling.

On the 28th of November his majeſty opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech to both houſes, in which he ſaid, "that he applauded the conſtancy and reſolution of the queen of Hungary, and the firmneſs and magnanimity of the king of Sardinia; that though the event of the laſt campaign had not entirely anſwered his wiſhes, he determined in conjunction with his allies, and with their effectual ſupport, to proſecute the war, ſo as to produce to an honourable peace; and concluded cluded with recommending unanimity and diſpatch in their proceedings."

Both houſes having preſented addreſſes of thanks to his majeſty, the commons proceeded to conſider the ſupplies; and it now appeared that the new miniſters would purſue the very ſame meaſures, which had been adopted by their predeceſſors. Freſh levies for land and ſea were ordered, and the commons voted ſix millions and a half for the ſervice of the current year, to be raiſed by the land, the malt, and ſalt taxes, the ſinking fund, and an additional duty on foreign wines.

A. D. 1745. The earl of Cheſterfield ſet out for the Hague in the month of January, in the character of ambaſſador extraordinary, to perſuade, if poſſible, the ſtates general to become parties in the war. About the ſame time a quadruple alliance was ſinged at Warſaw, by the queen of Hungary, the king of Poland, and the maritime powers. By this treaty, the king of Poland, as elector of Saxony, confirmed and renewed the guarantee of the Pragmatic Sanction, and promiſed to ſupport it with all his forces. It was further ſtipulated, that, as the kingdom of Bohemia was actually attacked, his Poliſh majeſty ſhould ſend to its defence an army of thirty thouſand auxiliary troops: that his Britannic majeſty and the ſtates general ſhould pay to that prince an annual ſubſidy of one hundred and fifty thouſand pounds ſterling; two thirds to be furniſhed by Great-Britain, and one third by the United Provinces: that, as ſoon as Bohemia and Saxony ſhould be free from danger, his Poliſh majeſty ſhould march ten thouſand men to the Netherlands, or to any other place within the empire, which the king of Great Britain and the ſtates general ſhould think moſt proper; for which a ſubſidy of ninety thouſand pounds ſhould be continued to be paid, according to the former proportions: that if, in conſequence of theſe meaſures, his Poliſh majeſty ſhould draw a war upon himſelf, he ſhould be ſupported by all his allies: that no peace ſhould be made without his conſent, and without procuring for him proper ſatisfaction: and that the empreſs of Ruſſia, the republic of Holland, and all the other powers of Europe, ſhould be invited to accede to this treaty, which was to continue in force even after the war was at an end.

The affairs which engaged the attention of parliament being finiſhed, the ſeſſion was cloſed on the ſecond day of May; and the king, having appointed a regency, immediately ſet out for his German dominions. The face of affairs on the continent were now entirely changed by the death of the emperor Charles VII. The grand duke of Tuſcany, conſort to the queen of Hungary, declared himſelf candidate for the Imperial throne; but his election was warmly oppoſed by the French king and his allies. The grand duke, however, on the ſecond of September, was, by a majority of voices, declared king of the Romans, and emperor of Germany at Frankfort.

Though the king of France could not prevent the elevation of the grand duke to the Imperial throne, he reſolved to humble the houſe of Auſtria by making a conqueſt of the Netherlands. Accordingly, a prodigious army was aſſembled there under the auſpices of count Saxe; and his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, with the dauphin, arriving in the camp, they inveſted the ſtrong town of Tournay. The garriſon conſiſted of eight thouſand Dutch commanded by the old baron Dorth, who determined to make a vigorous defence.

The allied army being aſſembled at Soignies, the duke of Cumberland aſſumed the chief command, and though their force was greatly inferior to that of the enemy, they reſolved to march to the relief of Tournay. Accordingly, they advanced to Leuſe, took poſt at Maulbre in ſight of the French army, and extended from the village of Antoine to a large wood beyond Vazon, having Fontenoy in their front. The French, in the interim, had compleated their batteries, and made the moſt formidable preparations for the reception of the allies.

On the 30th of April, about ten in the morning, the duke of Cumberland began the attack; a briſk cannonade enſued, and about nine both armies were engaged. The Britiſh infantry commanded by lieutenant-general Sir John Ligonier drove the French beyond their lines; but the left wing of the allies failing in the attack on the village of Fontenoy, and the cavalry forbearing to advance on the flanks, they retreated in ſome diſorder occaſioned by the warm and inceſſant fire of the French batteries. They rallied, however, and returning to the charge with redoubled ardour, repulſed the enemy to their camp with great ſlaughter; but being wholly unſupported by the other wing, and expoſed both in front and flank to a dreadful fire, which did great execution, about three in the afternoon the duke was obliged to make the neceſſary diſpoſitions for a retreat, which was effected in tolerable order. The battle was fought with the utmoſt obſtinacy, and the ſlaughter on both ſides was very great. The allies loſt about twelve thouſand men, among whom were lieutenant-general Campbel, major-general Ponſonby, and many officers of inferior rank. The victory coſt the French almoſt as many lives, and though the attack was judged raſh and precipitate, the Britiſh and Hanoverian troops fought with ſuch intrepidity and perſeverance, that if they had been properly ſupported by the Dutch forces, and their flanks covered by the cavalry, the French, in all probability, muſt have abandoned the ſiege. The duke of Cumberland left his ſick and wounded to the humanity of the victors, and retiring to Aith, encamped in an advantageous ſituation at Leſſines. The conquerors purſued their good fortune, till having reduced not only Tournay, but the greateſt part of the Auſtrian Netherlands, the French king returned to Paris, which he entered in triumph. On the 12th of October the duke of Cumberland returned to England, and ſoon after the allied armies repaired to their reſpective winter quarters.

The campaign in Italy was far from proving favourable either to the queen of Hungary or her ally the king of Sardinia. The Spaniards entered the Milaneſe with very little oppoſition. They took the ſtrong citadel of Tortona, reduced Parma, Placentia, Pavia, and the city of Milan. In fact, by the month of October the Auſtrian territories in Italy were wholly ſubdued, and the king of Sardinia was ſtripped of all his dominions; notwithſtanding which he continued firm and true to his engagements, and deaf to all propoſals of ſeparate accommodation.

During the courſe of this year, the Britiſh navy performed ſeveral ſervices of the utmoſt importance to the common cauſe in general, as well as to Great Britain in particular. In the Mediterranean, admiral Rowley had ſucceeded Matthews in the command. He had bombarded Savona, Genoa, Final, St. Remo, with Baſtia, the capital of Corſica, and made prizes of ſeveral Spaniſh ſhips; but he could not prevent the arrival of the rich Havannah ſquadron at Corunna.

In the Eaſt Indies, commodore Barnet took a great number of French ſhips richly laden; and commodore Townſend, in the neighbourhood of Martinico, found means to intercept about thirty ſhips belonging to the enemy, under convoy of four ſhips of war, two of which were deſtroyed.

Very extraordinary ſucceſs alſo attended the Engliſh privateers. But the moſt important atchievement was the reduction of Louiſburgh, the capital of Cape Breton in North America, a place of great conſequence, which the French had fortified in a very ſtrong manner, being the center and defence of their fiſhery.

During theſe tranſactions, a new ſcene engaged the attention of the Engliſh miniſtry. The ſon of the chevalier de St. George, fired by the inſinuations of ſome zealous partizans, who pretended that the nation in general was diſaffected to the reigning family, determined to make one more effort for aſcending the throne of England. At the ſame time he was amuſed by France with a promiſe of powerful ſuccours; but this was merely to encourage an attempt of the kind in order to embarraſs the Engliſh government, and divert their attention from the war on the continent.

Charles being furniſhed with a ſupply of money and arms by Lewis, embarked on board a frigate, accompanied by ſome Iriſh and Scotch adventurers, and on the 23d of July, reached the weſtern iſles of Scotland, and landing on the coaſt of Lochaber, was ſoon joined by a number of mountaineers, under their reſpective chiefs. Had government acted with vigour on the firſt intelligence of his arrival, the attempt muſt have been cruſhed in the bud; but it indeed appeared ſo romantic, that the nation in general could ſcarcely give credit to it.

When the intelligence was confirmed, Sir John Cope, who commanded the forces in Scotland, ſet forward without loſs of time. His orders were to proceed directly and attack the rebels, who were ſuppoſed to be lying on the weſtward of the Chain, in the neighbourhood of Glenſinnan, where their ſtandard was erected. But receiving intelligence that they had taken poſſeſſion of a very ſtrong paſs, which lay on the eaſt ſide of the chain, and commanded the road that led to Fort Auguſtus, he called a council of war, who agreed in opinion, that it would be moſt expedient to change their rout and march to Inverneſs.

The young chevalier, on the fourth day of September, entered Perth, where his army was greatly increaſed. The marquis of Tullibardine had ſent him ſeveral reinforcements, which he had raiſed among the tenants of the Athol eſtate; and he was alſo joined by lord George Murray, lord Nairn, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction with their followers.

Being thus conſiderably augmented, the rebel army croſſed the Forth, took poſſeſſion of Edinburgh without oppoſition, with a view of ſeizing the treaſure belonging to the two banks of that city, but were diſappointed by its having been conveyed into the caſtle, which was defended by a garriſon under command of general Gueſt.

Cope, having taken ſhipping at Aberdeen, had, by this time, landed at Dunbar with his army; and, on the nineteenth of September, he began his march towards Edinburgh, and encamped at night between that city and Haddington. Here being joined by the two regiments of dragoons, who had retired on the approach of the rebels to the capital, he immediately marched towards their army in order to give them battle. On the twentieth he encamped in the neighbourhood of Preſton-pans; but the rebels did not wait for him to begin the attack, for early the next morning the young pretender charged at the head of the Highlanders with ſuch impetuoſity, that the king's troops were ſoon broke and entirely routed. At the firſt onſet the dragoons fled with great precipitation, but the chief part of the infantry, who made a vigorous ſtand, were either killed or taken. Five hundred of the king's forces fell on the field of battle, among whom was the gallant colonel Gardiner, who diſdained to ſave his life at the expence of his honor: when abandoned by his own regiment of dragoons, he alighted from his horſe, and fought among the infantry until he fell covered with wounds,

This victory was of great importance to the rebels, who thereby procured arms, a train of artillery, and a conſiderable ſum of money, as the tents, cannon, baggage, and military cheſt of the royal party fell into their hands. Large ſupplies of money, artillery and ammunition were ſent from France by ſingle ſhips; and the number of their followers encreaſed daily, though the more opulent inhabitants of Scotland were averſe to the chevalier's family and pretenſions. The miniſtry were no ſooner informed of Cope's defeat, than they ſent orders for three battalions of guards, and ſeven regiments of infantry to return from Flanders; and theſe being joined by ſix thouſand Dutch troops lately arrived in England, began their march to Newcaſtle under the command of general Wade.

His majeſty, had before this time, returned to England, and received the moſt warm and affectionate addreſſes from the city, the lieutenancy, and the merchants of London, congratulating him on the reduction of Cape Breton, expreſſing their abhorrence and deſtation of the preſent unnatural rebellion, and promiſing to exert their utmoſt endeavours in defending his majeſty's perſon and government, and in ſupporting the public credit of the nation.

Similar addreſſes were alſo preſented by almoſt every town, county, and corporation in the kingdom. Many of the principal nobility and gentry offered their ſervices in the military capacity, and regiments were raiſed in the different counties wherein their reſpective eſtates were ſituated.

The arrival of the duke of Cumberland, who returned about this time from Holland, contributed to quicken the general ſpirit of loyalty; and all ranks of men ſeemed unanimouſly to concur in expreſſing their zeal for the preſent royal family; and the protection of their own rights civil and religious.

Charles having, by this time, collected about ſix thouſand men, paſſed the weſtern border of England, and inveſted Carliſle, which ſurrendered in three days. General Wade advanced from Newcaſtle in order to relieve that place, but hearing on his march that it had ſurrendered, he returned to his former ſtation.

The rebels, having left a garriſon in Carliſle, ſet out on the third of March for Penrith, from whence they proceeded to Lancaſter, which they entered on the twenty-eighth of the ſame month, after which the whole army took poſſeſſion of Manchester. But they now found themſelves terribly deceived in their views; for, inſtead of the multitudes, they expected to join them, they could raiſe but two hundred, which being formed into a regiment, were put under the command of Mr. Townly.

The train bands of London were now reviewed by his majesty, the country regiments were completed, the volunteers were employed in the exercise of arms, and the whole kingdom united firmly against the invader.

The king had by this time given directions for the raising another army, consisting of three regiments of cavalry and fifteen of infantry, to be commanded by the duke of Cumberland, and, under him, by Sir John Ligonier. This army was afterwards encreased to thirteen thousand, and took post at Litchfield, which was deemed the most proper place for intercepting the rebels in their march to the southward.

In the beginning of December the rebels left Manchester, and advanced to Congleton; but suddenly they turned off to the left, and marched into Derby, as if they intended to avoid the duke, and proceed immediately to London.

As soon as the citizens were informed, that, notwithstanding the vigilance and activity of the duke, the rebels had it in their power to advance to the metropolis, many of them were filled with the most dreadful apprehensions. Even the ministry seemed to be considerably alarmed. A council was held at St. James's, and a resolution taken, that the standard of England should be erected on Finchley Common, for assembling an army, to be commanded by the king in person, and under him, by field mareschal lord Stair: that all the regular troops about London, with the associated regiments, the trained bands, and the militia, should march to that camp; and that a numerous train of artillery should be drawn out of the Tower for the use of the forces. It was owing to these vigorous resolutions, that the pretender altered his opinion, and instead of advancing to London, determined to return into Scotland, where he heard his affairs had taken a very favourable turn.

Hereupon, after a very short stay in the town of Derby, he began his march early in the morning; and though Wade with his army had, for some time, been at Doncaster, and consequently nearer Manchester than the rebels, yet the latter retreated with such amazing rapidity, that they had almost reached Preston, before Wade had advanced to Wakefield.

Charles reached Carlisle on the 19th, and, after reinforcing the garrison of that place, crossed the rivers Edin and Solway into Scotland.

On the 21st of December the duke of Cumberland with his whole army invested Carlisle, and, on the thirtieth, the garrison surrendered at discretion.

Thus having pursued the rebels to the northern verge of England, and retaken the only place they were masters of, his royal highness returned to London, and the prisoners, amounting to four hundred, were confined in different jails.

A. D. 1746. After a very fatiguing march the rebels reached Glasgow, from whence they continued their route to Stirling, where they were joined by some forces assembled by lord Lewis Gordon and John Drummond. On the 13th of January, general Hawley, who had assembled a considerable body of forces at Edinburgh, advanced to Linlithgow. Next day the rebels rendezvoused at Falkirk, and on the 17th were perceived in full march to attack the king's forces. The enemy had taken possession of a hill on the right, and Hawley, in order to drive them from this eminence, sent two regiments of dragoons to attack them; but the first volley of the rebels broke their ranks, and they retreated with precipitation; and falling in among the infantry, put them also in confusion. The rebels followed their success, and the royal army, after making one irregular discharge, fled in the utmost confusion, leaving the field of battle, with part of their tents and artillery to the enemy. It was now judged expedient to send a commander to the army in Scotland, in whom the soldiers could place some confidence; and the duke of Cumberland was chosen for this purpose.

His royal highness, on the thirty-first of January, put himself at the head of the troops at Edinburgh, consisting of thirteen regiments of infantry, five regiments of dragoons, one regiment of light horse, and fifteen hundred highlanders from Argyleshire, under the command of colonel Campbell. On the last day of January he began his march to Linlithgow, and the enemy, who had renewed the siege of Stirling-castle, not only abandoned that enterprize, but after blowing up the magazines, crossed the Forth with the utmost precipitation.

In the mean time the duke, having secured the important posts of Stirling and Perth with the Hessian battalions, advanced with the army to Aberdeen, where he was joined by the duke of Gordon, the earls of Aberdeen and Findlater, and other persons of distinction,

A sloop of war which the rebels had surprized near Montrose was about this time retaken, with a considerable sum of money and a large quantity of arms on board, which she had brought from France for the service of the Pretender.

On the eighth of April the duke left Aberdeen, and arriving at Nairn, where he halted to refresh his men, he received advice that the enemy had burnt Fort Augustus, and marched from Inverness to Culloden, about nine miles distant from the royal army to give him battle. The same night, however, the rebels marched with an intent to surprise the duke's army before day light; but this scheme proving abortive, they returned to Culloden, resolving in that station to wait for the royal army. On the 16th the duke decamped between four and five in the morning, and after marching about eight miles, perceived the advanced guard of the rebels amounting to eight thousand men, drawn up in order of battle, in thirteen divisions, supplied with some pieces of artillery and posted behind some old walls and hutts in a line with Culloden house.

The duke immediately formed the royal army into three lines and about noon the engagement began. The artillery of the rebels was ill served, and did very little execution; but that of the king's troops made dreadful havock among the enemy. Impatient of this fire, the front line advanced to the charge, and about five hundred of the clans attacked the duke's left wing with their usual impetuosity. One regiment was disordered by the weight of this column; but two battalions advancing from the second line, supported the first, and soon put a stop to their career, by a smart fire, that killed a great number. At the same time, Kingston's and Hawley's horse pulled down the park wall that covered their flank, and falling in among them, sword in hand, made great havock.

The French piquets, on the left, stood inactive during the engagement, and afterwards surrendered themselves prisoners of war. In about thirty minutes after the whole rebel army was totally defeated, and the field covered with thier dead bodies. Three thousand were slain on the spot and in the pursuit.

The earl of Kilmarnock was taken in the field of battle: the lord Balmerino surrendered himself a few days after. The marquis of Tullibardine likewise followed his example. The earl of Cromartie and his son had been taken prisoners before the engagement. This victory put a final stroke to the rebellion; but his royal highness continued in the north some time in order to give proper orders for securing the tranquillity of the country; then, after receiving the submission of almost all the clans and chieftains, he returned to London, which he entered with universal acclamations.

The vanquished adventurer, upon his retreat from the field of battle, held a conference with some of his principal adherents, but finding his affairs desperate, he desired each of them to consult his own safety, while he himself, assuming various disguises, continued to wander about, a wretched fugitive, for the space of four months, during which, he underwent an amazing series of dangers, hardships, and miseries. At last, on the tenth day of August, he embarked, with about thirty of his followers, on board a French frigate, and arrived in safety at a small town near Morlaix in Britany.

The government were now resolved to make examples of some of those who had involved their country in such calamity and confusion, but to make the number as few as possible. An act was passed for attainting the earls of Kilmarnock and Cromartie, and the lords Balmerino and Lovat. The three former were tried, found guilty, and received sentence of death. Cromartie was afterwards pardoned as to life, but all his estates were confiscated.

On the 18th of August Kilmarnock and Balmerino were executed on Tower-hill. The former died with marks of penitence and contrition, but the latter viewed the implements of death with the most careless air and seemed to glory in his sufferings. Lovat was tried in the spring of the succeeding year, found guilty, and beheaded on Tower-hill. Courts were opened in different parts of the kingdom for the trial of the rebels of inferior rank, fifty of whom were condemed and executed, some were pardoned, and the greater number were transported to the plantations.

While England was thus engaged in crushing a rebellion at home, the French king, with his general the count de Saxe, took the field in the latter end of April, at the head of a numerous army, and advanced towards the allies, intrenched to the number of forty thousand, behind the Demer, under the conduct of the Austrian general Bathiana, who retired before them and took post in the neighbourhood of Breda.

Such was the amazing progress of the French arms under the conduct of that consummate general, count Saxe, that not only four strong towns in Dutch Brabant were rapidly and successively reduced; but by the middle of July, Lewis was absolute master of Flanders, Brabant, and Hainault. Namur soon followed the fate of the former places. Mean while the allied army lay encamped at Maestricht, where they were joined by Sir John Ligonier with some British and Bavarian battalions. Prince Charles of Lorrain, who commanded the confederate army, now determined to give the enemy battle; but finding, on his advance, marshal Saxe posted so advantageously at Tongres, he thought proper to return to Maestricht.

Count Saxe being by this time considerably reinforced, determined to bring the confederates to an engagement. The allies, perceiving his intention, drew up their forces in order of battle, and made preparations for giving him a warm reception. On the first of October the enemy advanced in three columns, and a terrible cannonading began about noon, which lasted two hours. Prince Waldeck, who commanded the left wing was then attacked with great fury, and after a brave defence over-powered by numbers. In a word, the allies were assaulted with such resistless impetuosity, that they were obliged to abandon their posts, and retreat towards Maestricht with the loss of five thousand men, and thirty pieces of artillery. This action terminated the campaign in the Netherlands. The allies passing the Maese, took up their winter quarters in the dutchies of Limburg and Luxemburgh, while the French cantoned their troops in the places which they had newly conquered.

On the 18th of November the parliament met, when the king in the course of his speech having represented the necessity of very considerable supplies in consequence of the unavoidable accidents of the war; affectionate addresses were presented by both houses, and the commons voted nine millions, four hundred and twenty five thousand pounds for the services of the ensuing year.

A. D. 1747. To frustrate the ambitious designs of France, the allies determined to assemble a powerful army in the Netherlands. The duke of Cumberland assumed the chief command of the confederate forces for the ensuing campaign. In the latter end of March he took the field, and fixed his head quarters at the village of Filberg: the prince of Waldeck, with the Dutch troops, were posted at Breda, and marshal Bathiani near Venlo. The allied army consisted of one hundred and twenty thousand men.

In the month of April Count Saxe took the field at the head of one hundred thousand men, and in a very short time completed the reduction of all Dutch Flanders.

His royal highness now took post between the Great and Little Nethes, by which he covered Bergen-op-zoom and Maestricht. About the latter end of May the French king arrived at Brussels, and Saxe then determined to undertake the siege of Maestricht. He advanced towards Louvain, and the confederates perceiving his intention, put their army into motion to take post between that town and the enemy. On the 20th of July, the confederates drew up in order of battle, having in the front of their left wing the village of Laffeldt, in which they posted several battalions of British infantry. Next morning the enemy's infantry marched down the hill in one column, and attacked the village of Laffeldt, which was resolutely defended, till the allies being over-powered by numbers, the French maintained their footing in the village, after it had been three times lost and carried. A most vigorous effort was then made by order of the duke to annoy the flanks of the enemy, and victory for some time seemed ready to declare for the confederates; when the fortune of the day took a sudden turn, through the dastardly behaviour of the Dutch, who turned their backs and flying at full gallop, overturned five battallions of infantry belonging to the allies corps de reserve. In all probability the defeat would have been total, had not Sir John Ligonier at the head of three British regiments of dragoons, and a few squadrons of Imperial horse charged the whole line of French cavalry with ſuch impetuoſity, that he ſtopped their career, and enabled the duke to effect a retreat to Maeſtricht. Sir John himſelf was taken priſoner, but the regiments he commanded retired in good order. The next effort of the enemy was the ſiege of Bergen-op-zoom, which alſo fell a prey to the conquerors, partly through the proweſs of their commanders, and partly through the inactivity of the governor, who, at the time of the moſt vigorous aſſault, was aſleep in his quarters; to the cowardice or ſluggiſhneſs of the Dutch may be juſtly imputed many of the failures of this campaign, at the cloſe of which the duke embarked for England.

In the courſe of this year the Britiſh cruizers were ſo diligent and fortunate, that they took no leſs than ſix hundred and forty-four prizes from the French and Spaniards.

Vice admiral Anſon and rear Admiral Warren were ſucceſsful againſt a fleet of the enemy deſtined to act in America. They fell in with them off Cape Finiſterre, and in conſequence of a defeat, took a fleet of merchantmen that was under their convoy, on board of which there was immenſe treaſure. Admiral Hawke alſo took ſix French ſhips of the line in an engagement off the coaſt of Britany, with a conſiderable number of merchantmen, and conducted his prizes ſafe to England. Soon after theſe tranſactions, Admiral Anſon was created a peer, and the admirals Warren and Hawke were honoured with the order of the Bath.

A. D. 1748. On the cloſe of the ſeſſion of parliament his majeſty acquainted both houſes that the preliminaries of a general peace were actually ſigned at Aix-la-Chapelle, by the miniſters of Great Britain, France, and the United Provinces; and that a general reſtitution of the conqueſts which had been made during the war was the baſis of this accommodation. Immediately after the prorogation of parliament, his majeſty, having appointed a regency to govern in his abſence, ſet out for his German dominions.

In the month of March in this year the duke of Cumberland had aſſembled the allied forces in the neighbourhood of Breda; but notwithſtanding the magnificent promiſes which had been made by the United Provinces, and the court of Vienna, they did not amount by far to ſo conſiderable a number, as might have been expected. The French, therefore, whoſe numbers were greatly ſuperior, were enabled to inveſt Maeſtricht without oppoſition: and accordingly, on the third day of April, they opened their trenches before that place.

The garriſon conſiſted of Imperial and Dutch troops, under the command of the baron D'Aylva, who defended the place with the utmoſt ſpirit and reſolution. He annoyed the beſiegers in repeated ſallies; but they were reſolved to overcome all oppoſition, and carried on their approaches with indefatigable perſeverance. They attacked the covered way, in which they actually made a lodgment, after an obſtinate diſpute, which coſt them two thouſand men, when a courier arrived from the duke of Cumberland with advice that the preliminary articles of peace had been ſigned at Aix-la-Chapelle on the 19th of April, upon which all hoſtilities were ſuſpended.

During theſe tranſactions, admiral Boſcawen, who commanded a powerful armament in the Eaſt-Indies, undertook the ſiege of Pondicherry; but finding the forces naval and military reduced by ſickneſs, and the rainy ſeaſon approaching, he ordered the artillery and ſtores to be re-embarked, and on the ninth of October raiſed the ſiege, after ſuſtaining great loſs aggravated by the mortification of ſeeing ſeveral ſhips with upwards of twelve hundred men periſh in a violent hurricane on the coaſt of Coromandel.

The plenipotentiaries ſtill continued at Aix-la-Chapelle, adjuſting all the articles of the definitive treaty, which, at length, was concluded on the ſeventh day of October. It was founded on former treaties, which was now expreſsly confirmed, from that of Weſtphalia to the laſt concluded at London and Vienna.

It was covenanted by the contracting parties, that all priſoners on each ſide ſhould be mutually releaſed without ranſom, and all conqueſts reſtored: that the dutchies of Parma, Placentia, and Guaſtalla, ſhould be ceded as a ſettlement to the infant Don Philip, and the heirs male of his body; but in caſe of his aſcending the throne of Spain, or of the two Sicilies, or his dying without male iſſue, that they ſhould revert to the houſe of Auſtria: that the king of Great Britain ſhould, immediately after the ratification of this treaty, ſend two perſons of rank and diſtinction, to reſide in France, as hoſtages, until reſtitution ſhould be made of Cape Breton, and all the other conqueſts which his Britannic majeſty ſhould have made in the Eaſt or Weſt Indies, before or after the preliminaries were ſigned: that the aſſiento contract, with the article of the annual ſhip, ſhould be confirmed for four years, during which, the enjoyment of that privilege had been ſuſpended ſince the commencement of the preſent war: that Dunkirk ſhould remain fortified on the land ſide, and towards the ſea continue on the footing of former treaties. All the contracting powers became guarantees to the king of Pruſſia for the dutchy of Sileſia, and the county of Glatz, as he then poſſeſſed them; and they likewiſe engaged to maintain the empreſs queen of Hungary and Bohemia in the poſſeſſion of her hereditary dominions, according to the pragmatic ſanction. The other articles regarded the forms and time fixed for the mutual reſtitutions, as well as for the termination of hoſtilities in different parts of the world.

But the right of Britiſh ſubjects to navigate in the American ſeas without being ſubject to ſearch was not once mentioned; though in fact this claim was the original ſource of the war between Great Britain and Spain. Theſe and other diſputes were left to the diſcuſſion of Commiſſaries.

His Britannic majeſty had, by this time, returned to England, and the parliament meeting on the twenty-ninth day of November, he made a ſpeech to both houſes, importing, that the definitive treaty of peace had been ſigned by all the parties concerned in the war: that he had made the moſt effectual proviſion for ſecuring the rights and intereſts of his ſubjects, and for procuring to his allies the beſt terms and conditions, that the ſituation of affairs would admit: that he took much ſatisfaction in being able to tell them, that he had found a good diſpoſition in all the parties engaged in the war, to bring this negotiation to a happy concluſion: that from theſe circumſtances, they might promiſe themſelves a long enjoyment of the bleſſings of a peace, provided they made a right uſe and improvement of it: that as great a progreſs had been made in reducing the public expences, as the nature of the caſe would allow; and he only deſired them to grant him ſuch ſupplies as might might be requiſite for the current ſervice of the year, for their own ſecurity, and for fulfilling ſuch engagements as had been already contracted, and laid before them: that times of tranquillity were moſt proper for leſſening the national debt, and ſtrengthening themſelves againſt future events; and he muſt recommend to them, as the moſt effectual means for theſe purpoſes, the improving of the public revenue, and the maintaining the naval force of the kingdom in due ſtrength and vigour: that thoſe brave men, who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the ſervice of their country, were certainly proper objects of parliamentary favour and protection; and he hoped they would deem it their duty, as well as intereſt, to convert their moſt ſerious attention towards the advancing of commerce, and cultivating the arts of peace.

This ſpeech was anſwered by loyal and affectionate addreſſes from both houſes; though that of the lower was not carried without a violent oppoſition.

A. D. 1749. A ſcheme was now formed by many perſons of diſtinction for the ſettlement of a new colony in Nova Scotia in order to diffuſe the benefits of population and agriculture, and improve the fiſhery of that extenſive coaſt. This patriotic ſcheme met with the ſucceſs it deſerved, for it being honoured with the royal ſanction, and proper encouragement being given to ſuch as had lately been diſmiſſed the public ſervice, a vaſt number of families engaged to go to this new ſettlement, and fix their habitations there. Soon after their arrival, a town was planned and expeditiouſly finiſhed at the head of Chebucto harbour, when it was divided into lots and called Halifax, in honour of the noble earl of that title, who was the original projector of the ſcheme. The honourable Edward Cornwallis was appointed governor of this infant colony.

The parliament meeting on the ſixteenth day of November, his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he ſaid, that it was with a particular pleaſure that he met them, at a time when the re-eſtabliſhment of a general peace had reſtored to his people the bleſſings of quiet and tranquillity: that the good effects reſulting from hence were already apparent in the flouriſhing condition of commerce, and the riſe of public credit, which naturally laid the foundation for an increaſe of ſtrength, and of laſting proſperity to his kingdoms: that he had not failed, during the courſe of this ſummer, to avail himſelf of every opportunity to cement and preſerve the peace; and that it was, and ſhould be, his firm reſolution to do every thing in his power to preſerve it inviolable, and religiouſly to adhere to the engagements he had entered into.

Both houſes of parliament having preſented very dutiful addreſſes to his majeſty in anſwer to this ſpeech, the commons proceeded to take into conſideration the eſtimates for the enſuing year, and voted the neceſſary ſupplies, ſoon after which the parliament was prorogued.

A. D. 1750. About two months before the cloſe of the ſeſſion, the inhabitants of the metropolis were thrown into the utmoſt conſternation, by two ſhocks of an earthquake; the firſt on the eighth day of February, between twelve and one o'clock in the afternoon, was felt all over the cities of London and Weſtminſter, and parts adjacent; in many places the waters were agitated to a very conſiderable degree.

At half an hour after five o'clock, on the morning of the eighth of March, the town was alarmed a ſecond time, by a ſhock more ſevere than the former, attended with a hollow ruſtling noiſe, as if cauſed by wind, and the violence of it awaked numbers of people out of their ſleep; but providentially no miſchief happened, except the throwing down ſome chimnies, and damaging ſome old houſes. The ſhock was ſo violent in ſome places, that the people ran from their beds and houſes almoſt naked, in the utmoſt confuſion. There was obſerved preceding the ſhock, a continual, though confuſed lightning, till within a minute or two of its being felt, the flaſhes of which were very ſtrong.

The ſhock was felt in Eſſex, Kent and Surry, as well as in moſt parts of Middleſex; and the panic, which was univerſal in the four counties, was conſiderably increaſed, by the ridiculous prediction of an enthuſiaſtic ſoldier, who boldly propheſied, that the next ſhock would happen in the night between the ſeventh and eighth of April, and lay the whole cities of London and Weſtminſter in ruins. Abſurd as this prognoſtication muſt ſeem to perſons of philoſophy and reflection, it had an amazing effect on the populace, inſomuch, that multitudes abandoned their houſes, and retired into the country; and in the evening of the 7th of April, the fields adjacent to the metropolis were crouded with people, who continued there during the whole night in the moſt alarming ſituation, till the light of the morning diſſipated their fears, and convinced them of the fallacy of the prognoſtication.

Soon after this alarm, a very extraordinary accident happened at the ſeſſions of the Old Bailey. The putrified air adhering to the cloaths of the malefactors ſpread a peſtilential fever among the audience. The lord mayor of London, one alderman, two of the judges, ſeveral lawyers, and the greater part of the jury, loſt their lives by this peſtilential vapour.

This melancholy cataſtrophe occaſioned orders to be given for erecting a ventilator on the leads of the jail of Newgate, in order to extract the foul air, and cauſe a circulation of freſh to prevent, if poſſible, the like accident in future.

A. D. 1751. His majeſty returned from his German dominions in the month of November, and on the ſeventeenth day of January opened the parliament with a ſpeech, in which he acquainted both houſes with his having concluded a treaty with the king of Spain, whereby ſuch particular differences as could not be ſettled by a general treaty had been amicably adjuſted, and concluded with an exhortation to unanimity, the improving the trade and commerce of the nation, and the putting the laws in force againſt the diſturbers of the internal peace and police of the kingdom. On this ſpeech, loyal and affectionate addreſſes were preſented to the throne, by both houſes.

The ſupplies demanded this year by the miniſtry amounting to nearly five millions, ſeveral of the motions were oppoſed with the utmoſt force of argument by Mr. Pitt, Sir George Lyttleton, and Mr. Grenville; but the power of numbers prevailed, and the miniſtry carried every thing they propoſed.

During the courſe of this ſeſſion, the nation ſuſtained a terrible blow in the death of the prince of Wales, who expired on the tenth day of March, about ten in the evening, in the 45th year of his age. He had caught cold about three weeks before in his gardens at Kew; and having neglected, through hurry of buſineſs, to have it removed, it was ſtill farther encreaſed by his coming very warm from the houſe of peers with the windows of his chair open.

A pleuriſy was the conſequence of this cold, which his phyſicians, however, were far from apprehending to be mortal; and upon the application of proper remedies, he was even thought to be in a fair way of recovery, till the very hour before his departure, when a large abſceſs upon his lungs, which had been gathering, was ſuppoſed to burſt, and to be the immediate cauſe of his death.

He was a lover and very munificent patron of the liberal arts, an unſhaken friend to merit, and warmly attached to the intereſt of his country.

An almoſt total extinction of party ſpirit was the conſequence of the death of the prince of Wales. The tender affection expreſſed by the king towards the princeſs and her children, and the dutiful ſubmiſſion which they ſhewed to him, made ſuch an impreſſion on the minds of the people in general, that all party-diſtinctions ſeemed at once to be annihilated.

Among the acts paſſed this ſeſſion of parliament was one for regulating the commencement of the year, and correcting the calendar agreeable to the Gregorian computation which had been long adapted by moſt other kingdoms. It was by this ſtatute enacted that the year ſhould for the future begin on the firſt of January, and that the eleven intermediate and nominal days between the ſecond and fourteenth of September enſuing ſhould be for that year omitted. By this correction the equinoxes and ſolſtices will happen nearly on the ſame nominal days on which they fell at the council of Nice in the year 325.

The king went to the houſe of peers on the 25th day of June, where, after having thanked the parliament for the prudence and diſpatch with which they had conducted the public buſineſs, he ordered them to be prorogued to the thirteenth day of Auguſt. His Swediſh majeſty paid the debt of nature this year, and was ſucceeded by Adolphus Frederic duke of Holſtein Euſtin.

On the 14th of November the parliament of Great Britain was opened at Weſtminſter with a ſpeech from the throne, in which his majeſty informed them, that he had, in conjunction with the ſtates, concluded a treaty with the king of Poland, elector of Saxony. He added, that the untimely death of the prince of Orange had occaſioned no change in the ſtate of affairs in Holland; and that he had received the ſtrongeſt aſſurances from the ſtates of their firm reſolution to maintain the intimate union and friendſhip happily ſubſiſting between him and theſe ancient and natural allies to his crown. He concluded with exhorting both houſes to conſider ſeriouſly of ſome effectual method for ſuppreſſing thoſe atrocious crimes of robbery and violence then ſo frequent about the capital, proceeding in a great meaſure from that profligacy, irreligion and diſſipation which had been extended to an uncommon degree, to the diſhonour of the nation, and prejudice of the ſubjects in geral.

A. D. 1752. A petition was preſented to the commons on the 20th of March, by the merchants of London, who alledged, that ſeveral foreigners had, of late years, been induced to come over to England, in order to obtain private acts of parliament for their naturalization, with a view to gain ſome advantages to themſelves in point of trade, particularly to avoid the payment of the duties of aliens on the goods and merchandizes which they imported from foreign parts into this kingdom; and that having obtained ſuch acts, they returned back to their own country, where they conſtantly reſided, and conſequently bore no part of the public taxes, nor, in any manner, contributed towards the ſupport of the ſtate, or at all anſwered the intention of the legiſlature. They, therefore, prayed, that this abuſe of the favour of parliament might be prevented, by reſtraining, for the future, the benefit of naturalization to the time during which foreigners ſhould reſide within this realm, in ſuch manner and under ſuch limitations as to the houſe ſhould appear fit.

The reaſonableneſs of this petition was ſuch, that the houſe thought proper immediately to grant it; and a clauſe, accordingly, to that purpoſe was drawn up, and has continued ever ſince to be added to every bill of that nature. Nothing of importance paſſed in the upper houſe during this ſeſſion, which on the twenty-ſixth day of March was cloſed with a ſpeech from his majeſty, who, having appointed a regency to rule the kingdom in his abſence, ſoon afterwards ſet out for his German dominions.

For a long time paſt the fatal effects of clandeſtine marriages had been a ſubject of complaint in England. Every day produced hearings in the court of chancery, and appeals to the houſe of peers, concerning the validity of thoſe marriages; on account of the irregularity of which the innocent offſpring were ſometimes cut off from ſucceſſion to eſtates, though the mutual conſent of the parents had been given to their marriages.

It was alſo in the power of men and women of the moſt infamous characters to ruin the ſons and daughters of the greateſt families in England, by the frequent opportunies of marrying in the Fleet and other unlicenſed places; which were ſo numerous that marrying was become as much a trade as any mechanical profeſſion. Some ſhocking inſtances of this kind having lately been diſcovered gave occaſion to a bill, which was introduced into the upper houſe, for preventing the practice of clandeſtine marriages, and which, after undergoing ſome ſlight alterations, was ſent down to the commons, where it met with a moſt furious and violent oppoſition, but was at laſt paſſed by a great majority, and in the end received the royal aſſent.

A. D. 1753. Sir Hans Sloan, the famous phyſician and naturaliſt, being dead, his collection of curioſities was offered to the public for twenty thouſand pounds; and which was readily accepted. The library of the late earl of Oxford was purchaſed for half that ſum; and theſe two being joined to the Cottonian and Royal libraries, were converted into the Muſeum, which is now to be ſeen at Montague-houſe, under the direction of its truſtees and governors, who conſiſt of many of the principal perſons in the kingdom. His majeſty cloſed the ſeſſion of parliament on the ſeventeenth day of June, with a ſpeech, in which he obſerved, that the ſtate of foreign affairs had received no material alteration ſince their meeting; and that they might depend upon his purſuing the ſame principles and ends, which he had then declared to them: that to preſerve the peace, and conſult the real proſperity of his people, and, at the ſame time, to aſſert and maintain the honour and juſt rights of his crown and kingdoms, were the objects of all his meaſures: that he had nothing to deſire of them, but what he was perſuaded, they wiſhed for themſelves: that he hoped they would exert their utmoſt endeavours, in their ſeveral counties, to promote the true intereſt and happineſs of his people, to encourage induſtry, to preſerve good order and regularity in the ſtate, and to make his ſubjects ſenſible of the bleſſings they enjoyed; by which means his government would be eſtabliſhed in the moſt peaceable and effectual manner.

An event occurred this year, which marks the prevalence of credulity and party zeal. A young woman whoſe name was Elizabeth Canning pretended to have been forcibly conveyed from Moorfields on the evening of the 1ſt of January to the obſcure manſion of one Wells near Enfield Waſh, a woman ſuſpected of harbouring unfortunate proſtitutes; from whence, after a continuance of twenty-eight days, ſhe made her eſcape without the leaſt violation of her virtue. Notwithſtanding the abſurdity of the pretence, the improbability of the girl's continuance in a place of known infamy, ſo long a time, without the violation of her virtue, and the apparent eaſe with which ſhe might at any time have effected her eſcape, the ſtory operated ſo powerfully on the minds of numbers of people, that they became her ſtrenuous advocates, and raiſed large ſubſcriptions for the proſecution of the ſuppoſed delinquents.

After various depoſitions, and bills of perjury being preferred on both ſides, Canning was found guilty of perjury and tranſported to America.

In the month of April of this year, Dr. Cameron, brother to the famous rebel, Lochiel, having, notwithſtanding his attainder, ventured over to Scotland, in order (as was reported) to reclaim ſome money which had been embezzled by the highlanders, was apprehended, and conducted to London, where the identity of his perſon being proved, he received ſentence of death, which he accordingly ſuffered at Tyburn, and behaved with an aſtoniſhing degree of courage and reſolution.

About this period ſome very alarming inteſtine commotions were produced by the exportation of corn, which had hitherto proved ſo advantageous to the kingdom. A large party of colliers and others of the rabble having aſſembled in a body, made an attack upon the city of Briſtol; and though treated by the magiſtrates with the utmoſt lenity, they began to plunder ſome loaded veſſels that were lying in the harbour, till the citizens were obliged to call to their aſſiſtance a troop of the Scotch grey dragoons, who immediately quelled the inſurgents, a great number of whom were wounded, and ſeveral killed.

Inſurrections of a like nature happened in Yorkſhire, and continued till they were ſuppreſſed by the interference of the military power.

At the meeting of the parliament on the 15th of November, his majeſty, in his ſpeech to both houſes, obſerved, that the events of this year had not made it neceſſary for him to offer any thing in particular to their conſideration, relating to foreign tranſactions: that the public tranquillity, and the ſtate of affairs in Europe, remained on the ſame footing, in which they were at the cloſe of the laſt ſeſſion; and they might be aſſured of his ſteadineſs in purſuing the moſt effectual meaſures to preſerve to his people the bleſſings of peace.

This ſpeech was anſwered by loyal and affectionate addreſſes from both houſes, who proceeded to diſpatch the public buſineſs with an unanimity, which, till this period, had hardly been ever known.

A. D. 1754. No material tranſaction occurred during this preſent ſeſſion, ſo that it may ſuffice to obſerve that on the 6th of April his majeſty, after giving the royal aſſent to ſeveral bills which had paſſed both houſes, prorogued the parliament; ſoon after which it was diſſolved by proclamation, and writs iſſued for calling a new one.

The right honourable Henry Pelham died in the beginning of March, and was ſincerely regretted by his majeſty and the nation in general.

The duke of Newcaſtle, brother to Mr. Pelham, was appointed firſt lord commiſſioner of the treaſury, and was was ſucceeded as ſecretary of ſtate by Sir Thomas Robinſon, who had long reſided as ambaſſador at the court of Vienna. The other department of this office was ſtill retained by the earl of Holderneſs; and the function of chancellor of the exchequer was performed, as uſual, by the lord chief juſtice of the King's Bench, until a proper perſon could be found to ſupply that important poſt; but in the courſe of the ſummer, it was conferred upon Mr. Legge, whoſe good character and great abilities have ſince been univerſally acknowledged.

Sir George Littleton was appointed cofferer, and the earl of Hilſborough comptroller of the houſhold; Mr. George Grenville, brother to earl Temple, became treaſurer of the navy; and Mr. Charles Townſend accepted the place of a lord of admiralty, in the room of lord Barrington, made maſter of the wardrobe. Lord Hardwicke, the chancellor, was raiſed to the dignity of an earl. The place of lord chief juſtice of the King's Bench becoming vacant by the death of Sir William Lee, was beſtowed upon Sir Dudley Rider, whoſe office of attorney-general was ſupplied by the honourable William Murray.

The miniſtry carried their elections for the new parliament almoſt univerſally. The ſpirit of oppoſition was now almoſt entirely extinguiſhed; and the words of court and country party, which uſed to produce ſuch terrible effects, had incurred the contempt not only of perſons of ſenſe and underſtanding, but began to be out of faſhion even among the populace.

The new parliament met at Weſtminſter on the 10th of May, and the ſeſſions was opened by the duke of Cumberland and ſome other peers acting by commiſſion from the king. On this occaſion the lord chancellor made a ſpeech to both houſes, in which he obſerved, that his majeſty had given them this opportunity of coming together, in order to compleat, without loſs of time, certain parliamentary proceedings, which he judged would be for the ſatisfaction of his good ſubjects; but he did not think proper to lay before them any points of general buſineſs, reſerving every thing of that nature to the uſual time of their aſſembling in the winter. On the fifth day of June, this ſhort ſeſſion was cloſed, the parliament prorogued to the 8th of Auguſt, and afterwards to the month of November.

The miniſtry, alarmed at the progreſs of the French in America, and convinced from the evaſive anſwers they received from that court, that nothing could be effected by negotiation, ſent peremptory orders to their governors in that country to repel force by force, and drive the French from their ſettlements on the river Ohio, provided they refuſed to retire in a peaceable manner. But before fore the governors could march their forces over the mountains the French found means to make themſelves maſters of Logs-town, ſurprized the Block and Truck-houſes, where they found ſkins and other commodities to the amount of twenty thouſand pounds; and deſtroyed all the Britiſh traders, except two, who found means to eſcape. At the ſame time, M. de Contrecœur, with a thouſand men and eighteen pieces of cannon, arrived in three hundred canoes from Venango, a fort they had built on the banks of the Ohio, and took by aſſault a Britiſh fort, which the Virginians had erected on the forks of the Monongahela, that emties itſelf into the river Ohio.

A. D. 1755. The king ſent a meſſage to the parliament, on the 27th day of March, by Sir Thomas Robinſon, ſecretary of ſtate, importing, "that his majeſty, finding it requiſite from the preſent ſituation of affairs to augment his forces by ſea and land, and to take ſuch other meaſures as might beſt tend to preſerve the general peace of Europe, and ſecure the juſt rights and poſſeſſions of his crown in America, as well as repel any attempts that might be formed againſt his majeſty and his kingdoms, doubted not but that his faithful commons would enable him to make ſuch augmentations in his forces by ſea and land as the emergency of affairs in ſo critical a juncture might require."

The readineſs of the parliament to aſſiſt his majeſty cauſed ſuch alacrity and diſpatch in every department of the marine, that in a very ſhort ſpace of time there was a powerful fleet at Spithead, well manned and ready to put to ſea.

Accordingly admiral Boſcawen ſet ſail on the 23d of April, with eleven ſhips of the line and ſix frigates, having on board ſix thouſand land forces, to attend the motions of the enemy: but more certain and particular intelligence being brought with regard to the ſtrength of the French fleet, which conſiſted of twenty-one ſhips of the line, beſides frigates and tranſports, with a great quantity of warlike ſtores, and four thouſand regular troops, under the command of Baron Dieſkau, admiral Holborne was detached with ſix ſhips of the line and one frigate, to reinforce Boſcawen; and a great number of capital ſhips were put in commiſſion.

His majeſty cloſed the ſeſſion of parliament on the 25th of April, with a ſpeech, in which, among other things, he informed them, that he had religiouſly adhered to the ſtipulations of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, and made it his care not to injure or offend any power whatſoever; but that he could never entertain the thought of purchaſing the name of a peace at the expence of ſuffering encroachments upon, or of yielding up what juſtly belonged to Great Britain, either by ancient poſſeſſion or by ſolemn treaties: that the vigour and firmneſs of his parliament, on this important occaſion, had enabled him to be prepared for ſuch events as might happen: that if reaſonable and honourable terms of accommodation could be procured, he would be ſatisfied, and in all events rely on the juſtice of his cauſe, the effectual ſupport of his people, and the protection of Providence. The ſpeech being finiſhed, the lord chancellor, by command of his majeſty, prorogued the parliament.

Affairs on the continent were at this time in ſuch a ſituation, that his majeſty's preſence in Germany was become abſolutely neceſſary: and many people were filled with the moſt terrible apprehenſions, leſt the French ſhould intercept him in his journey, or prevent his return.

The French fleet, commanded by Macnamara, an Iriſh officer, ſailed from Breſt on the 6th of May, directing their courſe towards the gulph of St. Lawrence; but as ſoon as they arrived in a certain latitude, Macnamara returned to Breſt with nine of the capital ſhips, leaving the reſt of the ſquadron to continue their courſe under the command of M. Bois de la Mothe.

On the tenth of June two of the French fleet, the Alcide and Lys, both ſixty four gun ſhips, though the latter had only twenty-two mounted, fell in with the Dunkirk and the Defiance off the banks of Newfoundland, in a very thinck fog. On their firſt appearance, captain Howe, in the Dunkirk coming along ſide of the Alcide, ordered her to ſtrike and come into the Engliſh fleet. The French captain aſked if it was peace or war? but not receiving a ſatisfactory anſwer, he repeated the queſtion, adding, he ſhould obey no orders but thoſe of his admiral. Upon this declaration, Howe poured in a broadſide, and the two ſhips being at cloſe quarters, his ſhot did great execution. He continued his fire with ſuch alacrity, that the Freneh officers, not being able to keep their men to their quarters, ſtruck their colours in leſs than an hour. In the mean time the Lys ſtruck to the Defiance, and in theſe ſhips were ſix hundred ſoldiers with their officers, and fifty thouſand crowns.

This action, however inſignificant when conſidered in its conſequences, animated the whole nation, as it convinced them that the government was reſolved to keep no farther meaſures with the French, but juſtly to repel force by force, and put a ſtop to the proſecution of their ambitious ſchemes in America.

The French miniſtry would willingly have avoided an open rupture till they had accompliſhed their grand ſcheme of eſtabliſhing a communication from the Miſſiſſippi to Canada by a line of forts, many of which they had lately erected, and had deſtroyed one of ours on the Ohio.

The ſucceſs that had attended Boſcawen's fleet was not the only event that proved favourable to Great Britain. The important fort of Beauſejour, now Cumberland fort, ſurrendered to Lieutenant-colonel Monckton by capitulation on the 16th of June, after four days bombardment, and the next day a ſmall fort on the river Gaſpereau followed the example. In the latter was the enemy's principal magazine for ſupplying the French ſoldiers and Indians with proviſions and ſtores. By this ſucceſs colonel Monckton was enabled to diſarm fifteen thouſand neutrals, conſiſting of Acadians and Indians. At the ſame time, captain Rouſe of the Sea-horſe, being ordered with the aſſiſtance of two other frigates, to attack the fort, lately erected by the French at the mouth of St. John's river, the enemy, after ſpiking up their cannon and blowing up their magazines, together with the principal part of their fortifications, abandoned the place on the appearance of the Engliſh.

An expedition had, by his majeſty's command, been concerted between general Lawrence and governor Shirley, againſt the French in Nova Scotia, and was carried into execution by the aſſiſtance of two thouſand of the New England troops. By this means the French were driven from the forts on the frontiers of that province, which for ſome time paſt they had occupied.

Early in the year commodore Keppel ſailed from Ireland

Ireland with a fleet of men of war and tranſports; having on board a body of land forces under the command of general Braddock, and landed the whole corps ſafely in Virginia. After ſeveral debates in council, it was agreed that in order to preſerve Oſwego, and reduce the French fort at Niagara, Shirley's and Pepperel's regiments ſhould march to the lake Ontario: general Braddock undertook the reduction of fort du Queſne, a French fortreſs on the river Monongahela.

With this view he began his march at the head of two thouſand men, and after many difficulties in his route, arrived at a ſpot called the Little Meadows; where, that he might proceed with greater alacrity, he left colonel Dunbar, with eight hundred men, to bring up the proviſions, ſtores, and heavy baggage, as faſt as the nature of the ſervice would permit; while he himſelf, with the other twelve hundred, together with ten pieces of cannon, and the neceſſary ammunition and proviſions, proſecuted his march with ſo much expedition, that he arrived within ten miles of fort Du Queſne, on the eighth day of July.

When Braddock left his camp in the Little Meadows, he was earneſtly requeſted to proceed with circumſpection, and to employ the friendly Indians in his army by way of advanced guard, in caſe of ambuſcades. But he raſhly continued his march without ſo much as endeavouring to procure the leaſt intelligence of the ſituation and diſpoſition of the enemy, or even taking the neceſſary precaution to ſend out ſcouts to reconnoitre the roads and thickets, which lay in his front and on each ſide of him.

He was advancing with this amazing degree of negligence, when, about noon, he was ſaluted with a general diſcharge upon his front, and all along his left flank, from an enemy ſo concealed among trees and buſhes, that not one of them could poſſibly be diſcovered, and who had artfully given the whole army time to enter the defile before they began to fire. The van guard, diſmayed at being expoſed to three different fires, after one general diſcharge, retreated in the utmoſt confuſion. They were, however, rallied by their officers, many of whom fell as they were exciting them to return to the charge, but all their efforts proved unſucceſsful.

In the mean time the general, who exerted himſelf in a moſt heroic manner, after having five horſes killed under him, was mortally wounded. On his dropping from his horſe, both regiments fled in the utmoſt terror, diſorder, and precipitation, deſerting their officers, who though alone kept their ground, till only five out of ſixty remained, the reſt being either ſlain or wounded.

The enemy now made prize of all the artillery, ammunition and baggage, and likewiſe ſeized the general's cabinet, with all his letters and inſtructions, of which the French court afterwards availed themſelves in the declarations and memorials which they preſented.

The provincials, ſo much deſpiſed by the general, that he always made them march in the rear, however ſtood firm, and continued the engagement on very unequal terms for near three hours, when they were obliged to retire, and that the regulars were not entirely deſtroyed, was wholly owing to their gallant behaviour.

Seven hundred of the Engliſh fell in the engagement, with the greater part of the officers.

While general Braddock was engaged in this fatal expedition, governor Shirley and general Johnſon were employed in their reſpective undertakings. After ſtaying ſome time for the neceſſary ſupplies, Johnſon marched, and encamped in a ſtrong place to wait for his battoes, in order to proceed to the attack of Crown-point. Receiving advice from ſome Indian ſcouts, that two thouſand of the enemy under the command of the baron Dieſkau were on their march to attack Fort Edward, colonel Williams was detached with a thouſand regulars, and a number of Indians to intercept them in their return. On meeting the enemy, who it ſeems had reſolved to ſurprize general Johnſon's camp previous to their attack on Fort Edward, Williams and his party retreated, while the general made the beſt diſpoſition he was able for their reception. The engagement ſoon became general, and the French regulars kept their ground till the inceſſant fire from our artillery put them in ſome diſorder, which our troops perceiving, immediately jumped over the breaſt work and attacked them on all ſides. Between ſeven and eight hundred were killed, thirty taken priſoners, among whom was the baron Dieſkau, and the reſt fled with the utmoſt precipitation. General Johnſon was wounded, but recovering in a ſhort time, a plan for attacking Crown Point was formed; the execution, however, was, from the advanced ſeaſon, deferred till the next year. The brave conduct of general Johnſon was duly rewarded; for his majeſty was pleaſed to create him a baronet, and the commons voted him five thouſand pounds.

But ſuch unaccountable delays attended the expedition of governor Shirley againſt Niagara, that he received orders to return to England and anſwer for his conduct.

During theſe tranſactions the miniſters of the two contending powers were ſecretly employed in forming, or endeavouring to form alliances and intereſts with the different courts of Europe. The emiſſaries of France having long tampered in vain with the Spaniſh court, had recourſe to the princes of Germany; among whom they found means to bring over to their intereſt the elector of Cologne, who agreed to their forming magazines in his territories in Weſtphalia.

In order to obtain ſome conceſſions in their behalf reſpecting the ſtate of affairs in America, the French court promiſed his Britannic majeſty to relinquiſh their deſign upon Hanover; but this propoſal being rejected with diſdain, the count d'Aubeterre, their envoy extraordinary at the court of Vienna, entered into a ſecret negotiation with the miniſters of the empreſs-queen; and gave broad intimations, that if ſhe would ſecond the views of his moſt Chriſtian majeſty, his beſt aſſiſtance againſt the king of Pruſſia ſhould be at her ſervice.

As the French would certainly endeavour to invade Hanover, in caſe of a war between them and England, which ſeemed not only inevitable, but near at hand; it was natural for his majeſty to take the moſt effectual methods to ſecure his poſſeſſions on the continent, by alliances among the princes of Germany.

About this time another treaty with Ruſſia was ſet on foot, but this did not take effect during his majeſty's reſidence at Hanover.

During theſe tranſactions, the Engliſh miniſtry were meditating a ſcheme whereby they might revenge the perfidious conduct of the French. Accordingly having with the utmoſt alacrity prepared a moſt formidable naval force, Sir Edward Hawke ſailed from Portſmouth on the twenty-firſt of July, with eighteen men of war, to watch the return of the the French fleet from America, which, however, escaped him, and got safe into the harbour of Brest, on the third day of September.

Commodore Frankland sailed from Spithead, on the thirteenth of August, for the West-Indies, with four men of war, furnished with instructions to commit hostilities upon the enemy, as well as to protect our sugar islands from any insults they might offer: orders were issued to all our ships of war to make reprisals upon the French, by seizing their ships wherever they should meet them; and the duke de Mirepoix set out for Paris, without taking leave, on the twenty-second of July.

As a war was now, in some degree, commenced, his majesty thought proper, perhaps for that reason, to return to his British dominions sooner than usual; for he left Hanover on the eighth day of September, and arrived at Kensington on the fifteenth, where the treaty of alliance between him and the empress of Russia, which he had begun during his absence, was concluded on the last day of the same month.

Notwithstanding the late strenuous exertions of government, the naval preparations in England for the approaching rupture were now carried on with more vigour than ever: several new ships were put in commission, and many others taken into the service: the exportation of gun-powder was prohibited: the bounty to seamen was continued; and the number of those that either entered voluntarily, or were pressed, encreased daily, as did likewise the captures from the French, among which was their ship the Esperance, of seventy guns, taken as she was going from Rochfort to Brest to be manned.

On the 13th of November his majesty opened the session of parliament with a speech, in which he informed them, that the most proper measures had been taken to protect our possessions in America, and to recover such parts of them as had been usurped or invaded: that to preserve his people from the calamities of war, as well as prevent a general flame from being lighted up in Europe, he had always been ready to accept of reasonable and honourable terms of accommodation, but that none such had been offered by France: that he had also confined his views and operations to hinder France from making new encroachments, or supporting those already made; to exert his people's right to a satisfaction for hostilities committed in time of profound peace; and to disappoint such designs, as, from various appearances and preparations, there was reason to think were formed against his kingdom and dominions: that he believed no impartial power could object to proceedings so absolutely necessary for the defence and security of his people: that his good brother the king of Spain beheld with concern these differences; and the part which he had taken in the common welfare of Europe made him earnestly wish the preservation of the public tranquillity, and had induced him to give the most solemn assurances of his firm resolution to continue in the same pacific sentiments: that he himself had greatly encreased his naval force, and augmented his army in such a manner, as might be least burthensome to his subjects: and finally, that he had concluded a treaty with the empress of Russia, and another with the land-grave of Hesse Cassel, which should be laid before them.

A few days after the meeting of parliament, Sir Thomas Robinson, secretary of state, resigned the seals of his office, which his majesty delivered to Mr. Stephen Fox. Mr. Legge also, at the same time, from a disgust at certain measures, resigned his post as chancellor of the exchequer, which was conferred on Sir George Lyttleton, and the post of secretary at war was given to lord Barrington. Mr. Pitt resigned his employment from the same motive as Mr. Legge, and the earl of Darlington and Mr. Hay were appointed joint pay-masters general in his stead. The privy-seal was given to earl Gower, and the duke of Marlborough was appointed general of the ordnance.

In the mean time the commons were employed in adjusting the supplies for the ensuing year. Fifty thousand seamen, including nine thousand one hundred and thirty-eight marines, were voted, together with two millions six hundred thousand pounds for their maintenance; and thirty-four thousand two hundred and sixty-three land forces, with nine hundred and thirty thousand six hundred and three pounds, six shillings and nine-pence for their support. An hundred thousand pounds were granted as a subsidy to the empress of Russia: fifty-four thousand one hundred and forty pounds to the land-grave of Hesse-Cassel; and ten thousand to the elector of Bavaria.

In this interval, not only the people of Great Britain, but the whole world, was thrown into the deepest consternation by a dreadful earthquake, which, on the first of November, shook all Spain and Portugal, and many other places in Europe, and laid the city of Lisbon almost in ruins.

Providentially the quarter in which the English chiefly lived, and where they had their warehouses, suffered the least of any part of the city; as most of the British merchants then residing there had gone, with their families, to their country houses, to avoid the insults, to which they might have been exposed from the Portuguese populace, during the celebration of their AUTO DA FE, which was to be held the very day on which the earthquake happened.

As soon as the British minister at the court of Lisbon had transmitted to his majesty an account of this melancholy event, he sent a message to both houses of parliament, acquainting them with the particulars, and desiring their concurrence and assistance in speedily relieving the unhappy sufferers; and the parliament thereupon, to the honour of British humanity, unanimously voted, for the use of the distressed subjects of Portugal, a free gift of an hundred thousand pounds.

His Portuguese majesty was so touched with this instance of British generosity, that, as a proof of his gratitude, he ordered Mr. Castres, the English resident at his court, to give the preference, in the distribution of these supplies, to the British subjects, who had suffered by the earthquake. Accordingly, about a thirtieth part of the provisions, and two thousand pounds in money, were set apart for that purpose: and the court of Lisbon returned thanks, in the warmest terms, to the king and people of Great Britain.

A. D. 1756. During these transactions, his Prussian majesty, having received intelligence that a negotiation was carrying on between the courts of Petersburg, Vienna, and Versailles, in order to effect his ruin; he not only publicly and solemnly declared against the introduction of any foreign troops whatever into Germany, but represented the design to his Britannic majesty as equally inimical to their respective interests; in consequence of which the kings of Great Britain and Prussia entered into a convention to the following import, "that having maturely conſidered, that the differences which had lately ariſen in America, might eaſily extend much farther, and even reach Europe, having, moreover, always the welfare and ſafety of Germany, their common country, much at heart, and being extremely deſirous to maintain its peace and tranquillity; they had, as the moſt effectual means of obtaining the ſalutary end, agreed upon a convention of neutrality, by which they reciprocally bound themſelves not to ſuffer foreign troops, of any nation whatſoever, to enter into Germany, or paſs through it, during the troubles aforeſaid, and the conſequences that might reſult from them: but to oppoſe the ſame with their utmoſt might, in order to ſecure Germany from the calamities of war, defend her fundamental laws and conſtitutions, and preſerve her peace uninterrupted." Their majeſties likewiſe embraced this favourable opportunity to adjuſt the differences that had ſo long ſubſiſted between them, in relation to the remainder of the Sileſian loan due to the ſubjects of his Britannic majeſty, and the indemnification claimed by the ſubjects of his Pruſſian majeſty for their loſſes by ſea during the late war; ſo that the attachment laid on the ſaid debt was agreed to be taken off, as ſoon as the ratifications of this treaty ſhould be exchanged.

On the 27th of May his majeſty went to the houſe of peers and cloſed the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech, in which he thanked them for the vigorous and effectual ſupport they had given him; and acquainted them, that, from the injuries and hoſtilities, which had been for ſome time committed by the French againſt his dominions and ſubjects, he found himſelf obliged, in vindication of the honour of his crown, and the rights of his people, to declare war in form againſt France: and that he relied on the Divine protection, and the vigorous aſſiſtance of his faithful ſubjects in ſo juſt a cauſe. This ſpeech being finiſhed, the parliament was prorogued by the lord chancellor at his majeſty's command.

Advice ſoon after arrived that the French were employed in equipping a formidable armament at Breſt, and aſſembling a numerous body of forces, together with a large fleet of tranſports, in order to make a deſcent in ſome part of the Britiſh dominions. This report filled the inhabitants with conſternation; though it ſoon appeared the intelligence was void of foundation. The French had, indeed, made uſe of that pretence, while employed in fitting out a ſtrong ſquadron at Toulon; but that armament was deſtined to perform a very different ſervice, for they landed a numerous body of troops in the iſland of Minorca. This invaſion alarmed the Britiſh miniſtry; but inſtead of ſending a force ſufficient to render abortive the deſigns of the enemy, they detached a ſmall ſquadron of ten ſhips of the line to the Mediterranean under the command of admiral Byng. He reached Gibraltar on the ſecond of May, where he found captain Edgecumbe with the princeſs Louiſa, a ſloop, and received intelligence that the French fleet, commanded by M. Galiſſoniere, conſiſting of thirteen ſail of the line and a numerous fleet of tranſports, having fifteen thouſand land forces on board, had ſailed on the tenth of April from Toulon, and made a deſcent on the iſland of Minorca.

Strengthened by captain Edgecumbe, and reinforced from the garriſon of Gibraltar, the admiral ſailed for Minorca on the 8th of May. Captain Hervey in the Phœnix joined him off the iſland, and confirmed the advice he had already received reſpecting the deſtination and force of the Toulon ſquadron. Soon after they ſaw the Engliſh colours flying on the caſtle of St. Philip, and ſeveral bomb batteries playing on the works from various parts of the enemy's camp.

Admiral Byng ſtill continued his courſe in order to relieve the caſtle, till he perceived the French fleet at a conſiderable diſtance to the ſouth-eaſt. Early the next morning both fleets were formed ready for the attack, and about two o'clock admiral Byng threw out a ſignal to bear away two points from the wind and engage the enemy. But the diſtance from the French fleet was ſo great, that rear-admiral Weſt, finding it impoſſible to comply with both orders, bore away with his diviſion ſeven points from the wind, and cloſing with the enemy, attacked them with ſuch impetuoſity, that the ſhips which oppoſed him were ſoon driven out of the line.

In all human probability, the Engliſh fleet would have obtained a complete victory, had Weſt been properly ſeconded by the van; but the other diviſion did not bear down, and the enemy's center keeping their ſtation, admiral Weſt could not improve his advantage, without expoſing himſelf to the danger of ſeeing his communication with the reſt of the line entirely cut off.

The Intrepid, in admiral Byng's diviſion, had, in the beginning of the action, been ſo greatly damaged in her rigging, that ſhe drove on the ſhip that was next in poſition; a circumſtance which obliged ſeveral others to throw all a-back, in order to avoid confuſion, and for ſome time interrupted the action.

Admiral Byng all this time kept aloof, and when his captain, the brave Gardiner, exhorted him to bear down upon the enemy, he very coolly replied, that he would not fall into the error commited by Matthews, who, in his engagement with the French and Spaniſh ſquadrons off Toulon, during the preceding war, had broke the line of battle, and ſingly expoſed himſelf to a fire which he could not ſuſtain, by his own precipitation.

The Britiſh admiral on the preſent occaſion declared againſt acting, except with the line entire; and, on pretence of rectifying the diſorder which had happened among ſome of his ſhips, heſitated ſo long, and kept at ſuch a wary diſtance, that though he received a few ſhots in his hull, he could not be ſaid to be properly engaged during the whole action.

The French commander appeared to be equally inclined to put an end to the engagement; part of his ſquadron had been fairly driven from the line of battle; and though he was rather ſuperior to the Engliſh in number of men and weight of metal, he did not chuſe to try the experiment of a cloſer fight, and edged away with an eaſy ſail to join his van, which had been defeated.

Admiral Byng, hereupon, made the ſignal for purſuing; but the French ſhips, being clean, he could not come up and cloſe them again, ſo that they retired at their leiſure. He then put his ſquadron on the other tack, in order to keep the wind of the enemy, but next morning they were quite out of ſight of the Engliſh fleet.

The number of the killed, including captain Andrews of the Defiance, amounted to forty-two, and about one hundred and ſeventy were wounded. Three of his capital ſhips had ſuffered ſo much in their maſts and rigging, that they could not keep the the ſea, without the moſt imminent danger of foundering: a great number of his ſeamen were ill; and as there was no veſſel that could be converted into an hoſpital ſhip for the ſick and wounded, it was therefore determined in a council of war to return to Gibraltar.

The news of this tranſaction threw the whole Britiſh nation into a violent ferment, and the miniſtry ſent Sir Edward Hawke and admiral Saunders to ſupercede the admirals Byng and Weſt in their commands of the Mediterranean ſquadron. The latter met with a very gracious reception from his majeſty, but the former was committed cloſe priſoner to an appartment in Greenwich Hoſpital.

But notwithſtanding this diſappointment of relief, the Engliſh garriſon ſtill defended fort St. Philip, though the French preſſed them on every ſide with the utmoſt vigour. Numbers, however, at length prevailed, and the caſtle was ſurrendered to the French on the ſeventh of July. Not many days after the reduction of Fort St. Philip, admiral Hawke's fleet, augmented with five ſhips of the line, appeared off the iſland of Minorca. But the French ſquadron was returned to Toulon, and Sir Edward had the mortification to ſee the French colours flying on St. Philip's caſtle.

The Britiſh admiral being diſappointed in his hope of encountering la Galiſſoniere, and relieving the Engliſh garriſon of St. Philip's, at leaſt aſſerted the empire of Great Britain in the Mediterranean, by annoying the commerce of the enemy, and blocking up their ſquadron in the harbour of Toulon. Underſtanding that the Auſtrian government at Leghorn had detained an Engliſh privateer, and impriſoned the captain, on pretence that he had violated the neutrality of the port, he detached two ſhips of war to inſiſt, in a peremptory manner, on the releaſe of the ſhip, effects, crew, and captain: and without even waiting the orders of the court of Vienna, they thought proper to comply with the admiral's demand.

Fortunatus Wright, a native of Liverpool, was the perſon in whoſe behalf the admiral thus effectually interpoſed. Though a ſtranger to a ſea-life, he had, in the laſt war, equipped a privateer, and particularly diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his uncommon vigilance andvalour. While he lay at anchor in the harbour of Leghorn, commander of the St. George privateer of Liverpool, a ſmall ſhip of twelve guns and eighty men, a large French xebeque, mounted with ſixteen cannon, and nearly three times the number of his compliment, with a view to interrupt the Britiſh commerce, took her ſtation within ſight of the harbour.

This inſult was too much for a man of Wright's gallant diſpoſition to endure: notwithſtanding the enemy's ſuperiority in metal and number of men, he weighed anchor, hoiſted his ſails, engaged him within ſight of the ſhore, and after a very obſtinate diſpute, in which the captain, lieutenant, and 60 of the men belonging to the xebeque were killed on the ſpot, he obliged them to ſheer off, and then returned to the harbour in triumph.

In the month of February this year admiral Watſon, in the Eaſt-Indies, totally deſtroyed the fleet of the famous pirate Angria, who had long infeſted thoſe parts. The garriſon of Geriah, which was his rendezvous, ſurrendered; and among the priſoners were Angria's wife and children, and the commander in chief of his grabs. The conquerors found upwards of two hundred guns, ſix braſs mortars, and in money and effects about one hundred and thirty thouſand pounds.

Hawke, having ſcoured the Mediterranean, and inſulted the enemy's coaſts, returned with the homeward bound trade to Gibraltar; from whence, about the latter end of the year, he ſet ſail for England, where war had been declared againſt France, and great preparations made for carrying it on with the utmoſt vigour.

The garriſon of Minorca, under general Blakeney, arrived at Portſmouth in the month of November; and that officer's behaviour was ſo acceptable to his ſovereign, that he was raiſed to the rank of an Iriſh baron.

A memorable, but melancholy event happened this year in the Eaſt-Indies. Surajah Dowla, viceroy of Bengal, having been irritated by ſome tranſactions of the company, inveſted Calcutta, at the head of a numerous army. The garriſon, overpowered by numbers, ſubmitted on promiſe that no perſonal injury ſhould be offered them. But the conqueror, in direct violation of his word, cauſed the garriſon and inhabitants, conſiſting of 146 perſons of both ſexes, to be driven into a place called the Black-hole, being a room of about 18 feet ſquare. Here they were confined during the whole night and totally deprived of the freſh air, by which means no more than twenty-three ſurvived, the reſt having periſhed in the utmoſt agony: among thoſe who eſcaped ſuffocation was Mr. Holwell, deputy-governor, who, with his companions, were ſent priſoners to Muxadabad.

A. D. 1757. After the parliament had enquired into the loſs of Minorca, a court-martial was appointed for the trial of admiral John Byng, which, after examining witneſſes for the crown and priſoner, came to ſeveral reſolutions, importing, on the whole, their opinion, that admiral Byng, during the engagement between the Engliſh and French fleets, did not do his utmoſt endeavours to take, ſeize, and deſtroy the ſhips of the French king, which it was his duty to have engaged; nor to aſſiſt ſuch of his majeſty's ſhips as was engaged, which it was his duty to have aſſiſted; and that he did not exert his utmoſt power for the relief of St. Philip's caſtle. They, therefore, unanimouſly agreed, that he fell under part of the twelfth article of an act of parliament; and as that article preſcribed death, without any alternative left to the diſcretion of the court, adjudged the ſaid admiral to be ſhot to death, at ſuch a time, and on board ſuch a ſhip, as the lords commiſſioners of the admiralty ſhould pleaſe to direct. But as it appeared by the evidence of the officers, who were near the admiral's perſon, that no backwardneſs was diſcernable in him during the action, nor any mark of fear and confuſion, either in his conntenance or in his behaviour; but that he delivered his orders cooly and diſtinctly, without ſeeming under the influence of timidity; and as they had reaſon, from other circumſtances, to believe, that his miſconduct did dot ariſe from cowardice or diſaffection, they recommended him as a proper object of the royal mercy, in the moſt unanimous and earneſt manner. But all application for this end proving ineffectual, he was, purſuant to his ſentence, executed on the 14th of March, on board his majeſty's ſhip the Monarque, in Portſmouth harbour. Juſt before his death he delivered a paper to the marſhal of the admiralty who attended him, in which he declared himſelf, "a victim, deſtined to "divert the indignation of an injured and de-"luded people, from the proper object."

Though the promotion of Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge (the former of whom had been appointed ed by his majeſty one of the ſecretaries of ſtate, and the latter chancellor of the exchequer) had given great ſatisfaction to the people, who had the utmoſt reliance on their virtues and abilities; yet the old junto found them very unfit for their purpoſes. Theſe miniſters could neither be perſuaded, cajoled, nor intimidated into meaſures, which they thought repugnant to the true intereſt of their country. They oppoſed, both in council and parliament, every thing which they deemed inconſiſtent with the honour of the crown, and prejudicial to the rights of the people. They nobly maintained, even in office, their independency and candour, and greatly evinced, that he is the beſt miniſter to the ſovereign, who acts with the greateſt probity to the ſubject. Thoſe who immediately ſurrounded the throne were ſuppoſed to have concealed from, or miſrepreſented, the characters of theſe faithful ſervants, to their royal maſter; and to have declared, that with ſuch colleagues it was impoſſible to conduct the machine of ſtate. The deſired effect was at length produced by the frequent repetition of theſe ſuggeſtions.

By his majeſty's command, Mr. Pitt reſigned the ſeals as ſecretary of ſtate, on the ninth of April; and Mr. Legge, the office of chancellor of the exchequer, which was conferred on lord Mansfield. The board of admiralty was changed, and ſeveral other removals made in different parts of the adminiſtration.

The honours conferred upon theſe diſcarded patriots, by the people in general, will tend, equally with their own conduct, to perpetuate their memory. The whole nation ſeemed to riſe up as one man, in vindication of their integrity; and many reſpectable cities and corporations preſented them the freedom of their reſpective ſocieties, incloſed in golden boxes, as teſtimonies of their peculiar veneration.

A great number of addreſſes, dutifully and loyally expreſſed, were preſented to the king to reſtore Mr. Pitt and Mr. Legge to their former employments. Accordingly, his majeſty was pleaſed to deliver the ſeals to the former, on the ninth of June, and in five days, the latter was reſtored to his office of chancellor of the Exchequer. Thus was effected by the importunity of the public, that, upon which the public reſted the ſecurity and honour of the nation, as well as the hopes of a ſpeedy and ſucceſsful iſſue to a war, hitherto attended with diſgraces and misfortunes.

The cuſtody of the great ſeal was delivered to Sir Robert Henley, and the earl Temple was made lord privy ſeal. The duke of Newcaſtle, Mr. Legge, Mr. Nugent, lord Duncannon, and Mr. Grenville, were appointed commiſſioners of the exchequer; lord Anſon, the admirals Boſcawen and Forbes, Dr. Hay, Mr. Weſt, Mr. Hunter, and Mr. Elliot, were placed at the board of admiralty; the earl of Thomond was appointed treaſurer of his majeſty's houſhold, and Mr. Fox made pay-maſter of all his majeſty's land forces.

Immediately after the reſtoration of Mr. Pitt and his friends, a deſign was formed for making a deſcent on the coaſt of France, in order to deſtroy the enemy's ſhipping; which would prevent them from ſending any ſuccours to America, and draw part of the French forces from Germany, to the defence of their own coaſt.

Accordingly great expedition was uſed in the fitting out a powerful fleet, and ten regiments were marched to the iſle of Wight. The naval armament, conſiſting of ſixteen ſhips of the line, beſides frigates, fire-ſhips, bomb-ketches, and tranſports, were put under the command of Sir Edward Hawke. Sir John Mordaunt was placed at the head of the land forces, and they were ſtrictly enjoined to act with the ſtricteſt unanimity.

This powerful armament ſailed from Spithead on the eighth day of September, and on the twentieth, the fleet made the iſle of Oleron, when orders were given by Sir Edward Hawke for proceeding to Baſque-road. On the twenty third, the van of the fleet, led by captain Howe, in the Magnanime, ſtood toward the iſle of Aix, ſituated at the mouth of the river Charente, leading up to Rochfort. The fortifications on this iſland were not finiſhed, and the number of cannon and mortars did not exceed thirty-two; the garriſon conſiſted of ſix hundred men, and the whole iſland was about five miles in circumference. In about an hour the fort ſtruck, and ſome forces were landed to take poſſeſſion of the iſland, and demoliſh the fortifications. This conqueſt, though trifling in itſelf, was conſidered by the troops as a happy omen of further advantages. But, inſtead of landing all the troops that night, ſeveral days were ſpent in councils of war, and ſounding the coaſt; by which means the enemy was alarmed, and took ſuch precautions as rendered the deſign wholly abortive. Such was the iſſue of an expedition, which had attracted the notice of all Europe, and thrown the inhabitants of the French coaſt into the utmoſt confuſion. Sir John Mordaunt was afterwards tried by a court-martial, and diſmiſſed the ſervice.

Our affairs in America this year wore but a gloomy aſpect. The enemy kept poſſeſſion of all the lakes, which gave them an opportunity of gaining moſt of the Indians over to their ſide. By the loſs of Oſwego, the whole country of the five nations was abandoned to the mercy of the French general; by the imprudent demolition of the forts we poſſeſſed at the great Carrying place, a paſſage was open to our ſettlements, on the German flats, and along the Mohock's river, which, before the end of the campaign, the enemy deſtroyed by fire and ſword.

The attempt upon Crown Point was, in the interim, laid aſide, and an expedition to Louiſbourgh ſubſtituted in its place. On the ninth of July admiral Holborne, with the ſquadron and tranſports under his command, arrived at Halliſax. Six thouſand men, under the command of lord Loudon, joined the Engliſh forces, which now amounted to twelve thouſand. Several ſmall veſſels were ſent out to diſcover the ſtrength of the enemy at Louiſbourgh, and brought the unwelcome news, that there were at that time in the iſland of Cape-Breton ſix thouſand regular troops, three thouſand militia, together with ſeventeen ſhips of the line, and three frigates ſafe at anchor in the harbour of Louiſbourgh. In conſequence of this information, the expedition was laid aſide, till a more convenient opportunity ſhould offer.

In the mean time lord Loudon's departure gave the French general an opportunity of improving the ſucceſſes of the former campaign. He reduced Fort William Henry, the garriſon of which, notwithſtanding the articles of capitulation, were cruelly uſed by the ſavages, and many of them murdered in a moſt ſhocking manner. The enemy demoliſhed the fort, carried off the effects, proviſions and artillery, together with the veſſels on the lake, and then returned to Montreal, without making making any further attempts on the frontiers of the Britiſh colonies.

Being now freed from the care of the tranſports, the admiral ſailed for Louiſbourgh with fifteen ſhips of the line, four frigates, and a fire ſhip. On the twentieth of Auguſt, they appeared before the harbour, and ſaw the French admiral making the ſignal to unmoor. Holborne, being greatly inferior in ſtrength to the enemy, did not chuſe to hazard an engagement, and therefore returned to Hallifax; but being reinforced about the middle of September with four ſhips of the line, he again ſailed for Louiſbourgh, with a deſign to draw the enemy to a battle. But La Mothe their admiral was too prudent to hazard an engagement, the loſs of which would inevitably expoſe all the French colonies to the attempts of the Engliſh. The Britiſh ſquadron continued cruizing before the harbour of Louiſbourgh until the twenty-fifth, when they were overtaken by a terrible ſtorm. In twelve hours they were driven within two miles of the rocks and breakers on the coaſt of that iſland, when the wind happily ſhifted, and ſaved the whole ſquadron from deſtruction, except the Tilbury, which was loſt upon the rocks, and about half the crew periſhed. Eleven ſhips were diſmaſted, others threw their guns over-board, and the whole returned to England in a very ſhattered condition.

The tranſactions in the Eaſt-Indies in ſome meaſure compenſated for theſe misfortunes. On the thirty-firſt of January, admiral Watſon and colonel Clive appeared with two ſhips before Calcutta, to revenge the cruelties inflicted on their countrymen during the preceding year, and were received by a briſk fire from the batteries. This ſalute was returned ſo warmly, that the enemy's guns were ſoon ſilenced, and in leſs than two hours the place and fort were abandoned. In the mean time, colonel Clive had inveſted the town; and made his attack with ſuch vigour, as greatly contributed to the reduction of the ſettlement. As ſoon as the fort was ſurrendered, captain Coote took poſſeſſion of it with his majeſty's troops, and found ninety-one pieces of cannon, four mortars, with abundance of ammunition, ſtores, and proviſions. Thus the Engliſh, with the loſs of only nine ſeamen and three ſoldiers killed, were re-eſtabliſhed in the two ſtrongeſt fortreſſes on the Ganges.

Not many days after, Hughly, a city of great trade higher up the Ganges, was reduced with as little difficulty, but infinite detriment to the Nabob; and his ſtorehouſes of ſalt, and vaſt granaries for the ſupport of his army, were deſtroyed and burned.

The viceroy of Bengal, being provoked at theſe misfortunes, aſſembled an army of ten thouſand horſe and fifteen thouſand foot, determined to exterminate the Engliſh, and take ample vengeance for his late diſgraces. He was ſeen marching by the Engliſh camp, in his way to Calcutta, on the ſecond of February, where he encamped about a mile from the town. Colonel Clive immediately applied to the admiral for a reinforcement; whereupon ſix hundred men under the command of captain Warwick, were immediately draughted from the different ſhips. The colonel drew out his forces, advanced in three columns towards the enemy, and attacked them with ſuch intrepidity, that the viceroy retreated, after a feeble reſiſtance, with the loſs of a thouſand men killed, wounded, and taken priſoners; alſo four elephants, five hundred horſes, and a very conſiderable number of draught bullocks.

This ſucceſs ſo intimidated the Nabob, that he made ſeveral conceſſions for the honour and advantage of the company, which were ſolemnly ſigned and ſealed with his own hand.

The Engliſh commanders however had too much diſcernment to confide in the promiſes of a barbarian, who ſo perfidiouſly had broken his former engagements; but theſe ſentiments they prudently concealed till they had reinſtated the affairs of the company, and reduced the French power in this province. The chief object of Clive's attention was the reduction of Chandenagore, a French ſettlement higher up the river than Calcutta, and the moſt important poſſeſſed by them in the bay of Bengal. With this view he began his march at the head of ſeven hundred Europeans, and ſixteen hundred Indians; and on his firſt arrival, took poſſeſſion of all the out-poſts, except one redoubt mounted with eight pieces of cannon, which he left to be ſilenced by the admiral.

The admirals Watſon and Pocock arrived, on the eighteenth of March, within two miles of the French ſettlement, with the Kent, Tyger, and Saliſbury men of war; when they found their paſſage obſtructed by booms laid acroſs the river, and ſeveral veſſels ſunk in the channel. Theſe difficulties being removed, they advanced early on the twenty-fourth, and drew up in a line before the fort, which they battered with great fury for three hours, while colonel Clive was making his approaches on the land ſide, and playing vigorouſly from the batteries he had raiſed. Their united efforts ſoon obliged the enemy to ſubmit, and the place ſurrendered by capitulation. The keys were delivered to captain Latham of the Tyger, and colonel Clive, with the king's troops, took poſſeſſion in the afternoon.

The reduction of this fortreſs, in which was a numerous garriſon well ſupplied with proviſions and warlike ſtores, was effected with the loſs of forty men only on the ſide of the conquerors. The goods and money found in the place were conſiderable: but the ruin of the principal ſettlement of the enemy on the Ganges was the chief advantage which accrued from the capture.

The Britiſh commanders, having reduced the Nabob to reaſonable terms, and deſtroyed the power of the French, entered on meaſures to compel the vice-roy to a ſtrict obſervance of the late treaty. Accordingly, a plan was concerted for diveſting him of all his power, and the conſpiracy was conducted by Jaffier Ali Khan, his prime miniſter and chief commander, who communicated his project to Mr. Watts, ſecond in the council at Calcutta.

The plan having been fully concerted between ſome diſaffected Indians and the council, a detachment was ſent on the nineteenth of June to attack Cutwa fort and and town, ſituated on that branch of the river, forming the iſland of Caſſimbuzar. This place ſurrendered at the firſt ſummons, and the colonel waited three days in expectation of receiving advice from Ali Khan. But being diſappointed of the intelligence he expected, he marched from the fort of Cutwa, paſſed the river on the twenty-ſecond, and the ſame day attacked the army of the vice-roy, conſiſting of twenty thouſand men, with his own forces only, Ali Khan not chuſing as yet to declare his intention openly. The attack was carried on with great vigour, and the enemy, after a ſhort conteſt, totally routed. The Nabob's camp-baggage, and fifty pieces of cannon, were taken; and thus a ſmall number of men obtained a complete victory over a numerous army.

In purſuit of the advantage he had gained, the colonel marched to Muſcalavat, the capital of the province, where he was joined by Ali Khan and the malecontents. It had been previouſly agreed, that this Indian chief ſhould be inveſted with the dignity of Nabob, and accordingly, colonel Clive proceeded to ſolemnly depoſe Sulajud Dowla, viceroy of Bengal, and ſubſtitute Ali Khan in his room, who was publicly acknowledged by the people as Suba or viceroy of the provinces of Bengal, Behar, and Orixa. Soon after the Sulajud-Dowla was taken and put to death by his ſucceſſor, who complied with all the conditions which he had ſtipulated before his elevation. He conferred on his allies very liberal rewards, and granted the company moſt extraordinary privileges.

By the reduction of Chandenagore, together with this alliance, the French were entirely excluded the commerce of Bengal, and its dependencies; the trade of the Engliſh company was reſtored; a new ally was acquired, whoſe intereſt obliged him to remain firm to his engagements: above two millions ſterling were paid to the company, and the ſufferers at Calcutta; beſides a very great variety of other advantages. Thus, in the ſhort ſpace of fourteen days, a remarkable revolution was effected; and the Eaſt India company, with ſome few individuals were enriched to an immenſe amount. Soon after this event, admiral Watſon, who had acquired a ſolid reputation for courage and conduct, fell a ſacrifice to the intemperature of the climate.

During theſe tranſactions in the eaſten world, a treaty was concluded with the king of Pruſſia, who had made himſelf maſter of the electorate of Saxony, and was oppoſed by the forces of the empreſs queen of Hungary, thoſe of the Czarina, and the whole army of France. The latter had taken poſſeſſion of the dutchy of Cleves, and the county of Merk, belonging to his Pruſſian majeſty in the neighbourhood of the Low Countries; and the rendezvous of their troops, under the prince of Soubiſe, was appointed at Neuſs in the electorate of Cologne, where, before the firſt of April, a large body of forces was actually aſſembled.

In order to protect his Britannic majeſty's dominions in Germany, orders were diſpatched to recruit the troops of the electorate of Hanover; to furniſh the magazines with all things neceſſary for fifty thouſand men, under the command of his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland, who arrived on the ſixteenth of April, and immediately repaired to the allied army, which having been joined by three Pruſſian regiments, now conſiſted of thirty-ſeven ſquadrons. The duke ſoon after his arrival, removed the camp of the allies to a convenient ſpot of ground between Bielefeldt, and Hervorden, and took poſſeſſion of the caſtle of Retberg, where he fixed his head quarters. On the thirteenth of June, having received advice, that the enemy had cauſed a large body of troops to file off on his right to Burghotte, he cauſed his army to march that evening towards Hervorden. The next day he encamped at Cofeldt, and finding the intention of the enemy was either to force him to an engagement, or to repaſs the Weſer, he choſe the latter, and encamped in a very advantageous ſituation, having that river in front, and his right and left covered with eminences and marſhes.

On the eleventh of July the French paſſed the ſame river, and having laid part of the electorate under contribution, encamped on the heights oppoſite the duke of Cumberland's poſt. His royal highneſs reſolved immediately to change his ſituation, and draw up his army on an eminence between the Weſer and the woods, having the river Hamelen on his right, the village of Haſtenbech in his front, and the wood on his left, where he erected a battery of twelve pounders, and haubitzers. Major general Schulenberg was poſted in the corner of the wood upon the left ſide of the battery, with the hunters and two battalions of grenadiers.

The French army advanced in columns, on the twenty-fifth in the morning, and began a very ſevere cannonade, which continued the whole day. The allied army was ordered to lay all night upon their arms, and his royal highneſs cauſed the battery at the end of the wood to be repaired and reinforced by four more battalions of grenadiers, under the command of major general Hardenberg. A battery was alſo erected behind the village of Haſtenbech, and every precaution taken to give the enemy a warm reception.

A briſk cannonading began, about five in the morning, againſt the battery behind the village, which was defended by the Heſſian infantry and cavalry with great ſteadineſs and reſolution. Between ſeven and eight the firing of the ſmall arms began on the left of the allies, and the French ſeemed to gain ground, upon which his royal highneſs detached the colonels Darenhauſen and Bradenbach, with three Hanoverian battalions and ſix ſquadrons round the wood; who in the evening drove ſeveral ſquadrons of the enemy back to their army. At length the grenadiers in the wood, apprehenſive of being ſurrounded by the enemy, thought it prudent to retire near the leſt of the army, which gave the French an opportunity of poſſeſſing themſelves of that battery without oppoſition. The hereditary prince of Brunſwick, however, putting himſelf at the head of a battalion of Wolfenbuttle guards, repulſed a ſuperior force of the enemy, and retook the battery. But the French being by this time in poſſeſſion of a height which commanded and flanked both the lines of the infantry and the battery of the allies, which attack they could ſupport under cover of a hill, and his royal highneſs finding he could not diſlodge them, without expoſing his troops to imminent danger, he ordered a retreat to Hamelen, which was effected without the leaſt moleſtation from the enemy. The loſs of the allies were three hundred and twenty-ſeven men killed and miſſing, and nine hundred and ſeven wounded; while that of the French amounted to fifteen hundred, according to their own account.

The electorate of Hanover, and territories of Heſſe Caſſel, were now taken poſſeſſion of by the French. On the firſt of September his royal highneſs retired under the cannon of Stade, where it was imagined his army would have been able to have maintained their ground between the Aller and the Elbe, till the ſeverity of the ſeaſon would have put an end to the campaign; but the French, having made themſelves maſters of a little fort at the mouth of the river Zwinga, whereby they could have cut off his communication with the Elbe, his royal highneſs was in a manner compelled to ſign the convention of Cloſter Seven, by which thirty eight thouſand Hanoverians laid down their arms, and were diſperſed into different quarters of cantonment.

The ACTION near CAPE FRANCOIS on the 21st of Octr 1757 between his Majesty's Ships the Augusta, Dreadnought, & Edinburgh, under the Command of Captn Forrest, and seven French Men of War, when the latter where defeated, and obligd to sheer off in a shattered condition.

The courts both of London and Verſailles diſapproved of this convention. The former ſaw the electorate of Hanover left in the entire power of the enemy, and the latter was perſuaded that the terms granted by their general to the Hanoverian forces were too favorable, for which cauſes they refuſed to acknowledge the validity of the convention, except thoſe troops would formally engage that, during the preſent war, they would not ſerve againſt France.

The king of England, in quality of elector of Brunſwick and Lunenburg then publiſhed a declaration; in which he explained the motives which influenced his conduct, and induced him once more to have recourſe to arms.

The duke of Cumberland having reſigned the command of the electoral army, it was conferred on prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick, who about the latter end of the month of November put the troops in motion, and overtaking a body of two thouſand men, which formed the enemy's rear, attacked and totally routed them. Another action alſo happened upon the river Aller, between two conſiderable bodies of each army, in which the Hanoverians remained maſters of the field. Theſe advantages put the allies in poſſeſſion of Lunenburg, Zell, and part of the Brunſwick dominions, which the enemy were obliged to abandon, but not before they had committed the moſt terrible outrages; burning and deſtroying all the villages and farm houſes that fell in their way. They reduced the ſuburbs of Zell to aſhes, and cruelly ſet fire to the orphan-houſe, by which means many of the poor innocents periſhed in the flames.

The ſeverity of the ſeaſon preventing prince Ferdinand from purſuing his operations, he retreated to Ultzen and Lunenburgh, where his army was put into winter quarters.

During the courſe of the year, conſiderable ſucceſs attended the Engliſh cruizers. The Duc d'Aquitaine, a large ſhip of fifty guns, was taken in the month of June; and about the ſame time, the Aquilon, of nearly the ſame force, was driven aſhore and deſtroyed near Breſt. The Emerald, a French frigate of twenty-ſix guns, was taken by captain Gilchriſt; and a noble emulation to diſtinguiſh themſelves in the ſervice of their country, appeared among the ſea officers in general.

Very conſiderable ſucceſs alſo attended their operations in the Weſt Indies. Captain Forreſt, in the Auguſta, ſailed from Port Royal in the month of October, accompanied by the Dreadnought and Edinburgh, under the command of the captains Suckling and Langdon. He was ordered to cruize off Cape François, and performed his orders in the face of a French ſquadron, lately arrived at that place from the coaſt of Africa. The commander, piqued at being thus braved by an inferior armament, reſolved to come out of the harbour, and give them battle, or at leaſt expel them from thoſe ſeas, that the merchant ſhips, then laying at the Cape, might have a free paſſage to Europe. Accordingly, having reinforced his ſquadron with ſeveral ſtore ſhips, armed for the occaſion, he ſailed out of the harbour, and at ſeven in the morning the Dreadnought made a ſignal for ſeeing the enemy's fleet, conſiſting of ſeven large ſhips, a ſchooner, and a pilot boat. Captain Forreſt then hove out the ſignal for a line of battle a-head, and ſhortened ſail to let the enemy come up. At noon he perceived that the French fleet conſiſted of four large ſhips and three large frigates, on which he made a ſignal for the captains of the Dreadnought and Edinburgh, who readily agreed, to engage the enemy. Accordingly, they bore down upon the French; the action began with great fury, and continued for two hours and a half, when the French commodore made a ſignal for one of the frigates to tow him out of the line, and his example was ſpeedily followed by the reſt of his ſhips.

The Engliſh were in no condition to purſue the enemy, having ſuffered very conſiderably in their maſts, ſails and rigging. The French loſt above five hundred men in the action; while the Engliſh had only twenty-three killed, and eighty-nine wounded. Soon after, captain Forreſt, by a well conducted ſcheme, took a fleet of merchantmen, conſiſting of nine ſail, and carried them to Jamaica, where they were ſold for the benefit of the captors.

But to return to the domeſtic of affairs of England. On the 21ſt of December the parliament met at Weſtminſter, when his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he declared, "that it would have afforded him the higheſt ſatisfaction, to inform them at the beginning of the ſeſſion, that his ſucceſs in the proſecution, had been equal to the juſtice of his cauſe in the undertaking of the war. He expreſſed the moſt confident reliance on the ſpirit and bravery of his commanders, who, by the bleſſing of God, he hoped, would fruſtrate the attempts of his enemies, and aſſert the rights of his crown. He aſſured them of his determined reſolution, to exert his utmoſt efforts for the ſecurity of his kingdom, and for the recovery and protection of his juſt poſſeſſions in America, and elſewhere. He ſignified his ſincere concern for the preſervation of the proteſtant religion and the liberties of Europe; and his reſolution, on that account, to encourage and adhere to his allies. He obſerved, that the late ſucceſs in Germany had given a happy turn to affairs, which it was their duty to improve; and reminded them, that at ſuch a critical juncture the eyes of all Europe were upon them. He ardently recommended to them ſuch ſupport for his good brother and ally, the king of Pruſſia, as his valour, as well as zeal, for the common cauſe, would be found to merit."

A. D. 1758. The buſineſs of this ſeſſion was not diſpatched till the month of June, when his majeſty being indiſpoſed, the parliament was prorogued by the lord's commiſſioners.

Admiral Boſcawen ſailed, in the month of February, from St. Helen's with a fleet deſtined for making vigorous efforts againſt the enemy in North America; and ſoon after Sir Edward Hawke ſteered into the bay of Biſcay, with another ſquadron, in order to intercept any ſupplies from France, deſigned for Cape Breton, or Canada.

Commodore Holmes, about this time, made himſelf maſter of the town of Embden, belonging to his Pruſſian majeſty, which had fallen into the hands of the enemy during the laſt campaign.

On the 28th of March admiral Oſborne cruizing off Carthagena on the coaſt of Spain fell in with a ſquadron of the enemy commanded by the marquis du Queſne, conſiſting of four ſhips; the Foudrayant of eighty guns, the Orpheé of ſixty-four, the Oriflamme of fifty, and the Pleiade, a frigate of twenty-four, on their paſſage from Toulon, to reinforce M. de la Clue, who had for ſome time been blocked up by admiral Oſborne, in the bay of Carthagena. The enemy, immediately on deſcrying the Engliſh ſquadron, diſperſed, and steered different courses; upon which, the English admiral detached several ships in pursuit of each, while he himself, with the principal part of his fleet, stood into the bay of Carthagena, to watch the motions of the enemy in that port. Captain Storr, in the Revenge, came up with the Orpheé, about seven in the evening, and took her after a very smart engagement. The Foudroyant, one of the largest ships in the French navy, was engaged by the Monmouth of sixty-four guns, commanded by the brave captain Gardiner, who lost his life in the action; but the fight was continued by his lieutenant, Mr. Carkett, until the Foudroyant was obliged to strike. The frigate made her escape, and the Oriflamme was driven on shore.

In the beginning of April Sir Edward Hawke discovered a French fleet consisting of five ships of the line, six frigates, and forty transports, having on board three thousand troops, and a large quantity of stores and provisions, for their settlements in North America, lying at anchor off the island of Aix. As soon as the French saw the English fleet standing for them, they slipped cable, and fled with the utmost precipitation. Some of them escaped to sea, but the greater number ran into shoal water, where they could not be followed, and by throwing overboard their guns, stores and ballast, got into the river Charente. Their loading, however, was lost, and the design of their equipment wholly frustrated; while the conquests of the English, in North America were, by these means greatly facilitated.

But the general joy that arose from these successes was damped by the unfortunate loss of his majesty's ship Prince George of 90 guns, commanded by rear admiral Broderick, which took fire at sea, on the 30th of April, and was entirely consumed. Near five hundred of the crew perished on this melancholy occasion, but the admiral, captain, four lieutenants, purser, chaplain, master, two lieutenants of marines, boatswain, three passengers, fourteen petty officers, and about two hundred and thirty men were saved.

The scheme for a descent on France was now renewed: two powerful squadrons were accordingly equipped, the one, consisting of eleven sail of the line, commanded by lord Anson and Sir Edward Hawke; the other, composed of four sail of the line, two fire ships, two bombs, twenty tenders, ten store ships, and one hundred transports, was put under the direction of commodore Howe. On board the latter was embarked a body of forces, consisting of sixteen regiments, nine troops of light horse, and six thousand marines, under the command of the duke of Marlborough. The troops, which had been for some time encamped in the Isle of Wight, were embarked the latter end of May, and on the first of June sailed from St. Helen's for the coast of Britany; the squadron commanded by lord Anson, standing to the westward, and the other steering right athwart the channel.

They had hardly left the English coast, when the weather became very tempestuous, and a little before midnight the commodore made a signal for the fleet to lay too, lest they should run on the French shore, before break of day. It continued to blow a strong gale all night, so that they could not make sail again till six the next morning. About eight they saw Cape la Hogue, whither they directed their course, but being retarded by the strong tide against them, did not reach the island till evening, when the whole fleet came to an anchor in the channel.

Early the next morning they got under sail and stood directly for St. Malo. On the fourth, about five in the afternoon, being entirely becalmed, they came within a league of the place. They weighed next morning before day-break, and stood along the coast, till they entered the bay of Cancalle, where they intended to disembark their forces. About eight o'clock the commodore made a signal for the ships with the grenadiers on board to make sail, and about four in the afternoon the whole fleet came to an anchor, except three or four frigates which stood on towards a battery, that might impede the landing of the forces. Ten companies of grenadiers, under the command of general Mostyn, were now in the flat bottomed boats, waiting for the signal to put off. The battery on shore fired at the frigates as they advanced but was soon silenced; and the grenadiers landed just before sunset, without any other opposition, than a few shot fired from behind a windmill by some peasants, who fled at the appearance of a serjeant and twelve men; as seven companies of foot and three troops of dragoons had done before, on perceiving the English begin to advance towards the shore.

The grenadiers were no sooner drawn up on the beach, than lord Downe, at the head of twenty men, marched through a very narrow pass up to the village, where they were met by the marquis of Landal, intendant of the coast, and one of his servants. Lord Downe assured him, that if he would surrender, he had nothing to fear; but he foolishly refused quarter, and was shot dead on the spot, together with his servant and two horses.

After taking possession of the village of Cancalle, the grenadiers lay all night on their arms. The next day the disembarkation was effected, and the troops encamped at Cancalle. The day following, as soon as it was light, the whole army, except the third brigade, struck their tents, and began to march in two columns. The first column consisting of the brigade of guards, two battalions of grenadiers, and the first brigade, commanded by lieutenant general lord George Sackville, marched from the left till they fell into the great road leading to St. Malo. The second column, consisting of the second and fourth brigades, commanded by the earl of Ancram, marched also from the left through a country wholly enclosed, and a road so remarkably narrow, that two hundred pioneers, who marched at the head of the division, were frequently obliged to continue their rout in single files. At the same time the hedges on each side the road so intercepted their view, that they could seldom see above forty yards clear of their flanks. They found the villages through which they passed entirely deserted by the inhabitants, and the houses stripped of every thing they could possibly carry away. The march was conducted with great ardour and without beat of drum; but though the distance was no more than six miles, it was late in the evening before they reached their ground. The general officers then reconnoitred the situation of St. Malo, and ordered the ground to be marked out at the distance of something more than a mile from the town. Parties of light horse were immediately detached to different quarters of the country to scour the road and make discoveries. One of these detachments perceived a large bason behind the town, into which all the shipping belonging to the port, was collected, and hid from the sight of our fleet by a prodigious large ſtore-houſe built in the form of a rotunda near the rope walk. Information of this diſcovery being given to the duke of Marlborough, he ſent all the horſemen with a foot ſoldier mounted behind each of them, with hand granades and matches, who, through covert of the night, marched under their cannon to the walls of the harbour, where they found a large fleet, conſiſting of men of war, privateers and merchant-men, to which they applied their combuſtibles, and then proceeded to communicate the flames to the magazines of pitch, tar, ropes, &c. all which in the ſpace of a few hours exhibited a ſhocking ſcene of conflagration. The ſhips were all aground, ſo that not one of them could be moved, by which means two men of war, one of fifty, the other of thirty guns, thirty-three privateers from thirty to eighteen guns each, and above ſeventy ſail of merchant-men, together with a prodigious quantity of naval ſtores, were totally deſtroyed.

The duke of Marlborough expecting a ſally from the town, ordered the ſecond brigade to march in ſupport of the piquets, about eleven o'clock at night; and the whole deſign was accompliſhed without the leaſt attempt from the enemy, though it was known, that a conſiderable body of troops had the preceding day thrown themſelves into the town from the other ſide of the river. The ſhipping continued to burn during the whole night, and as the army had landed with proviſions only for two days, foraging parties were ſent out the next morning.

During the encampment of the army near St. Malo, one of the battalions of guards marched under the command of colonel Cæſar, twelve miles up the country, to a town called Doll, where they were politely entertained by the magiſtrates; and as their deſign was only to reconnoitre the country, they continued one night in the town without committing the leaſt act of hoſtility, and then returned to their camp. Part of the light horſe advancing ſtill farther, fell in with the vedelle of a French camp, two of whom they took, and brought priſoners to the Engliſh camp, after a long purſuit.

By this time it was evident that the town of St. Malo was too well fortified to admit of any hope of ſucceſs, all thoughts of inveſting it were therefore laid aſide, and the general having received repeated advices that the enemy were buſily employed in aſſembling forces to attack his camp, he returned to Cancalle, where commodore Howe had made ſuch a maſterly diſpoſition of the boats and tranſports, that the troops were re-embarked with great eaſe and expedition. The ſoldiers, while they remained on ſhore, were reſtrained from all outrages by the moſt ſevere diſcipline, and they even left unpillaged thoſe houſes which the French inhabitants had abandoned.

As ſoon as the troops were all embarked the fleet left Cancalle bay, and, after encountering the fury of a tempeſtuous ſea for near a fortnight, came to an anchor near Cherburgh, and on the 1ſt of July arrived in the road of St. Helen's. The ſoldiers were landed on the Iſle of Wight, and a conſiderable part of them ſent, under the command of the duke of Marlborough and lord George Sackville, to reinforce the allied army in Germany.

All proper preparations having been made, and the forces again re-embarked, the fleet ſailed from St. Helen's on the 1ſt of Auguſt, and after a tedious paſſage anchored on the ſeventh before Cherburg. The French, expecting the viſit, had thrown up an intrenchment from the fort de Ecourdeville, ſituated about two miles to the weſtward of Cherburg, along the coaſt for the ſpace of four miles, and fortified it with ſeveral batteries at proper diſtances. Behind this intrenchment a body of horſe and infantry appeared in red and blue uniforms; but as they did not advance to the open beach, the landing of the Britiſh forces was not attended with much danger. At firſt a bomb-ketch was ſent to anchor near the town, and throw a few ſhells into the place, as a feint to amuſe the enemy, and deceive them with regard to the ſpot where they intended to land, which was near a league to the weſtward of Querqueville, the weſternmoſt fort in the bay. The other bomb-ketches, being poſted along ſhore, galled the intrenchments conſiderably, not only by throwing ſhells, but loading their mortars with balls, which being thrown a great diſtance, and ſcattering as they flew, did great execution. While theſe ketches kept an inceſſant fire on the trenches, the grenadiers and guards landed without oppoſition, and formed on the beach, having a natural breaſt-work in their front. On the left the ground was interſected with hedges, and from this quarter the enemy advanced in good order. The Britiſh troops, as ſoon as they perceived their approach, quitted the breaſt-work in order to meet them, and a random fire began; but the French edging to the left, took poſſeſſion of the hill, from whence they and the advanced poſts of the Engliſh exchanged a few ſtraggling ſhot.

During this ſkirmiſh the reſt of the infantry were diſembarked, and the enemy took advantage of the night to retire. General Bligh, who now commanded the Britiſh forces, encamped at the village of Erville, and the next morning marched towards Cherburgh. An advanced party took poſſeſſion of Fort Querqueville, which the enemy had abandoned, together with the lines and batteries along the ſhore.

When the Britiſh forces reached Cherburgh, they found the place entirely deſerted by the enemy, and the gates being open, entered it without the leaſt oppoſition; while the inhabitants, encouraged by a manifeſto, containing a promiſe of protection, chearfully entertained them. This place was remarkable for a curious baſon built at an immenſe expence, which, if the whole plan had been compleated, would have formed one of the fineſt ports in the known world. Such was the curioſity of this port, when the Engliſh became maſters of it; and which, with conſiderable labour and difficulty, was totally deſtroyed.

During the time that the engineers employed themſelves in demoliſhing the works, the light horſe ſcoured the country, and detachments were every day ſent out towards Walloign, at the diſtance of four leagues from Cherburgh, where the enemy was encamped, and every hour received reinforcements. Several ſkirmiſhes enſued between the advanced parties of each army, and in one of theſe captain Lindſay, a gallant young officer, who had been very aſſiduous in training the light horſe, was mortally wounded.

The baſon, harbour, and ſluice of Cherburgh, being deſtroyed, together with all the enemy's forts and artillery in the neighbourhood, on the ſixteenth of Auguſt, the forces marched down to the beach, and re-embarked at Fort-Galet, without the leaſt annoyance.

The next day the fleet ſailed for the coaſt of England, and anchored in Weymouth-road, under the high-land of Portland. In two days they again got under ſail, and ſtood to the ſouthward; but contrary winds obliged them to return to the ſame ſtation. The ſecond effort was more effectual; they reached the French coaſt, and arrived in the bay of St. Lunaire, two leagues to the weſtward of St. Malo, upon which it was determined to make another attempt. The ſloops and ketches being poſted along ſhore to cover the landing, the troops were diſembarked on an open beach, and a ſmall party detached to the harbour of St. Briac above the town of St. Malo, where they deſtroyed ſome ſmall veſſels; but St. Malo itſelf being carefully reconnoitered appeared to be impregnable either by land forces or ſhipping, ſo that the deſign againſt it was laid aſide. The general, unwilling to embark without attempting ſome ſtep for the further annoyance of the enemy, reſolved to penetrate into the country, regulating his motions, however, by thoſe of the fleet, which, by this time, had quitted the bay of St. Lunaire, where it could not ride in ſafety, and anchored in the bay of St. Cas, about three leagues to the weſtward.

On the 8th of September the army began its march to St. Guildo, which they reached in the evening, and the next day continuing their route, they encamped in the open ground about three miles from the bay of St. Cas, which was immediately reconnoitered for re-embarkation, the general having received certain intelligence that the duke d'Aiquillon had advanced from Breſt to Lambale, within ſix miles of the Engliſh camp at the head of twelve regular battalions, two regiments of militia, eight mortars, and ten pieces of cannon."

Had our troops decamped in the night in ſilence, they might poſſibly have reached the beach before the enemy had received the leaſt notice of their deſign; but inſtead of this cautious method of proceeding, the generale was beat about two in the morning, which could not fail of alarming the French. Before three the troops were all in motion, and met with ſeveral little ſkirmiſhes on their march; but no conſiderable body of the enemy appeared till the embarkation was begun, when a battery of ſix pieces of cannon was opened, near a windmill, from which they maintained a cloſe fire on the troops while embarking. At noon the enemy opened a battery of cohorns, behind the hedge, on the right of the mill; but the ſhips and ketches kept ſo inceſſant a fire upon it, that they threw only two ſhells among the troops, which did ſome damage.

By this time the greater part of our troops were embarked, but the rear-guard conſiſting of all the grenadiers, and half of the firſt regiment of guards amounting to about twelve hundred men, remained on the ſhore under command of major-general Drury, to cover the battalions while embarking. On the enemy's advancing that officer ordered his troops to form, and march from behind the banks that covered them in order to attack them before they could form on the plain. At the firſt onſet the French gave way, but continual ſuccours of the enemy arriving, they, in their turn, repelled the Engliſh. General Drury was now too late convinced of his error; for the ſecond diviſion could not get over the breaſt-work time enough to ſuccour the firſt, which was entirely broken, and with great difficulty got back. The enemy having now got poſſeſſion of the dyke, kept a continal fire upon the grenadiers, and the general ſeeing that a retreat was the only remedy, ordered the whole body immediately to wheel to the right, and make to the boats as faſt as poſſible. Some embarked, but a battery which the French had erected on the middle of the hill, played ſo furiouſly, that many of the boats were beat to pieces. The enemy ſeeing no retreat left to the grenadiers, mounted the dyke, and by a vaſt ſuperiority of numbers, drove thoſe that remained into the ſea, where the greateſt part of them were cut to pieces, or drowned. During the laſt attack, the fire from the ſhips was rendered ineffectual, becauſe the Engliſh would have ſuffered equally with the French. General Drury was ſhot in the breaſt, but by the help of a grenadier, he ſtripped off his cloaths, and plunged into the water, where he periſhed, which was likewiſe the fate of a conſiderable number of officers as well as ſoldiers.

Our loſs amounted to about one thouſand men, among whom was Sir John Armitage, a volunteer. After the action was over, ſeveral polite meſſages paſſed between the reſpective commanders in chief with mutual aſſurances that the wounded ſhould be attended to with the utmoſt care and humanity. Commodore Howe then ſailed for the coaſt of England, and arriving at Spithead on the 18th of September, the forces were diſembarked.

The miniſtry having reſolved for a conſiderable time to attack the French ſettlements on the coaſt of Africa, the deſign was this year carried into execution. The plan was concerted by Mr. Cumming, a quaker, a man of acute penetration, and happy invention. This perſon, who, as a private merchant, had made a voyage to that part of the coaſt, obſerved the extenſive trade carried on by the French, and even contracted a perſonal acquaintance with Amir, the mooriſh king of Legibelli; in whoſe dominions the moſt important branches of trade are carried on. The French, beſides other articles of commerce, were in poſſeſſion of the whole gum trade, a great quantity of which is uſed in the manufactures of Great-Britain, and which could only be procured at an exorbitant price from the Dutch, who had taken care to purchaſe the whole from the French.

It was evident to Mr. Cumming, that though the gum trade was of the utmoſt importance, yet it was not the only article that could be purchaſed here to advantage, as the country abounded with gold duſt, elephants teeth, hides, cotton, oſtrich feathers, bees-wax, indigo, ambergreaſe, and civet. He farther obſerved, that Amir, the African prince, entertained a favourable opinion of the Engliſh, and a deſire of trading with them; and was ſo exaſperated againſt the French, that he declared his moſt ardent deſire of their extermination from the river Senegal; adding, that he could wiſh the king of England would ſend an armament to reduce Fort Louis and the iſland of Goree, promiſing to join the Britiſh forces, and grant the Engliſh merchants an excluſive trade.

Mr. Cumming on his return to England informed the government of the great advantages which would accrue to the nation from ſuch an attempt. It was, however, little noticed at that time; but at length the principal difficulties being overcome, a ſmall ſquadron was equipped for this expedition, under the command of captain Marſh, having on board a body of marines, commanded by major Maſon, with a detachment of artillery, ten pieces of cannon, eight mortars, and a conſiderable quantity of warlike ſtores and ammunition. Captain Walker Walker was appointed engineer, and Mr. Cumming was concerned as chief director and promoter of the expedition.

About the beginning of March this little armament ſailed from St. Helen's, and in their paſſage touched at the iſland of Teneriff, and while the ſhips were taking in their wine and water, Mr. Cumming proceeded in the Swan ſloop to Portenderrick, charged with a letter of credence to the king of that country, who had, in his laſt viſit, favoured him with an excluſive trade on that coaſt, by a formal charter written in the Arabic language. But on his arrival, he unfortunately found the prince had engaged in a new war with a neighbouring nation, and that he was heading his army at a very conſiderable diſtance from his capital. One of the chiefs, however, diſpatched a meſſenger to the king, with advice of their arrival and deſign; declaring, at the ſame time, that he would uſe the utmoſt expedition in aſſembling three hundred warriors to join the Engliſh troops, and that he was perſuaded the king would reinforce them by a detachment from his army.

Captain Marſh with the reſt of the armament had now arrived at Portenderrick, and without waiting for the Indian forces, which were not yet ready, they ſailed again on the 22d of April, and the next day at four in the afternoon diſcovered the French flag flying at Fourt Louis. The Britiſh commander came to an anchor in Senegal road, after taking a large Dutch ſhip, loaded with gum, and ſoon perceived that the French had placed ſeveral armed ſloops at the mouth of the river to diſpute the paſſage of the bar, which is very dangerous.

The Engliſh, however, without loſing any time, prepared for landing, and employed all the boats in the fleet to carry the ſtores on board the ſmall craft; though the enemy's armed veſſels kept firing on them, over a narrow track of land. The neceſſary preparations being made, the veſſels weighed anchor in order to paſs the bar; and the wind, which generally blows down the river, veering about, captain Millar in the London buſs, ſeized the opportunity, and paſſing the bar, dropped anchor on the inſide, where he lay all night expoſed to the whole fire of the enemy. Next day he was joined by the other veſſels, when a regular engagement enſued, which was warmly maintained on both ſides, till the buſſes and one dogger running aground, immediately bulged, and were filled with water. This misfortune obliged the troops to take to their boats; and notwithſtanding the difficulties that ſurrounded them, they reached the ſhore, where they were formed in a body and ſoon after joined by their companions from the other veſſels; the whole now amounting to three hundred and ninety marines, beſides the detachment of artillery. As they expected to be attacked by the natives, who lined the ſhore at ſome diſtance, they threw up an intrenchment, and as great part of their ſtores lay under water, they began to diſembark them immediately.

Having, on the following day, obtained a conſiderable re-inforcement of ſeamen from the ſhips, their intention was to make an immediate attack on Fort Louis; but this deſign was prevented by the arrival of two French deputies at the entrenchments with propoſals from the governor for a capitulation. A ſhort time having paſſed in deliberation, it was agreed, that all the white people belonging to the French company of Senegal ſhould be ſafely conducted to France in an Engliſh veſſel, without being deprived of their effects; that all the merchandize and uncoined treaſure ſhould be delivered up to the victors; that all the forts, ſtore-houſes, veſſels, arms, proviſions, and every article belonging to the company in that river, ſhould be put into the hands of the Engliſh immediately after the capitulation ſhould be ſigned; that the free natives living at Fort Louis ſhould remain in quiet poſſeſſion of their effects, and in the free exerciſe of their religion; and that all negroes, mulattoes, and others, who could prove themſelves free, ſhould be at their option, either to retire to any diſtant part of the country, or to remain in the place.

The captains Campbell and Walker were immediately ſent up the river with a flag of truce, to ſee the articles ſigned and executed. Having rowed towards a battery, on a point of the iſland, they lay upon their oars near an hour, beating the chamade; but not the leaſt notice was taken of their approach.

Being at a loſs to account for this ſtrange conduct, they returned to their intrenchment, where they learned that the negroes on the iſland were in arms, and had blocked up the French in Fort Louis, reſolving to defend the place to the laſt extremity, unleſs they were included in the capitulation. This intelligence was alſo communicated to the governor, who, at the ſame time, informed the Engliſh commander, that unleſs the French director-general ſhould be permitted to remain with the natives, as a ſecurity for that article of the capitulation in which they were concerned, they would ſuffer themſelves to be cut to pieces rather than ſubmit.

This requeſt was chearfully granted by the Engliſh, who directly began their march for Fort Louis, accompanied by a number of long-boats, in which the artillery and ſtores had been embarked. As ſoon as the French ſaw them advancing, they ſtruck their flag, and major Maſon took poſſeſſion of the caſtle, where he found ninety-two pieces of cannon, with much treaſure and merchandize. The corporation and burghers of the town of Senegal readily ſubmitted, and ſwore allegiance to his Britannic majeſty: the neighbouring princes, attended by numerous retinues, viſited the commander, and concluded treaties with the Engliſh, and the king of Legibelli ſent an ambaſſador from his camp to major Maſon, with aſſurances of his friendſhip, compliments of congratulation, and preſents.

About three thouſand free negroes and mullatoes were ſettled at Senegal, many of whom enjoyed poſſeſſions of their own. Thus without loſing a ſingle man, Great-Britain obtained a conqueſt, from which, with proper management, ſhe might derive conſiderable wealth.

Having left an Engliſh garriſon at Fort Louis, and placed a ſufficient number of armed boats to ſecure the paſſage of the bar, the large ſhips proceeded to make an attempt upon the iſland of Goree, thirty leagues diſtant from Senegal, where the French company had conſiderable magazines.

This expedition, however, for want of a ſufficient force, miſcarried. But the miniſtry being ſenſible that the Engliſh ſettlements on the coaſt of Africa could never be ſecure while the French kept poſſeſſion of this iſland, they fitted out a ſquadron, the command of which was given to commodore Keppel. This ſquadron, which conſiſted of the Torbay, Fougueux, Naſſau, Prince Edward, and Dunkirk, ſeveral frigates, two bomb-

ketches

ketches. and ſome tranſports, having ſeven hundred regular troops on board, ſailed from Cork, on the eleventh of November. After a very tempeſtuous paſſage, they arrived at Goree, on the twenty-eighth of December, when the commodore immediately made a diſpoſition for attacking the iſland.

All the flat bottomed boats were ſent on board the tranſports, for diſembarking the land forces; accordingly they were, to the number of ſix hundred men, in their reſpective boats in the ſpace of five hours, during which the ſhips of war finiſhed all their preparations.

As it was thought adviſeable to attack the iſland on the weſt-ſide, orders were given that one of the bombs ſhould go down firſt, and that the Prince Edward, to cover her from the fire of the enemy, ſhould anchor a-breaſt of a ſmall battery, a little below the citadel, on the north. Captain Sayer, in the Naſſau, was ordered to lead the line of battle on the right, anchoring a-breaſt of St. Peter's battery, of five guns. The Dunkirk followed in the order, and was to bring up a-breaſt of a battery, a little to the northward of the former. The commodore followed in the Torbay, taking for his part the weſt point battery of five guns, with the weſtern corner of St. Francis's fort, of four guns of a ſmaller ſize. Captain Knight, in the Fougeux, having the ſecond ſtation on the left, bringing up the rear, with directions at the ſame time to cover the other bombs, on his ſtarboard quarter, had allotted to his ſhare the mortar battery of eight guns, ſo called from two large mortars, which are covered by the battery.

As ſoon as the fire ſhip had dropped her anchor from her ſtern, ſhe was to hoiſt a pendant at her mizen, to acquaint the next ſhip that ſhe had brought up; thus the ſecond was to acquaint the third; and ſo on to the reſt. Particular orders were likewiſe given not to fire a gun, until each had his ſhip a-breaſt of his ſtation, and was moored both head and ſtern. On the captain's departure, the commodore's laſt orders were, to get on board their ſhips, and lead on as faſt as they poſſibly could.

The Prince Edward, with the Fire Drake bomb, bore down towards the iſland about nine o'clock, and in ten minutes after the action began, by throwing a ſhell from the bomb. In a moment the enemy returned the fire from both forts and batteries; and with their ſecond ſhot carried away the Prince Edward's enſign ſtaff, and ſet fire to an arm-cheſt, which, blowing up, killed one of the marines.

The gallant and intrepid behaviour of the Prince Edward was witneſſed by the whole ſquadron. The commodore ſaw, with concern, the Naſſau tedious in getting under ſail; but as there could be no reaſon to ſuſpect an officer of captain Sayer's approved valour, imagining that a foul cable might occaſion the delay, he turned his thoughts to other matters, which might poſſibly further the proſecution of the deſign. Obſerving that the Fire Drake over-charged her mortars, all her ſhells falling far beyond the iſland to the ſouth, he ſent his boat on board the Furnace bomb, with this meſſage. "That, as they ſaw the error of the other, in "over-charging the mortars, they would avoid "that extreme: and that, as the enemy ſeemed "bent upon ſinking the Prince Edward, and the "Fire Drake, he deſired they would, at the diſ-"tance they then were, begin the fire; and en-"deavour, as much as poſſible, to draw part of "the enemy's attention from their ſuffering "friends." The orders were immediately obeyed, ſhe bore down cloſe under the Fougueux's ſtern, and getting upon the larboard quarter, began her fire.

As the wind began to fall, both the Torbay and Fougueux were greatly hindered in bearing down; another misfortune alſo attended the commander of the Furnace bomb; for, endeavouring to come under the Torbay's ſtern, he ran athwart the Fougueux's lee bow, which cauſed a ſecond delay; but her aſſiſtance was not indiſpenſably requiſite, as the fire of the Torbay alone was ſufficient to have razed the very foundation of the iſland itſelf.

The line of battle ſhips now poured in their broadſides without intermiſſion, and their fire was returned with equal ſpirit from all the batteries of the iſland. At length the cannonading from the ſhips became ſo ſevere and terrible, that the French ſoldiers fled from their quarters in ſpite of all the efforts of the governor, who endeavoured to keep them to their duty, which obliged him at length to ſtrike his colours and ſurrender at diſcretion. The commodore then ſent a detachment of marines on ſhore, who diſarmed the garriſon, and hoiſted the Britiſh flag on the caſtle of St. Michael. Two trading veſſels that happened to be at anchor in the road likewiſe fell into the hands of the victors, with ſtores, money, and merchandize to the amount of twenty thouſand pounds. This important conqueſt coſt the Engliſh only one hundred men killed and wounded. Commodore Keppel having left a garriſon at Goree, and reinforced that of Senegal, returned with his ſquadron to England.

During theſe tranſactions, events of much greater importance happened in America, where, excluſive of the fleet and marines, the government had aſſembled about fifty thouſand men. Lord Loudon having returned to England, the chief command devolved on major-general Abercrombie; but as the objects of operation were various, the forces were divided into three bodies under three diſtinct commanders. Twelve thouſand were deſtined for an attack on Cape Breton, under the command of major general Amherſt: ſixteen thouſand were reſerved under the direction of the general himſelf, for the reduction of Crown Point; and eight thouſand were allotted for the conqueſt of Fort du Queſne, under the command of brigadier general Forbes.

General Amherſt, on the twenty-eighth of May, embarked his troops at Halifax, in Nova Scotia, and ſailed for Louiſbourgh with an Engliſh ſquadron, commanded by admiral Boſcawen; the whole fleet conſiſting of one hundred and fifty-ſeven ſail. On the ſecond of June, they anchored in Gabarus-bay, about ſeven miles to the weſtward of Louiſbourg. The garriſon of this place conſiſted of two thouſand five hundred regular troops, three hundred militia, formed of the burghers, under the command of the chevalier Drucour, who had taken every precaution in his power to prevent the Britiſh forces from landing on the iſland; having for this purpoſe erected a chain of forts, extending two leagues and a half along the moſt acceſſable parts of the beach. Batteries were alſo erected, and entrenchments thrown up, and the mouth of the harbour was guarded by ſix ſhips of the line and five frigates, three of which were ſunk at the haven's mouth in order to render the paſſage impaſſable to our fleet.

Notwithſtanding theſe diſpoſitions our troops, amidſt amidſt innumerable difficulties, made good their landing on the 8th of June under the command of the gallant brigadier general Wolfe, after which the ſiege was carried on with ſuch vigour and reſolution, that the French governor, finding it impoſſible to withſtand the fury of the aſſault, thought proper to capitulate, by which he and his garriſon became priſoners of war.

The Echo frigate, which had made its eſcape out of the harbour, was taken by the Engliſh cruizers, and from the officers of this ſhip the admiral learned that the Bizarre, another frigate, accompanied by the Cornete, had ſailed from Louiſbourg the very day the troops were landed. The Enterprenant, Capricieux, and Celebre, all ſhips of the line, were ſet on fire by the ſhells, and burned to aſhes; ſo that the Prudent and Bienfaiſant only remained in the harbour; and theſe the admiral undertook to deſtroy. Accordingly, in the night between the twenty-fifth and twenty-ſixth of July, the boats of the ſquadron, divided into two detachments, were ſent into the harbour, under the command of two young captains, Lafore and Belfour. They executed their orders through a terrible diſcharge of cannon and muſquetry, and boarded the enemy ſword in hand. The Prudent, being a-ground, was ſet on fire and deſtroyed; and the ſailors towed the Bienfaiſant out of the harbour in triumph.

In conſequence of the capitulation of the governor of Louiſbourg, major Farquhar took poſſeſſion of the weſtern gate, and brigadier Whitmore was detached to diſarm the garriſon, and poſt the neceſſary guards at the entrances of the magazines and on the ramparts.

Thus, at the expence of four hundred men killed and wounded, the Engliſh obtained poſſeſſion of the important iſland of Cape Breton, and the ſtrong town of Louiſbourg, in which the victors found two hundred and twenty-one pieces of cannon, and eighteen mortars, together with a large quantity of ſtores and ammunition. The merchants and inhabitants were ſent to France in Engliſh ſhips; but the garriſon, ſea officers, marines, and ſeamen, were tranſported to England.

All things being properly ſettled at Cape Breton, ſeveral ſhips were detached, with a body of forces commanded by lieutenant colonel lord Rollo, to take poſſeſſion of the iſland of St. John, a ſmall but fertile place in the gulph of St. Lawrence. The inhabitants made no oppoſition, but readily brought in their arms and ſurrendered. At the governor's quarters, lord Rollo found ſeveral ſcalps of Engliſhmen, whom the ſavages had butchered, in conſequence of the encouragement given them for ſuch inhuman proceedings, by their French patrons and allies. This iſland abounded in grain, was well ſtocked with cattle, and contained about four thouſand inhabitants.

During theſe tranſactions, general Abercrombie inveſted Ticonderoga, a fort ſituated on the point of land between lake George and a narrow gut, communicating with lake Champlain. Our troops marched up to the attack with the utmoſt intrepidity, and ſuſtained a moſt terrible fire from the enemy's cannon; till the general finding them ſo well covered and ſo impregnably fortified, took ſuch meaſures for ſecuring a retreat, that his army retired to their former camp, with the loſs of about eighteen hundred men, including many officers. Brigadier general Forbes was more fortunate in his attempt on fort du Queſne, which having reduced, he called Fort Pitſburg.

The whole kingdom was filled with exultation on the valuable conqueſts of the iſlands of Cape Breton and St. John; and eleven pair of colours taken at Louiſbourg were, by his majeſty's order, carried in a pompous parade, eſcorted by a party of horſe, and foot guards, with kettle drums and trumpets, from Kenſington palace to the cathedral of St. Paul, where they were depoſited as trophies, under a diſcharge of cannon, and other expreſſions of triumph and exultation.

The moſt important tranſactions in the Weſt-Indies were the protection of our commerce, and two gallant feats performed by captain Tyrrel, who, in the Buckingham, aſſiſted by the Cambridge, demoliſhed a ſmall fort in Grand Ana bay in the iſland of Martinico, and took four privateers, one of which he converted into a tender, and deſtroyed the other three.

When the fort was demoliſhed, the men, fluſhed with victory, warmly ſolicited leave to deſtroy a village ſituated near it; but their valiant commander replied, "Gentlemen, it is beneath us to "render a number of poor people miſerable by "deſtroying their habitations; brave Engliſhmen "ſcorn to diſtreſs even their enemies, when not in "arms againſt them." This ſpeech, which redounds to the honour of humanity, had the deſired effect on the brave tars, in conſequence of which the dwellings of the poor inoffenſive villagers were ſaved from deſtruction.

Some months after this, captain Tyrrel, being detached in the Buckingham on a cruize, diſcovered a fleet of nineteen ſail between the iſlands of Montſerrat and Guadaloupe, under the convoy of a French man of war called the Floriſſant, and two frigates. The brave Tyrrel, undiſmayed by their ſtrength and number, immediately gave chace with all the ſail he could carry. The enemy were prepared to receive him; but after a ſhort engagement became intimidated by his briſk fire, which ſoon diſabled the two frigates, and preſſed hard on the Floriſſant, that now made ſail in order to eſcape; but Tyrrel prevented her deſign by getting within piſtol ſhot, and pouring into her a whole broadſide, which did great execution.

The ſalutation was returned with equal courage, and a moſt furious engagement enſued: captain Tyrrel received a wound in his face and loſt three fingers of his right hand, which obliged him to leave the command of his ſhip to his firſt lieutenant, who continued the action with great bravery until he loſt his life; the charge then deſcended to the ſecond lieutenant, who behaved with equal intrepidity, and maintained a moſt deſperate engagement. At length, the fire of the Floriſſant ceaſed, and ſhe ſtruck her colours. At this time, the ſea ran ſo high, and the Buckingham was in ſo ſhattered a condition, that they could not immediately board the enemy; which being perceived by the commander, he ſpread all the ſail he could, and made his eſcape. But though the gallant Tyrrel was diſappointed of his prize, the action will ever be remembered with honour. The Buckingham had twenty men killed and wounded; but the Floriſſant had above one hundred and eighty killed, and three hundred wounded; ſhe was alſo greatly diſabled in her hull.

The war in the Eaſt-Indies was, in the interim, carried on with vigour, though not always with ſucceſs. Vice admiral Pocock, being joined by commodore Stephens in Madraſs road with the reinforcements from England, ſailed on the twenty-ſeventh of March with the Yarmouth, Elizabeth, Tyger, Weymouth, Cumberland, Newcaſtle, Saliſbury, Queenborough, and Protector ſtore-ſhip, in order to get to windward of St. David's, to intercept the French ſquadron, which he had reaſon to expect.

He diſcovered ſeven ſhips, on the twenty-ninth in the morning, in St. David's road, getting under ſail, and two cruizing in the offing, formed the line of battle a-head. The admiral judged it neceſſary to form his line of battle alſo; and as ſoon as his ſhips had got into their ſtation, bore down upon M. d'Arché, but was obliged to make the ſignals for the Newcaſtle and Weymouth, obſerving that they did not bear away at the ſame time.

Although the enemy fired upon the Engliſh while they were going down, the admiral did not make the ſignal to engage, till he was within half muſquet ſhot of the Zodiaque, M. d'Aché's ſhip, which was about three o'clock in the afternoon. A few minutes after he made the ſignal for a cloſer engagement, which was immediately complied with by thoſe of the van. At half an hour paſt four, obſerving the rear of the French line had drawn up pretty cloſe to the Zodiaque, the admiral made the Cumberland, Newcaſtle, and Weymouth ſignals to make up and engage cloſe. After maintaining a warm fight for about two hours, the French commander bore away with his whole fleet, and then being reinforced with two ſhips formed the line of battle again to leeward. Admiral Pocock's own ſhip and three others being greatly diſabled in their maſts and rigging, he did not think it prudent to purſue them with all the ſail he could carry; but followed at ſuch a diſtance, that he might renew the action the next morning. In this, however, he was diſappointed, for the enemy ſhewed no lights nor made any ſignals that could be obſerved, and in the morning not one of them was to be ſeen. The admiral, therefore, concluding they had weathered him in the night, by being able to carry more ſail, continued his endeavours to work up after them until ſix in the morning of the firſt of May, when finding he loſt ground conſiderably, he came to an anchor about three leagues to the northward of Madraſs.

M. Lally now landed his troops at Pondicherry, and taking the field, immediately laid ſiege to Fort St. David, while the French ſhips blocked it up by ſea. The Engliſh ſhips being at anchor in the road when the enemy arrived, their captains ſeeing no poſſibility of eſcaping, ran them on ſhore, ſet them on fire, and retired with their men into the fort, which was obliged, however, to ſurrender after a few days ſiege.

Having repaired the moſt material damages of his ſhips, admiral Pocock put to ſea the tenth of May, with an intent to get up to fort St. David, but was not able to effect it. He got ſight of Pondicherry on the thirtieth, and the next morning the French ſquadron ſtood out of the road, and got away, notwithſtanding the admiral's utmoſt endeavours to come up with them. On the ſixth of June, upon receiving an account that fort St. David had ſurrendered to the French, he judged it prudent to return immediately to Madraſs, in order to take in proper refreſhments.

On the twenty fifth day of July the admiral again ſailed in queſt of the enemy, and on the twenty-ſeventh in the evening got within three leagues of Pondicherry road, where he perceived their ſquadron at anchor, conſiſting of eight ſail of the line and a frigate. They got under ſail the next morning and ſtood to the ſouthward. The admiral made the ſignal to chace, and endeavoured to weather them, as the moſt probable means of bringing them to action, which, however, he was not able to accompliſh till the third of Auguſt, when taking the advantage of the ſea breeze, he got the weather gage, and brought on the engagement about one o'clock. M. d'Aché ſet his foreſail, and bore away in about ten minutes, his ſquadron following his example, and continuing a running fight in a very irregular manner till three o'clock. The admiral then made the ſignal for a general chace; upon which the French cut away their boats, and made all the ſail they could: he purſued them till it was dark, when they eſcaped by out-ſailing him, and got into Pondicherry road. The admiral anchored with his ſquadron off a French ſettlement called Carrical, on the ſame evening.

In this action the loſs of men, on the part of the Engliſh, was only thirty-one killed, and one hundred and ſixteen wounded; among the latter of whom were commodore Stephens, and captain Martin. The number of killed and wounded on board the enemy's ſquadron amounted to five hundred and forty, and their ſhips were ſo much ſhattered during the engagement, that the commander ſailed for the iſlands of Bourbon in order to refit.

The company's ſhip the Pitt, arrived at Madraſs on the fourteenth of September, with colonel Draper on board, and a detachment of his regiment.

The French army made a motion, on the twelfth of December, towards Choultry plain, and were cannonaded by the Engliſh, who killed about forty of them, without ſuſtaining any loſs on their ſide. They marched in three diviſions, one directly towards the Engliſh, one towards Egmore, and the other down St. Thome road. The colonels Lawrence and Draper, fearing this laſt might get poſſeſſion of the iſland bridge, retired to the iſland, ſoon after which, part came into the garriſon, and part took poſſeſſion of the poſts in the Black Town. The ſame morning the French hoiſted their flag at Egmore and St. Thome. The thirteenth every thing was quiet, not a gun firing on either ſide. The fourteenth in the morning the enemy marched their whole force to attack the Black Town. Our ſmall parties retreated into the garriſon, and about an hour after a grand ſally was made, commanded by colonel Draper. The regiment of Lorrain was ſurprized, and a very hot action enſued. Colonel Draper acquitted himſelf with amazing valour, and, if he had been vigorouſly ſuſtained, would have foiled the enemy conſiderably. Another attempt was afterwards made upon the town, but the enemy was obliged to retire, and even abandon the undertaking.

During theſe tranſactions in America and the Eaſt Indies, the campaign in Germany was carried on with the utmoſt vigour on both ſides. About the cloſe of the laſt year, a farmer of the revenues had arrived at Hanover from Paris, in order to receive the revenues of that electorate, together with thoſe of all the other countries which ſhould be reduced by the armies of his moſt Chriſtian majeſty. At the ſame time, a decree was publiſhed at Paris, by which it appeared, that the court of Verſailles had determined to change the government and ſyſtem of the electorate, contrary to an expreſs article of the capitulation granted to the city of Hanover, when it ſurrendered.

The landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel, alarmed at theſe proceedings, ſolicited a treaty with the French king whereby the former was injoined not to act directly or indirectly againſt his moſt Chriſtian majeſty; and, in conſequence of this treaty, the latter was to afford him the moſt ſpeedy and effectual ſupport, in caſe any of his property or eſtates ſhould at any time be attacked.

The landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel, was not the only power that acted with ſuch puſillanimity. The duke of Brunſwick, though ſtill more nearly connected with his Britannic majeſty, in order to detach himſelf from the deſperate fortune of Hanover, concluded a treaty with the courts of Vienna and Verſailles, ten days after the former convention was ſigned.

Prince Ferdinand, brother to the duke who was now inveſted with the command of the Hanoverian army, heard of this treaty with great concern, and determined to fruſtrate the expectations of the French king. He had received orders to reſume the operations of war againſt the enemy, and thought proper to retain the troops of Brunſwick, and alſo his nephew, the hereditary prince, notwithſtanding the treaty ſigned by the duke, who wrote an expoſtulatory letter to prince Ferdinand, complaining of his having ſeduced his troops, decoyed his ſon, and diſgraced his family. He peremptorily demanded the return of his troops, and threatened, in caſe of refuſal, to apply more effectual methods. But prince Ferdinand adhered to his purpoſe: he detained both the troops and hereditary prince, who, being fond of the ſervice, ſoon ſignalized himſelf for his valour and military proweſs.

A virulent memorial was now publiſhed by the court of Verſailles againſt his Britannic majeſty, on the violation of the treaty ſigned at Cloſter-Seven; but an anſwer ſoon appeared, which refuted every article of the charge, and fully juſtified the conduct of his Britannic majeſty in the moſt ample manner.

About the middle of February, prince Ferdinand, being joined by a body of Pruſſian horſe, under the command of the prince of Holſtein Gottorp, the whole army was put in motion, and advanced to the country of Bremen. The enemy were ſoon diſlodged from Rottenburg, Otterſburg, and Verden, and abandoned the city of Bremen, on the approach of the Hanoverian army.

The duke de Richlieu had, in the interim, been recalled, and the count de Clermont now commanded the French forces. Perceiving it would be impoſſible for him, with the wretched remnant of the French army, to oppoſe prince Ferdinand in the field, with ſucceſs, or even maintain the footing his predeceſſor had gained, he retreated as the allies advanced, with ſuch precipitation, as frequently to leave the greater part of his artillery and baggage behind him, and ſometimes even his ſick men.

The two grand diviſions of the French army, which were quartered at Zell and Hanover, finding themſelves obliged to abandon thoſe places, retired to Hamelen, leaving a conſiderable detachment under count Chabot, at Hoya, a ſtrong fort upon the Weſer, and a place of ſuch importance, that prince Ferdinand determined to drive the enemy from it. The hereditary prince of Brunſwick was appointed to this ſervice, with four battalions of foot, and a detachment of light horſe. The prince with part of his detachment croſſed the Weſer at Bremen, while the reſt advanced on this ſide the river. The engagement was vigorouſly ſupported on both ſides, till the enemy being attacked in front and rear, were thrown into the utmoſt confuſion.

The count de Chabot threw himſelf, with two battalions, into the caſtle, ſeemingly determined to defend the place to the laſt extremity, but ſoon after capitulated, by which his garriſon marched out with all the honours of war; but their cannon, ſtores, and ammunition, were ſurrendered to the conqueror. The prince had about an hundred men killed and wounded, but took ſix hundred and ſeventeen priſoners. By this action a place of the utmoſt importance, and which opened a paſſage over the Weſer, was ſecured to the Hanoverian army.

The hereditary prince, on his return from Hoya, inveſted Minden, which was defended by a garriſon of four thouſand men, who, in nine days, ſurrendered themſelves priſoners of war. About the ſame time ſeveral ſkirmiſhes happened between the advanced parties of the Hanoverian and French armies, but always to the advantage of the former; the latter, ſurrounded with difficulties and diſtreſs, marched in three columns towards the Rhine.

Prince Ferdinand, finding it impoſſible to prevent the French from paſſing the Rhine, cantoned the allied army in the biſhopric of Munſter, but did not remain long inactive. About the latter end of May, he ordered a detachment to paſs the Rhine at Duyſburgh, under the command of colonel Scheither, who executed his orders without loſs of time, defeated three battalions of the enemy, and took five pieces of cannon.

The whole army paſſed the Rhine on the ſeventh of June, on a bridge conſtructed for that purpoſe, defeated a body of French cavalry, and obtained ſeveral other advantages over the enemy.

In order to put a ſtop to the progreſs of the allies, the count de Clermont took poſſeſſion of an advantageous camp, near Rhinefeldt, which he fortified with a ſtrong entrenchment, and determined to wait for reinforcements at that place.

The court of France, equally mortified and alarmed at the ill ſucceſs of their arms in Germany, reſolved, if poſſible, to retrieve their loſſes. Accordingly, they aſſembled a body of forces at Hanover, under the command of the prince de Soubiſe, with orders to penetrate into Bohemia. A conſiderable re-inforcement was ſent to the count de Clermont, who then quitted his ſtrong camp, and retired to Nuys, whence he detached a conſiderable corps, under the command of the count de St. Germain, to take poſt at Crevelt, ſituated in a plain between his army and the camp of the allies, which fronted the town of Meurs. Prince Ferdinand, having taken the moſt prudent precautions for attacking the enemy, marched at the head of the grenadiers, to the valley of Anrath, where he fell in with an advanced party of the French, who, after a few diſcharges of muſquetry, retired to their camp, and gave the alarm. On the 23d of June, about one o'clock in the afternoon, the action began with a ſevere cannonading on the part of the allies, which, though well ſupported, did not drive the French from their cover; he therefore determined to diſlodge them, by a cloſe attack of the infantry. The hereditary reditary prince advanced with the whole front, and an obſtinate action enſued. In the mean time, the cavalry on the right attempted in vain to penetrate through the wood on the other ſide, where the enemy had raiſed two batteries, which were ſuſtained by forty ſquadrons of horſe.

The action was continued in this manner till five in the afternoon, when the grenadiers, collecting all their ſtrength, forced the intrenchments in the wood, which were lined with the French infantry. Theſe giving way, abandoned the wood in the utmoſt diſorder; but the purſuit was checked by the conduct and reſolution of the enemy's cavalry, which maintained their ground, and covered the foot in their retreat to Nuys, notwithſtanding a dreadful fire from the artillery of the allies, and the vigorous attacks of the Hanoverian horſe, who had, by this time, found means to regain the plain. The ſucceſs of the day was, in a great meaſure, owing to the artillery on the left and in the center, which did great execution, while prince Ferdinand proſecuted his attack on the other quarter.

Seven thouſand of the French troops were killed, wounded, or taken priſoners in this battle, and ſeveral ſtandards, colours, and pieces of cannon fell into the hands of the allies, who loſt about fifteen hundred men.

This victory, though far from being deciſive, obliged the French to ſeek refuge under the cannon of Cologn, without being able to take one ſtep for the relief of Duſſeldopp, which prince Ferdinand immediately inveſted, and in a few days reduced the garriſon, being allowed to march out with all the honours of war on condition of not ſerving againſt the allies during the ſpace of four years.

The count de Clermont reſigning his command, was ſucceeded by Monſieur de Contades, and the army was conſiderably reinforced. This general determined to attack prince Ferdinand, and made ſome motions in conſequence of that reſolution; but was prevented in his purſuit by the little river Erff, behind which the prince reſolved to continue quiet, till he ſhould be joined by a body of Britiſh troops under the command of the duke of Marlborough; the firſt diviſion of which had juſt landed at Embden. He was perſuaded that the prince of Yſenburgh, who commanded the Heſſian troops, would be able for ſome time to find ſufficient employ for Soubiſe, who lately marched from Hanau, with a deſign to penetrate into the landgrave of Heſſe-Caſſel; but his van-guard had been ſurprized and cut to pieces by the militia of the country. This circumſtance induced prince Ferdinand to hope that the operations of the enemy would be retarded, until he himſelf, with the aſſiſtance of the Britiſh troops, ſhould be in a condition for paſſing the Maeſe, and transferring the ſeat of war into the enemy's country.

But when he had marched as far as Ruremond upon the Maeſe, in proſecution of this deſign, an account arrived which diſconcerted all his meaſures. The duke de Broglio, at the head of a very powerful corps had been detached from the prince of Soubiſe's army, defeated the prince of Yſenburgh, at Sangerhauſen, on the twenty-third of July; and the enemy, in conſequence of this advantage, became maſters of the Weſer, by which a free paſſage into Weſtphalia was opened to them.

This intelligence entirely fruſtrated Prince Ferdinand's plan, and left him no alternative, but a battle or a retreat acroſs the Rhine. A long ſuceſſion of heavy rains, which had broke up the roads, and rendered the country impaſſable, increaſed his difficulties. Having offered the enemy battle, which they thought proper to decline, he made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for repaſſing the Rhine. This hazardous undertaking was executed by the hereditary prince of Brunſwic, who, on finding the enemy had drawn up the bridge, ruſhed into the river at the head of his grenadiers, when they drove the French away with their bayonets, and cleared the bridges for the paſſage of the army to Rhinebergen.

In conſequence of the misfortunes which attended the allied army, Monſieur de Chevert, one of the moſt able commanders in the French army, formed a plan, which, if it had ſucceeded, muſt have greatly embarraſſed the ſituation of prince Ferdinand. Chevert had projected a ſcheme for diſlodging baron Imhoff, who was poſted on the right of the Rhine; burning the bridge at Rhees, making himſelf maſter of the magazine, and preventing the junction of the Britiſh and Hanoverian forces.

The Hanoverian general was no ſooner acquainted with M. Chevert's intention, than he did every thing in his power to defeat it. Intelligence being brought him of the enemy's approach, he reſolved to quit his poſt and meet them; when perceiving they were marching through very difficult ground, he did not loſe a moment in beginning the action. He ordered a ſmall party, poſted in a little coppice, to fall upon the enemy's left, which he perceived to be uncovered; and appointed the fire of this party, as a ſignal for the reſt to advance, and begin the attack with fixed bayonets. The French being attacked in ſo vigorous and unexpected a manner, were thrown into confuſion, and in leſs than half an hour fled from the field of battle, leaving eleven pieces of cannon, and all their baggage, to the Hanoverians, who took three hundred and fifty-four priſoners, and drove them under the cannon of Weſel. This advantage was gained with a very inconſiderable loſs on the part of the allies, but the enemy had a great number of men killed and wounded.

Prince Ferdinand made an attempt to paſs the Rhine at Rhinebergen ſoon after this action; but the river had overflowed its banks to ſuch a degree, that here, as well as at the Rhees, the ſhore was inacceſſible. He, therefore, found it neceſſary to march further down the river, and lay a bridge at Griethuyzen. The enemy had prepared four veſſels for the demolition of this bridge, but before they could carry their deſigns into execution, they were all taken, and on the 10th of Auguſt the whole army paſſed without loſs or interruption.

Prince Ferdinand now retired into Weſtphalia, and fixed his head quarters at Munſter; while Contades encamped near Ham, upon the Lippe, and extended his troops in ſuch a manner, as to command the whole courſe of the Rhine on both ſides. The campaign was ſo far advanced before the Britiſh troops joined the army, that they had no opportunity of ſignalizing themſelves in the field. The effects of a long and tedious march, however, was felt by them in general, and proved fatal to their commander, the duke of Marlborough, who died at Munſter of a dyſentry, univerſally regretted.

In the interim the French miniſtry had recourſe to various arts, to elude the vigilance of the Engliſh cruizers, in order to tranſport to their colony of Canada a ſupply of troops, artillery, ammunition, and and other military ſtores. While the convoys were getting ready for ſailing in one port, they aſſembled tranſports in another, to divert the attention of the Engliſh from the real object of theſe preparations. They ventured out in boiſterous weather, when the Britiſh cruizers could not block up their harbours, and choſe to ſail for the relief of their American ſettlements, in ſtorms and tempeſts.

They had alſo recourſe to various ſchemes, in order to elude the Britiſh ſquadrons ſtationed at Halifax, or cruizing on the banks of Newfoundland, or in the gulph of St. Lawrence. They ſometimes ventured to navigate the river before it was clear of the ice, and while the Engliſh ſquadron continued in the harbours of Nova Scotia; ſometimes they waited on the coaſt of Newfoundland for ſuch thick fogs, as might conceal them from the Britiſh cruizers, and ſometimes penetrated through the moſt dangerous paſſages, in hopes of taking prizes from the enemy.

The invaſion of Great Britain, which had ſo long engaged the thoughts of the French, began now to appear impracticable even in their own opinion. They, therefore, laid up their large ſhips of war, which, in this reduced ſtate of their navy, could not but be uſeleſs, and encouraged the fitting out of ſtout privateers, which greatly annoyed the commerce of Great Britain and Ireland, by cruizing in the ſeas of Europe and America. Some of them lay cloſe in the harbours of the channel facing the coaſt of England, and darted out occaſionally on the Engliſh trading ſhips, as they received intelligence from boats employed for that purpoſe. Some took up their ſtation in the north ſea, where a great number of captures were made on the coaſt of Scotland, and others cruized in the chops of the channel, and to the weſtward of Ireland. But the greater number infeſted the ſeas in the neighbourhood of the Leeward iſlands in the Weſt Indies, where they made a prodigious number of captures, and conveyed them to their own ſettlements in that part of the world.

Many veſſels were taken this year belonging to the Dutch, who had, for ſome time, carried on a very conſiderable trade, not only by availing themſelves of their neutrality, but ſupplying the French with naval ſtores, and tranſporting the produce of their ſugar colonies, as conveyances hired by the proprietors. The Engliſh government, juſtly incenſed at this unfair commerce, iſſued orders for their cruizers to ſtop all neutral ſhips that ſhould have French property on board, and theſe orders were punctually executed. A great number of Dutch ſhips were taken and condemned as legal prizes, both in England and Jamaica. Theſe proceedings irritated the Dutch merchants to ſuch a degree, that they preſented a memorial to the ſtates, expreſſing their deſign of reſenting this proceeding, and offering to join, at their own expence, in order to protect their trade: but the princeſs of Orange prevented matters from coming to a dangerous extremity, by the exertion of all her power and influence with the ſtates-general.

On the twenty-third of November, the time for which the parliament had been prorogued, the ſeſſion was opened by commiſſion, his majeſty being indiſpoſed; when the lord keeper told them, that his majeſty had directed the lords of the commiſſion to aſſure his parliament, of his having always received the higheſt ſatisfaction in being able to lay before them any events that tended to promote the honour and intereſt of his kingdom; that in conſequence of their advice, and enabled by their aſſiſtance, his majeſty had exerted his endeavours to proſecute the war with vigour, in order to obtain a ſafe and honourable peace; that the conqueſts of the ſtrong fort of Louiſbourgh, with the iſlands of Cape Breton and St. John, the demolition of Fort Frontenac, and the reduction of Senegal, could not fail of bringing great diſtreſs on the French commerce and colonies, and that Great Britain muſt, in proportion thereto, reap conſiderable advantages.

He obſerved that France had been convinced, that while her forces were ſent out to invade and ravage the dominions of her neighbours, her own coaſts were not inacceſſible to his majeſty's fleets and armies: a truth which ſhe had experienced in the demolition of Cherburg. He told them, that in Germany his majeſty's good brother the king of Pruſſia, and prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick, had wholly engaged the attention of the armies of France and her confederates; that their ſucceſſes, owing, under God, to their able conduct, and the bravery of his majeſty's troops, and thoſe of the allies, had been as glorious as they were ſignal.

His lordſhip farther ſaid, that he had it in command from his majeſty, to declare, that the common cauſe of liberty and independency was ſtill making glorious efforts againſt the unnatural union formed to oppreſs it; that the commerce of his ſubjects, the ſource of national riches had, by the care and vigilance of the officers of his majeſty's fleet, flouriſhed in a manner not to be equalled at ſuch a time. In this ſtate of things the king thought it unneceſſary to uſe many words to perſuade them to bear up againſt all difficulties, effectually to defend his majeſty, and vigorouſly to ſupport the king of Pruſſia and the reſt of the allies, in order to reduce their enemies to equitable terms of accommodation. He obſerved to the houſe of commons, that the uncommon extent of this war had unavoidably incurred uncommon expences, and that his majeſty ſincerely lamented the burden of his people; that the ſeveral eſtimates were ordered to be laid before them, and that he deſired only ſuch ſupplies as were requiſite to proſecute the war with advantage, and adequate to the neceſſary ſervices. In the laſt place he aſſured them, that the king took ſo much ſatisfaction in that harmony which ſubſiſted among his faithful ſubjects, that it was more proper for him to thank them for it, than to repeat his exhortations to it; that this union was more eſpecially neceſſary in the preſent critical juncture, and his majeſty doubted not, but the good effects the nation had found from it would effectually induce them to purſue it.

Addreſſes from both houſes were preſented to his majeſty, filled with expreſſions of their ſteady zeal and unſhaken loyalty to his majeſty's perſon and government. They congratulated him on the ſucceſs of his arms, and promiſed to ſupport his meaſures and thoſe of his allies with the utmoſt alacrity, fidelity and zeal.

A. D. 1759. Encouraged by this approbation of their conduct, the miniſtry reſolved to proſecute the war in every quarter with the utmoſt vigour, and the commons voted a ſupply of near thirteen millions. The navy was augmented and repaired, a proclamation was iſſued, offering a conſiderable bounty to all ſeamen, and able landmen, who ſhould, before a certain day, enter into his majeſty's ſervice. Many cities, towns, corporations, and even individuals, joined government in offering bounties; ſo general was the approbation of the miniſtry, and deſire of humbling the inſolent foe. Such was the ſtate of commerce in this metropolis, even in theſe expenſive times, that the citizens of London found leiſure to plan, and funds to execute, magnificent works of art, for the ornament and conveniencies of that meridian of trade and opulence. They obtained an act of parliament empowering them to build a new bridge over the Thames, from Black Friars to the oppoſite ſhore, about midway between thoſe of London and Weſtminſter.

Not only the French navy was, by this time, conſiderably reduced, but the Engliſh had made themſelves maſters of the greater part of the numerous privateers which they had fitted out, on laying up their large ſhips of war. Many Engliſh ſhips of the line as well as frigates were ordered to cruize in different latitudes of Europe and America; and were, in general, remarkably ſucceſsful; by which means the ſubjects of France were greatly impoveriſhed through the interruption of its trade.

Struck with terror at this happy and univerſal union among the Engliſh, the enemy ſeemed to act like perſons of deſperate fortune, and made preparations for venturing every thing on a ſingle ſtroke. With this view all their ports were filled with preparations for an invaſion of Great-Britain; nay, to ſuch a degree of military phrenzy were they wrought, that they talked of a triple embarkation. M. Thurot was to command a ſmall ſquadron, and ſeveral tranſports from Dunkirk, which, it was imagined, were intended for Scotland. This perſon had, from maſter of a merchantman, become captain of a privateer, in which capacity he greatly annoyed the trade of England, and acquired ſuch renown for courage and conduct, that he at length obtained a command in the ſervice of his ſovereign.

Flat-bottomed boats were to have conveyed, from Havre de Grace and other ports of Normandy, the troops deſigned to invade England. The third embarkation, which was ſuppoſed to be intended againſt Ireland, was to be made from Vannes, in Lower Britany, where a large body was aſſembled, under the command of the duke d'Aquilon, governor of that province. M. de Conflans was appointed commander of the fleet then fitting out at Breſt for covering the embarkation. Such was the plan laid by the French for invading the Britiſh territories. But all the pleaſing ideas they had formed with regard to the ſucceſs of theſe embarkations were ſoon diſſipated by the meaſures taken by the Engliſh. Commodore Boys, with his ſquadron, was ſtationed before Dunkirk; and admiral Hawke, with a ſtrong ſquadron, blocked up the French fleet in Breſt; while a ſmaller ſquadron, under the command of captain Duff, kept a watch on the port of Vannes.

To render uſeleſs the preparations at Havre, admiral Rodney was ſent with a ſmall ſquadron of ſhips and bombs, not only to prevent the French flat bottomed boats from ſailing, but to defeat the project, by bombarding the place. He arrived before Havre on the ſecond of July, and anchored the next day in the great road, where, after making the proper diſpoſitions, the bombs proceeded to place themſelves in the narrow channel of the river leading to Harfleur. About ſeven in the evening, two of the bombs were ſtationed, as well as the reſt early next morning, and continued the bombardment for fifty two hours, without the leaſt intermiſſion, with ſuch ſucceſs, that the town was ſeveral times in flames, and their magazine of ſtores collected for the uſe of the flat bottomed boats, burnt with fury for ſix hours, notwithſtanding the continual efforts of ſeveral hundred men to extinguiſh it. Many of the flat bottomed boats were overturned and deſtroyed by the exploſion of the ſhells. During this attack, the enemy's troops, which appeared very numerous, were continually erecting new batteries, and throwing up intrenchments; and the conſternation of the inhabitants was ſo great, that they forſook the place, which was ſet on fire in ſeveral parts, and burnt with great fury. Thus a ſmall ſquadron was ſufficient to terrify a whole town, defended by a large body of forces, as well as to convince the enemy of the abſurdity of their attempt, at a time when their naval force was in the moſt reduced and ruinous condition.

Nor did the operations of blocking up the French in their harbours employ the whole Britiſh fleet. Admiral Boſcawen continued cruizing off Toulon to watch the motions of a fleet fitting out there under the command of M. de la Clue. He often diſplayed the Engliſh flag in ſight of this fleet, by way of defiance, in order to induce M. de la Clue to quit his aſylum, and hazard an engagement on the open ſea; but being diſappointed in his hopes, he ordered three ſhips of the line, commanded by the captains Smith, Harland, and Baker, to advance, and burn two ſhips that lay cloſe to the mouth of the harbour.

They accordingly advanced with the utmoſt reſolution, and met with a very warm reception, from divers batteries which they had not before perceived. They attempted to deſtroy two ſmall forts, but being over-matched, and a calm coming on, they ſuſtained conſiderable damage, and were towed off with difficulty in a very ſhattered condition. The admiral, therefore, returned to Gibraltar to refit, and M. de la Clue ſeized the opportunity of ſailing, in hopes of paſſing the ſtreight's mouth unobſerved by the Engliſh.

While the admiral remained in this harbour, he detached the Gibraltar, to hover on the Barbary coaſt to keep a good look out, and give timely notice in caſe the enemy ſhould think proper to attempt the paſſage of the Streight's mouth.

About eight o'clock in the morning on the ſeventeenth of Auguſt, the Gibraltar made a ſignal, that fourteen ſail appeared on the Barbary coaſt, to the eaſtward of Ceuta; upon which admiral Boſcawen got under ſail with the greateſt expedition, and the next morning at day break he ſaw ſeven large ſhips lying to; but finding the Engliſh did not anſwer their ſignals, they made off with all the ſail they could ſet. The Engliſh fleet, conſiſting of fourteen ſail of the line and two fire ſhips, ſtood after them, and it blowing freſh, came up with them about noon, but the wind dying away, the engagement did not begin till paſt two; nor could admiral Boſcawen get up with the Ocean, M. de la Clue's ſhip, till about four, when the action began with great fury. In about half an hour the mizen-maſt, and both top-ſail-yards of the Namur were ſhot away, which obliged the admiral to hoiſt his flag on board the Newark, and the Ocean ſtood away, with all the ſail ſhe could crowd. Soon after, the Centaur, of ſeventy-four guns, ſtruck, and the Engliſh purſued the enemy all night, but in the morning four ſail ſtanding in for the land were all that could be diſcovered.

The Engliſh were now at a greater diſtance than three miles from the enemy, and not more than five leagues from the ſhore. About noon the Ocean ran among the breakers; the Redoubtable followed her example, and both endeavoured to land their men; but this, from the roughneſs of the ſea, proved a difficult and tedious taſk. The captains of the Temeraire and Modeſte anchored as near as poſſible to the ſhore.

Admiral Boſcawen ſtood in very near the land himſelf, and ſent the Intrepid and America to deſtroy the Ocean; the former, by coming to an anchor, could not get in; but the latter ſoon performed the ſervice; for, on firing a broadſide, the Ocean ſtruck, and the Engliſh took poſſeſſion of her. M. de la Clue, who had one leg broke, and the other wounded, had been landed about half an hour, but the captain, M. le compte de Carne, and ſeveral officers and men were on board.

The Ocean was now ſet on fire, as it was found impoſſible to get her off. Captain Bentley, of the Warſpight, was ordered againſt the Temeraire, of ſeventy-four guns, and brought her off with very little damage. At the ſame time, vice-admiral Broderick, with his diviſion, burnt the Redoubtable, which was bulged, and abandoned by the people; and brought off the Modeſte, of ſixty-four guns, which had received very little damage.

The Engliſh fleet obtained this victory at the expence of fifty-ſix men killed, and one hundred and ninety-ſix wounded; but the damage on board the enemy muſt have been much more conſiderable, as M. de la Clue, in his letter to the French ambaſſador at Liſbon, acknowledged, that on board the Ocean, one hundred men were killed on the ſpot, and ſeventy dangerouſly wounded. But what added to the concern of the enemy, was the loſs of four capital ſhips, two of which were deſtroyed, and the other two brought to England in triumph, to increaſe the naval force of Great Britain.

Though the intended invaſion of Great Britain was retarded by the defeat of Monſieur de la Clue, yet the preparations for it were ſtill carried on. With this view, Thurot received inſtructions to ſail the firſt opportunity from Dunkirk, round the northern coaſt of Ireland, and make a diverſion from that part, where Conflans intended to diſembark his forces. The tranſports and ſhips of war were aſſembled at Breſt and Rochford, having on board a train of artillery, and accoutrements for cavalry, to be mounted in Ireland. A body of French troops, including the Iriſh brigade, were kept in readineſs to embark, and the young pretender, having agreed to the terms propoſed in France, remained, with a view to give countenance to a revolt in Great Britain, incognito, in the neighbourhood of Vannes.

The execution of this ſcheme was, however, prevented by the vigilance of Sir Edward Hawke, who blocked up the harbour of Breſt with a fleet of twenty-three capital ſhips; while another ſquadron of ſmall ſhips commanded by captain Duff, continued cruizing along the French coaſt, from Port l'Orient in Britany, to the point of St. Giles in Poictou.

But in the month of November the Britiſh fleet, commanded by Sir Edward Hawke, Sir Charles Hardy, and rear admiral Geary, was driven from the coaſt of France, by ſtreſs of weather, and on the ninth day anchored at Torbay. The French admiral no ſooner received intelligence that the Engliſh were driven from their ſtation, than he ſailed from Breſt with twenty-one ſail of the line, in order to deſtroy the ſquadron commanded by captain Duff, before the larger could return from the coaſt of England.

Sir Edward Hawke, having received intelligence that the French fleet was ſailed, immediately put to ſea, in order to deſtroy them; and in the mean time, the government iſſued orders for guarding all thoſe parts of the coaſt that were expoſed to a deſcent.

The Britiſh admiral directed his courſe for Quiberon bay, where he had reaſon to think the French fleet would rendezvous; but a hard gale fruſtrated his attempt, and drove him to the weſtward, where he was joined by the Maidſtone and Coventry, two of his majeſty's frigates. Theſe ſhips he ordered to keep a head of the ſquadron, one on the ſtarboard and the other on the larboard bow. On the morning of the 20th of November, the Maidſtone made a ſignal for ſeeing a fleet, upon which the admiral hove out a ſignal for forming the line a-breaſt, in order to draw all his ſquadron together; and about ten they were diſcovered to be the enemy. They were then in chace of captain Duff's ſquadron; but on diſcovering the Engliſh fleet, they made off with all the ſail they could carry, and captain Duff, with ſome difficulty, joined Sir Edward, who, perceiving the French were endeavouring to eſcape, threw out a ſignal for ſeven of his ſhips that were neareſt the enemy to chace, and endeavour to detain them, till they could be ſuſtained by the reſt of the ſquadron, which, in order to ſave as much time as poſſible, were ordered immediately to form into a line a-head.

The Engliſh van began the engagement with the rear of the French about half an hour after two o'clock in the neighbourhood of Belleiſle. They did not, however, ſtop the purſuit, but having poured in a broadſide on the ſternmoſt of the French, continued their courſe towards the van, leaving the rear to the ſhips that followed.

Admiral Hawke, in the Royal George of one hundred guns, reſerved his fire in paſſing through the rear, and ordered the maſter of the ſhip to put him along-ſide the French admiral, who commanded in perſon on board the Soliel Royal, carrying eighty guns and twelve hundred men. The pilot remonſtrating, that he could not obey his commands, without the moſt imminent danger of running upon a ſhoal, the undaunted hero replied, "You have done your duty in pointing out "the danger, now you are to obey my order, and "lay me along-ſide of the Soliel Royal." The maſter readily obeyed, and the gallant veteran ſoon ſaw the Royal George range up with the French admiral.

In the mean time another large ſhip of the enemy, called the Theſee, obſerving the danger of Conflans, ran in between the two commanders, and received the fire that had been reſerved for the Soliel Royal. It proved, however, fatal to her commander, who endeavouring to return the ſalute, the ſea ruſhed in at the lower deck ports, and the ſhip ſoon went to the bottom. Notwithſtanding the weather was boiſterous many of the ſhips on both ſides fought with equal fury, and, for ſome time, with doubtful ſucceſs, but victory at laſt declared for the Engliſh.

The Formidable ſtruck her colours about four in the afternoon; and the Superb ſhared the unhappy fate of the Theſee. The Heros hauled down her colours, in token of ſubmiſſion, and came came to an achor; but the wind was ſo high that no boat could be ſent to ſecure the conqueſt. By this time night came on, under cover of which great part of the French fleet eſcaped.

The tempeſt now raged with great violence, and Sir Edward, fearing his ſhips might run on the unknown ſhoals and iſlands, made the ſignal for coming to an anchor on the weſt ſide of the ſmall iſland Dumet, where the fleet continued the whole night, in a very dangerous road, alarmed by the fury of the ſtorm, and the continual firing of guns of diſtreſs.

Under ſhelter of the darkneſs the Soliel Royal had come to an anchor in the midſt of the Britiſh ſquadron; but as ſoon as dawn appeared, M. de Conflans ordered her cable to be cut, and ſhe drove aſhore to the Weſtward of Croize, which, when perceived by the Engliſh admiral, he made a ſignal to the Eſſex to ſlip her cable, and purſue her. The ſignal was immediately obeyed, but the Eſſex unfortunately ran on a ſand bank, called Le-four, where the Reſolution, another Engliſh ſhip, was already aground; and where they were both irrecoverably loſt, notwithſtanding all the aſſiſtance that could be given them. The greateſt part of their ſtores, together with all their men, were ſaved, and, to prevent the wrecks from falling into the hands of the enemy, they were ſet on fire, and thereby totally deſtroyed.

In the interim the Soliel Royal lay beating on the ſhore; and the French, obſerving the Portland, Chatham, and Vengeance, approaching to deſtroy her, ſet her on fire. The Engliſh, therefore, returned and deſtroyed the Heros, which was likewiſe a-ground, and the Juſte, another of their large ſhips, periſhed in the river Loire.

On the 23d the admiral, diſcovering ſeven of the line riding at anchor between Point Penva and the river Vilaine, made the the ſignal to weigh, in order to attack them; but the ſtorm increaſed to ſuch a degree, that he was obliged to remain at anchor, and ſtrike top-gallant maſts. In the mean time, the French ſhips threw overboard their guns and ſtores, and the weather being more moderate under the land, took the advantage of the flood to paſs the bar, at the mouth of the river Vilaine, where they came to an anchor, within a mile of the entrance, and were protected by ſeveral occaſional batteries erected on the ſhore.

Only thirty-nine men and one lieutenant were killed, and about two hundred wounded, in this extraordinary engagement; a trifling loſs when put in competition with the victory obtained, by which the projected invaſion that had ſo long alarmed the apprehenſions of the ſubjects of Great Britain was rendered abortive, and a finiſhing blow given to the naval power of France. Sir Edward Hawke was, therefore, emboldened, by conſcious integrity, to make the following declaration in his letter to the ſecretary of the admiralty; "When I conſider the ſeaſon of the year, the hard gales on the day of action, a flying enemy, the ſhortneſs of the day, and the coaſt we are on, I can boldly affirm, that all that could poſſibly be done has been done. As to the loſſes we have ſuſtained, let it be placed to the account of the neceſſity I was under of running all riſks to break this ſtrong force of the enemy: had we but two hours more day-light, the whole had been totally deſtroyed or taken, for we were almoſt up with their van when night overtook us."

The gallant Hawke continued cruizing off the coaſt of Britany for a conſiderable time after the the defeat of Conflans, and took particlar care to block up the Vilaine, that the ſeven ſhips might not eſcape, and join the ſhattered remains of their ſquadron, which had found means to reach Rochford. At length, the admiral was recalled, and preſented to his ſovereign, who received him very graciouſly, and conferred on him a conſiderable penſion, as a reward for the courage and conduct he had ſo repeatedly and ſo eminently diſplayed in the ſervice of his country.

The next great object of national importance was the reduction of the iſland of Martinico; and for that purpoſe a fleet failed from St. Helen's, under the command of commodore Hughes, conſiſting of eight ſail of the line, one frigate, four bomb ketches, and a number of tranſports, having on board ſix regiments of infantry, and a detachment of artillery, beſides eight hundred marines diſtributed among the ſhips of war. The land forces were under the command of major general Barrington, colonels Armiger and Haldane, and lieutenant colonels Trapand and Clavering acting in the capacity of brigadiers.

The fleet reached the iſland of Barbadoes after a paſſage of ſeven weeks, and were there joined by commodore Moore, who aſſumed the command of the united ſquadrons, amounting to ten ſhips of the line, beſides frigates and bomb ketches. Having taken on board a ſupply of wood and water, together with a number of negroes to aſſiſt in drawing the artillery, they ſailed from Carliſle bay on the thirteenth of January; but by this time the troops, unaccuſtomed to a hot climate, were conſiderably weakened and reduced, by fevers, fluxes, and the ſcurvy. Next morning the ſquadron came in ſight of the iſland of Martinique, the place of their deſtination.

The chief fortification of the iſland of Martinique was the citadel of Port Royal, a regular fort, garriſoned by four companies, which did not exceed one hundred and fifty men, thirty-ſix bombadiers, eight Swiſs, and fourteen officers. One hundred barrels of beef conſtituted the whole ſtore of proviſions, and they were deſtitute of all neceſſaries. The only preparation they had made for receiving the Engliſh, were ſome trifling intrenchments thrown up at Pierre, and a place called Caſenavire, where they thought the forces would attempt to make their deſcent.

On the 15th day of the month, the ſquadron entered the great bay of Port Royal, and the next day the firſt attack on the iſland was made at Fort Negro, a ſtrong battery of ſeven embrazures, and within three miles of the citadel. The Briſtol, Rippon, and Lyon were ordered for this ſervice; but the Lyon afterwards driving out to ſea, the Briſtol and Rippon ſtood in for the fort, and the Briſtol, having anchored cloſe in with it, began to attack the place. Soon after, the Rippon anchored a-ſtern of her, when the battery being ſilenced, the marines and ſome ſailors from both ſhips landed in the flat bottomed boats, and took poſſeſſion of the fort, the enemy having abandoned it with the utmoſt precipitation. The Britiſh colours were immediately hoiſted and the detachment ordered to keep poſſeſſion of the battery.

The Wincheſter, Woolwich, and Roebuck, were ſent to attack a fort in the bay of Cas-des-Navires, a ſmall bay about two miles to the northward of Fort Negro, where it was propoſed to land land the troops. Having ſilenced this battery, and blown up the magazine, the three ſhips lay by to cover the flat-bottomed boats upon landing, and kept a conſtant fire upon the ſhore, in conjunction with the Briſtol and Rippon.

Some French troops who had been ſent from the citadel to oppoſe the landing, obſerving the whole Britiſh ſquadron, already within the bay, and Fort Negro poſſeſſed by the marines, deſerted the beach and withdrew to Port Royal, ſo that the Engliſh troops were diſembarked without oppoſition, and advanced towards the fort.

At noon the Britiſh forces advanced towards an eminence that overlooks the town and citadel, when all appearances at firſt ſeemed to promiſe ſucceſs. But at two o'clock general Hopſon ſent to acquaint the commodore, that he found it impoſſible to maintain his ground, unleſs the ſquadron could give him aſſiſtance, by landing ſome heavy cannon at the Savanna, near the town of Port Royal, or that the commodore would attack the citadel on the bay, at the ſame time he did it on ſhore. But both theſe expedients, however, being thought impracticable, the attempt upon Port Royal was given up, and the troops being recalled from their advanced poſts were re-embarked without moleſtation about four o'clock.

A council of war being now held, it was reſolved to make an attack upon St. Pierre; the fleet, therefore, proceeded to that part of the iſland, and entered the bay on the nineteenth. The commodore declared he made no doubt of being able to reduce the town of St. Pierre, but the ſhips might be diſabled in the attack, ſo as not to be in a condition to proceed immediately on any other material ſervice; and as the taking the iſland of Guadaloupe would be of great benefit to the ſugar colonies, he propoſed that the armament ſhould proceed to that iſland, and the general agreed to the propoſal. Accordingly, they left the iſland of Martinique, and ſteered for Guadaloupe, which lies diſtant from it about thirty leagues to the weſtward.

This iſland is divided into two parts by a ſmall arm of the ſea, or rather a narrow paſs, through which no ſhip can venture; the inhabitants paſs it in a ferry boat. The country on the weſt ſide is called Baſſe-terre, and here the metropolis ſtands, defended by a citadel, and other fortifications. The eaſtern part, called Grand-terre, is defended by fort Louis, with a redoubt which commands the road, in the diſtrict of Goſier.

The Britiſh ſquadron being arrived at Baſſeterre, the chief engineer reconnoitred the town and pronounced it abſolutely impregnable to ſhipping; notwithſtanding which the commodore reſolved to attack it early the next morning.

Accordingly the Lyon began to engage the firſt battery of nine guns, about eight o'clock, when ſhe was raked by a ſmall one of two guns a-ſtern of her to the ſouthward, and by the citadel with what guns they could bring to bear. The reſt of the ſhips continuing to move on in line of battle to the reſpective batteries, they were ordered to engage, the citadel playing upon them as they advanced. At half paſt nine the Cambridge, Norfolk, and St. George, began to engage the citadel, and, after an almoſt inceſſant fire, ſilenced it about five in the afternoon. Near ten captain Shuldham, in the Panther, began to engage the twelve gun battery, and continued it warmly for many hours, doing great execution, and beating down moſt of the buildings near it, when, having ſilenced all the guns, he lay by till called off by the commodore. The Burford, which was to have ſupported the Panther in this attack, and the Berwick, which was to have engaged the ſeven gun battery, drove off to ſea, by which means the Rippon, which followed, became expoſed to the fire of three other batteries, and received great damage in her hull and rigging. At twelve, all the line of battle ſhips, the Burford and Berwick excepted, were warmly engaged, and all the forts in and about the town briſkly cannonaded, till after an obſtinate defence for ſome time, the enemy were entirely driven from all the batteries to the ſouth of the town, and quitted their guns. On the north ſide remained unſilenced the ſeven gun battery, and the fort at the Morne Rouge, where the Rippon lay aground engaging them both; and at two in the afternoon had actually ſilenced the guns at the Morne; but the enemy obſerving the ſhip to be aſhore, aſſembled in great numbers on the brow of the hill, and lined the trenches, from which they kept a briſk fire of ſmall arms, and killed and wounded numbers of her men, by raking her fore and aft.

Eight men were either killed or wounded out of twenty-three which were quartered in the poop, and ten out of thoſe remaining were obliged to be ſent forwards, to aſſiſt the men on the forecaſtle: the reſt of the marines were employed at the great guns. A large box of cartridges blew up on the poop, and ſet fire to the ſhip, when they threw out a ſignal of diſtreſs to the ſquadron, ſoon after which the fire was happily extinguiſhed.

The ſituation of the Rippon being at this time obſerved by captain Leſlie of the Briſtol, he came from ſea, and ran between the ſhip and the ſeven gun battery, which had played upon her from the beginning of the engagement, pouring in a whole broadſide upon the enemy; the marines in the Briſtol at the ſame time flanked the militia in the lines, ſo that the fire upon the Rippon ſlackened. At five the commodore made the ſignal to prepare to land the troops, which was afterwards countermanded, it being too late, and growing dark, by which means many of the flat-bottomed boats, in returning back to the rendezvous of their brigade, were in danger of being run down by the men of war, now coming from the batteries: at ſeven in the evening the flat bottomed boats diſperſed, and the troops returned to their reſpective tranſports; all the line of battle ſhips, except the Rippon, having now rejoined the fleet, and all the batteries of the enemy being ſilenced, the four bombs ſtood in for the ſhore, and threw ſhells and carcaſes into the town. The houſes and churches were every where ſoon in flames, the magazines of powder were blown up, and the whole place exhibited a ſcene of general conflagration.

After great pains and labour to lighten her forwards, and the other neceſſary methods had been uſed, about midnight the Rippon gave a ſudden ſtart, and was got off, to the great joy of the officers and men, and in a ſhort time ſhe came to an anchor in thirteen fathom water. According to the gunner's report, this ſhip had fired one thouſand three hundred great ſhot and upwards, and the marines two thouſand cartridges. The rigging was greatly damaged, the foremaſt ſhot thro', and the mizen-yard almoſt cut away.

In this engagement the ſquadron ſuſtained but little loſs of men; only ſix were killed, and twenty wounded on board the St. George, which, for ſo many hours, had engaged the citadel.

Next day the fleet came to an anchor in the road of Baſſe-terre, where they found the hulls of ſeveral ſhips which the enemy had ſet on fire at their approach. At five in the afternoon the troops landed without oppoſition, and took poſſeſſion of the town and citadel, which they found entirely abandoned. Information being given by a deſerter of a deſign formed by the enemy for blowing up the powder magazines in the citadel, immediate orders were given to cut off the train and ſecure the magazine.

Part of the troops occupied an advantageous poſt upon the hill, about a mile to the weſtward, and part entered the town, and lined the ſtreets, which ſtill remained on fire, and continued burning all night.

At break of day the enemy appeared, to the number of two thouſand, throwing up intrenchments near a houſe where the governor had fixed his head quarters, at the diſtance of about four miles from the town, declaring he would maintain his poſt to the laſt extremity. The nature of the ground ſeems to have inſpired him with this reſolution, it being contiguous to a paſs called Le Dos d'Ane. The aſcent from Baſſe-terre to this paſs was ſo very ſteep, and the way ſo broken and interrupted by rocks and gullies, that there was no proſpect of attacking it with ſucceſs, except at the firſt landing, when the inhabitants were greatly alarmed. This, however, was but of ſhort duration, for though the governor did not appear to have acquitted himſelf in a manner becoming his ſtation, the people in general afterwards behaved with great ſpirit and activity in defence of their country. They very prudently avoided coming to a general engagement reſolving to weary out our troops by maintaining a kind of petty war in ſeparate parties, which alarmed and harraſſed our men with hard duty in a ſultry climate where they were but ill ſupplied with proviſions and refreſhments; and in conſequence of which both the army and navy were attacked with fevers and other diſeaſes, whereby the hoſpitals were ſo crouded, that it was judged expedient to ſend five hundred of the ſick to the iſland of Antigua where they might be properly attended.

Finding it would be impoſſible to conquer the inhabitants on this ſide of Guadaloupe, the Engliſh reſolved to make an attempt on Grand-terre, and accordingly all the great ſhips were ſent round to that place. On the 13th of February they attacked Fort Louis. when, after a ſevere cannonading, which laſted ſix hours, the marines and Highlanders were landed, and drove the enemy from their intrenchments, with bayonets fixed, hoiſted the Engliſh colours at the fort, and kept poſſeſſion of it, till a detachment arrived from the camp, when they were re-embarked.

General Barrington now ſucceeded to the chief command in the place of general Hopſon, who died at Baſſe-terre a few days after the reduction of Fort Louis, and determined to proſecute the reduction of the iſland with the utmoſt vigour. With this view, the commodore, at the inſtance of the general, ordered the Briſtol to ſail to Euſtatia, and cruize off that port, in order to prevent the Dutch from ſupplying the enemy with proviſions, which they had conſtantly done, from the time that the Engliſh had driven them up the mountains.

On the next morning the general ordered the troops to ſtrike their tents and huts, that the enemy might imagine he intended to continue in this quarter; but a few days after, the detachments at the out-poſts were all drawn in; the batteries in and about the town of Baſſe-terre were blown up and deſtroyed, the whole army brought off, and re-embarked on board the tranſports by break of day, except colonel Deſbriſay, who was left in the citadel with Watſon's regiment, and a detachment from the artillery; and the commodore with the fleet ſailed for Grand-terre, leaving the St. George and Buckingham behind, which, in caſe of an attack from the enemy, were to cover the garriſon.

While the general was making the neceſſary diſpoſitions for landing at Grand-terre, the French at the redoubt, and Dos d'Ane, came down upon colonel Deſbriſay in the citadel, and having been ſupplied with a mortar of thirteen inches from Martinique, threw ſhells into it from the neighbouring hills, and erected a battery, from which they kept playing upon the new works thrown up by the governor, and ſometimes made a ſhew of an aſſault upon the body of the place, but were conſtantly repulſed by frequent ſallies which were made, and the fire from the garriſon.

When the Buckingham and St. George were called in to join the ſquadron, upon the arrival of the French fleet at Martinique, the enemy was encouraged to approach nearer to the citadel, which occaſioned a more frequent diſcharge of artillery; and ſoon after a cannon being fired too near a powder magazine, placed at the flanked angle of the ſouth eaſt baſtion, the return of the wadding blew it up, and with it the governor, one lieutenant, two bombardiers, and ſeveral men upon the plat-form. By this unhappy accident the army was deprived of the ſervice of two gallant and experienced officers, and the citadel loſt a bold and active governor to defend it. The French availing themſelves of the diſorder reſulting from the exploſion, came down in great numbers from the hills, but the fire from the garriſon quickly repulſed them.

Major Melville, an active and gallant officer, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf at his out-poſt, was appointed governor of the citadel, in the room of captain Deſbriſay, and ſucceeded him likewiſe as lieutenant-colonel of Watſon's regiment.

Colonel Crump landed at Grand terre on the fifth day of April, with a detachment of ſix hundred men, between the towns of St. Anne and St. François, attacked them, and deſtroyed their batteries and cannon.

St. Mary's was the only town that now remained, to prevent the irruption of the troops into the Capeſterre, and was the laſt reſource of the enemy. This poſt was ſtrongly fortified, but, like the reſt, badly ſupported. They were purſued as far as the heights of St. Mary, having retired with great precipitation; upon which the detachment took poſſeſſion of the town, and the next morning broke into the Capeſterre.

As colonel Crump now preſſed cloſe on the French governor, he thought proper to ſend a flag of truce to colonel Barrington, to demand a ceſſation of arms, and to know what terms he would grant; and having conſulted the principal inhabitants, who were of opinion, that it was in vain to hold out any longer, the iſland of Guadaloupe was, on the firſt day of May, ſurrendered to the Engliſh general by capitulation.

This was a moſt fortunate circumſtance for the Britiſh forces; for the agreement was but juſt ſigned, when a meſſenger arrived to inform the natives, that M. de Beauharnois, general of the French iſlands, had landed at St. Anne, with a reinforce-inforcement from Martinique under convoy of a ſquadron commanded by M. de Bompart, who no ſooner heard of the capitulation, than he reimbarked the troops, and returned to Martinique.

The iſlands of Deſeada, Los Santos and Marigalante were now ſummoned to ſurrender, and they accordingly ſubmitted upon the ſame terms as were granted to Guadaloupe. General Barrington having thus happily concluded the preſent deſigns of this expedition acquainted the commodore, that he propoſed to ſend back part of the troops, with the tranſports to England, the latter end of June.

In conſequence, therefore, of this intimation, the commodore made the ſignal to weigh, and the ſquadron ſailed in two diviſions from Rupert's bay for Guadaloupe; where he was the next day joined by two ſhips of the line from England, which rendered him ſuperior in force to the French ſquadron, which he was informed had retired to the iſland of Granada. But before he could get under ſail, a frigate arrived with intelligence, that Bompart had quitted Granada, and was ſuppoſed to have directed his courſe to Hiſpaniola; upon which the commodore diſpatched information to Admiral Cotes, who commanded the ſquadron at Jamaica.

General Barrington having ſuperintended the repairs of the fortifications at Guadaloupe, ſettled the affairs of the inhabitants, and left a proper garriſon in the place, under the command of colonel Crump, embarked on board the Roebuck, the latter end of June, and, with the tranſports under convoy of captain Hughes, ſailed for England; while commodore Moore, with the greater part of the fleet, directed his courſe to Antigua.

During theſe tranſactions in the Weſt Indies the war in America was carried on with equal vigour. In the month of October the preceding year, a grand aſſembly had been held at Eaſton about ninety miles from Philadelphia, where peace was eſtabliſhed by a formal treaty concluded between Great Britain, and fifteen Indian nations. The conferences continued eighteen days, when every article being ſettled to the general ſatisfaction of the parties, the Indians were gratified with preſents, and returned to their reſpective ſettlements.

Having by this treaty once more reconciled the Indians, every method was taken by the Engliſh miniſtry for reducing the French ſettlements in Canada, and terminating the war in that part of the world. To accompliſh this deſign, it was reſolved to divide the forces in North America, and attack three different parts at the ſame time, that all Canada might be reduced in the ſpace of one campaign.

Three different expeditions were, therefore, planned in ſuch a manner as to aſſiſt each other. General Wolfe was ordered to proceed up the river St. Laurence with a conſiderable armament to undertake the ſiege of Quebec. General Amherſt had inſtructions to reduce Ticonderoga and Crown Point, and then croſs the Lake Champlain, and join Wolfe before Quebec. Brigadier-general Prideaux with a third body, reinforced by a number of Indians, had orders to inveſt the French fort near the fall of Niagara, which commanded all the interior part of that continent.

General Amherſt, whoſe ſeparate army was firſt in motion, paſſed Lake George without any oppoſition from the enemy; though the progreſs of his operations had been ſo ſhamefully retarded, by certain individuals of great influence, that the winter was far advanced before he croſſed that collection of water. The enemy at firſt ſeemed diſpoſed to defend the fortreſs of Ticonderoga; but perceiving the Engliſh general was both prudent and reſolute, they retreated from place to place, towards the center of all the military operations before Quebec. In the courſe of their retreat they abandoned the fort, after having in ſome meaſure diſmantled the fortifications. General Amherſt, having taken poſſeſſion of this important fort, allotted a ſtrong garriſon for its defence, and gave orders for the works to be repaired.

On the firſt day of Auguſt, one of the ſcouting parties brought intelligence, that the French had abandoned the fort of Crown-point; in conſequence of which he diſpatched a body of rangers before him to take poſſeſſion of the place, while himſelf embarked with the reſt of the army, and on the fourth landed at the fort, where the rangers where already encamped. His next ſtep was to lay the foundation of a new fort to be maintained for the ſecurity of the Britiſh dominions in that part of the country, and totally prevent the incurſions of ſcalping parties by whom the plantations had been terribly infeſted.

Advice being now received, that the enemy had retired to the other end of the Lake Champlain, and were augmented by very conſiderable and powerful reinforcements, general Amherſt, determined to maintain the ſuperiority on the Lake, ordered captain Loring to build, with the utmoſt expedition, a ſloop of ſixteen guns, and a redeau of eighty-four feet in length, capable of carrying ſix pieces of large cannon, being reſolved to have the ſuperiority on the lake. Theſe veſſels being prepared and manned, the general embarked, and made ſeveral attempts to attack the enemy, but the winter coming on, and the weather being generally boiſterous, he ſaw the impoſſibility of accompliſhing his deſign, and therefore returned to the ſame bay, where he had taken ſhelter, landed his troops, and began his march for Crown-point, which he reached on the twenty-firſt of October. His attention was now wholly employed in erecting the new fortreſs at Crown-point, in opening roads of communication with Ticonderoga, and in making the diſpoſitions for the winter quarters of his troops, ſo as to prevent the enemy from making inroads on the back colonies.

A large body of Indians, commanded by Sir William Johnſon, having reinforced the army under the command of general Prideaux, he advanced to the camp of Niagara, without any obſtruction. Towards the middle of July the general inveſted the fortreſs, and carried on his approaches with great vigour, till the twentieth of the ſame month, when, viſiting the trenches, he was unfortunately killed by the burſting of a cohorn. As ſoon as general Amherſt was informed of this diſaſter, he ſent brigadier-general Gage from Ticonderoga to aſſume the command of that army.

The apprehenſion of loſing a place of ſo much importance alarming the French, they loſt no time in aſſembling a body of regular troops, amounting to twelve hundred men, and theſe, reinforced by a large body of Indians, were ſent under the command of M. d'Aubry, to reinforce the garriſon of Niagara.

As ſoon as their deſign was known to Sir William Johnſon, who had carried on the plan of his predeceſſor with great ability, he made the neceſſary diſpoſitions for intercepting them in their march.

In

In the mean time the French continued their route, and about eight in the morning diſcovered the Engliſh army drawn up in order of battle. The Indians, on ſeeing the enemy, advanced to ſpeak with their countrymen, who ſerved under d'Aubry, but the conference was declined by the latter, who immediately uttered a horrible ſcream called the war-whoop, and began the action with great fury. But they met with ſuch a warm reception in front from the Britiſh forces, while the Indian auxiliaries fell upon their flanks, and galled them in ſuch a manner, that in about half an hour their whole army was routed, their general, with all his officers taken, and great numbers of the fugitives ſlain in their attempt to eſcape through the woods.

When the purſuit was over, the general ſent major Hervey to the commander of the fort, with a liſt of the officers taken in the late battle, and to adviſe him to ſurrender, while he had it in his power to reſtrain the ferocity of the Indians; the governor having aſſured himſelf of the truth by ſending an officer to viſit the priſoners, conſented to treat, and ſoon after the capitulation was ſigned. The garriſon were ſuffered to march out with all the honours of war, in order to embark in veſſels on the lake, and be conveyed from the iſland in the moſt expeditious manner. All the women were, at their own requeſt, ſent to Montreal, and great humanity was exerciſed towards the ſick and wounded, who could not bear the fatigue of travelling.

Thus were Crown-point and Niagara, by the valour and intrepidity of our troops, reduced in a very ſhort time; but the conqueſt of Quebec proved a much more difficult and hazardous enterprize.

In the month of February, the fleet deſtined for this expedition ſailed from England, under the command of the admirals Saunders and Holmes, officers of approved courage and conduct.

They came within ſight of Cape Breton on the twenty-firſt of April, but the harbour being frozen over, they were obliged to bear away for Hallifax in Nova Scotia. It was, however, thought proper to detach admiral Durell with a ſmall ſquadron up the river St. Lawrence, to ſail as far as the iſle de Coudres, in order to intercept any ſupplies that might be ſent from France to Quebec. In the mean time admiral Saunders arrived at Louiſbourgh, and the troops being embarked on board the tranſports, proceeded with all expedition up the river St. Lawrence. The land forces were commanded by major-general Wolfe, aſſiſted by brigadiers Monckton, Townſhend, and Murray.

About the latter end of June the forces were landed on the iſle of Orleans, which is ſituated a little below Quebec; and the general publiſhed a manifeſto, importing, "that the king of Great Britain, his maſter, for equitable cauſes, had fitted out an armament, in order to reduce the moſt important French ſettlements in America; that he intended not the leaſt act of hoſtility to the induſtrious peaſants, their families, or the miniſters of their religion, and that he would maintain them in their temporal poſſeſſions, as well as in the exerciſe of their religion, provided they would remain quiet, and not intereſt themſelves in the diſpute between the two crowns."

Though there was no ſmall degree of generoſity in this declaration, yet it did not produce the deſired effect; nor could the Canadians rely on the faith of a nation, which their prieſts had repreſented not only as heretical, but implacably cruel.

In conſequence, therefore, of their prejudices and bigotry, they rejected the lenity of a brave general, and expoſed themſelves to inevitable ruin, by joining the ſcalping parties of Indians, falling on the Engliſh ſtraggling parties, and butchering them with inhuman barbarity. The generous Wolfe, whoſe noble nature was ſhocked at theſe ſcenes of cruelty, ſent a letter to the French general, complaining of ſuch enormities as were repugnant to the rules of war obſerved by civilized people, diſhonourable to the French nation, and diſgraceful to humanity; and requeſting, that the Canadians and Indians might be reſtrained from the commiſſion of acts ſo horrid; otherwiſe he ſhould be under the diſagreeable neceſſity of retaliating ſuch cruelties as ſhould be perpetrated on the ſubjects of his maſter, on the perſons of ſuch priſoners as were in his poſſeſſion, or might fall into his hands hereafter.

No good effect, however, was produced from this letter; they perſiſted in their infernal practices; and general Wolfe was obliged to connive at ſome irregularities committed by his people, in order that what had been in vain attempted by gentle methods might be effected by ſeverity.

M. de Montcalm carefully avoided coming to an engagement, depending on the ſtrength of the country, which appeared almoſt inſurmountable. The city of Quebec was ſtrongly fortified, well ſupplied with ammunition and proviſions, as well as defended by a very numerous garriſon. The French general had taken poſt in a very advantageous ſituation, every acceſſible part of his camp being deeply intrenched.

General Wolfe ſaw the difficulties that muſt attend the ſiege; but conſoled himſelf with conſidering that he could always retreat, while the Britiſh ſquadron maintained its ſtation in the river; nor was he without hopes of being joined by general Amherſt. Theſe conſiderations, added to the impulſe of a martial genius, determined him to undertake the hazardous enterprize.

Having received information that a detachment of the enemy, with a train of artillery, was poſted at Point Levi, on the ſouth ſhore, oppoſite to the city of Quebec, he ſent brigadier Monckton at the head of four battalions, who paſſed the river in the night, and next morning, after ſkirmiſhing with ſome of the enemy's irregulars, obliged them to retire from that poſt, which the Engliſh troops immediately occupied.

By this time Montcalm was convinced of his error in not fortifying Point Levi, and foreſeeing the effect of a battery raiſed by the Engliſh, detached a body of 1600 men acroſs the river to deſtroy the works before they ſhould be completed; but the attempt miſcarried. The detachment fell into diſorder on their landing, fired upon each other, and retired in confuſion. The battery was ſoon after finiſhed, and played with ſuch ſucceſs, that the upper town was conſiderably damaged, and the lower one entirely demoliſhed.

The fleet was all this time expoſed to the greateſt danger. A few days after the troops landed on the iſle of Orleans, a furious ſtorm aroſe; many tranſports drove foul of each other, a number of boats and ſmall craft were foundered, and ſeveral ſhips loſt their anchors. The enemy, reſolved to avail themſelves of the confuſion inevitable from this diſaſter, ſent down ſeven fire ſhips at midnight from Quebec among the tranſports. But this ſcheme failed of ſucceſs: the Britiſh admiral ſaw them approach, and ordered the boats of the ſhips to be manned manned and armed, to prevent the deſtruction of the fleet; the tars obeyed with alacrity, and reſolutely boarding the fireſhips, towed them faſt aground, where, without doing any kind of damage to the Engliſh ſhips, they were burnt to the water's edge. A ſecond attempt of that kind was made, but proved as fruitleſs as the former.

The works for the ſecurity of the hoſpital, and the ſtores on the iſland of Orleans being now compleated, the Britiſh forces croſſed the north channel in boats, and, landing under the cover of two ſloops, encamped on the ſide of the river Montmorenci, which ſeparated them from the left of the enemy. In reconnoitering the river a ford was diſcovered about three miles above; but the oppoſite ſide, which was naturally ſteep, and covered with woods, had been fortified by the enemy in a manner almoſt impregnable. From a careful ſurvey of the ſituation of the enemy's camp, general Wolfe, perceiving the difficulty that muſt attend his attacking them, deferred the attempt, till he had taken a view of the river St. Lawrence above Quebec, in hopes of finding a place more favourable for a deſcent. Having taken an exact ſurvey, he found that the attack could not be made without imminent danger, and therefore returned to Montmorenci, where, during his abſence, general Townſhend had, by a ſuperior fire, prevented the French from erecting a battery on the bank of the river, from whence they intended to cannonade the Engliſh camp, which was pitched on the oppoſite ſide; general Wolfe, therefore, reſolved to attack the enemy though poſted to great advantage, and prepared to give them a very warm reception.

As the water was ſo ſhallow that the men of war could not come near enough to annoy the enemy in their intrenchments, the admiral prepared two tranſports, which might, on occaſion, be run aground to favour a deſcent. With the aſſiſtance of theſe veſſels, the general propoſed to make himſelf maſter of a detached redoubt near the water's edge, and ſeemingly beyond muſquet ſhot of the enemy's intrenchments on the hill.

Accordingly diſpoſitions were made for ſtorming the redoubt. On the thirty-firſt of July in the afternoon, the boats of the fleet were filled with grenadiers, and a part of brigadier Monckton's brigade from the point of Levi. The two brigades under the brigadiers Townſhend and Murray were ordered to be in readineſs to paſs the ford, when it ſhould be thought neceſſary. To facilitate their paſſage, the admiral had placed the Centurion in the channel, to check the fire of the lower battery, which commanded the ford; at the ſame time two tranſports were run a-ground near the redoubt, the better to favour the deſcent of the troops.

An evident confuſion among the French being produced by theſe previous meaſures, the general came to the reſolution of ſtorming the intrenchments without delay, and orders were given that the three brigadiers ſhould, at a certain ſignal, put their troops in motion, which was accordingly made at a proper time of the tide; but many of the boats, in rowing towards the ſhore, grounded upon a ledge that runs off a conſiderable diſtance. This accident occaſioned ſome diſorder, by which ſo much time was loſt, that the general was obliged to ſend an officer to ſtop brigadier Townſhend's corps, which he then obſerved to be in motion. As ſoon as this diſorder was rectified, the general, aſſiſted by ſeveral ſea officers, ſounded the ſhore, in order to find a place where the troops might diſembark with the greateſt ſafety. This being diſcovered, thirteen companies of grenadiers, and two hundred men of the ſecond American battalion were the firſt who landed.

The grenadiers were ordered to form themſelves into four diſtinct bodies, and to begin the attack, ſupported by brigadier Monckton's corps, as ſoon as the troops had paſſed the ford, and were at hand to aſſiſt. But inſtead of forming themſelves as they were directed, they ran towards the enemy's intrenchments in the utmoſt confuſion, without waiting for the troops that were to join them, and aſſiſt in the attack. Brigadier Monckton was not landed, and brigadier Townſhend was ſtill at a conſiderable diſtance, though upon his march to join the grenadiers in very great order. The grenadiers were checked by the enemy's firſt fire, and obliged to ſhelter themſelves under the redoubt, which the French had abandoned at their approach. In this ſituation they continued for ſome time, unable to form under ſo hot a fire; and having many brave officers wounded, who, careleſs of their perſons, had been ſolely intent on their duty. General Wolfe then ordered them to retreat, and form behind Monckton's brigade, which was by this time come up. It was now almoſt night, a ſudden ſtorm came on, and the tide began to make, ſo that the general thought it prudent to deſiſt from ſo difficult an attempt, and, in conſequence of this reſolution, the troops returned to their camp, on the other ſide of Montmorenci. The admiral ordered two veſſels, which were a-ground, to be ſet on fire, that they might not fall into the hands of the enemy.

Brigadier Murray was now ſent with twelve hundred men in tranſports above the town, to act in concert with rear-admiral Holmes, whom admiral Saunders had ſent up the river, in order, if poſſible, to deſtroy the French ſhips. Brigadier Murray, purſuant to theſe directions, made two unſucceſsful attempts to land on the northern ſhore; but the third proved more fortunate. He landed unexpectedly at Chambaud, and burnt a conſiderable magazine, filled with arms, cloathing, proviſion, and ammunition.

Here he received the firſt news of the reduction of Niagara and Crown-point, and that general Amherſt was making preparations for an attack on the corps poſted at the iſle Aux Noix under M. Bourlemarqu. This intelligence gave the gallant Wolfe the utmoſt ſatisfaction; but at the ſame time it convinced him that the hope he had entertained of aſſiſtance from Amherſt was now no longer to be depended on. At length a continual ſucceſſion of care, watching and fatigue brought on a dyſentry, which, for ſome time, rendered this great officer unable to perform his duty; but during his confinement he held conſultations with his officers for the public utility. They agreed in opinion, that as more ſhips and proviſions were now got above the town, they ſhould endeavour, by conveying four our five thouſand men up the river, to draw the enemy from their ſituation, and bring on a general engagement. This meaſure, however, was not adopted till the general and admiral, aſſiſted by the chief engineer, had attentively reconnoitered the town of Quebec, in order to be ſatisfied whether a general aſſault could be made with any proſpect of ſucceſs. Purſuant to the opinion of the officers in conſultation, the troops quitted their camp at Montmorenci, and, with the artillery, were reimbarked and landed at Port Levi. They then paſſed up the river in tranſſports, while admiral Holmes made a motion with his ſhips to amuſe the enemy, now poſted along the northern ſhore. As no probability appeared of annoying the enemy above the town, it was determined to make a total change in the plan of operations. It was agreed to convey the troops farther down in boats, and land them during the night within a league of Cape Diamond, in hopes of aſcending the heights of Abraham, (which riſe abruptly with a ſteep aſcent from the banks of the river) that they might take poſſeſſion of the ground on the back of the city, where the fortifications were weaker than in any other part.

Hazardous as this undertaking was, Wolfe reſolved to attempt it; accordingly, the time was fixed, and the neceſſary preparations made. Admiral Holmes advanced with his ſquadron up the river above the intended landing-place, in order to amuſe M. de Bougainville, whom Montcalm had detached with fifteen hundred men to watch the motion of this ſquadron; but the Engliſh admiral was directed to fall down in the night, and protect the landing of the forces, which orders he punctually executed. The firſt embarkation was made in flat-bottomed boats, under the immediate command of the brigadiers Monckton and Murray, though general Wolfe accompanied them, and was one of the firſt that landed. The boats fell down the river, but by the rapidity of the tide and the darkneſs of the night, they paſſed the place originally intended, and landed the troops a little below it.

This was no ſooner accompliſhed than the boats were ſent back for a ſecond embarkation, which was under the direction of brigadier Townſhend. In the mean time, colonel Howe, with the light infantry and highlanders, diſlodged a captain's guard, that defended a paſſage, by which alone the reſt of the troops could reach the ſummit, where the enemy were entrenched. The whole army then mounted without moleſtation, and as faſt as the troops arrived, the general drew them up in order.

M. de Montcalm was no ſooner informed that the Engliſh had gained the heights of Abraham, than he determined to hazard a battle, and having collected his whole force from the ſide of Beauport, immediately ſet forward on the march.

General Wolfe, perceiving that the French were croſſing the river St. Charles, formed his own line, which conſiſted of ſix battalions and the Louiſbourg grenadiers: the right commanded by brigadier Monckton, and the left by brigadier Murray. Colonel Howe, with his light infantry, was poſted in the rear of the left.

M. de Montcalm advancing in ſuch a manner as ſhewed his intention was to flank the left of the Engliſh, brigadier Townſhend was ſent with the regiment of Amherſt, which he formed in ſuch a manner as to preſent, as it were, a double front to the enemy.

He was afterwards reinforced by two battaliions, and the reſerve conſiſted of one regiment drawn up in eight ſubdiviſions, with conſiderable intervals.

The enemy advanced to the charge, about nine in the morning, with great ſpirit as well as order, though their fire was both irregular and ineffectual. The Engliſh reſerved their ſhot, till the enemy approached within forty yards of their line, when they poured in a diſcharge with ſuch violence as could not fail of doing terrible execution. The brave general Wolfe had ſtationed himſelf in the warmeſt part of the attack, and ſoon received a ſhot in his wriſt, which did not, however, oblige him to quit the field. Having a handkerchief about his hand, he continued to give his orders without the leaſt emotion; and advanced at the head of the grenadiers with their bayonets fixed, when another ball unfortunately pierced the breaſt of this young hero, who fell an honour to his profeſſion, and his country, and at the moment when every part of the Britiſh army ſeemed to exert itſelf with ſingular valour.

While the right puſhed on with their bayonets, brigadier Murray advanced briſkly with the troops under his command, and ſoon broke the enemy's center; when the highlanders, drawing their broad ſwords, fell upon, and drove them with great ſlaughter into the town, and the works they had raiſed at the bridge over the river St. Charles. Colonel Howe frequently attacked the flanks of the enemy, and drove them into heaps, while brigadier Townſhend advanced platoons againſt their front; ſo that the right wing of the French were prevented from carrying their firſt deſign into execution.

General Wolfe being ſlain, and brigadier Monckton dangerouſly wounded, the command devolved on brigadier Townſhend, who haſtened to the center, and finding the troops diſordered by the purſuit, formed them again with all poſſible expedition. He had hardly performed this neceſſary part of his duty, when M. de Bougainville appeared in the rear of the Engliſh, at the head of two thouſand freſh forces.

Two battalions with two pieces of artillery were immediately ordered to advance againſt him, and at their approach he retired among woods and ſwamps, where general Townſhend did not think it prudent to follow them.

During the action, M. de Montcalm was mortally wounded, and conveyed to Quebec, where he died. His ſecond in command was left wounded on the field, and being conveyed on board an Engliſh ſhip, expired the next day. About five hundred of the enemy were ſlain on the field of battle; and not leſs than a thouſand, including a great number of officers, were made priſoners.

In this memorable action the Engliſh had only fifty men killed and about five hundred wounded. But the death of the brave Wolfe was a national loſs, as he might juſtly be ranked among the greateſt generals who have adorned the Britiſh annals. He was an honour to ſociety, as a man poſſeſſed of a ſoul ſuſceptible of every generous and ſublime ſentiment, that can aggrandize humane nature, or influence to actions worthy a rational being. His dying breath witneſſed his ardent love of his country; for being rouzed from fainting in the laſt agonies by the ſound of they run, he eagerly aſked who run; and being told, the French, he ſaid, "Then, I thank God, I die contented:" and inſtantly expired.

The battle of Quebec was fought on the 12th of September, and on the 17th a flag of truce was ſent from the town with propoſals of capitulation, which being maturely conſidered by the general and admiral, were accepted and ſigned at eight next morning. By theſe articles it was agreed, that the garriſon of the town ſhould march out with all the honours of war, and be embarked as ſoon as convenient, in order to be landed at the firſt port in France; that the inhabitants ſhould not be removed nor obliged to quit their houſes, until their condition ſhould be ſettled by a definitive treaty between their moſt Chriſtian and Britannic tannic majeſties; that the exerciſe of the Romiſh religion ſhould be permitted, as well as of all epiſcopal and clerical functions, till the poſſeſſion of Canada ſhould be determined between their Britannic and moſt Chriſtian majeſties; that the ſick, wounded, and all perſons employed in the hoſpitals ſhould be treated agreeable to the cartel ſettled between their Britannic and moſt Chriſtian majeſties; that before delivering up the gate and entrance of the town to the Engliſh forces, their general ſhould ſend ſome ſoldiers to be placed as ſafeguards at the church, convents, and chief habitations; and the commander of the city of Quebec ſhould be permitted to ſend advice to the marquis of Vandreuil, governor-general, of the reduction of the town, and alſo be allowed to tranſmit accounts of the ſame nature to the court of Verſailles.

The capitulation was no ſooner ratified, than the Britiſh forces took poſſeſſion of Quebec on the land ſide, and guards were poſted in different parts of the town to preſerve order and diſcipline. In the mean time, the inhabitants of the country came in great numbers to take the oaths of fidelity to the new government, and to deliver up their arms.

General Townſhend, having provided every neceſſary for the defence of Quebec, and left a garriſon of five thouſand effective men, under the command of brigadier Murray, embarked with admiral Saunders, and arrived in England about the beginning of the winter. Brigadier Monckton was carried to New York, where he happily recovered of his wounds.

A general joy was now transfuſed throughout the Britiſh dominions; a day of thankſgiving was appointed by proclamation, and the principal cities and corporations preſented addreſſes to his majeſty. The parliament petitioned the king, that he would order a monument to be erected in Weſtminſter-abbey to the memory of general Wolfe; and reſolved at the ſame time, that the thanks of the houſe ſhould be given to the generals and admirals employed in this ſucceſsful expedition.

The ſame ſucceſs attended the arms of Great Britain in the Eaſt Indies, where colonel Ford, who commanded the troops in Bengal, obtained a compleat victory over the French general Conflans, in the neighbourhood of Muſulipatam, which he entered in triumph. At the ſame time colonel Maitland was detached from Bombay with fifteen hundred ſeapoys, and nine hundred Europeans to inveſt the town and caſtle of Surat, which he attacked with ſuch fury, that both ſoon ſurrendered, on condition of being ſuffered to march out with their effects.

On the firſt of September vice-admiral Pocock ſailed from Madraſs in queſt of the enemy, and next day diſcovered their fleet conſiſting of fifteen ſail; but his endeavours to bring them to an engagement proved ineffectual, till the tenth, when the French admiral made a ſignal for battle. The action was maintained with great fury for two hours, when the whole French ſquadron bore away to the ſouthward under a crouded ſail. The Engliſh were in no condition to purſue them, many of their ſhips having ſuſtained much damage in their maſts, yards, and rigging. They loſt likewiſe above three hundred men, including captain Michie, who commanded the New-caſtle, captain Gore of the marines; the captains Somerſet and Brereton, with about two hundred and fifty men, were wounded. The Britiſh admiral with his ſquadron returned to the harbour of Madraſs. The French directed their courſe to the iſland of Mautitius, in order to refit, leaving the Engliſh maſters of the Indian coaſt; and this ſuperiority was ſoon confirmed by the arrival of rear-admiral Corniſh with four ſhips of the line, who joined admiral Pocock at Madraſs.

The Dutch, who during the the preſent war had maintained a puſillanimous and in ſome reſpects moſt inſiduous neutrality, were now excited by envy and jealouſy, and inſtigated by the governor of Batavia, to open acts of hoſtility in the Eaſt-Indies. They ſeized on ſeveral ſmall veſſels on pretence of retaliating affronts received from the Engliſh, and the Calcutta Indiaman, commanded by captain Wilſon ſailing down the river, the Dutch commodore gave him to underſtand, that if he preſumed to paſs, he would ſink him without further ceremony. Captain Wilſon, being in no condition to diſpute with ſuch ſuperior force, returned to Calcutta, where two other Indiamen were lying at anchor, and reported his adventure to colonel Clive, who immediately ordered the three ſhips to prepare for giving battle to the Dutch commodore. The ſhips having made the neceſſary preparations, and each of them taken on board two additional twelve-pounders, fell down the river, till they came near the Dutch ſhips, which drew up in line of battle to receive them. Three of the Dutch men mounted thirty-ſix guns, three twenty-nine, and one nineteen.

The duke of Dorſet, commanded by captain Forreſter, began the engagement with a broadſide, which was immediately returned. A ſevere conteſt was now maintained, till two of the Dutchmen ſlipping their cables bore away, and a third was driven on ſhore. Their commodore being thus weakened, after a few broadſides ſtruck his flag to captain Wilſon, and the other three followed his example.

On the part of the Engliſh there was not a ſingle man loſt in obtaining this victory, a circumſtance the more remarkable, as the Dorſet was torn almoſt to pieces, having received about ninety ſhot in her hull. Captain Wilſon took poſſeſſion of the prizes, and ſent the priſoners to colonel Clive at Calcutta.

The Engliſh arms were alſo crowned with ſucceſs on the coaſt of Coromandel, under the conduct of colonel Coote, who had lately arrived from England. This brave officer inveſted and reduced the fort of Wandewaſh, defeated the French army under general Lally, and finiſhed a hot and laborious campaign, with equal advantage to his country and honour to himſelf.

While the arms of Britain were thus extending their conqueſts in the Indies and America, their military operations in Europe were attended with the moſt fortunate events. It was now hoped by the friends of mankind, that the belligerent powers, whoſe reſources were nearly exhauſted, would have cloſed the ſcene of blood, and given repoſe to the world; but theſe pleaſing expectations vaniſhed, and each party prepared afreſh to decide the conqueſt by the ſword.

Freſh reinforcements from England, and recruits from different parts of Germany, had been ſent to ſtrengthen the forces of prince Ferdinand, who ſtill commanded the allied army. He had already formed a ſcheme for the operations of the enſuing campaign, the main drift of which was the expulſion of the enemy from Frankfort, before they could receive their expected reinforcements. This enterprize being determined on, he aſſembled aſſembled all his forces near Fulda, amounting to forty thouſand choice troops, and began his march on the tenth of April. On the thirteenth he came in ſight of the enemy, whom he found ſtrongly encamped about the villageof Bergen,between Frankfort and Hanau. Their general, the duke of Broglio, who was conſidered as one of the beſt officers in France for conduct and intrepidity, no ſooner received intelligence of the prince's intention, than he diſpoſed his army in ſuch a manner as prevented the allies from making the attack any way but by the village.

Prince Ferdinand ſaw the advantage of their ſituation, notwithſtanding which he reſolved to give them battle. Accordingly, about ten in the morning the battle began; but the allies being repulſed in three attacks, and having loſt about two thouſand men, among whom was the prince of Yſſembourg, prince Ferdinand thought proper to retreat to Windehen; from whence, in a few days, he continued his march to Munſter.

This defeat was of the utmoſt conſequence to the French; for while their army enjoyed plenty in the neighbourhood of Duſſledorp and Crevelt by means of the Rhine, the allies laboured under a dearth of proviſions, becauſe the country they occupied was already exhauſted, and the ſupplies were brought from a greater diſtance.

The French army being encamped at Stadſburg, the duke of Broglio who commanded the right wing, advanced from Caſſel into the territories of Hanover, where he took poſſeſſion of Gottingen without oppoſition; while prince Ferdinand was obliged to retire as they advanced, after leaving ſtrong garriſons in Lipſtadt, Retberg and Minden.

But theſe precautions proved fruitleſs, for Retberg was ſurprized by the duke de Broglio, after which he took Minden by ſtorm; nor was it long before Munſter and Liſtpadt were obliged to ſubmit. The regency of Hanover, alarmed at the progreſs of the enemy, exerted their utmoſt endeavours to reinforce prince Ferdinand, which having done, the allied army now began to advance, and fixed their camp in an advantageous manner at Peterſhagen, a place about three leagues from the enemy.

From Peterſhagen prince Ferdinand marched towards Hillen, a village at a conſiderable diſtance on his right. He had the day before detached the hereditary prince with ſix thouſand men, to make a compaſs towards the enemy's left flank, and to poſt himſelf in ſuch a manner as to cut off the communication of their convoys from Paderborn. He had alſo left on the banks of the Weſer a body of forces, under the command of general Wangenheim, which extended to the town of Dodenhauſen, where they were entrenched, and ſupported by a conſiderable train of artillery.

The marſhal de Contades, having come to a reſolution of attacking the allied army, he ordered Broglio to repaſs the river with his corps, which being done, he advanced in eight columns, and about midnight croſſed the rivulet of Barta that runs along the moraſs, and falls into the Weſer at Minden. At day-break he drew up his army in order of battle, and began to cannonade the prince's quarters at Hillen, upon which two pieces of artillery were immediately conveyed to that place, and the officer of the piquet-guard poſted there received orders to defend himſelf to the laſt extremity.

The allied army now advanced in eight columns, and occupied the ground between Halen and Hemarn, while general Wangenheim's corps filled up the ſpace between this laſt village and Dodenhauſen. The chief attack made by the enemy was on the left,with a deſign to force Wangenheim's corps, and penetrate between it and the body of the allies; but they received a moſt ſevere check from a battery of thirty pieces of cannon erected on purpoſe to receive them. About five in the morning both armies cannonaded each other; and at ſix the fire of the muſquetry began with great fury. The weight of the battle was in a great meaſure ſuſtained by the Engliſh infantry, and ſome corps of Hanoverians, who ſtood the reiterated charges of ſo many bodies of horſe, with an intrepidity which was never exceeded. They cut to pieces, or totally routed, theſe bodies. Two brigades of foot attempted to ſupport them, but they ſoon vaniſhed before the Engliſh infantry. Waldegrave's and Kingſley's regiments diſtinguiſhed themſelves in a particular manner, nor were their commanders leſs conſpicuous. The enemy's horſe, which compoſed their center, being entirely defeated, and their right, which attacked Wangenheim, unable to make the leaſt way, they thought of nothing but a retreat.

At this inſtant prince Ferdinand diſpatched orders to lord George Sackville, who commanded the whole Britiſh, and ſeveral brigades of German cavalry, to advance. But the critical minute paſſed away, through ſome delay in waiting for an explanation of the orders, and the cavalry were not brought up time enough to have any part in the glory of the day. The enemy, however, were repulſed in every attack with conſiderable loſs; at length they gave way in all parts, and about noon abandoned the field of battle to the victors, who purſued them to the ramparts of Minden, the garriſon of which place ſurrendered next day at diſcretion.

In this action the loſs of the French amounted to about ſeven thouſand men killed, wounded, and taken priſoners, while that of the allies did not exceed two thouſand, twelve hundred of whom were Engliſh, for as they obtained the greateſt glory on this important day, ſo they were the greateſt ſufferers.

The next day prince Ferdinand paid the due honours to thoſe gallant corps, as well as to ſeveral of the Hanoverians, who had exhibited ſimilar tokens of valour; and upon the whole, gave the moſt undeniable proofs of his penetration to diſcern, as well as diſpoſition to reward, true bravery, and genuine merit. Notwithſtanding theſe extraordinary marks of his approbation of the conduct of ſome, there were expreſſions that ſeemed to convey very ſevere reflections on the behaviour of others. The prince required, with particular ſtreſs, that his orders by his aids de-camp ſhould, for the future, be more punctually obeyed; he alſo expreſſed his concern, that the marquis of Granby had not been inveſted with the command of the Britiſh cavalry; for his highneſs ſeemed to entertain no doubt but that the ſucceſs of the day would have been much more complete, if that brave officer had commanded.

The people of England were equally tranſported and incenſed at the news of a victory ſo glorious to the Britiſh forces, and a cenſure ſo diſgraceful to their commander, who, a few days after the battle, reſigned his command, and returned to London, where he was deprived of all his military employments. The marquis of Granby, whom the opinion of prince Ferdinand, and the deſires of the whole army had pointed out, ſucceeded him in his command. An ardent courage, an affability of manners, a generous openneſs of ſoul, an extenſive benevolence, in ſhort, all qualities that compoſe the ſoldier or make the man, endeared him to the whole army, of which, indeed, he had long been the particular favourite.

No opportunity was now loſt by prince Ferdinand, of harraſſing the enemy, and driving them from place to place. Having defeated them in divers ſkirmiſhes, and made himſelf maſter of the town and caſtle of Marpurg, he proceeded with the army to Nerder-Weimar, and there encamped, while Contades remained at Gieſſen, on the ſouth ſide of the river Lahne.

Contades and Broglio had mutually accuſed each other of miſconduct, but the latter ſeemed to gain credit at the court of Verſailles, and in a little time he aſſumed the command of the French army, while Contades, d'Etrées, with ſeveral other general officers, received orders to return to Paris.

While the two armies lay encamped near each other, ſeveral ſkirmiſhes paſſed between the light troops and little excurſive parties. In the mean time the duke of Wirtemberg having occupied the town of Felda, the hereditary prince reſolved to beat up his quarters, and accordingly arrived with a ſelect body of forces before that place on the 30th of November about one in the morning. The troops of Wirtemberg, who were detached about in ſmall parties, retired haſtily into the town; whither they were followed by the hereditary prince, who purſued them to the other ſide of it, where four battalions were routed and taken. The duke de Broglio, who, (as the hereditary prince was detached with a party from the main army of the allies,) thought this a favourable opportunity for diſtinguiſhing the commencement of his command. Accordingly, on the twenty-fourth of December, he attempted to attack prince Ferdinand's army by ſurprize; but finding him perfectly prepared, and all his poſts well guarded, he was convinced that it would be more prudent to return to his former quarters, than to attack the camp of the enemy. This abortive attempt cloſed the operations of the campaign in Germany, and the reſpective armies retired into their winter quarters. Having thus given a particular detail of the operations of this campaign as far as they relate to the intereſts of Britain, we ſhall return to our affairs at home.

Mr. ſecretary Pitt preſented to the houſe of commons, on the nineteenth day of January, the copy of a convention between their Britannic and Pruſſian majeſties, concluded and ſigned at London two days before; and alſo the copy of a convention between his majeſty and the landgrave of Heſſe Caſſel, ſigned the ſame day. By the latter, nineteen thouſand of the troops of Heſſe Caſſel were taken into the pay of Great Britain, inſtead of twelve thouſand, the number then employed in the Engliſh ſervice; and the landgrave, in conſequence of the immenſe loſſes he had already ſuſtained in ſupport of the common cauſe, was to receive, beſides the ordinary pay of theſe troops, the ſum of ſixty thouſand pounds; and by the former, five hundred and twenty thouſand pounds were to be paid to his Pruſſian majeſty.

His majeſty ſent a meſſage to both houſes of parliament, on the thirtieth day of May, informing them, that he had received advice, that the French court was making preparations for an invaſion of this kingdom; and though he was perſuaded, that, by the united zeal and affection of his people, any ſuch attempt muſt, under the bleſſing of God, end in the deſtruction of thoſe who engaged in it; yet he apprehended, that he ſhould not act conſiſtently with that paternal care and concern, which he had always ſhewn for the preſervation of his people, if he omitted any means in his power, that might be neceſſary for their defence. His majeſty had, therefore, thought proper to acquaint the parliament with his having received repeated intelligence of the actual preparations making in the French ports to invade this kingdom, and the imminent danger of ſuch an invaſion being attempted; in order that his majeſty might, if he thought proper, cauſe the militia, or ſuch part of it as might be thought neceſſary, to be drawn up and embodied, and to march as occaſion might require.

This meſſage was no ſooner read, than both houſes preſented addreſſes to his majeſty, giving him the ſtrongeſt aſſurances, that they would, with vigour and ſteadineſs, ſupport his majeſty in taking the moſt effectual meaſures to defeat the deſigns of his enemies; to preſerve and ſecure his perſon and government, the proteſtant ſucceſſion in his royal family, and the religion, laws, and liberties of theſe kingdoms. The ſeſſion of parliament was cloſed with a ſpeech to both houſes, in which his majeſty not only thanked the commons, but applauded the firmneſs and vigour with which they had acted, as well as their prudence in judging, that notwithſtanding the preſent burthens, the making ample proviſion for carrying on the war was the moſt probable means of bringing it to an honourable and happy concluſion. He aſſured them that no attention ſhould be wanting, on his part, for the faithful application of what had been granted. They were informed, that his majeſty had nothing further to deſire, but that they would carry down the ſame good diſpoſitions, and propagate them in their ſeveral counties, which they had ſhewn in their proceedings, during the ſeſſion. As ſoon as this ſpeech had been delivered, the parliament was immediately prorogued.

In the month of June, this year, the prince of Wales having compleated the one and twentieth year of his age, the anniverſary of his birth was celebrated with great rejoicings, and his majeſty received the compliments of congratulation on the occaſion from the nobility, gentry, city of London, and many other cities, towns, corporations, and communities, who vied with each other in profeſſions of attachment; nor was there the leaſt trace of diſaffection perceivable at this juncture, in any part of his majeſty's dominions.

The Britiſh miniſtry having, with becoming ſpirit and reſolution, retaliated the illicit commerce which the Dutch had carried on with the French, in the capture of ſeveral of their veſſels; the ſtates-general ſent three miniſters extraordinary to London, to make repreſentations, and remove, if poſſible, the cauſes of thoſe miſunderſtandings that had ariſen between Great Britain and the United Provinces.

Hereupon, the credentials were delivered to his majeſty, who aſſured them in reply, that he ſhould endeavour, on his part, to remove the obſtacles in queſtion; expreſſing, at the ſame time, his ſatisfaction, that the deputies were come over for that purpoſe.

But notwithſtanding theſe proceedings, the Dutch ſtill perſiſted in their inſidious conduct, and ſeized every opportunity of ſhewing a partiality in favour of the French.

Major general Yorke, the Britiſh miniſter at the Hague, therefore preſented a memorial to the ſtates-general, remonſtrating, that the merchants of Holland carried on a contraband trade in favour of France, by tranſporting warlike ſtores from the Baltic to Holland, in Dutch bottoms, under the borrowed names of private perſons. He deſired that an immediate ſtop might be put to practices ſo repugnant to the treaty ſubſiſting between the two nations. He obſerved, that the care his majeſty had taken to reſtrain the exceſſes of privateers, demanded their regard to his remonſtrances; that their trading towns felt the effects of theſe reſtrictions, and that if they ſeriouſly deliberated on the affair, they muſt neceſſarily acquit his majeſty of any hoſtile intention, or wilful infringement of treaty.

This memorial had ſome little effect for a ſhort ſpace of time, but the Dutch, who are too ſtrongly characteriſed for perfidy and avarice, ſoon lapſed into their former conduct, and, from venal motives, afforded aſſiſtance to the enemies of Great Britain.

The parliament being aſſembled at Weſtminſter on the fourteenth of November, the ſeſſion was opened by commiſſion, and the lord keeper made a ſpeech to both houſes, in which they were given to underſtand, that his majeſty had deſired him to aſſure them, that he thought himſelf perfectly happy in being able to call them together, at a time when the ſituation of affairs was ſo glorious to his crown, and advantageous to his kingdom. He told them, that he was commanded by his majeſty to acquaint them, that the happy progreſs of ſucceſs, from the taking of Goree on the coaſt of Africa, to the taking of many important places in America, with the defeat of the French army in Canada, and the reduction of their capital city of Quebec, effected with ſo much honour to the adminiſtration, and his majeſty's officers; together with the important ſucceſs of his majeſty's fleet off Cape Lagos, and the effectually blocking up, for ſo many months, the principal part of the navy of France, in their own ports, were events that muſt have filled the hearts of his majeſty's ſubjects, as well as his own, with the ſincereſt joy; and convinced his parliament, that there had been no want of vigilance or vigour on his part, in the exertion of thoſe means which they had put into his hands. He added, that this general joy muſt be greatly heightened by the advantages obtained over the enemy in the Eaſt-Indies; the victory gained at Minden, and the great and able conduct of his majeſty's general, prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick. He told them, that his majeſty's good brother and ally, the king of Pruſſia, attacked and ſurrounded by ſo many conſiderable powers, had, by his magnanimity and abilities, and the bravery of his troops, been able, in a ſurpriſing manner, to prevent the miſchiefs concerted with ſuch united force againſt him. He declared, by the command of his ſovereign, that as his majeſty entered not into this war from views of ambition, ſo he did not wiſh to continue it from motives of reſentment; that his majeſty ſincerely deſired to ſee a ſtop put to the effuſion of human blood; that whenever ſuch terms of peace could be eſtabliſhed, as ſhould be juſt and honourable for his majeſty and his allies; and by procuring ſuch advantages, as, from the ſucceſſes of his majeſty's arms, might in reaſon and equity be expected, ſhould bring with them full ſecurity for the future; he ſhould rejoice to ſee the repoſe of Europe reſtored on ſuch ſolid foundations, and his faithful ſubjects happy in the bleſſings of peace: but in order to this great and deſirable end, he ſaid his majeſty was confident the parliament would agree with him, that it was neceſſary to make ample proviſion for carrying on the war, in all parts, with the utmoſt vigour. Finally, he repeated the aſſurances from the throne, of the high ſatisfaction his majeſty took in that union and good harmony, which was ſo conſpicuous in his loving ſubjects; and obſerved, that experience had ſhewn how much the nation owed to this union, by which alone the true happineſs of the people could be ſecured.

In the beginning of this year died the princeſs dowager of Orange and Naſſau, governante of the united provinces and eldeſt daughter of his Britannic majeſty, ſincerely regretted by the republic, as well as the court of London.

Her highneſs, by her will, appointed the king her father, and princeſs dowager of Orange, her mother-in-law, honorary tutors; and prince Louis of Brunſwick, acting tutor to her children.

The death of this amiable princeſs was ſoon followed by that of the princeſs Elizabeth Caroline, ſecond daughter of his late royal highneſs Frederic, prince of Wales, who died at Kew, in the month of September, before ſhe had attained the eighteenth year of her age.

This year the liberal arts ſuſtained an irreparable loſs by the death of George Frederic Handel, the moſt conſummate muſician of his age. He was a native of Germany, but had ſtudied in Italy, and afterwards ſettled in England, where he lived the darling of the ſons of Apollo, univerſally admired for his extraordinary genius for the ſublime in muſical compoſitions.

A. D. 1760. The parliament continued ſitting till the 22d of May, when a great number of bills were paſſed by commiſſion, after which the lord keeper cloſed the ſeſſion.

It has been already obſerved, that Thurot, as commodore of a ſmall ſquadron of five ſail had, in the preceding year, received from the French miniſtry inſtructions to ſail from Dunkirk, round the northern coaſt of Scotland in order to alarm the coaſt of Ireland, and favour an intended deſcent. It appears in the ſequel, that Thurot had been purſued by commodore Boys, and that on the Britiſh commander's being under a neceſſity of putting into Leith for a ſupply of proviſion, the Frenchman, before he could put to ſea again, had taken ſhelter at Gottenburgh in Sweden in the month of October. From thence they proceeded to Bergen in Norway, and this year, about the latter end of January, he ſailed again for the northern part of Ireland, with a deſign of making a deſcent about Derry; but before this project could be put in execution, they were driven out to ſea by a violent ſtorm, and in the night loſt one of their ſhips which never joined them again. As ſoon as the weather would permit, Thurot ſteered for the iſland of Iſla, where he landed his forces in hopes of finding ſome refreſhment, and accordingly they were ſupplied with ſome black cattle, and a little oatmeal, for which they paid a reaſonable price.

By this time the arrival of this enterprizing adventurer in the Britiſh ſeas had alarmed the whole nation. Bodies of regular troops and militia were poſted along the coaſts of Ireland and Scotland, and beſides the ſquadron under commodore Boys, who ſailed to the northward in purſuit of Thurot, ſeveral ſhips of war were ordered to ſcour the Briſtol channel, and cruize between Scotland and Ireland.

In the mean time Thurot's ſquadron ſailed from Iſla to Carrickfergus, where they anchored at twelve, and at three in the afternoon landed their forces, amounting in number to ſix hundred men.

The people on ſhore having diſcovered and ſuſpected them to be enemies, while they were bringing their fleet to an anchor, the troops were immediately aſſembled, and orders were ſent to the caſtle to continue the guards under arms. Lieutenant Hall went off with a reconnoitring party, and took poſt on a riſing ground, where he could plainly perceive eight boats landing armed men; he therefore gave orders to his non-commiſſioned officers and men, to watch their approaches, and take particular care they did not get round them by going along the foot of the hill. He then went to the town himſelf, and acquainted lieutenant-colonel Jennings with what he had done; upon which the colonel, with the troops on the parade, ordered the gates and avenues of the town to be defended by detachments made from the main body.

Thurot's people were, by this time, in full march, and a few ſtraggling huſſars, mounted on horſes they had picked up after landing, attempted to enter the gates; they retired on the firſt fire, but were ſoon ſupported by parties of foot, who attacked both the North and Scotch gates, but theſe were alſo repulſed, and kept back as long as the men had ammunition. Before the gates of the caſtle were ſhut, the enemy appeared in the market place, and finding our fire now grow ſlack, they attacked the gates, and at length forced them and marched in. Lieutenant-colonel Jennings, lord Wallingford, captain Bland, lieutenant Ellis, with ſome other gentlemen, and about fifty men, ſtill made a ſtand, and repulſed the enemy.

But all their ammunition being at length exhauſted, and lieueenant-colonel Jennings finding it would be in vain any longer to reſiſt, ſurrendered on condition that the troops ſhould march out with all the honours of war, and the officers be on their parole in Ireland; that an equal number of French priſoners ſhould be ſent to France within one month, or as ſoon as ſhips could be got ready for that purpoſe; that the caſtle of Carrickfergus ſhould not be demoliſhed, nor any of the ſtores deſtroyed or taken out of it; and that the town and country of Carrickfergus ſhould not be plundered or burnt, on condition that the French troops were furniſhed with neceſſary proviſions by the mayor and corporation. The enemy, however, were ſoon obliged to abandon their conqueſt, for Thurot having received intelligence that a conſiderable body of forces were, by this time, collected, he ordered his men to re-embark immediately.

Advice from the lord lieutenant of Ireland having, in the interim, been tranſmitted to captain Elliot, commander of his majeſty's ſhip Æolus, of thirty guns, who was ſtationed at Kinſale, that three French ſhips had appeared off Carrickfergus, he ſailed with the Pallas and Brilliant, two frigates of thirty-ſix guns each, in queſt of them. On the evening of the twenty-ſixth of February he made the port of Carrickfergus, but the wind blowing contrary, he could not poſſibly get in. On the 28th he got ſight of the enemy, and about nine o'clock came along ſide of the commodore; in a few minutes the action became general, and having continued about an hour and a half, all the enemy's ſhips ſtruck their colours. The French loſt their gallant commander Thurot, and about three hundred men. The brave Thurot, whoſe humanity was equal to his valour, was unfortunately killed, after he had ordered his colours to be ſtruck, and two men were killed at the ſtaff, while they were endeavouring to ſtrike them.

Only five men were killed, and thirty-one wounded, in this engagement, on the part of the Engliſh; the enemy's ſhips were much damaged in their maſts and rigging, and were brought by captain Elliot into Ramſay bay, in the iſle of Man, to refit. The Belleiſle, the French commodore's ſhip, was, with the utmoſt difficulty, prevented from ſinking, after having loſt her bowſprit, mizenmaſt and main yard.

The attention of the public, which had been engroſſed by this event, was ſoon afterwards wholly engaged by the trial of lord George Sackville, for diſobeying the orders of prince Ferdinand, at the battle of Minden. In order to invalidate the charge brought againſt him, he made a very elaborate defence. But from the depoſitions of ſeveral principal officers it was deemed equivocal; thoſe gentlemen poſitively denying the facts upon which it was founded. The court martial, having examined the evidence, and heard the defence, gave judgment in theſe words: "The court, upon due "conſideration of the whole matter before them, "is of opinion, that lord George Sackville is "guilty of diſobeying the orders of prince Ferdi-"nand of Brunſwick, whom he was by his com-"miſſion and inſtructions directed to obey as com-"mander in chief, according to the rules of war; "and it is the further opinion of the court, that "the ſaid lord George is, and he is hereby "adjudged, unfit to ſerve his majeſty in any "military capacity whatſoever." His ſentence was confirmed by the king, who, moreover, ſignified his pleaſure, that it ſhould be given out in public, not only in Great Britain, but in America, and every quarter of the globe, where any Engliſh troops happened to be, that officers being convinced, that neither high birth, nor great employments can ſhelter offences of ſuch a nature; and, that ſeeing they are ſubject to cenſure much worſe than death, to a man who is not loſt to all ſenſe of honour, they may avoid the fatal conſequences ariſing from diſobedience of orders. His majeſty alſo ordered the name of lord George Sackville to be ſtruck out of the liſt of privy counſellors.

This ſummer was diſtinguiſhed by the trial and execution of Laurence earl Ferrers, who perpetrated a deliberate murder on one Mr. Johnſon, his own ſteward. Lord Ferrers had, ſome time before, married a very amiable lady, but behaved to her in ſo unbecoming a manner, that application was made to the houſe of peers, and a ſeparation effected by act of parliament. In conſequence of this ſtatute, truſtees were appointed, and Johnſon was to receive the revenues of the earl's eſtate. This act exaſperated his lordſhip to the higheſt degree, and ſuſpecting Johnſon to have joined with the reſt of his family againſt his intereſt, he laid a plan for his deſtruction. Accordingly, he ſent for him to his houſe under pretence of conſulting with him on buſineſs of importance. Johnſon, ſuſpecting nothing of this diabolical contrivance, attended, and was received with appearance of friendſhip. But ſoon after the earl ſhot the unfortunate victim with a piſtol he had loaded for that purpoſe. A pre-

premeditated deſign of ſo horrid a nature alarmed the whole nation, and the people, with one voice, cried aloud for juſtice. Nor did they implore in vain: he was tried before the houſe of peers, and the lord keeper Henley, who was appointed lord high ſteward on the occaſion, after having made a ſhort ſpeech touching the heinous nature of the offence, pronounced the ſame ſentence of death upon the earl, which the loweſt claſs of malefactors undergo; that from the Tower he ſhould, on the Monday following, be carried to the common place of execution, there to be hanged by the neck, and his body be afterwards diſſected and anatomized; but the lords, his judges, by virtue of a power veſted in them, reſpited his ſentence for one month, that he might have time to ſettle his concerns.

The criminal was extremely ſhocked at the laſt part of the ſentence; he changed colour, his jaw quivered, and he appeared to be in the utmoſt agitation: but he behaved with aſtoniſhing compoſure and unconcern during the remaining part of his life.

From the paſſing of the ſentence to the time of execution, he had recourſe to various methods, in order to ward off the fatal ſentence, but perſuaded, at length, of the inefficacy of all efforts to obtain ſo undeſerved a pardon, he ſent a letter to his majeſty, remonſtrating on the ignominy of the death to which he was aſſigned, and requeſting that he might be allowed to ſuffer in the Tower; but this indulgence was refuſed.

His body being demanded by the ſheriffs on the fifth day of May, at the Tower gate, in conſequence of a writ under the great ſeal of England, directed to the lieutenant of the Tower, he was delivered up, and then attended to the place of execution by one of the ſheriffs and the chaplain of the Tower, followed by the chariots of the ſheriffs, a mourning coach and ſix filled with his friends, and a hearſe for the conveyance of his body.

On his approaching the place of execution, he expreſſed an earneſt deſire to ſee and take leave of a certain perſon, who waited in a coach, for whom he entertained a ſincere regard; but the ſheriff prudently obſerving that ſuch an interview might ſhock him, at a time which required the exertion of all his fortitude, he declined it, and delivered to him a pocket book, a ring, and a purſe, deſiring they might be given to that perſon, whom he then declined ſeeing.

He had been conveyed from the Tower in his landau, at his own requeſt; and when he came to Tyburn, he got out of it, and aſcended the ſcaffold with an undaunted countenance. He refuſed to join the chaplain in his devotion, but kneeling with him, he repeated the Lord's prayer, and added, with great energy, "O Lord, forgive me "all my errors, and pardon all my ſins." The ſtage was then removed from under his feet, and the fatal ſentence executed as adjudged, after which his body was conveyed to Surgeons Hall, where it remained for ſome days, and was then taken away and privately interred by direction of his friends.

The only conſiderable damage ſuſtained by the navy of Great Britain ſince the beginning of this year, was the loſs of the Ramillies, a magnificent ſhip of the ſecond rate belonging to the ſquadron which admiral Boſcawen commanded on the coaſt of France, in order to watch the motions, and diſtreſs the commerce of the enemy. The admiral was obliged, by ſtreſs of weather, to return to Plymouth in the beginning of February, where he arrived with much difficulty; but the Ramillies overſhot the entrance to the ſound, and being embayed near a point called the Bolt-head, about four leagues higher up the channel, was daſhed in pieces among the rocks, after all her cables had given way. All her officers and men, amounting to ſeven hundred, periſhed on this occaſion, except one midſhipman and twenty-five ſeamen, who ſaved their lives by leaping on the rocks, as the hull was thrown forwards, and raiſed up by the ſucceeding billows.

The war in America was carried on with the ſame vigour as in the preceding year. The French emiſſaries from the province of Louiſiana had, by their arts, induced the Cherokees, a numerous and powerful nation of the Indians ſettled on the confines of Virginia and Carolina, to break out in open acts of hoſtility againſt the Engliſh, which they began by plundering, maſſacreing and ſcalping ſeveral Britiſh ſubjects of the more ſouthern provinces. In conſequence of theſe inſtances of cruelty and injuſtice, application was made for aſſiſtance to general Amherſt, commander in chief of his majeſty's forces in America. He forthwith detached twelve hundred choſen men to South Carolina, under the command of colonel Montgomery, brother to the earl of Eglington. Immediately after his arrival at Charles Town, he proceeded to the Twelve-mile river, which he paſſed without oppoſition in the beginning of the month of June.

From Twelve-mile river he proceeded, by forced marches, until he arrived in the neighbourhood of the Indian town called Little Keowee, where he encamped in an advantageous ſituation. Determined to ſurprize the enemy, he left his tents ſtanding, with a ſufficient guard for the camp and waggons, and marched through the woods towards the Cherokee town of Eſtatoe, and in this rout detached a body of light-horſe and infantry to deſtroy the village of Little Keowee, where they were received with a ſmart fire, but they ruſhed in with their bayonets, and killed all their opponents.

In the mean time, the main body continued their rout towards Eſtatoe, which they reached in the morning, but it had been abandoned about half an hour before their arrival. Some few of the Indians, who had not time to eſcape, were ſlain; and the town, conſiſting of two hundred houſes, was deſtroyed.

In order to intimidate theſe ſavages, it was thought neceſſary to make ſome examples of ſeverity; and the ſoldiers became obdurate when they found in one of the Indian towns the body of an Engliſhman, whom they had ſcalped that very morning.

Colonel Montgomery proſecuted his devaſtation with great rapidity; in the ſpace of a few hours, he deſtroyed Sugar-town, and every village and houſe in the lower nation. All the men that were taken ſuffered immediate death, but the greateſt part had eſcaped with the utmoſt precipitation.

Having thus taken vengeance on the perfidious Cherokees, the colonel returned to Fort Prince George, with about forty Indian women and children, whom he had made priſoners. Two of their warriors were ſet at liberty, and deſired to inform their nation, that though they were yet in the power of the Engliſh, they might ſtill reap the advantages and bleſſings of peace if they would make proper ſubmiſſion.

This meſſage, however, produced no effect, upon which colonel Montgomery reſolved to make a ſecond irruption into the middle ſettlements of the Cherokees, and began his march on the twenty-fourth of June.

After having ſuſtained a very troubleſome fire from the enemy, they at length arrived at the town of Etchowee, which the inhabitants had forſaken, having taken every thing of value away with them. For the ſpace of two days after this, the colonel purſued his rout without interruption; but afterwards ſuſtained ſome ſtraggling fires from the woods, though the parties of the enemy were put to flight as often as they appeared. In the beginning of July, he arrived at Fort Prince George, having loſt about ſeventy men, killed and wounded, in this expedition.

The Cherokees now aſſembled a conſiderable number, and formed the blockade of Fort Loudon, a ſmall fortification near the confines of Virginia, defended by an inconſiderable garriſon, and ill ſupplied with proviſions and neceſſaries. Having ſuſtained a long ſiege, and being reduced to the utmoſt diſtreſs, the commander held a council of war, to deliberate on their then ſituation, when they were unanimouſly of opinion, that as it was impoſſible to prolong their defence, they ſhould accept of an honourable capitulation; and captain Stuart ſhould be ſent to treat with the warriors about the conditions of their ſurrender. This officer, being diſpatched with full powers, obtained a capitulation of the Indians, by which the garriſon was permitted to retire.

The garriſon evacuated the Fort in conſequence of this treaty, and had marched about fifteen miles on their return to Carolina, when they were ſurprized by a large body of Indians, who maſſacred all the officers except captain Stuart, and ſlew five and twenty of his ſoldiers: the reſt were made priſoners, and diſtributed among the different towns and villages of the nation.

Attakullakulla, or the Little Carpenter, one of the Indian chiefs, generouſly interceded for the life of captain Stuart, and having ranſomed him at the price of all he could command, conducted him ſafe to Holſton river, where he found major Lewis had advanced with a body of Virginians.

During theſe tranſactions in the ſouthern colonies of America, the military tranſactions in the more northern parts were carried on with equal vigour.

The garriſon of Quebec, which was left under the command of general Murray, had ſuffered greatly from the exceſſive cold in the winter, and the want of vegetable and freſh proviſions; inſomuch, that before the end of April, near two thouſand ſoldiers were ſo ill of the ſcurvy as to be unfit for ſervice, and about one thouſand had died of that diſorder.

Such was the ſituation of the garriſon when general Murray received intelligence that the French commander, the chevalier de Levy, was employed in aſſembling his army, which had been cantoned in the neighbourhood of Montreal; and that he determined to undertake the ſiege of Quebec, whenever the river St. Lawrence ſhould be clear of ice, and he could make proper uſe of his veſſels.

Being informed on the night of the twenty-ſixth, that the enemy had landed at Point au Tremble, to the number of ten thouſand men, with five hundred ſavages, he ordered all the bridges over the river Caprouge to be broken down, ſecured the landing places of Sylleri, and the Foulon, and marching the next day with a ſtrong detachment, and two field pieces, took poſſeſſion of an advantageous ſituation, and thus defeated the ſcheme which the French commander had projected, for cutting off the poſts which the Engliſh had eſtabliſhed. Theſe being all withdrawn, the general marched back to Quebec, with little or no loſs, although his rear was much harraſſed by the enemy. There he formed a reſolution of hazarding a battle, on failure of which he determined to hold out the place to the laſt extremity, then to retreat to the iſle of Orleans, or Condres, and there wait, with the remainder of the garriſon, for a reinforcement.

Having taken theſe reſolutions, he gave the neceſſary orders over-night, and on the twenty-eighth of April, in the morning, marched out with his ſmall army of three thouſand men, which he formed on the heights, in order of battle. The right brigade, commanded by colonel Burton, conſiſted of the regiments of Amherſt, Anſtruther, and Webb; and the ſecond battalion of Americans conſtituted the corps de reſerve; major Dallings's corps of light infantry covered the right flank: the left was ſecured by captain Huzzen's company of rangers, and one hundred volunteers, under the command of captain Donald Macdonald; and two field pieces were allotted for the ſecurity of each batalion.

The general, having reconnoitred the enemy, perceived that their van had taken poſſeſſion of the riſing ground about three quarters of a mile from his front, but that the army was on their march in one column. Determined to attack them before they were formed, he advanced towards them with equal order and expedition. After a warm conteſt, they were driven from the heights, and in the mean time their army advanced and formed in columns. Their van conſiſted of ten companies of grenadiers, two of volunteers, and four hundred ſavages; their center, of eight battalions formed in four columns, with ſome bodies of Canadians; their rear of two battalions and ſome Canadians in the flanks; and two thouſand Canadians formed the reſerve. Their whole army conſiſted of twelve thouſand men. Major Dalling bravely diſpoſſeſſed their grenadiers of a houſe and a windmill, which they occupied in order to cover their left flank; and in this attack the major and ſome of his officers were wounded; nevertheleſs, the light infantry purſued the fugitives to a corps, which was formed to ſuſtain them; the purſuers then halted, and diſperſed along the front of the right, a circumſtance which prevented that wing from taking advantage of the firſt impreſſion they had made on the left of the enemy. The light infantry being ordered to regain the flank, were, in attempting this motion, furiouſly charged, and thrown into diſorder; they then retired to the rear in ſuch a ſhattered condition, that they could never again be brought up during the whole action. Otway's regiment was immediately ordered to advance from the body of reſerve, and ſuſtain the right wing, an attempt to penetrate which the enemy had twice made in vain.

In the mean time, the left brigade of the Britiſh forces had diſpoſſeſſed the French of two redoubts, and ſuſtained, with amazing intrepidity, the whole efforts of the enemy's right, until being overpowered by numbers, they were fairly fought down. The French now attacked them with great impetuoſity, and a freſh column of the regiment of Rouſillon penetrating the left wing of the Britiſh army, it gave way; the diſorder was ſoon communicated to the right, ſo that after a very obſtinate diſpute, which laſted an hour and a half, general Murray was obliged to quit the field, with the loſs of the greateſt part of his artillery, and above a thouſand men killed and wounded. The enemy, however, loſt twice that number of men without deriving any eſſential advantage from their victory. On the very evening of the battle, the French opened the trenches before the town, which the general, having made the neceſſary preparations, reſolved to defend to the laſt extremity.

Lord Colville had ſailed from Hallifax, with the fleet under his command, on the twenty-ſecond of April, but was retarded in his paſſage, by great ſhoals of ice which floated down the river, thick fogs and contrary winds. Commodore Swanton, who had ſailed from England with a ſmall reinforcement, arrived about the beginning of May, at the iſle of Bec, in the river St. Lawrence, where, with two ſhips, he propoſed to wait for the reſt of the ſquadron, which had ſeparated from him in his paſſage: but one of theſe, the Loweſtoffe, had entered the harbour of Quebec on the ninth of May, and informed the governor that the ſquadron was arrived in the river.

As ſoon as commodore Swanton was informed that Quebec was beſieged, he ſailed up the river, and on the fifteenth in the evening landed at Point Levy, where the general expreſſed an earneſt deſire that the French ſquadron above town might be removed. The commodore, therefore, ordered captain Schomberg, of the Diana, and captain Deane of the Loweſtoffe, to ſlip their cables early the next morning, and attack the enemy's fleet, conſiſting of two frigates, two armed ſhips, and a large number of ſmaller veſſels. They were no ſooner in motion, than the French ſhips fled in the utmoſt confuſion. One of their frigates was driven on the rocks above Cape Diamond; the other ran aſhore, and was burnt, at Point au Tremble, and all the other veſſels were either deſtroyed or taken.

The enemy, having received undoubted information that a ſtrong Engliſh fleet was already arrived in the river St. Lawrence, and being much intimidated by the above diſaſter, on the following night they thought proper to raiſe the ſiege of Quebec, and retreat in the moſt precipitate manner, leaving their proviſions, implements, and artillery behind them.

The attempts of the French againſt Quebec being thus defeated, they began to take meaſures for the preſervation of Montreal, againſt which the force under general Amherſt was directed; but of ſo little effect were all their ſchemes, that on the ſeventh of September, general Amherſt took full poſſeſſion of it, and thus compleated the conqueſt of Canada; a conqueſt, the moſt important of any atchieved by the Britiſh arms, as by theſe means the ſafety of the Engliſh colonies in America was effected; the Indian furr trade, in its full extent, veſted in the hands of the Engliſh; the French intereſt among the ſavage Indians totally extinguiſhed; and their American poſſeſſions reduced to a ſmall track on the weſt of the Miſſiſſippi, which, on any future occaſion, might be eaſily conquered.

The Britiſh arms were no leſs ſucceſsful in the Eaſt Indies. The ſettlement of Carical was reduced by the ſea and land forces under the command of rear admiral Corniſh and major Monſon. Colonel Coote had defeated Lally in the field, and ſubdued ſeveral ſettlements on the coaſt of Coromandel. Five ſhips of the line, commanded by captain Haldane, blocked up Pondicherry by ſea, while Col. Coote carried on the ſiege by land. The garriſon defended the town with great reſolution: at length, however, the city of Pondicherry, with a garriſon of about fourteen hundred European ſoldiers, a vaſt quantity of military ſtores, and great riches, were given up at diſcretion to the conquerors. A ſmall French ſettlement on the coaſt of Malabar was next reduced, by which means Great Britain commanded the whole trade of the vaſt peninſula of India, from the Ganges to the Indies, the moſt extenſive and profitable ſphere of commerce in the known world.

The general joy which muſt naturally have ariſen from a ſeries of ſucceſſes not to be paralleled in the hiſtory of any nation, was now totally damped by the death of his majeſty king George the Second, who expired early on the morning of the 25th of October, at his palace at Kenſington, in the ſeventy-ſeventh year of his age, and thirty-fourth of his reign. He had not the leaſt warning of this fatal ſtroke, having ariſen at his uſual hour, drank his chocolate according to cuſtom, enquired about the wind as if anxious for the arrival of the foreign mails, and ſignified, as the weather was calm and ſerene, his intention of walking in the gardens. But a few minutes after he had given this intimation, and while he remained alone in his chamber, he fell on the floor, the noiſe of which brought in ſeveral of his attendants, who lifted him on the bed, where, in a faint voice, he deſired that Amelia might be called; but before the princeſs could reach the apartment, her royal father expired. It appeared on examination, that the cauſe of his death was beyond the reach of the healing art, being a rupture of the right ventricle of the heart, which occaſioned an immediate ſtoppage of the whole circulation.

George II. attained to a greater age than any of his predeceſſors, and exceeded the greater part of them in the length of his reign. Nor was this protracted ſeries undiſtinguiſhed by that public tranquillity and domeſtic felicity, to which monarchs, from a variety of cauſes, are too frequently ſtrangers. In his days commerce flouriſhed, agriculture and manufactures were daily improving, and the liberal arts were cultivated and cheriſhed by the wiſe regulations of parliament, and the generous aſſiſtance of learned and virtuous individuals. He had the ſingular pleaſure, at the laſt period of his reign, to ſee the ſpirit of party, which had long and malignantly raged in theſe kingdoms, wholly extinguiſhed; and his people firmly united in the proſecution of a war as general and expenſive as had diſturbed the world for many centuries.

To crown his happineſs, he had ample demonſtration that he reigned in the hearts of his ſubjects, as well as that he was the dread and terror of the perfidious and ambitious houſe of Bourbon, and the admiration of the firſt characters in the known world. If his parts were not the moſt lively nor brilliant, his judgment was ſolid and comprehenſive. He was well verſed in the political ſyſtem of Germany, from which originated the continental wars during his reign; and ſuch was his attachment to the general rights and intereſts of mankind, that he always oppoſed, to the utmoſt of his abilities, every attempt that tended to affect the ballance of power. Though his temper might be haſty and impetuous, his diſpoſition was humane; and, to ſum up his character, the whole tenour of his actions apparently beſpeaks the great prince and the good man.

George the ſecond had iſſue by queen Caroline, two ſons and five daughters, who arrived at years of maturity; Frederick, late prince of Wales, the father of his preſent majeſty; William, late duke of Cumberland; Anne, the princeſs royal, married to the late prince of Orange, and mother to the preſent ſtadtholder; Mary, landgravine of Heſſe Caſſel; Louiſa, late queen of Denmark; and Amelia and Caroline, who were never married.

Remarkable Occurrences during the Reign of George II.

A. D.

1729 On the firſt of January this year there happened ſo great a fog in London, that ſeveral chairmen miſtook their way in St. James's Park, and fell with their fares into the canal: many perſons fell into Fleet-ditch, and conſiderable damage was done on the Thames by boats and barges running foul of each other.

1730 This year five Cherokee chiefs arrived in England, and ſubmitted themſelves and country to the Engliſh government.

Copper firſt imported into England from Virginia.

1731 Forgery firſt puniſhed with death in England.

This year the national debt amounted to 48,985,638l. 12s. 9½d.

1734 Franking of letters firſt permitted to members of parliament.

1735 The number of gin-ſhops this year in London amounted to upwards of ſeven thouſand.

On the 16th of February the tide in the Thames roſe ſo high that the lawyers were obliged to be carried out of Weſtminſter-hall in boats, and by the great quantity of rain that fell on that day numbers of cattle were deſtroyed in ſeveral parts of the kingdom, particularly in the marſhes of Eſſex.

1739 This year was remarkable for one of the ſevereſt froſts ever known in England. It began on Chriſtmas-day, and continued without intermiſſion upwards of ſeven weeks. The Thames was frozen over in ſuch a manner, that a public fair was held on it, and booths erected for the reception of all thoſe whoſe curioſity led them thither. The hardſhips of the poor were extremely great; but, to the everlaſting honour of the Engliſh, let it be recorded, that they did every thing in their power to alleviate the diſtreſſes of their ſuffering fellow-ſubjects. From the king, down to the humble tradeſman, each ſeemed anxious to be moſt forward in acts of benevolence; ſo that a national calamity revived decaying charity.

The firſt ſtone of Weſtminſter-bridge laid on the 29th of January, and in the month of October was laid the firſt ſtone of the Manſion-houſe.

1741 In the ſummer of this year the city of London, and places adjacent, were viſited with an epidemic fever, which, for ſeveral months together, carried off great numbers of people. The cauſe of it was ſuppoſed to ariſe from the heat of the weather, which occaſioned a coagulation of the blood, or a ſtagnation thereof in the capillary arteries. This diſtemper ſpread all over the nation; and was alſo ſenſibly felt in Ireland.

1744 Tar water firſt recommended in medicine.

1748 On the 25th of March, early in the morning, a dreadful fire broke out at the houſe of Mr. Eldridge, a peruke-maker in Exchange-alley, Cornhill. The flames were ſo furious, that notwithſtanding there was the greateſt ſupply of water and engines, with every other poſſible aſſiſtance, yet before noon upwards of 80 houſes were entirely conſumed, beſides many others very conſiderably damaged. Mr. Eldridge and his family all periſhed in the flames: and Mr. Cook, a merchant, who lodged in the houſe, broke his leg by jumping out of the window, and died ſoon after. The damage occaſioned by this accident was eſtimated at 200,000l.

In the ſame year, in the evening of the 4th of Auguſt, many ſwarms of locuſts were ſeen in the air in different parts of London. They were ſuppoſed to have come from Poland and Hungary, where they had this ſummer ſettled in vaſt quantities, and deſtroyed all the fruits of the earth. The next day great numbers of them were found in Pall-mall, St. James's Park, and Southwark. They ſoon, however, diſappeared, as was ſuppoſed from the difference of our climate to that from whence they came; and this tranſient viſit rather produced an amuſement to exerciſe the curioſity of the people, than any preſage of danger.

On the 2d of December, in the ſame year, there aroſe a prodigious hurricane of wind, which continued for near eight hours. A great number of houſes were intirely blown down, others ſtripped of their roofs, and many trees torn up by the roots. Several perſons, in paſſing the ſtreets, were greatly hurt by the falling of chimnies and ſigns; and a child who was ſtanding by the fire was killed by the bricks of the chimney falling within-ſide the houſe. The moſt conſiderable damage was done to the ſhipping and ſmall craft in the river, and ſeveral perſons were drowned. Many ſhips were driven on ſhore, and great damage done on the coaſts of Kent and Suſſex.

1750 In the beginning of this year two ſhocks of an earthquake were felt in London, the firſt of which happened on the 8th of February, and the ſecond on the 8th of March.

1752 The new ſtile took place in England Sept. 3, which was made the 14th.

With reſpect to the ſtate of learning during the reign of George II. it continued advancing towards perfection. Many great men appeared in the literary world, and although they did not make ſuch ſhining figures as ſome have done in the preſent reign, yet they laid a foundation for the nobleſt improvements in every art and ſcience. Simpſon, Saunderſon, and M'Laurin carried the knowledge of the mathematics to an height unknown before. Phyſic and natural hiſtory were cultivated by many learned gentlemen, among whom were Dr. Mead and Sir Hans Sloane; and Doctors Warburton and Newton ſtood forth in defence of Divine Revelation. In a word, the reign of George II. produced many great men, ſome of whom are now bright ornaments to their country, while ſuch as are dead have left behind them the moſt illuſtrious examples.

MR. Secretary Pitt no ſooner received the melancholy information of the death of his late ſovereign, than he immediately repaired to Kew, and communicated the important event to the heir-apparent. The lords of the privy council were immediately aſſembled, and next day his majeſty king George III. was proclaimed with the uſual ſolemnity. His majeſty then addreſſed himſelf to the council aſſembled at Carlton houſe in a ſpeech, implying his reſolution to proſecute the ſame meaſures which had been planned under the late king; which being made public, the apprehenſions of ſome perſons, who vere fearful of a change in the adminiſtration of affairs, were entirely removed.

His majeſty then took and ſigned the oath relating to the ſecurity of the church of Scotland, and ſubſcribed two inſtruments thereof; one of which was tranſmitted to the court of ſeſſion, and afterwards lodged in the public regiſter of Scotland; the other remained among the records of the council. Both houſes of parliament were immediately aſſembled, and the members ſworn in by the proper officers; a proclamation having been publiſhed, requiring all perſons in poſts of authority or government on the demiſe of the late king to proceed in the execution of their reſpective offices. A proclamation was iſſued for the encouragement of piety and virtue, and the prevention and puniſhment of prophaneſs and immorality.

Never did prince aſcend the throne of his anceſtors with greater eclat than this young monarch, who, at the time of his acceſſion, was in the 23d year of his age. Such was the tide of popular affection, that addreſſes flowed in from every part of the kingdom. The houſes of parliament led the way, and were followed by the magiſtrates and merchants of London, the clergy, and the principal cities and corporations throughout the kingdom. Indeed, the people in general ſeemed to vie with each other in expreſſions of loyalty and affection to their new ſovereign.

On the evening of the 10th of November, the body of the late king was removed from Kenſington to the Prince's Chamber, where it lay in ſtate till next day, when it was interred with great funeral pomp, in the royal vault in the chapel of Henry VII. the duke of Cumberland acting as chief mourner on the ſolemn occaſion.

The parliament being aſſembled on the 18th, his majeſty addreſſed both houſes in a moſt elegant ſpeech from the throne, importing, the juſt concern he felt for the loſs of the late king; the critical time in which he was called to the government; his reliance on the bleſſing of heaven, and their united aſſiſtance; the peculiar glory of his having been born and educated in this country, and his title to the name of Briton; aſſurances of his inviolable attachment to the civil and religious liberties of his ſubjects, and fixed purpoſe to encourage the practice of religion and virtue; his peculiar ſatisfaction in the ſucceſſes with which the Britiſh arms had been crowned in the different quarters of the globe; his reſolution to reward the valour of his officers by ſea and land; and deſired they would, in concurrence with the king of Pruſſia, proſecute the war with vigour. With this view, he requeſted of the houſe of commons the neceſſary ſupplies, and aſſured them of a faithful application, as well as regular œconomy on his part; and concluded with reminding them, that the eyes of Europe were upon them, and that the iſſue of a war of ſuch great importance to themſelves and their allies, muſt depend on the vigour, unanimity, and diſpatch of their proceedings.

As at the commencement of every reign, it is cuſtomary for the members of both houſes to repeat the oaths; that ceremony was performed with the uſual ſolemnity, as ſoon as the king retired; after which each houſe prepared an addreſs, replete with the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of loyalty and affection.

A. D. 1761. In conſequence of a motion which was made for granting a ſupply to his majeſty, the commons voted for the ſupport of his majeſty's houſhold, and of the dignity of the crown, during his life, ſuch a revenue, as, together with the annuities payable by virtue of any act of parliament made in the reign of the late king, of the hereditary civil liſt revenues, ſhould amount to the yearly ſum of eight hundred thouſand pounds, to commence from the demiſe of his late majeſty; to be charged upon, and made payable out of the aggregate fund. At the ſame time they reſolved, that the ſeveral revenues payable to his late majeſty, during his life, which continued to the time of his demiſe (other than ſuch payments as were charged, and iſſuing out of the aggregate fund,) ſhould be granted and continued from the time of the ſaid demiſe, to his preſent majeſty during his life; and the produce of the ſaid revenues, together with that of the hereditary revenues, which were appointed towards the ſupport of the late king's houſhold, ſhould be, during the ſaid term, added to, and conſolidated with, the aggregate fund.

But we muſt now advert to the affairs of the continent. Early in the year, the French king, in conſequence, doubtleſs, of the loſſes he had ſuſtained through the victories with which the Britiſh arms had been crowned in every quarter of the globe, began to throw out hints by means of his ambaſſadors at different courts of his diſpoſition to reſtore the peace of Europe, and affected a peculiar moderation with reſpect to Great Britain, provided ſhe ſhould appear in any degree to acquieſce in reaſonable terms.

In conſequence of this intimation the courts of Peterſburg, Vienna, France, Sweden and Poland, having made ſeveral declarations which were ſigned at Paris, and delivered at London the thirty firſt of March; the counter declaration of Great Britain and Pruſſia appeared on the third of April; and Augſburg was appointed for the place of congreſs, as being moſt conveniently ſituated for the ſeveral powers at war.

Lord Egremont, lord Stormont, ambaſſador in Poland, and general Yorke, ambaſſador in Holland, were nominated as plenipotentiaries for England; and the count de Choiſeul was appointed on the part of France. The public converſation was now diverted from ſcenes of horror, to the more agreeable contemplation of this public ſcene of magnificence, and the events, which, in all probability, would happen conſequent thereon.

It was unanimouſly agreed, with a view to render the negotiation as unembarraſſed as poſſible, to admit none but the principal parties, and their allies to this treaty. As the German war was referred to the treaty of Augſburg, the great and main object of the general war, the limits of America were ſeparately conſidered at London and Paris. For this purpoſe, miniſters were mutually ſent from thoſe courts; M. de Buſſy on the part of France, and Mr. Stanley on that of England.

But unhappily, the plan of the treaty was more eaſily adjuſted than the ſubſtance. The proper quarrel of France was no ſooner ſeparated from the general cauſe, than ſhe had every diſadvantage in the negotiation; the reſource, ſhe, therefore, ſought was in Spain, which ſhe imagined could not be an idle ſpectator of the humiliation of the principal branch of the houſe of Bourbon. Thus, in effect, all the advances which France ſeemingly made towards a peace, were ſo many ſteps towards the renovation of the war; and whilſt at London ſhe breathed nothing but moderation, and the moſt earneſt deſire of putting a period to the calamities of Europe; at Madrid ſhe was taking the moſt vigorous meaſures to encreaſe and continue them.

There were yet many obſtacles on the part of Great Britain. The extenſive conqueſts of he arms had raiſed proportionable expectations in the minds of the people, who deemed it unreaſonable to make almoſt any conceſſions to a nation, whoſe every public procedure was founded on ambition, and to whom they now thought they had a right to give laws.

The miniſtry, on the other hand, were by no means inſenſible, from the ſituation of the allies in Germany, that though their caſe was in the plan ſeparated from the main object in diſpute between the courts of France and England, it muſt have an influence on the final determination of the treaty.

In this ſituation of doubt and perplexity, they thought the beſt means they could purſue was, a vigorous proſecution of the war; accordingly, prince Ferdinand of Brunſwick was empowered to carry into execution the operations he had planned in the beginning of the winter; and another expedition was prepared in England, the object of which was kept a profound ſecret.

The French had entirely poſſeſſed themſelves of Heſſe before the cloſe of the laſt campaign; they had driven the allies from the Lower Rhine, where they kept a conſiderable body of troops on that ſide; on the right they poſſeſſed the town of Gottingen, in which they had placed a very ſtrong garriſon, ſo that the allies were ſhut up on this quarter alſo, whilſt the Hanoverian dominions were left entirely open to the enterprizes of the enemy.

Prince Ferdinand, ſenſible of the inconvenience of his ſituation, and of the advantages the enemy had over him, determined, on this emergency, to act with vigour. In the beginning of February he aſſembled his army, and began his march towards Caſſel on the 11th, in four columns; the command of the vanguard being aſſigned to the marquis of Granby, who advanced to Kirkberg and Metz.

In the mean time the hereditary prince, having received intelligence that the French garriſon of Fritzlar was not prepared for a defence, marched thither with a few battalions in hopes of carrying the place by aſſault. But unfortunately the garriſon was prepared and reſolute, and though he attacked it with great ſpirit, he was obliged to draw off with conſiderable loſs, and wait for the arrival of ſome artillery, which was uſed with ſuch vigour that the governor was compelled to capitulate on honourable terms.

The marquis of Granby was employed, with ſucceſs, in reducing the forts and caſtles in this neighbourhood. The allied army boldly advanced, and the French continually retired, abandoning poſt after poſt, and fell back almoſt to the Maine. They fired their magazines as they retreated, but the allies purſued with ſuch alacrity, that they ſaved five capital ſtores, which, affording proviſion for the cavalry, was of the utmoſt ſervice in promoting their advances.

Prince Ferdinand now reſolved to reduce Caſſel, before the duke de Broglio ſhould receive any reinforcements. As it was neceſſary, previous to the ſiege of this place, to clear the adjacent country of the enemy, and to cut off the communication of the garriſon and their grand army, the prince, after Broglio had been driven out of Heſſe, and retreated towards Franckfort, ceaſed to advance, and formed that part of the army which was with him, into a chain of cantonments, making a front towards the enemy; thus he propoſed to watch the motions of Broglio's army, to cover the ſiege of Caſſel, and the blockades of Marpurg and Zeingenheim, which he had ordered to be inveſted. The ſiege of Caſſel was carried on by the count of Dippe Schaumberg, a ſovereign prince of the empire, reputed one of the ableſt engineers in Europe. Trenches were opened on the firſt of March, and all eyes were turned to this point, on the ſucceſs of which depended the whole fortune of the campaign, as the inferior places muſt inevitably fall with it if that was reduced.

M. de Broglio, in order to relieve this important place, called in, though with the utmoſt difficulty, his moſt diſtant poſts, embodied his army, inſpired them with new ſpirit, and made them capable, by a more exact order in their diſcipline and a great ſuperiority in their numbers, of attempting ſome important enterprize.

Prince Ferdinand had three ſtrong poſts of the enemy in his rear, and their grand army united in his front. This obliged him to call in general Sporcken's body, which had effected its purpoſe and could beſt be ſpared. However, the prince kept his poſition as long as poſſible; and the ſiege was carried on with as much vigour as a winter operation, and the ſpirited defence of a numerous garriſon, under an able commander, could admit.

By this time the duke de Broglio was joined by all the detachments he expected from the Lower Rhine, and advanced towards the allies, who were then unable to meet him in the field. On the 21ſt of March the detachment, under the hereditary prince, was on its advance from Heimbach, encountered by a numerous body of the enemy near the village of Stangerode in the neighbourhood of Grunberg. The attack was made by the enemy's dragoons, the very firſt ſhock of which broke the whole foot of the allies, conſiſting of nine regiments of Hanoverians, Heſſians, and Brunſwickers. The French, on this occaſion, though very few were killed or wounded on either ſide, took two thouſand priſoners, together with ſeveral trophies of victory.

The ſeverity of this blow was ſuch, that the allies, who could no longer think of making head againſt the French, or of maintaining their ground in Heſſe, raiſed the ſiege of Caſſel, retired behind the Dymel, and fell back near to the quarters they poſſeſſed before this undertaking.

Notwithſtanding the loſſes the French ſuſtained in the Eaſt Indies by the evacuation of Pondicherry and other ſettlements, they found means to intereſt in their cauſe a prince of the Mogul empire, called Shah Zadda, who took the field at the head of fourſcore thouſand men, againſt the forces of the Engliſh company, commanded by major John Carnack, and reinforced by the ſuba of Bengal. This army conſiſted of five hundred Europeans, two thouſand five hundred ſeapoys, and twenty thouſand black troops, with twelve pieces of cannon. The ſhah made an effort to join two rajas, who had taken up arms againſt the ſuba; but receiving intelligence that they were already reduced by the Engliſh troops, he ſurrendered at diſcretion to the ſuba, and promiſed to ſupport him in his pretenſions to the Mogul empire, with the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh company.

In the courſe of this year rear-admiral Holmes, commander of the ſquadron at Jamaica, made ſome important captures. The iſland of Dominique, which the French had ſettled and fortified, was attacked by a ſmall body of troops under the command of lord Rollo, together with four ſhips of the line and ſome frigates. After ſuſtaining a ſhort but vigorous ſiege, the inhabitants delivered up their arms, and took the oaths of allegiance to his Britannic majeſty. The Engliſh cruizers in the channel met with the greateſt ſucceſs, and ſeveral commanders of frigates ſignalized their valour on divers occaſions.

The miniſtry were determined at all events to ſubdue Belliſle, the longeſt of all the European iſlands belonging to the French king. Accordingly, the fleet, which was commanded by commodore Keppel, and the land forces by general Hodgſon, arrived before Belliſle on the ſeventh of April, and on the eighth agreed to attempt a landing on the ſouth eaſt of the iſland, in a ſandy bay, near Lochmaris point. The attempt was made in three places with great reſolution; a few grenadiers got on ſhore and formed themſelves: but, as they were not ſupported, they were for the greateſt part made priſoners. The reſt of the army, after ſeveral brave efforts, being unable to force the enemy's lines, or make good their landing, were obliged to retire with loſs; the chief cauſe of this diſaſter was, that ſeveral of the flat-bottomed boats were deſtroyed or damaged in a hard gale, which ſprang up while the Engliſh were retiring from the ſhore; near five hundred men, killed, wounded, and taken priſoners, were loſt in this attack.

The weather was ſo bad that the Engliſh were unable to make a ſecond attempt for ſome conſiderable time after the firſt; but, however, they found at length a convenient opportunity, and the attempt was accordingly made. Beſides the principal attack, two feints were made at the ſame time to deceive the enemy, whilſt the men of war directed their fire with great judgment towards the hills, which produced a conſiderable effect.

In the mean time Brigadier Lambert pitched upon the rocky point of Lochmaris, where captain Paterſon, at the head of Beauclerk's genadiers, and captain Murray with a detachment of marines, climbed the precipice and ſuſtained the fire of the enemy, till they were ſupported by the reſt of the troops, who now landed very faſt, when the French were obliged to abandon their batteries. All the forces were landed on the 25th of April, without further moleſtation; and the loſs in this daring, tho' ſucceſsful attempt, was inconſiderable. The great difficulty which now remained was, to bring forward the cannon, which were to be dragged up the rocks, and afterwards, for two leagues along a very rugged road. This was at length effected, the ſiege commenced, and the garriſon, commanded by the chevalier de St. Croix, an experienced officer, threatened a long and obſtinate defence. The enemy made ſome ſallies, one of which had a conſiderable effect, major-general Crawford being made priſoner on the occaſion. But the Engliſh, rouzed by theſe checks, made a furious attack upon the enemy's lines, which covered the town, and they were carried without much loſs, chiefly by the intrepidity of a new raiſed regiment of marines.

The enemy now entirely abandoned the town, and the defence was confined to the citadel. As the Engliſh fleet cut off all communication with the continent, and conſequently all hopes of relief, the place muſt neceſſarily be reduced; but the chevalier, though he could not maintain it, was determined to ſell it as dear as poſſible. Accordingly, there was no mention made of ſurrendering, till the ſeventh of June, when there was not the leaſt proſpect of ſuccour; and the place was by no means ſafely tenable. In conſequence of this the French general capitulated, and the garriſon marched out with the honours of war. In this expedition, the loſs of the Engliſh, in killed and wounded, amounted to about eighteen hundred men.

The members of the privy council, having aſſembled in the month of July, his majeſty informed them that, "having nothing ſo much at heart, "as to promote the welfare and happineſs of his "people, and to render the ſame ſtable and per"manent to poſterity, he had, ever ſince his ac"ceſſion to the throne, turned his thoughts towards "the choice of a princeſs for his conſort, and, now, "with great ſatisfaction, acquainted them, that, "after the fulleſt information, and matureſt deli"beration, he had come to a reſolution to demand "in marriage the princeſs Charlotte, of Meck"lenberg Strelitz; a princeſs diſtinguiſhed by "every eminent virtue, and amiable endowment; "whoſe illuſtrious line had conſtantly ſhewn the "firmeſt zeal for the proteſtant religion, and a "particular attachment to his family; that he had "judged proper to communicate to them theſe his "intentions, that they might be fully apprized of "a matter ſo highly important to him and his "kingdoms, and which he perſuaded himſelf "would be moſt acceptable to all his loving ſub"jects." The then council unanimouſly requeſted that his majeſty, for the ſatisfaction of his people in general, would make this declaration public.

The ambaſſador extraordinary appointed on this occaſion to the court of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, was the earl of Harcourt, who was authorized to demand the princeſs, and ſign the contract of marriage; and the royal yachts were prepared, under convoy of a ſquadron, commanded by lord Anſon, to convoy the princeſs to England. The dutcheſſes of Ancaſter and Hamilton were appointed ladies of the bed-chamber, to attend her from the court of Mecklenburg, in her paſſage to England, and embarking at Harwich, the whole fleet ſet ſail for Stade, on the eighth of Auguſt. On the ſeventeenth the princeſs, accompanied by the reigning duke her brother, ſet out with all her attendants for Mirow, and proceeded to Perleberg, where the count de Gotton complimented her in the name of his Pruſſian majeſty. On the twenty-ſecond ſhe arrived at Stade, under a general diſcharge of cannon, and amidſt the acclamations of the people. Next day ſhe embarked in a yatcht at Cuxhaven, where the Britiſh ſquadron, aſſembled for her convoy, ſaluted her with a diſcharge of cannon.

The eager and anxious curioſity of the people of England was never more conſpicuous than during this interval. After a tedious voyage of ten days, during which the fleet was expoſed to contrary winds and tempeſtuous weather, the princeſs landed on the ſeventh of September, in the afternoon, at Harwich; from whence ſhe proceeded with her attendants, by the way of Colcheſter, to Witham, and lodged at a houſe belonging to the earl of Abercorn. In the mean time the king, being apprized by couriers of her arrival, diſpatched his own coaches, with a party of horſe-guards, who met her at Rumford, and conducted her to London, through innumerable crowds of people: thus accompanied, the princeſs proceeded to the garden gate of the palace of St. James's, where ſhe was handed out of her coach by the duke of Devonſhire, in quality of lord-chamberlain. At the gate ſhe was received by the duke of York, and in the garden ſhe was met by the king. When ſhe made her obeiſance, he raiſed her by the hand, and led her up to the palace, where they dined, together with the whole royal family. At nine the nuptial ceremony was performed in the royal chapel, which had been magnificently decorated on the occaſion. Beſides the royal family, all the great officers of ſtate, the nobility, peers, and peereſſes, and foreign miniſters were preſent at the ſervice, the concluſion of which was announced to the people by the diſcharge of the artillery in the Park, and at the Tower; and the cities of London and Weſtminſter were illuminated in honour of this auſpicious event. His majeſty received congratulatory addreſſes from the city of London, the univerſities, and the cities, towns, and corporations, in all parts of the Britiſh dominions, on this happy occaſion.

Nothing now remained but the ſplendid ceremony of the coronation, which was appointed to be performed on the 22d of September. Weſtminſter-hall was accordingly prepared for the banquet, by removing the courts of judicature, erecting canopies, and building galleries for the accommodation of ſpectators. All the houſes and ſtreets within ſight of the proceſſion were crowded with benches and ſcaffolding, which, when filled with people of both ſexes dreſſed in the moſt ſplendid manner, filled the mind with an aſtoniſhing idea of the wealth and proſperity of Great Britain.

While the court of London was thus engaged, the allied army under prince Ferdinand continued their vigilance and activity; nor did the French remain motionleſs.

A reſolution to attack the allied army having been formed by mareſchal de Broglio, he united his troops to thoſe of the prince of Soubiſe, at a place called Soeſt, between Lipſtadt and Ham. On the other hand, as ſoon as the general of the allies was apprized of the French mareſchal's intention, he poſted his army in a very advantageous manner. The left wing he placed between the rivers Aeſt and Lippe, the left extremity of which, under general Wutgenau, extended to the Lippe, by which it was perfectly ſecured; and the right was ſupported by the village of Kirch Denkern, ſituated immediately on the Aeſt. The marquis of Granby commanded in that wing, with the aſſiſtance of lieutenant-general Howard, and the prince of Anhalt, who were poſted near the above village. Behind the river Aeſt, on a conſiderable eminence, was placed the center, commanded by general Conway: and, on a continuation of the ſame eminence, the right wing, under the hereditary prince, ſtretched out towards the village of Werle, and was well defended on the flank by rugged and buſhy ground.

On the 15th of July in the evening, the enemy made a furious attack on lord Granby's poſt, which was ſuſtained with the moſt intrepid bravery, till the arrival of general Wutgenau, who, advancing on his his left, and charging them in flank, obliged them to retire into the woods with precipitation.

The diſpoſition of the allies was compleated by the next morning; and it was evident, that the French were prepared for a more furious attack than the former. M. Broglio commanded againſt the left wing of the allies; the prince de Soubiſe led the left wing and center of the French.

At three in the morning the whole French army advanced again to the attack on the ſide where Wutgenau was poſted, and there was a ſevere and continual fire for upwards of five hours, before the leaſt effect could be perceived on either ſide. About nine the prince diſcovered that the enemy were preparing to erect batteries on an eminence in the front of the marquis of Granby's camp: he therefore immediately ordered a body of troops to anticipate this operation by making a vigorous charge. Accordingly, they advanced with the greateſt intrepidity, and attacked the enemy with ſuch fury, that they were ſoon obliged to give way, and abandon the field to the conquerors. The French would, in all probability, have ſuffered a total defeat, had the nature of the ground permitted the artillery to act. They had, however, about three thouſand killed and taken priſoners in this attack, loſt ſome colours and a few pieces of artillery. Prince Ferdinand's loſs did not exceed five hundred men.

The French, notwithſtanding the conſiderable loſs they had ſuſtained, were ſtill ſuperior in number. Broglio now penetrated ſtill farther into the electorate of Hanover, took poſſeſſion of Keſter, and fortified the place. The allied army being greatly inferior to the French, prince Ferdinand retired to Dumolt, and called in moſt of his detachments. The French general encamped near him on the heights of Neim, and ſeveral ſkirmiſhes happened between the two armies, in one of which prince Henry, brother to the hereditary prince, was mortally wounded.

During theſe tranſactions general Luckner, at Caſſel, routed a large body of the enemy, and took many priſoners. Nor were the French inactive. Broglio, having paſſed the Weſer with his whole army, prince Ferdinand made a forced march, paſſed the Dymel, and advanced to Caſſel. The French general, perceiving he could not now advance to the city of Hanover without bringing on a general engagement with the allied army, thought proper to retreat; after which prince Ferdinand proceeded to Paderborn, and eſtabliſhed his head quarters at Buhne. After different attacks, ſkirmiſhes, and operations on both ſides with various ſucceſs till about the middle of the month of November, the duke de Broglio quartered his troops in and about Caſſel, and along the Lower Rhine. The allies were diſtributed throughout ſeveral places in the neighbourhood of Munſter. The Britiſh cavalry wintered in Eaſt Frieſland, and the infantry in the biſhopric of Oſnaburg.

While war was thus raging in almoſt every quarter of the globe, the congreſs at Augſburg was intended to be opened for a general peace; but ſuch was the ſubtle and politic prevarication of the French, and the unprecedented interpoſition of the Spaniards, that the intention was rendered abortive, and the congreſs never took place. The Spaniſh ambaſſador was called upon to diſavow the repreſentation he had made, but ſo far from that, he returned, as authorized by the court of Madrid, a written anſwer, in which he juſtified the ſtep he had taken as agreeable to the ſentiments of his maſter. He declared that the kings of France and Spain were united not only by the tie of blood, but by a mutual intereſt; he applauded his moſt Chriſtian majeſty for the humanity and greatneſs of mind he had demonſtrated in the propoſition that was complained of. He inſiſted much on the ſincere deſire of peace, the only motive which influenced the conduct of the two monarchs; and he preſumptuouſly added, "That if "his maſter had been governed by any other prin- "ciples, his Catholic majeſty, giving full ſcope "to his greatneſs, would have ſpoken for him- "ſelf, and as became his dignity."

From the whole of this paper it plainly appeared, that the court of Spain, as a kind of party, was regularly apprized of every ſtep that was taken in the negotiation; that her judgment was appealed to upon every point, and her authority called in aid to force the acceptance of the terms offered by France; that there was a perfect union of affections, intereſts, and councils between thoſe two courts; and M. de Buſſy the French agent, ſo far from denying or palliating this conduct, ſeemed to make it a matter of boaſt and triumph.

Without entering into a tedious detail of the ſeveral memorials which were delivered in, or referring numerically to the ſeveral articles, ſuffice it to obſerve, that the Engliſh miniſtry, having the greateſt reaſon to doubt the ſincerity of the French, ſent directions to Mr. Stanley to return to England, and to deſire that M. Buſſy ſhould, on the part of his court, receive the ſame orders; accordingly, on the twentieth of September, an end was put to this negotiation.

From a variety of circumſtances, Mr. Pitt was fully perſuaded that the intentions of Spain were equivocal, and that their partiality, which they ſtrongly avowed, not only by declarations, but by facts, would drive them into all the meaſures of France. He therefore declared, that a war, on that account, was inevitable; that we ought to conſider the evaſions of that court as a refuſal of ſatisfaction, and that refuſal as a declaration of war; that we ought from prudence as well as ſpirit, to ſecure to ourſelves the firſt blow; that to carry on this war with vigour, it was only neceſſary to continue our preſent efforts, no new armament would be neceſſary; and that if any war could provide its own revenues, it muſt be a war with Spain; that their flota had not yet arrived, and that the taking of it would at once diſable their hands and ſtrengthen ours; that this procedure, ſo ſuited to the nation, and the inſults it had received, would be a leſſon to Spain, and to every other power, how they ſhould preſume to dictate in our affairs; and that we ſhould allow our enemies, whether ſecret or declared, no time to recollect themſelves.

Very different, however, were the ſentiments of moſt of the other miniſters on this occaſion. They admitted, that we ought not to be terrified from the aſſertion of our juſt demands by the means of any power; they owned that Spain had taken a very extraordinary and very unjuſtifiable ſtep, but that we ought to allow, and wiſh for an explanation; they declared, that to plunge into ſuch meaſures in the manner propoſed, and upon no better grounds, could not fail to alarm all Europe, and that we could derive no advantage from this precipitate conduct, which would not be more than counterbalanced by the jealouſy and terror it would neceſſarily create in every nation near us. As to the ſeizure of the flota, it was not to be depended upon, as, at the very time of that deliberation, it might might be expected to be safe in its harbour, and, perhaps, if we could succeed in seizing it, we might perform a service not very advantageous to our own commerce, and by no means agreeable to neutral nations.

By this opposition, Mr. Pitt declared, that "this "was the time for humbling the whole house of "Bourbon; that if this opportunity was let slip, it "might never be recovered, and if he could not "prevail in this instance, he was resolved that this "should be the last time he would sit in that "council. He thanked the ministry of the late "king for their support; said he was himself called "to the ministry by the voice of the people, to "whom he considered himself accountable for his "conduct, and that he would not remain in a situ-"ation, which made him responsible for measures "he was no longer allowed to guide."

On the division Mr. Pitt and lord Temple were the only voices in favour of the immediate declaration of war; upon which, after stating their reasons in writing, they resigned their employments; his majesty, the day following, in consideration of his eminent services, settled a pension of three thousand pounds per annum on Mr. Pitt for three lives, and at the same time his lady was made countess of Chatham in her own right.

This able and upright minister with very little parliamentary, and less court influence, maintained a sway both in the council and the senate, and, under his guidance, Great Britain carried on the most extensive war with the most signal success.

The new parliament assembled at Westminster on the third of November, when his majesty, being seated on the throne, commanded the attendance of the commons, to whom he signified his pleasure, by the lord-high-chancellor, that they should return to their house and chuse a speaker. Accordingly, their unanimous choice fell upon Sir John Cust, baronet, a gentleman of capacity and great probity.

The king, having approved of the speaker, on his next going to the house of peers, addressed the parliament in a speech, wherein he told them that the military operations had not only been carried on with vigour, but crowned with success, in the reduction of Belleisle, Dominique, and Pondicherry; as well as the defeat of the enemy's projects, by the able conduct of prince Ferdinand of Brunswick, and the valour of his troops, and by the abilities and bravery of the king of Prussia; that he was persuaded they would concur in opinion with him, that the vigorous prosecution of the war was the most probable means of procuring a lasting peace; and that no consideration should induce him to depart from the true interest of these his kingdoms, and the honour and dignity of his crown. He informed the house of commons, that he had ordered the proper estimates for the ensuing year to be laid before them; and desired such supplies as might enable him to prosecute the war with vigour, assuring them of the faithful application of whatever might be granted. He told them, that he doubted not but their affectionate regard for him and the queen would induce them to make an honourable provision for her in case she should survive him; and concluded with a general declaration, that from a confidence of the zeal and good affections of his parliament, he was well assured they would pursue the most proper measures without any particular exhortations on his part.

Both houses presented to his majesty addresses filled with the warmest expressions of duty and loyalty, together with congratulations on the success of his arms in the four quarters of the globe. The commons had hardly settled the supplies, when advice was received from the earl of Bristol, his majesty's ambassador at Madrid, importing, that having demanded a categorical declaration with respect to the part his Catholic majesty intended to act in the disputes between the courts of London and Versailles, he had received at first a very evasive and unsatisfactory answer. The ambassador added, that on repeating his remonstrance, he was answered, that the Spanish monarch had already taken his measures in concert with the court of Versailles; that war was that moment declared against Great Britain, and that therefore the earl might return home when he thought proper. Soon after the count de Fuentes, ambassador from Spain at the court of London, delivered to the earl of Egremont, who had succeeded Mr. Pitt, as secretary of state for the southern department, a paper calculated for sewing jealousies, and fomenting divisions among the subjects of Great-Britain, containing bitter invectives against the person of Mr. Pitt.

A. D. 1762. On the fourth of January, war was declared in form against Spain. Letters of marque were issued, and preparations made with the greatest diligence and dispatch for humbling that proud and ambitious monarch. On the 19th his majesty went to the house of peers and addressed the parliament in a speech, in which he expressed his reliance on the divine blessing, on the justice of his cause, on the zealous and powerful assistance of his faithful subjects, and the concurrence of his allies; who must find themselves involved in the pernicious, and extensive projects of his enemies. The two houses then presented addresses to his majesty, assuring him, in the most affectionate and loyal manner, that they would vigorously support the justice of his cause.

Some time before Mr. Pitt resigned the seals of his office, he had determined to employ a very considerable part of the British forces against the French colonies in the West-Indies. A strong squadron was accordingly fitted out and sailed from Spithead in the month of October in the preceding year, having under their convoy a number of transports, with four battalions from Belleisle, to join at Barbadoes a strong body from North America, together with some regiments and volunteers from Guadaloupe, and the Leeward islands, and proceed in concert with the fleet already on that station, and make a conquest of Martinique, which, since the attempt of general Hodgson, had been strengthened by a large body of men, and the building of new fortifications.

The reduction of this island was an object of the highest importance to Great-Britain, not only on account of its own intrinsic worth, and the detriment the loss of it must occasion to the enemy, but likewise for the security of the English trading ships, which the privateers of Martinique had greatly annoyed.

The armament from North America and England, under the command of major general Monckton and rear admiral Rodney, amounting to eighteen battalions and as many ships of the line, besides frigates, bombs, and fire ships, having rendezvoused at Barbadoes in the month of December, proceeded from thence on the fifth of January; and on the eighth the fleet and transports anchored in St. Ann's bay, in the eastern part of Martinique, after the ships of war had silenced some batteries, which the enemy had erected on that part of the coast.

In the course of this service, the Raisonable, a ſhip of the line, was, by the ignorance of the pilot, run upon a reef of rocks, from whence ſhe could not be got off; the men, however, were happily ſaved, together with her ſtores and artillery. The general being of opinion that this was an improper place for landing, two brigades, commanded by the brigadiers Haviland and Grant, were detached under convoy to the bay of Petitenſe, where a battery was cannonaded and taken by the ſeamen and marines. Theſe brigades were ſoon followed by the whole army, and the reſt of the ſquadron, and other batteries being ſilenced, general Monckton and the forces landed without oppoſition on the ſixteenth in the neighbourhood of Cas des Navires. The brigadiers Haviland and Grant had made a deſcent in the other place, and marched to the ground oppoſite Pidgeon Iſland, but general Monckton altered his firſt deſign on finding the roads impaſſable for the artillery.

The troops being landed at Cas des Navires, and reinforced with two battalions of marines, the general reſolved to beſiege the town of Fort Royal, but, in order to make his approaches, he found it neceſſary to attack the heights of Garnier, and Tortueſon, which the enemy had fortified, and ſeemed reſolved to defend to the laſt extremity. For this purpoſe he raiſed a battery to protect the paſſage of a ravine which ſeparated him from thoſe heights, and made a diſpoſition for the attack, which, on the twenty fourth of January, was carried into execution.

About break of day brigadier Grant, at the head of the grenadiers, ſupported by lord Rollo's brigade, attacked the advanced poſts of the enemy, under a briſk fire of the batteries; while brigadier Ruſarne, with his brigade, reinforced by the marines, marched up on the right to attack the redoubts that were raiſed along the ſhore; and the light infantry under colonel Scot, ſupported by the brigade of Walſh, advanced on the left of a plantation, in order, if poſſible, to turn the enemy. By nine in the morning they were in poſſeſſion of Morne Garnier. Major Leland with his light infantry, finding no reſiſtance on the left, advanced to the redoubt which was abandoned; and the brigadiers Walſh, Grant, and Haviland moved up in order to ſupport him, ſo that by nine at night the Engliſh troops were in poſſeſſion of this very ſtrong poſt, that commanded the citadel, againſt which their own artillery was turned in the morning. The French regular troops had fled into the town, and the militia diſperſed in the country. The governor of the citadel, perceiving the Engliſh employed in erecting batteries on the different heights by which he was commanded, ordered the chamade to be beat, and ſurrendered the place by capitulation.

The gate of the citadel was delivered up to the Engliſh on the fourth of February, and next morning the garriſon, to the number of eight hundred, marched out with the honours of war.

Fort Royal was no ſooner reduced, than deputations were ſent from different quarters of the iſland, deſiring a capitulation; but the governor-general, M. de la Touche, retired with his forces to St. Pierre, which he propoſed to defend to the laſt extremity. On the ſeventh, Pidgeon iſland, which was ſtrongly fortified, and deemed one of the beſt defences of the harbour, ſurrendered at the firſt ſummons.

This conqueſt was obtained at the ſmall expence of about four hundred men including a few officers killed and wounded, in the different attacks; but the loſs of the enemy was much more conſiderable. Fourteen French privateers were found in the harbour of Fort Royal, and a much greater number from other ports in the iſland were delivered up to admiral Rodney, in conſequence of the capitulation with the inhabitants, who, in all other reſpects, were treated in the moſt humane manner.

General Monckton was juſt ſetting out for the reduction of St. Pierre when two deputies arrived with propoſals of capitulation for the whole iſland, on the part of M. de la Touche, the governor-general. The terms were adjuſted, and the capitulation ſigned on the fourteenth, and on the ſixteenth the Engliſh commander took poſſeſſion of St. Pierre, and all the poſts in that neighbourhood, while the French governor general with M. Rouille, the lieutenant governor, the ſtaff-officers, and about three hundred and twenty-grenadiers, were embarked in tranſports to be conveyed to France.

The conqueſt of Martinique naturally drew on the ſurrender of all the Caribbees, and that chain of iſlands, extending from the eaſtern point of Hiſpaniola, almoſt to the continent of South America.

It was now determined to make a vigorous impreſſion on Spain, not only by attempting the reduction of the Havannah, but alſo by making a deſcent on the iſland of Manilla in the Eaſt Indies. For the firſt of theſe expeditions, lord Albemarle was appointed commander in chief of the land forces, and admiral Pocock of the fleet. On the 5th of March they ſailed from Portſmouth, and on the 27th of May were joined at Cape Nichola, on the north-weſt point of Hiſpaniola, by a ſquadron from Martinique under the command of Sir James Douglas. With this junction the armament amounted to nineteen ſhips of the line, eighteen ſmaller veſſels of war, and near one hundred and fifty tranſports, which conveyed about ten thouſand land forces. A ſupply of four thouſand had been ordered from New York, and was expected to join them, about the time that it was imagined their operations would begin.

On the 5th of June they arrived off the Havannah, the harbour of which is entered by a narrow paſſage, upwards of half a mile in length, which afterwards expands into a large baſon, and is ſufficient in extent and depth to contain a thouſand ſail of the largeſt ſhips, having almoſt throughout ſix fathom water, and being ſheltered from every wind.

The narrow entrance already mentioned is ſecured on one ſide by a very ſtrong fort, called the Moro, built upon a projecting point of land; on the other it is defended by a fort called the Puntal, which joins the town. The town itſelf, which is ſituated to the weſtward of the entrance of the harbour, and oppoſite to the Moro fort, is ſurrounded by a good rampart, flanked with baſtions, and covered with a ditch.

As preparations for a war had been, for ſome time paſt, making by the Spaniards, they had formed a conſiderable fleet in the Weſt-Indies, amounting to near twenty ſail, ſome of the line, which lay in the baſon of the Havannah; but they had not at that time received an authentic account from their court, concerning the commencement of hoſtilities between the two nations.

As ſoon as admiral Pocock had given directions to the maſters of the tranſports with reſpect to the landing of the forces, and left commodore Keppel with a ſufficient force to ſuperintend this ſervice, he ſtood with the reſt of the fleet to the weſtward, and ran down off the harbour; and the next morning manned his boats with marines, making a feint to land about four miles to the weſtward of the Havannah. In the mean time the earl of Albemarle, with the whole army, landed between the rivers Bocanao and Coxemoor, about ſix miles to the weſtward of the Moro.

The Spaniſh fleet now lay quiet in the harbour, and the only uſe they made of their ſhipping, in defence of the place, was to ſink three of them behind a boom which they laid acroſs the mouth of the harbour. The principal part of the army was deſtined to act upon the eaſt ſide, and was divided into eight corps, one of which was advanced a conſiderable way up the country, in order to cover the ſiege, and to ſecure the Engliſh parties employed in watering, and procuring proviſions. This corps was commanded by general Elliot. The other was immediately occupied in the attack of Fort Moro, to the reduction of which the efforts of the Engliſh were principally directed, as the Moro commanded the town, and the entrance of the harbour. This attack was conducted by major general Keppel; and a detachment under colonel Howe was encamped to the weſtward of the town, to make a diverſion in favour of this grand operation.

The utmoſt hardſhips and difficulties were ſuſtained by the Engliſh in carrying on the ſiege of the Moro; and the earth was every where ſo thin, that it was with great difficulty they could cover themſelves in their approaches. Epidemical diſtempers began to make terrible havock both in the army and navy, and their malignancy was rendered ſtill more fatal by the want of neceſſaries and refreſhments peculiar to that climate. This misfortune was likewiſe increaſed by the great numbers of ſick, whereby the neceſſary duty became more fatiguing to thoſe who were well. Nevertheleſs, in ſpite of all difficulties, batteries were raiſed againſt the Moro, and all along the hill upon which the fort ſtood, in order to drive the enemy's ſhips into the harbour, and thus prevent them from moleſting the approaches of the Engliſh.

The fire on both ſides, which was kept up with the utmoſt vivacity, was for a long time nearly equal. The Spaniards in the fort communicated with the town, from which they were recruited and ſupplied: they did not rely ſolely on their works, but made a ſally on the twenty-ninth of June, with ſufficient reſolution, and a conſiderable force, but with little ſucceſs. They were obliged to retire, with the loſs of between two and three hundred men left dead on the ſpot.

The day the batteries on ſhore were opened, three of the largeſt ſhips, the Dragon, the Cambridge, and the Marlborough, commanded by the captains Burnet, Gooſtrey and Hervey, laid their broad ſides againſt the fort, and began a terrible fire, which was returned with great conſtancy. This firing was continued without intermiſſion for the ſpace of ſeven hours.

But the Moro was ſituated too high to be much affected by the ſhot from the men of war; while on the other hand the balls from the caſtle did them conſiderable damage in their rigging, and killed a great number of men; captain Gooſtrey was among the ſlain.

The enemy continued to make ſo vigorous a defence, that the ſiege was protracted much longer than was generally expected; and, to add to the difficulty and perplexity of the beſiegers, their principal battery took fire, and the flames raged with ſuch fury, that the whole work was nearly conſumed.

In the midſt of this ſevere conteſt, attended with hardſhips almoſt beyond the endurance of human nature, the hopes of the beſiegers were revived by the appearance of the Jamaica fleet under convoy of Sir James Douglas, who had himſelf parted from the admiral immediately after their junction of his ſquadron with the grand fleet. Soon after, they received a conſiderable part of the New York reinforcement, which, added to the proviſion on board the fleet, infuſed double life into their operations. The Engliſh now made themſelves maſters of the covered way before the point of the right baſtion, and began a new ſap at this lodgment. The foot of the wall was acceſſible only in one place, and even this was nothing more than a thin ridge of rock to cover the extremity of the ditch, which would otherwiſe have been open to the ſea. On this narrow ridge the miners, wholly uncovered, but with very little loſs, paſſed the ditch on the twentieth of July.

While the miners were thus employed, a ſerjeant and twelve men ſcaled the walls by ſurprize, but the garriſon being alarmed before they could be ſuſtained, they were obliged to retreat with precipitation. In return for this attempt the garriſon, at four in the morning of the ſucceeding day, made a ſally from the town. Fifteen hundred men fell upon the beſiegers in three different places, while a warm fire was kept up in their favour from the fort of Puntal, the weſt baſtion, the lines and flanks of the entrance, and their ſhipping in the harbour. The conflict was very ſmart, but at laſt the aſſailants were repulſed, and obliged to make ſo haſty a retreat, that a conſiderable number of them were drowned. Their loſs amounted to four hundred killed and taken priſoners, while that of the Engliſh did not exceed fifty men.

The miners, now left to themſelves, compleated their buſineſs on the thirtieth of July; a part of the wall was blown up, and fell into the ditch, leaving a breach, which, though very narrow and difficult, the general and engineer judged practicable, and determined to make the attempt.

Accordingly the troops mounted it, entered the fort, and formed themſelves with ſo much alacrity, and with ſuch ſurprizing coolneſs and reſolution, that the enemy, who were drawn up to receive them, aſtoniſhed at their intrepidity, threw down their arms and flew on all ſides. About four hundred were killed on the ſpot, or ran into the water, where they periſhed; and four hundred more obtained quarters on throwing down their arms.

Don Lewis de Velaſco, the governor, and the marquis de Gonzales, his ſecond in command, both fell in the attack, and nobly expired on the bed of honour.

Thus, after an obſtinate defence of forty-four days, the important fort of the Moro fell into the hands of the Engliſh. Nothing was wanted to avail themſelves of this great advantage; not only the fire of the fort was turned againſt the town, but a line of batteries was erected by major-general Keppel on the hill of the Cavannos, on the extremity of which the town ſtands. Preparations for an attack were alſo made, and batteries erected to the weſtward of the town, which on that ſide had hitherto been only watched.

As ſoon as theſe preparations were ready to take effect effect, the Engliſh general ſent a meſſage to the governor, in which he repreſented the irreſiſtable nature of the operations now completed, and which, to prevent the farther effuſion of human blood, he was willing to ſuſpend, that the Spaniards might have leiſure to capitulate. The haughty Spaniard, however, returned for anſwer, "that he would defend the place to the laſt extremity."

Lord Albemarle, willing to convince the governor of the truth of his repreſentation, on the very next morning, ordered a general fire from the batteries, ſo that in ſix hours almoſt all the enemy's guns were ſilenced; and, to the inexpreſſible joy of the fleet and army, a flag of truce appeared from every quarter of the town.

A capitulation was now ſet on foot, by which the eſtabliſhed religion, the former laws, and private property, were ſecured to the inhabitants. The garriſon, which was reduced to about ſeven hundred men, marched out with the honours of war, and were to be conveyed to Spain. About five hundred of the Britiſh troops including fifteen officers, were killed or died of their wounds during the progreſs of this ſiege, and about ſeven hundred, among whom were nine officers, were carried off by ſickneſs. Beſides the town there was yielded up to the Engliſh a diſtrict of one hundred and eighty miles weſtward of the Havannah. The Spaniards ſtruggled a long time to ſave the men of war; but this, being a point of eſſential conſequence, could not be admitted. They alſo attempted to have the harbour declared neutral, during the war; but this, being of equal importance with the former, was refuſed.

In the end, the Spaniards being obliged to give up theſe points, the Engliſh troops were put in poſſeſſion of the Havannah, on the fourteenth of Auguſt, when they had been before it two months and eight days.

All the advantages to be expected from any war reſulted from the conqueſt of this place; as thereby the enemy loſt a whole fleet, and in ſpecie and merchandize a computed ſum of three millions ſterling; acquiſitions to the conquerors equal to the greateſt naval victory, by their effect on the enemy's marine, and by the plunder, which equalled the produce of a national ſubſidy.

An incidental piece of ſucceſs equally fortunate crowned this expedition: this was the capture of a large Spaniſh regiſter ſhip, called the Hermoine. She ſailed from Lima on the ſixth of January bound for Cadiz, was taken on the twenty-firſt of May off Cape St. Vincent, by two Engliſh frigates, and carried into Gibraltar.

Her cargo conſiſted of near two millions of money, regiſtered, and the unregiſtered was likewiſe very conſiderable, beſides two thouſand ſcrons of cocoa, and other articles of merchandize to a large amount. This moſt important conqueſt was ſoon followed by a deſcent on the iſland of Manilla in the Eaſt Indies. Manilla, its chief city, is extenſive, populous and tolerably well fortified. It is the center of the Spaniſh trade, and the port from whence two large ſhips are ſent annually to the port of Acapulco, one of the ſea ports of Mexico, laden with the richeſt merchandize of India. The trade and conſequence of Manilla are well known at Madraſs, and there the plan of attack was accordingly formed. This attempt was to be made by part of the ſquadron of vice-admiral Corniſh, and the troops deſtined for the expedition were to be under the command of brigadier-general Draper. On the twenty-third of September they anchored in the bay of Manilla, and the troops were diſembarked without the loſs of a ſingle man. The Spaniards exerted themſelves with vigour on the occaſion, and feats of valour were atchieved both by the aſſailants and the beſieged in divers inſtances. At length, however, the Engliſh mounted the breach they had made; the enemy fled in confuſion, and our troops entered the town with very little difficulty. The governor and principal inhabitants retired to the citadel, but that being ſoon demoliſhed, they ſurrendered priſoners of war. The Spaniſh officers were enlarged on their parole, and all the Indians diſmiſſed in ſafety. By the capitulation, the iſland and forts depending upon Manilla were to be delivered up to his Britannic majeſty; and four millions of dollars paid as a ranſom for the city and the effects of the inhabitants, who, in return, were to be protected in their religion and private property. This valuable acquiſition coſt the Engliſh only one hundred men, including officers. Various and important ſucceſſes attended the navy, and a number of ſignal exploits were performed by the Britiſh arms at ſea during the courſe of this year, under the command of Sir Edward Hawke, Lord Colville, commodore Moore, and other brave and experienced officers. In a word, Great Britain at this period may be ſaid to have reached the ſummit of glory.

His majeſty went to the houſe of peers on the ſecond of June, and cloſed the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he expreſſed his approbation of their zeal, unanimity and diſpatch, in the courſe of their proceedings; intimated, that though it was his earneſt wiſh to reſtore the bleſſings of peace to his people, it was his fixed reſolution, with their concurrence and ſupport, to proſecute the war with vigour till that deſirable end could be obtained; that the united attack of the houſe of Bourbon on his ancient ally the king of Portugal, required the continuance of their military preparations, and augmentation of their fleets and armies; and finally aſſured them of his reliance on the Divine favour in the uſe of thoſe means, which might tend to promote the dignity of his crown, and the commercial intereſts of his people. He told the commons, that he could not but lament the heavy, though neceſſary burthens impoſed on the people; aſſuring them, at the ſame time, of the moſt exact œconomy in the application of what might be hereafter granted; returned them thanks for their teſtimony of regard to him and his family, in the ample proviſion they had made for the queen, and concluded with declaring, that the grand end of all his actions ſhould ever be to promote the welfare and happineſs of his people.

Between ſeven and eight o'clock in the morning of the twelfth of Auguſt, the queen was ſafely delivered of a prince, and a few days after the royal infant was created prince of Wales and earl of Cheſter.

It was by this time apparent to the court of France, that Great-Britain was neither intimidated by the threats of the formidable alliance, nor at all likely to be reduced by the exertion of its forces, and ſhe therefore came ſincerely into thoſe pacific ſentiments, which before ſhe had only counterfeited. The ſlow progreſs of the Bourbon troops in Portugal, the retrogade motion of the French army in Germany, the taking of Martinique and its dependencies, and the reduction of the important city of the Havannah, all conſpired to humble the pride, and defeat the hopes of the Bourbon alliance.

The ſpirit of party now raged in a violent degree, and was not a little enflamed by an alteration in the miniſtry, which ſuddenly took place. The duke of Newcaſtle reſigned his office of firſt lord of the treaſury, and was ſucceeded by the earl of Bute; and many other very unpopular changes were made in the adminiſtration.

While the ſtate of affairs was thus diſtracted, the conduct of the war became difficult, its continuance unſafe, and its ſupplies uncertain; eſpecially as the ancient and known connection between the chiefs of the moneyed intereſt and the principal perſons in the oppoſition, muſt have greatly perplexed the then government.

Notwithſtanding the ſituation of Portugal, againſt which the houſe of Bourbon determined to unite their efforts in a formidable invaſion, the king behaved in ſuch a manner as muſt tranſmit his name with honour to poſterity. In ſpite of the memorial, and menaces of the French and Spaniſh ambaſſadors at the court of Liſbon, he rejected all their propoſals of joining them in a war againſt Great Britain, and determined to preſerve an inviolable neutrality reſpecting that power to the laſt extremity. However, the wheels of government were now ſo clogged, and the political ſyſtem ſo embarraſſed, that the court of Great Britain began ſeriouſly to apply itſelf to methods of pacification, which were readily embraced by their humbled, impoveriſhed foes. As ſoon as terms were propoſed, each, in order to give a pledge to their mutual ſincerity, agreed, that this treaty ſhould not be negotiated, as the former had been, by ſubordinate perſons, but that the two courts of London and Verſailles ſhould depute a perſon of the firſt conſequence and diſtinction in either kingdom. Accordingly, the duke of Bedford was ſent to negotiate on the part of England, and the duke de Nivernois on that of France. The preliminaries were ſigned at Fontainbleau on the third of November, and the definitive treaty about three months after.

The parliament met on the 25th of November; and his majeſty, going to the houſe of peers, opened the ſeſſion, by telling them, that nothing was more deſirable to him than a laſting peace, procured on ſuch honourable terms as would ſecure the happineſs of his people. For that purpoſe, he had once more condeſcended to renew the negotiation that had been broken off before; and he ſpoke of the conduct of his army and navy in the higheſt terms of applauſe. He took notice, that he had been obliged to ſend an armed force to ſupport his good ally the king of Portugal, who was threatened by the whole Spaniſh army, in conſequence of the intrigues of the French, who, notwithſtanding their numerous loſſes, ſeemed ſtill averſe to peace. He concluded by telling them, that nothing gave him ſo much unhappineſs as the conſideration that his ſubjects were burthened with taxes; but then there was a neceſſity for it, otherwiſe it would have been impoſſible to have defeated the enemy's ſchemes, and rendered their undertakings abortive.

His majeſty acquainted the houſe of commons, that he had ordered the proper eſtimates to be laid before them, and ſhould proceed to make whatever reductions might be found conſiſtent with wiſdom and ſound policy, aſſuring them of his concern that the burthens of his people could not be immediately ſo much alleviated as he could deſire, and concluded with obſerving, that, induced chiefly by principles of policy, and views of humanity, he had entered early into negotiation, in order to make a progreſs in it before the fate of many operations was known, and ſo to haſten the concluſion of it as to prevent the neceſſity of making preparations for another campaign; and concluded with reminding them, that the ſame unanimity would be neceſſary to make a proper uſe of the advantages of peace, as had been requiſite for the maintenance of an expenſive war.

The preliminaries of the peace underwent a rigorous ſcrutiny, and incurred very heavy cenſure from ſeveral able ſpeakers and acknowledged ſtateſmen in both houſes as inglorious, inadequate, and inſecure, and, in a word, injurious to the commerce, and derogatory to the dignity, of the nation. They were, however, approved by a great majority, and addreſſes were preſented from the lords and commons, in which they declared, "That they owed "the utmoſt gratitude to his majeſty for the re- "eſtabliſhment of the public tranquillity upon "terms of honour to the crown, and of advan- "tage to the people."

Soon after the reſpective ſignatures, conferences were opened at Hubertſbourg, and a treaty concluded between his Pruſſian majeſty and the empreſs queen. The wiſe and valiant king of Pruſſia, having withſtood for ſix years the united efforts of almoſt all the great powers in Europe, enjoyed at length the rewards of his magnanimity, retaining his dominions in their full extent, and reaping the ſatisfaction of delivering his country from the encroachments of ambitious foes. He then turned his attention to domeſtic policy, and, by well concerted regulations, gave the moſt demonſtrative proofs, that his genius for war was no way ſuperior to his capacity for cultivating the arts of peace.

A. D. 1763. The definitive treaty of peace was ſigned at Paris on the 10th of February, and being tranſmitted to England, was laid before the parliament according to uſual cuſtom. By this treaty Canada, Nova-Scotia, and the iſland of Cape Breton, were ceded to Great Britain; the river Miſſiſippi was to be the boundary between the Britiſh and French colonies in North America; and in the Weſt-Indies, the king of Great Britain gave up to the French the conquered iſlands of Martinico and Guadaloupe, with all the ſmaller ones depending on them. The iſland of Belliſle was given in exchange for Minorca; and the Grenades, with all the other iſlands depending on them, were ceded to Britain. All our conqueſts on the river of Senegal were confirmed to us; and in the Eaſt-Indies part of the French ſettlements were reſtored, and part retained. The French were obliged to give up ſuch places as they had taken poſſeſſion of in Germany; and in conſequence of the king of Spain's giving up all pretenſions to Florida, and ceding it to the Engliſh, the Havannah, with the whole iſland of Cuba, were to be reſtored. The king of Pruſſia was to remain in the ſame condition he was in before the commencement of the war; and the ſame was to take place with reſpect to the empreſs queen.

Such were the principal articles in this treaty, which, like the preliminaries, occaſioned violent debates in both houſes, where, after a variety of arguments on each ſide, the queſtion being put, it was carried in the affirmative by a very conſiderable majority.

To the honour of the metropolis of this kingdom it may not be improper to obſerve, that Mr. Beckford maintained the office of mayor this year with peculiar dignity and ſplendor, and was favoured with the company of ſome of the firſt perſonages in the kingdom, at a magnificent entertainment preſented by him at the manſion houſe.

The marquis of Granby arrived in the beginning of the year from Germany, to the general joy of the nation, and the people omitted no opportunity of teſtifying their approbation of his valour and generoſity.

In conſequence of his majeſty's warrant iſſued for that purpoſe, peace was, on the twenty-ſecond of March, proclaimed in London with the uſual ceremony, and in the uſual places. On the 18th of April two ambaſſadors extraordinary from the republic of Venice to the court of London made their public entry in a very pompous and ſplendid manner. On the 19th his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, delivered a ſpeech, gave the royal aſſent to ſeveral bills, and then prorogued the parliament.

The following event, at this time, wholly engroſſed the attention of the public. A rule for an information was granted by the court of King's Bench againſt the publiſhers and ſuppoſed printers of a paper called the North Briton, of the nineteenth of March, and on the 30th of April, the publiſher, ſuppoſed printers, and Mr. Wilkes, the ſuppoſed author of that paper, were taken into cuſtody by the meſſengers of ſtate.

When the meſſengers entered the houſe of Mr. Wilkes, in order to ſeize his perſon, he excepted to the generality of the warrant, as his name was not mentioned in it; and threatened the firſt who ſhould offer violence to his perſon in his own houſe at that unſeaſonable hour of the night, upon any pretended verbal order, which they might, or might not have received for that purpoſe; upon which the meſſengers thought proper to defer the execution of their warrant till next morning, when they took him into cuſtody without oppoſition, and carried him before the ſecretaries of ſtate for examination. On the intimation of this event, a motion was made in the court of Common Pleas, then ſitting in Weſtminſter-hall, for a Habeas Corpus, which, as the prothonotary's office was not open, could not be granted till four in the afternoon. During the interval, ſeveral gentlemen applied for admittance to him; which was peremptorily refuſed, on pretence of an order from the ſecretaries of ſtate, which order, however, was never produced. Though it was well known that the court of Common Pleas had granted an Habeas Corpus, and Philip Carteret Webb, Eſq. was aſſured of the fact, Mr. Wilkes was committed to the Tower of London, where many of his friends, even after repeated ſolicitations, were alſo denied admittance to him.

Being brought to the bar of the court of Common Pleas, on the 3d of May, he made a ſpeech, ſetting forth his grievances, the oppreſſive manner in which he had been treated, and aſſuring them, that he only wanted an opportunity to ſhew that he had ever been ſuperior to the arts of corruption, and proof againſt every venal temptation. The caſe was then learnedly argued on both ſides, and the court, after making a polite excuſe to Mr. Wilkes for the delay, took time to conſider the affair and to give their opinion; and therefore remanded him priſoner to the Tower till the ſixth, on which day he attended, and, in an eloquent ſpeech, ſet forth the aggravated nature of the injuries he had ſuſtained, the violation of liberty that might reſult therefrom, as well as aſſerted the privileges to which, by Magna Charta, he was entitled as an Engliſhman.

Lord chief juſtice Pratt then ſtood up, and delivered the opinion of the court reſpecting the principal heads inſiſted on by the council. Theſe were the legality of Mr. Wilkes's commitment; the neceſſity for a ſpecification of thoſe paſſages in No. 45 of the North Briton, which had been deemed a libel; and his privilege as a member of parliament.

Theſe points were diſcuſſed by his lordſhip in a manner, which will redound to his honour, as a judge and an Engliſhman, to the lateſt poſterity; and his opinion having deſervedly met with the approbation of the whole court, Mr. Wilkes was diſcharged. He had not, however, quitted the court when a perſon of eminence in the law ſtood up, and told the lord chief juſtice, that he had juſt received a note from the attorney and ſolicitor-general, to intreat his lordſhip to detain Mr. Wilkes till their arrival, which would be inſtant, as they had ſomething to offer againſt his plea of privilege: the motion was, however, rejected, and Mr. Wilkes took his leave of the court in a very polite manner, after having addreſſed them with great ſpirit on their generous and patriotic deciſion. The audience teſtified their joy on this occaſion by frequent and repeated acclamations.

Mr. Wilkes now cauſed a printing preſs to be ſet up under his own direction, at his houſe in Great George-ſtreet, Weſtminſter, where he advertiſed the proceedings of the adminiſtration, with all the original papers; and the North Briton was again publiſhed.

In the mean time an information was filed againſt him in the court of king's bench, at his majeſty's ſuit, as author of the aforeſaid North Briton, No. 45; and on the meeting of the parliament, a meſſage was ſent to the lower houſe, with the informations his majeſty had received, that John Wilkes, Eſq. a member of that houſe, was the author of a moſt ſeditious and dangerous libel: the meaſures that had been taken thereupon, and the examinations and proofs of the ſaid libel were likewiſe laid before the houſe, and the North Briton No. 45 was adjudged "a falſe, ſcandalous, "and ſeditious libel, containing expreſſions of "the moſt unexampled inſolence and contumely "towards his majeſty, the groſſeſt aſperſions upon "both houſes of parliament, the moſt audacious "defiance of the authority of the whole legiſla-"ture, and moſt manifeſtly tending to withdraw "the people from their obedience to the laws of "the realm, and to excite them to traiterous in-"ſurrections againſt his majeſty's government." The paper called the North Briton, No. 45, was then ordered to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman.

On the day appointed for the execution of this ſentence, a great concourſe of people aſſembled at the Royal Exchange. The North Briton was partly conſumed by means of a link, but ſome ſcraps were carried off in triumph by the populace, who, in the evening, diſplayed them at Temple Bar, where a bonfire was made, and a large jack-boot committed to the flames, amidſt the acclamations of a crowd of ſpectators.

Soon after this, a complaint was exhibited againſt Mr. Wilkes in the upper houſe, for affixing the name of a member of that houſe to a book, intitled, "An Eſſay on Woman," which book was produced to the eternal disgrace of all concerned in it; but Mr. Wilkes could not prefer his answer, being at that time indisposed, in consequence of a wound he had received in a duel with Mr. Martin, late secretary of the treasury.

Mr. Wilkes, not content with the complaint which he had made to the house of commons of a breach of their privilege on his person, commenced an action in the court of Common Pleas against Robert Wood, Esq; the under secretary, for seizing his papers, and on the sixth of December this cause was tried before lord chief justice Pratt, and a special jury, when Mr. Wilkes obtained damages and full costs of suit.

On the evening of the day on which this verdict was obtained, a person knocked at Mr. Wilkes's door, desiring to speak with him on particular business; but it appearing by his dialect that he was a Scotchman, and being besides an entire stranger, he was refused admittance, on which he went to a coffee-house near Parliament-street, where a person made affidavit, that he overheard him declare, that himself and ten more men were determined to cut off Mr. Wilkes let the event be what it would, and next morning gave information of it by a letter to Mr. Wilkes, desiring him to be on his guard. According to the information, the person sworn against, as was supposed, bringing a letter to Mr. Wilkes's house, signed Alexander Dun, the purport of which was to beg an interview with him on an affair of the most interesting nature, he was desired to call again at one o'clock, which he did accordingly; and seven o'clock being then appointed, as he was going out at the parlour door into Mr. Wilkes's bed-chamber, two gentlemen, who had placed themselves behind it, seized him by the arms, and threw him on his back. On searching him a new penknife was found in his pocket, which he pretended he had purchased about nine months before but, after many equivocations, owned he bought it at Chatham about a fortnight since. Upon this he was taken into custody by a tip-staff then present for that purpose, and carried next morning before one of the judges. A complaint was likewise exhibited against him in the house of commons, who thereupon ordered the officer in whose custody he was, to bring him to the bar; but when he was there, the house discharged him from any farther appearance, as it was evident from his behaviour, that he was disordered in his mind.

When Mr. Wilkes had been wounded, in the duel he fought with Mr. Martin he gave proper notice of it to the house of commons, who thereupon gave him time for his appearance, and afterwards enlarged it on the report of his physician and surgeon; but beginning at last to suspect some collusion betwixt him and them, on the sixteenth of December they ordered Dr. Heberden and Mr. Hawkins to attend him, in order to observe the progress of his cure, and to report the same to the house. Dr. Heberden acquainted the physician with this order, and desired him to communicate it to Mr. Wilkes, that the time of attendance might be settled. Mr. Wilkes, in consequence of the intelligence received by him from his physician, dispatched cards to the two gentlemen appointed to attend him, expressing his sense of the kind care of the house for his speedy recovery, intimating his perfect reliance on the gentlemen to whom he had committed his case (Dr. Brocklesby and Mr. Graves) and assuring them, that though he did not wish to see them at present he was impatient for an opportunity of shewing the just regard he would ever pay to distinguished merit.

On the 24th of December Mr. Wilkes was so well recovered as to set out for France, on a visit to his daughter, who then lay dangerously ill at Paris, at which place he arrived on the twenty-sixth.

On the 18th of April the parliament was prorogued, after a speech from the throne in which his majesty expressed his thanks for the zeal and dispatch they had manifested in their proceedings; informed them, that he had ordered the preliminary articles to be laid before them, in consequence of which he had received the highest satisfaction, on their grateful expressions of their entire approbation; and acquainted them with his firm resolution to form his government on a plan of strict œconomy. He assured the commons, that they might depend on the utmost frugality being observed in the disposition of the supplies they had granted; and when the account of the money arising from the sale of such prizes as were vested in the crown should be closed, it was his intention to direct, that the produce should be applied to the public service. He concluded with declaring, that his future attention should be directed to the extension of the commerce of his subjects, the improvement of the advantages they had obtained, and the increase of the public revenue.

Sir Charles Asgill, who represented the lord-mayor, six other aldermen, the recorder, sheriffs, chamberlain and town-clerk, on the twelfth day of May, waited on his majesty with the city's address on the peace. They were hissed, going and coming, by great numbers of people: and as they passed by St. Bride's church, in their way to St. James's, the great bell began to toll, and a dumb peal struck up, which continued some time: they were treated in the same manner on their return by Bow bells. This address was followed by that of the protestant dissenting ministers, in the cities of London and Westminster: some of the merchants and traders of the city of London: the people called Quakers, and several of the principal corporations in various parts of the kingdom.

Mr. Pitt, having declined accompanying Sir John Sebright, in presenting an address from Bath, caused his sentiments on that subject, as communicated to Mr. Allen, to be inserted in the journal of that city; the substance of which was as follows; "That as the epithet of adequate, given to the peace, contained a description of the conditions of it, so repugnant to his unalterable opinion concerning them, as fully declared by him in parliament, it was as impossible for him to obey the corporation's commands, in presenting their address, as it was unexpected to receive such a commission; that with respect to the peace, he formed his opinion with such lights, as his little experience, and small portion of understanding, could afford him; and that though this conviction must remain to himself the constant rule of his conduct, he left it to others, with much deference, to follow their own; expressing, at the same time, the highest veneration for the virtues and friendship of Mr. Allen, though, in relation to that important subject, he very much differed in opinion from him."

On the 16th of August her majesty was delivered of a prince, and on the 14th of September his royal royal highneſs was baptized at St. James's, in the great council-chamber, by his grace the archbiſhop of Canterbury, by the name of Frederic. The ſponſors were his royal highneſs the duke of York, repreſented by the earl of Huntingdon, groom of the ſtole; his moſt ſerene highneſs the duke of Saxe Gotha, repreſented by earl Gower, lord chamberlain; and her royal highneſs the princeſs Amelia, in perſon.

The king went to the houſe of peers on the fifteenth day of November, and opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he obſerved, that the re-eſtabliſhment of the public tranquillity upon terms of honour and advantage to his kingdoms, which was the firſt great object of his reign, had ſince been happily completed and carried into execution, by the definitive treaty; aſſured them that it had been and ſhould be his endeavour to inſure the continuance of the peace, by a ſteady adherence to the conditions upon which it was concluded, and reminded them, that their principal care ſhould be the improvement of their valuable acquiſitions, and the cultivation of the arts of peace. He told the houſe of commons, that he would order the proper eſtimates for the ſervice of the year to be laid before them; reminded them of the heavy debts contracted in the courſe of the late war, and recommended to them the maintenance of a conſiderable fleet, to which paſt ſucceſſes had been ſo much owing, and on which the importance and welfare of Great Britain eſſentially depended. He concluded with a general deſire, that as the intereſts and proſperity of his people were the ſole objects of his care, they would unite their efforts to diſcourage that licentious ſpirit, which was repugnant to the true principles of liberty, and cultivate that unanimity on which it ſo much depended.

His majeſty having been pleaſed to communicate to both houſes of parliament the intended marriage of her royal highneſs the princeſs Auguſta with the hereditary prince of Brunſwick, the houſe of commons allowed her highneſs, on her marriage, a dowry of eighty thouſand pounds.

Both houſes preſented an addreſs to his majeſty during the courſe of this ſeſſion of parliament, ſetting forth their ſurprize and indignation at the publication of the North Briton, as an indignity offered to his majeſty, and a violation of the ſacred regard due to his authority, and preſcribed by the laws and conſtitution of the realm, as well as tending to inflame the minds of his majeſty's ſubjects, againſt his mild and juſt adminiſtration; aſſuring his majeſty, at the ſame time, of their ardent wiſhes, that ſuch wicked deſigns might be defeated, and thoſe who were guilty puniſhed in a manner proportioned to their deſerts.

A. D. 1764. On the 12th of January his moſt ſerene highneſs the hereditary prince of Brunſwick Lunenburgh landed at Harwich, and arrived at Somerſet-houſe. On the evening of the next day the ceremony of his marriage with her royal highneſs the princeſs Auguſta, eldeſt ſiſter to his majeſty, was performed in the great council-chamber, by his grace the archbiſhop of Canterbury, in preſence of a a great number of peers, peereſſes, and foreign miniſters. After the ſolemnization of the nuptials, their ſerene and royal highneſſes repaired to Leiceſter-houſe, where was prepared an elegant entertainment, at which their majeſties, the princeſs-dowager of Wales, and the reſt of the royal family, were preſent.

The military atchievements of the hereditary prince were already ſufficiently known, and his affable and generous behaviour now procured him the affection of the people of England. During his ſhort ſtay he viſited the Royal Society, the Britiſh Muſæum, St. Paul's cathedral, the Tower, Weſtminſter-abbey, and other remarkable places. The duke of Cumberland, Mr. Pitt, the duke of Newcaſtle, the marquis of Granby, and many others of the nobility and gentry attended his ſerene highneſs in his excurſions.

On the twentieth of this month the commons, after long debates, expelled John Wilkes, Eſq; for a contempt of their authority, and publiſhing the North Briton, being adjudged an infamous libel; and iſſued out a writ of election for Ayleſbury in his ſtead.

Addreſſes were preſented to his majeſty on the ſame day, by the houſe of lords, and the lord-mayor, aldermen, and commons of the city of London, on the late happy marriage. On the twenty-fifth his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and gave, among others, the royal aſſent to the bill for naturalizing his ſerene highneſs the prince of Brunſwick, who was in the houſe during his majeſty's ſtay. In the mean time, her royal highneſs the princeſs of Brunſwick remained at Leiceſter-houſe, taking leave of the ladies of quality her intimates, with the greateſt tenderneſs and fortitude. In the afternoon their highneſſes took leave of the company; when the prince, on the people's expreſſing their ardent wiſhes for their highneſſes happineſs and proſperity, returned his prayers for the ſucceſs of the Britiſh nation, for which he ſaid he had already bled, and would again, with pleaſure, on any future occaſion.

A great variety of melancholy accounts were received during the courſe of this month of the loſs and damage of ſhips at ſea, and on the coaſts; robberies, with many daring circumſtances, notwithſtanding the vigilance of the magiſtracy, were committed in town and country, where ſharpers exerciſed their various ſtratagems, and murders, the conſequence of paſſion, reſentment, and luſt, were frequently perpetrated.

Great part of the converſation of the public during this year was engaged by the diſputes which prevailed amongſt the proprietors of Eaſt India ſtock.

A ſtop having been put to the payment of the rents of lord Clive's eſtates in India, in conſequence of ſome objections made to his conduct there, his lordſhip, in a letter to the proprietors, gave a ſhort account of his conduct in India; anſwered the objections that had been made againſt it here at home, and laſtly, confuted the reaſons given for that part of their behaviour towards him, which gave riſe to this altercation.

Mr. Sullivan, in a long and tedious detail unintereſting to the public, endeavoured to exculpate himſelf, and to aſſert the company's right to the proceedings of which lord Clive had ſo loudly complained.

In the month of February the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council voted lord chief juſtice Pratt the freedom of the city of London to be preſented to him in due form; they alſo agreed to return thanks to the repreſentatives of that city for their patriotic conduct in parliament.

The trial of John Wilkes, eſq; for the republication of the North Briton in volumes, came on during during the courſe of this month, before lord Mansfield in the court of king's-bench; of which publication he was found guilty; as he was afterwards of printing and publiſhing "the Eſſay on Woman." The friends of Mr. Wilkes then publiſhed a letter from him, and a certificate ſigned by one of the French king's phyſicians, and a ſurgeon of eminence, and atteſted by two notaries, and the earl of Hertford, ambaſſador from the court of London; wherein it appeared that he was ſo bad with his wound, as not to have been able, during the month of January, to return to England.

About this time the Eaſt India company received advice, "That the diſputes between the company's ſervants and the reigning nabob, Coſſim Aly Cawn, had been productive of ſuch animoſities and jealouſies on the part of the latter, that it was judged highly neceſſary to uſe every means to allay them: for this purpoſe Meſſrs. Amyatt and Hay, two gentlemen of the council, were deputed to wait upon the nabob, with inſtructions to endeavour to adjuſt the difference in an amicable manner.

They accordingly arrived at Mongheer, the place of his reſidence, on the twelfth of May, and had many conferences with him, in which he evidently ſhewed a great averſion to an accommodation upon the terms offered him.

A ſupply of five hundred arms going to Patna was, about this time, ſtopped by the nabob's officers, and other acts of hoſtility were committed; till affairs being come to an extremity, a war with Coſſim Aly was unavoidable. Meſſrs. Amyatt and Hay were recalled, and the former of theſe gentlemen, having received the uſual paſſports, ſet out for Calcutta, accompanied by Meſſrs. Amphlett, Wollaſton, and Hutchinſon; lieutenants Jones, Gordon, and Cooper, and Dr. Crooke, Meſſrs. Hay and Gulſton remaining with the nabob as hoſtages. As the boats were paſſing the city of Moorſhedabad, they were attacked by a number of troops, aſſembled for that purpoſe, on both ſides the river, and ſome of the gentlemen in the boats were killed.

Mr. Amyatt immediately landed with a few ſeapoys, whom he forbad to fire. He then endeavoured to make the enemy underſtand that he was furniſhed with the nabob's paſſports, and had no deſign of committing any hoſtilities: but their horſe advancing, ſome of the ſeapoys immediately fired, and in the confuſion that enſued, Mr. Amyatt, with moſt of his ſmall party, were killed.

Mr. Ellis and his council at Patna having, with the approbation of captain Corſtairs, agreed to attack that city early in the morning of the twenty-fifth of June, it was accordingly carried into execution: they were in entire poſſeſſion of the city for four hours, the Mooriſh governor and moſt of his people having fled as far as Futwa. Here, however, he came to a reſolution of returning and making an effort to regain the city; and having got in at the water-ſide gate of the fort, ſucceeded in diſpoſſeſſing our troops, owing to the ſeapoys and Europeans being moſtly diſperſed in plundering. Upon the retiring into the factory, on account of the diſpiritedneſs of the men, and a great deſertion among the ſeapoys, it was found impracticable to make any ſtand there; a reſolution was therefore taken to proceed to Sujah Dowla's country. They accordingly croſſed the river on the twenty-ſixth in the evening, and met with no obſtruction until they paſſed Churpa; when they were attacked on the thirtieth by the Phouſdar, with about two thouſand men, whom they eaſily routed; but he being that evening joined from Bugepore with four or five hundred ſeapoys, and five or ſix field pieces, he attacked the party on the next evening, the firſt of July, and entirely routed them, the Europeans having quitted their ranks at the firſt onſet. Fifty of them were killed, amongſt whom was captain Corſtairs. Mr. Ellis and the reſt were all made priſoners.

In conſequence of theſe and other acts of hoſtility, againſt ſeveral of the company's ſettlements, committed by Coſſim Aly, it was determined to declare war againſt him, and to reſtore the former nabob Meer Jaffier to the ſubahſhip, upon his entering into a new treaty with the company. War was accordingly declared, and an advantageous treaty concluded, the moſt material articles whereof were a confirmation of his former treaty, and alſo of the provinces of Burdwan, Nidnapoor, and Chitagong, granted by the late nabob Coſſim Aly, engaging to give thirty lacks of rupees to defray the expences and loſs accruing to the company from the war, and alſo to reimburſe the amount of what had been loſt by private perſons.

A few days afterwards Meer Jaffier ſet out to join the army under major Adams, which was then on its march towards Moorſhedabad. The firſt action which happened was on the nineteenth of July, oppoſite to Cutwa, on the Coſſimbuzar ſide of the river. The major having croſſed with the army the night before, in the morning came up with a large body of the enemy's troops, who were ſtrongly poſted to oppoſe his progreſs to the city; and having attacked them, they were routed, after a ſmall reſiſtance, and with an inconſiderable loſs on our ſide. A detached party, under the command of captain Long, at the ſame time poſſeſſed themſelves of the fort of Cutwa, on the other ſide of the river, together with all the enemy's artillery.

Major Adams now purſued his march to Moorſhedabad, which the army entered, with a trifling oppoſition, the twenty-fourth at night. Here the army halted ſome days to refreſh, during which Meer Jaffier was proclaimed in due form.

The major purſued his rout; and on the ſecond of Auguſt, having arrived near a place called Sooty, at the head of the Coſſimbuzar river, a very obſtinate engagement enſued, with a numerous army of the enemy's beſt troops and artillery, who there occupied a very advantageous poſt. The ſtand that they made was reſolute and uncommon for troops of this country, having cloſely engaged our forces for no leſs than four hours: however, the enemy at length ſuſtained a total defeat, through the major's good conduct and intrepidity, and the remarkable bravery of the officers and men.

On the part of the Engliſh, the loſs was not ſo great as might have been expected from ſo ſevere an action. It conſiſted only of ſix officers and forty Europeans, and two hundred and ninety-two ſeapoys and black horſe, killed and wounded. On the part of the enemy, a great number of men were killed and wounded, and twenty-three pieces of cannon, with about one hundred and fifty boats, laden with military and other ſtores, were taken.

After this battle major Adams advanced with the army near to Rajamant; about three or four miles from which, the enemy had thrown up a ſtrong entrenchment from the hills to the river. This the major was reſolved to attack, and every thing being ready for the aſſault by the fifth of September, it was carried on with ſuch vigour, that in a ſhort time the enemy were obliged to abandon the entrenchment to the conquerors. By this victory the province of Bengal was entirely ſecured to the Engliſh, and the letters which brought theſe accounts expreſſed their hopes that by this action the fate of the war would be entirely decided.

Many thouſand journeymen ſilk weavers went in proceſſion from Spitalfields, in the beginning of the month of April, and waited on his majeſty at the queen's palace in St. James's Park, with a petition, repreſenting the miſerable condition themſelves and families were reduced to, by the clandeſtine importation of French ſilks. They waited before the court-yard, and two gentlemen, belonging to that manufactory, had the honour to be introduced to his majeſty's preſence, and preſent their petition, which his majeſty received in the moſt gracious manner; and gave for anſwer, "That he would ſend immediate orders to put an intire ſtop to the importation of French ſilks; that an affair of ſo much conſequence to the kingdom ſhould be properly laid before the parliament, and that he would do his utmoſt to procure them redreſs."

His majeſty went to the houſe of peers on the nineteenth of this month, and having given the royal aſſent to various bills, cloſed the ſeſſion of parliament with the following ſpeech from the throne:

My lords and gentlemen,

"I cannot put an end to this ſeſſion of parliament, without returning you my hearty thanks for the ſalutary meaſures which you have taken to extend the commerce, and ſecure the happineſs, of my kingdoms."

"The aſſurances which I have received of the pacific diſpoſition of the powers with whom we were lately at war, and of their reſolution to adhere inviolably to the terms of the late treaty, promiſe the continuance of peace abroad; and the firm and temperate exertion of your authority, joined to the conſtitutional and public ſpirited conduct which you have manifeſted on every occaſion, during the preſent ſeſſion, will, I truſt, eſtabliſh at home due obedience to the laws, reverence to the legiſlature, and domeſtic union."

Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I thank you for the ſupplies which you have ſo chearfully and unanimouſly granted. The ample proviſion you have made for the ſeveral ſervices recommended to you, and eſpecially for maintaining my fleet in a reſpectable ſtate, will, I am confident, preſerve to this nation its proper weight and influence, and give ſtrength and ſecurity to all my dominions."

"The wiſe regulations which have been eſtabliſhed to augment the public revenues, to unite the intereſts of the moſt diſtant poſſeſſions of my crown, and to encourage and ſecure their commerce with Great Britain, call for my hearty approbation."

"Your regard to public credit, in diſcharging a part of the heavy debt contracted and unprovided for during the late war, without impoſing on this kingdom the burthen of any new taxes, is particularly pleaſing to me, from the tender concern which I feel for my people."

My lords and gentlemen,

"It is the proper employment of this ſeaſon of tranquillity, to conſider of the moſt effectual means for perfecting thoſe works of peace, and plans of public utility, which have been ſo wiſely and happily begun."

"I recommend theſe important objects to your conſideration during the receſs. You may depend upon my conſtant endeavours for the ſucceſs of theſe good purpoſes; as I ſhall ever eſteem it my trueſt glory, to employ that power with which the conſtitution hath entruſted me, in promoting your real intereſts and laſting happineſs."

It was reſolved on the ſame day, that the thanks of the houſe be given to brigadier-general Draper, for the eminent ſervices he had performed to his king and country, in aſſiſting in the conqueſt of Manilla, and the reduction of the Philippine iſlands, and that Mr. Speaker ſignify the ſame to him; the thanks of the houſe were likewiſe voted to be given to vice-admiral Corniſh, and to be delivered in the very ſame words.

On the 23d of April, a chapter of the moſt noble order of the garter was held at St. James's, when his majeſty was pleaſed to inveſt the reigning duke of Mecklenburgh Strelitz, eldeſt brother to her majeſty, with one of the vacancies of that order, and the other was beſtowed upon the right honourable the earl of Halifax, one of his majeſty's principal ſecretaries of ſtate.

Next day his majeſty was pleaſed to fill up the vacant ſtall at Weſtminſter of the moſt honourable military order of the Bath, by inveſting lord Clive with the inſignia of that order.

Information having been given about this time, that ſeveral of his majeſty's ſubjects had been for a conſiderable time, and were then detained in France, as hoſtages for the payment of ranſom bills, which had not yet been ſatisfied; notice was given in the Gazette, that in caſe ſuch ranſom bills were not forthwith diſcharged, proſecutions would be commenced in his majeſty's court of admiralty againſt all maſters, owners, and others, refuſing or neglecting to pay the ſums of money ſtipulated for the releaſe of thoſe unfortunate perſons, who had ſuffered ſo long an impriſonment.

Great quantities of French ſilks and laces were, during the courſe of this month, ſeized and confiſcated; and ſeveral bakers were fined for defrauding the public in the weight of their bread.

A general court of the Eaſt India company was held on the firſt of May, at which there were many debates, which were carried on with great coolneſs and deliberation; and the court broke up with a reſolution, that the following queſtion ſhould be determined by a ballot, at a general court to be held on the third inſtant in the morning, namely;

"That it be recommended, and that the court of directors be impowered to agree with lord Clive for the payment of his jaghire for the ſpace of ten years, provided his lordſhip ſhall ſo long live, and the company ſhall be in actual poſſeſſion of the land out of which it iſſues, and the revenues thereof during that period of time."

The queſtion was determined in the affirmative by a conſiderable majority. Thanks and rewards were alſo voted to major Adams and other officers who had diſtinguiſhed themſelves in the company's ſervice.

By the advices which were received in the month of July from North America, it appeared that the military operations in that quarter were ſtill carried on with the greateſt vigour; and that Sir William Johnſton had at laſt brought the Seneca nation to conceſſions highly advantageous to the ſubjects of Great Britain; and that they had entered into the following treaty of peace, friendſhip, and alliance with the Engliſh.

"That the Seneca nation do immediately ſtop all all hoſtilities, and ſolemnly engage never more to make war upon the Engliſh, or ſuffer any of their people to commit any acts of violence on the perſons or properties of any of his Britannic majeſty's ſubjects.

"That they forthwith collect all the Engliſh priſoners, deſerters, Frenchmen and negroes amongſt them, and deliver them up to Sir William Johnſton, and that they engage never to harbour or conceal any deſerters; but ſhould any ſuch take refuge amongſt them, they are to be brought to the commanding officer of the next garriſon, and delivered up.

"That they cede to his majeſty and his ſucceſſors, for ever, in full right, the lands from the fort of Niagara, to the Creek above fort Schloſſer, and down the ſame to the river or ſtraight, comprehending the whole carrying place, and containing a track of about fourteen miles in length, and four in breadth.

"That they allow a free paſſage through their country from that of Cayugas to Niagara, or elſewhere, for the uſe of his majeſty's troops for ever; engaging never to obſtruct, or moleſt, any of his majeſty's troops, or other his ſubjects who make uſe of the ſame.

"That they grant to his majeſty and his ſucceſſors for ever, a free uſe of the harbours for veſſels, within their country on Lake Ontario, or in any of the rivers, with liberty to land ſtores, and erect ſheds for their ſecurity.

That they immediately ſtop all intercourſe between any of their people, and thoſe of the Shawaneſe and Delawares, or other his majeſty's enemies, whom they are to treat as common enemies, and to aſſiſt his majeſty's arms in bringing them to proper puniſhment; ſolemnly engaging never to be privy to, or aſſiſt any of his majeſty's enemy's, or thoſe who may hereafter attempt to diſturb the public tranquillity.

"That ſhould any Indian commit murder, or rob any of his majeſty's ſubjects, he ſhall be immediately delivered up to be tried and puniſhed, according to the equitable laws of England: and ſhould any white man be guilty of the like crime towards the Indians, he ſhall be immediately tried, and puniſhed if guilty: and the Senecas are never for the future to procure themſelves ſatisfaction, otherwiſe than as before-mentioned, but to lay all matter of complaint before Sir William Johnſton, or his majeſty's ſuperintendant of thoſe affairs for the time being, and ſtrictly to maintain and abide by the covenant claim of friendſhip.

"For the due performance of theſe articles, the Senecas are to deliver up three of their chiefs, as hoſtages, who are to be well treated and reſtored to them, ſo ſoon as the ſame are fully performed on their parts.

"In conſequence of their perfect agreement to the foregoing articles, Sir William Johnſton doth, by virtue of the powers and authorities repoſed in him, in the name of his Britannic majeſty, promiſe and engage, that the ſaid Indians ſhall have a full pardon for paſt tranſgreſſions: that they ſhould be left in the quiet and peaceable poſſeſſion of all their rights not compriſed in the foregoing articles, and that on their duly performing the ſame, and ſubſcribing the definitive treaty of peace to be held in conſequence hereof, they ſhall be once more admitted into the covenant chain of friendſhip with the Engliſh, and be indulged with a free, fair, and open trade, ſo long as they abide by their engagements."

The forces commanded by the colonels Bradſtreet and Bouquet met with the ſame ſucceſs as thoſe under Sir William Johnſton. The Delawares and Shawaneſe had refuſed to meet Sir William at the congreſs of Niagara, but now, intimidated by the march of ſuch a number of troops towards their country, they met colonel Bradſtreet at Preſque Iſle, and in the moſt ſubmiſſive manner ſued for peace, which was granted them on the following conditions.

"That all priſoners in their hands ſhould be delivered to him at Sanduſky in twenty-five days.

"That they ſhould renounce all claim to the poſts and forts we now have in their country, and that we ſhall be at liberty to erect as many as we think neceſſary to ſecure our trade; and that they ſhall cede to us for ever, as much land round each fort as a cannon ſhot can fly over, on which our people may raiſe proviſions.

"That if any Indian hereafter kill any Engliſhman, he ſhall be delivered up by his nation, and tried by the Engliſh laws, only to have half the jury of Indians. And if any one of the nations renew the war, the reſt ſhall join to bring them to reaſon.

"That ſix of the deputies ſhall remain with colonel Bradſtreet as hoſtages, and the other four, with an Engliſh officer and one of our Indians, ſhould proceed immediately to acquaint the dependent nations with theſe terms of peace, and forward the collecting of the priſoners, to be ready at the day appointed."

The colonel reſolutely told them, that if their chiefs would not confirm this peace, no other would be granted them; and that if they continued the war, they ſhould find their country filled with warriors immediately, who would totally deſtroy every one of their people. The number of priſoners delivered up by thoſe ſavages exceeded three hundred.

The lords commiſſioners of the treaſury having, towards the end of this month, repreſented to his majeſty in council, that the endeavours they had uſed for improving his majeſty's revenue of cuſtoms, and preventing the many frauds committed in the out-ports of this kingdom, were greatly obſtructed by the ſtate of the Iſle of Man, from whence a pernicious and illicit trade was carried on to the neighbouring coaſts of Great-Britain and Ireland, in violation of the laws of this kingdom, and to the great detriment and diminution of the public revenue: his majeſty was pleaſed, with the advice of his privy council, to enjoin on his officers the utmoſt vigilance in the execution of their duty; to declare that all perſons detected in ſuch offence, ſhould be proceeded againſt with the utmoſt rigour of the law, and iſſued orders that the lords commiſſioners of the admiralty ſhould ſtation a ſufficient number of ſhips and cutters, in the harbours and on the coaſts of the Iſle of Man, in order to diſcover, and bring to juſtice, all concerned in ſuch illegal practices.

The lord lieutenant of Ireland, or, in his abſence, the lords juſtices of that kingdom, were required, to give ſuch directions for carrying his majeſty's commands into execution, as unto them might reſpectively appertain.

Our ambaſſador at the court of Verſailles having received orders to demand immediate ſatisfaction and reparation for acts of violence committed in the courſe of this year, at one of the Turk's iſlands by the commander of a French ſhip of war; he returned returned for anſwer, that the court of France had diſavowed the ſaid proceedings, diſclaimed all intention or deſire of acquiring or of conquering the Turks iſlands; and had given orders to the compte d'Eſtaign, governor of St. Domingo, to cauſe the ſaid iſlands to be immediately abandoned on the part of the French, to reſtore every thing therein to the condition in which it was on the firſt of June then laſt, and to make reparation for the damages which any of his majeſty's ſubjects ſhould be found to have ſuſtained in conſequence of the ſaid proceedings, according to an eſtimation to be forthwith ſettled by the ſaid governor, with his majeſty's governor of Jamaica; and that a duplicate of the ſaid order ſhould be tranſmitted to his majeſty's ſecretary of ſtate.

By letters received at the admiralty office ſigned by commodore Palliſer at St. John's in Newfoundland, it appeared that a ſloop had been diſpatched with a letter to the French governor at St. Pierre, enquiring into the truth of ſome reports that had prevailed of his having mounted cannon, and erected works on that iſland, contrary to treaty; and that the ſaid governor, in his anſwer to the commodore, diſavowed the contents of ſuch reports, and aſſuring him that the concurrent fiſhery in thoſe parts of the coaſts, wherein the French were permitted by treaty to fiſh, had been carried on in perfect tranquillity.

It muſt here be recorded to the credit of Britiſh hoſpitality, that at this time upwards of ſix hundred German emigrants, men, women, and children, conſiſting of Wurtzburghers, and Palatines, all proteſtants, (who were brought hither by a perſon, with a promiſe of being immediately ſent to ſettle at his own expence, in the iſlands of St. Johns and Le Croix, in America, and afterwards abandoned by him) were generouſly relieved by the benevolence of this nation, in conſequence of a moſt affecting narrative of their ſufferings, which the miniſter of the German Lutheran-church in London printed in the public papers.

The narrative ſet forth "That ſome of them had laid, during heavy rains, and were then lying, in the open fields adjacent to this metropolis, without covering, without money, and without the common neceſſaries of life; that others were languiſhing under the complicated evils of ſickneſs and extreme want; and more than two hundred remained on board the ſhip, which brought them over, on account of their paſſage not being paid for, where they were periſhing for want of food, and other neceſſaries of life.

On this occaſion the humanity and generoſity of the public were excited to a degree perhaps ſcarcely remembered; for, according to the clergyman's account, before eleven o'clock of the very morning on which his letter appeared, they received from the Tower, by order of a great perſonage, an hundred tents, with the neceſſaries thereunto belonging; by the ſame bountiful hand, the freight of thoſe on board the ſhips was paid, and they were immediately releaſed.

On the firſt day the contributions amounted to near three hundred pounds, which with future additions enabled the committee to cloath and provide them with every requiſite for perſons in their diſtreſſed condition. Having obtained his majeſty's permiſſion, they contracted for veſſels to convey them to South Carolina, for their proviſion and maintenance during the voyage, and for a time after their arrival in that province.

Various accounts having been received from the bay of Honduras, complaining that our logwood cutters had not only been diſturbed in their buſineſs, but ſuddenly ordered to remove from their uſual places of ſettlement on frivolous and preſumptive pretences; a remonſtrance was made by the Britiſh ambaſſador at the court of Madrid, in conſequence whereof orders were diſpatched to Don Felix Raming de Eſtenoz, governor of Jucatan. From the tenor of theſe orders, it appeared, that his Catholic majeſty diſapproved the proceedings of the ſaid governor, with reſpect to his majeſty's ſubjects in the bay of Honduras, expreſſed his deſire of giving his majeſty the greateſt proofs of his friendſhip, and of preſerving peace with the Britiſh nation. That he had commanded the ſaid governor to re-eſtabliſh the Britiſh Logwood Cutters in the ſeveral places from which he had obliged them to retire, and to acquaint them, that they might return to their occupations of cutting logwood, without being diſturbed under any pretence whatſoever.

The city of London in particular, and the nation in general, having, about this time, preferred complaints in parliament concerning the exorbitant price of proviſions, his majeſty, in order to prevent all unlawful combinations for enhancing the price of proviſions, and encourage thoſe, who might diſcover any concerned in ſuch illegal practices, promiſed to all perſons who ſhould diſcover, or cauſe to be diſcovered, ſuch offenders, ſo that they might be convicted, a reward of one hundred pounds, to be paid out of the treaſury immediately. When the merchants petition, touching the above complaint, was preſented to one of the ſecretaries of ſtate, a council was immediately called, and, after an examination of evidence, his majeſty ordered his royal proclamation to be iſſued as before mentioned.

But the pernicious effects of luxury on the one hand, and monopoly on the other, fruſtrated the means uſed for the public relief, and the people of England were ſtill obliged to purchaſe thoſe neceſſaries at a moſt exorbitant rate, which their country annually yields in ſuch abundance, that they might always be ſupplied on moderate terms.

In the month of October, the weather proved extremely boiſterous, by which many ſhips were wrecked, and other very conſiderable damage was ſuſtained both by ſea and land.

Though the terms between the ſavage Indians and his majeſty's officers had been ſo ſolemnly and recently ratified, they again revolted, and renewed their outrages with aggravated inſolence. In conſequence of this perfidious behaviour, major general Gage, commander in chief of his majeſty's forces in thoſe parts, determined to penetrate into the heart of their country. Accordingly, the regular and provincial troops under colonel Bouquet, having been joined by a large body of volunteers from Virginia, and others from Maryland and Penſylvania, marched from Fort Pitt the beginning of October, and arrived at Tuſcarowas about the fifteenth. The march of the troops into their country threw the ſavages into the greateſt conſternation, as they hoped their woods would protect them, and had boaſted of the ſecurity of their ſituation from the attacks of our army. The Indians hovered round the troops during the march, but deſpairing of ſucceſs in action, had recourſe to negotiation. They were told that they might have peace; but every priſoner in their poſſeſſion muſt firſt be delivered up. They brought in near twenty, and promiſed to deliver up the reſt; but as their their promiſes were not regarded, they engaged to deliver the whole on the firſt of November, at a ſpot about one hundred and fifty miles from Fort Pitt, the center of the Delaware towns, and near to the moſt conſiderable ſettlement of the Shawaneſe. Colonel Bouquet kept them in ſight, and moved his camp to that place. He ſoon obliged the Delawares, and ſome broken tribes, to bring in all their priſoners, even to children bought of white women. They were then told that they might appoint deputies to go to Sir William Johnſton, to receive ſuch terms as ſhould be impoſed upon them, which the nations ſhould agree to ratify; and they were obliged to leave a number of their chiefs in the hands of the Engliſh, as ſecurities for their performance of this agreement.

All the nations readily agreed to the terms, except the Shawaneſe, who did not approve of the conditions, and were particularly averſe to the giving of hoſtages: but finding their obſtinacy would only tend to their deſtruction, they at laſt conſented, gave up forty principal chiefs as hoſtages, and appointed their deputies to go to Sir William Johnſton in the ſame manner as the reſt. The number of priſoners delivered up by theſe ſavages, exceeded three hundred, and it was expected that the Engliſh parties would bring in near one hundred more from their different towns.

A. D. 1765. His majeſty went to the houſe of peers on the tenth of January, and opened the ſeſſion of parliament with the following ſpeech from the throne:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The ſituation of affairs, both at home and abroad, has enabled me to allow you that receſs, which has been uſual in times of public tranquillity. I have now the ſatisfaction to inform you, that I have agreed with my good brother the king of Denmark, to cement the union which has long ſubſiſted between the two crowns, by the marriage of that prince with my ſiſter the princeſs Carolina Matilda, which is to be ſolemnized as ſoon as their reſpective ages will permit. I obſerve, with pleaſure, that the events which have happened in the courſe of the laſt year give us reaſon to hope for the duration of that peace, which has been ſo happily eſtabliſhed, and which it is my reſolution ſtrictly to maintain. The courts of France and Spain have given me freſh aſſurances of their good diſpoſitions. The future quiet of the empire has been confirmed, by the unanimous choice of a ſucceſſor to the Imperial dignity; and the peaceable election of the king of Poland has prevented thoſe fatal conſequences, which, upon ſimilar occaſions, have ſo frequently been deſtructive to the repoſe of Europe. I am happy, therefore, to meet my parliament, at a time when no foreign diſturbances interrupt their conſultations for the internal good order and proſperity of my kingdoms."

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I ſhall aſk, for the current ſervice of the year, no other ſupplies than ſuch as are neceſſary for thoſe eſtabliſhments, which have already met with your approbation, and I will order the proper eſtimates for this purpoſe to be laid before you. I muſt, however, earneſtly recommend to you the continuance of that attention which you have hitherto ſhewn to the improvement of the public revenue, and the diminution of the public debt. For theſe deſirable and neceſſary ends, I am perſuaded, that you will purſue every proper meaſure, which the ſtate of my dominions, and the circumſtances of the times, require."

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The experience which I have had of your former conduct makes me rely on your wiſdom and firmneſs in promoting that obedience to the laws, and reſpect to the legiſlative authority of this kingdom, which is eſſentially neceſſary for the ſafety of the whole, and in eſtabliſhing ſuch regulations as may beſt connect and ſtrengthen every part of my dominions, for their mutual benefit and ſupport. The affection which I bear to my people excites my earneſt wiſhes, that every ſeſſion of parliament may be diſtinguiſhed by ſome plans for the public advantage, and for their relief from thoſe difficulties, which an expenſive war has brought on them. My concurrence and encouragement ſhall never be wanting where their welfare is concerned; and I truſt, that for the attainment of that great object, you will proceed with temper, unanimity and diſpatch."

On the ſeventh of February the houſe of commons agreed to the reſolutions formed by the committee of ſupply for impoſing much the ſame ſtamp duties upon our people in America, as were payable here in England; and the ſaid reſolutions, being formed into a bill, received the royal aſſent on the 22d of March.

During this month, his majeſty was pleaſed to order, that America ſhould be divided into two diſtricts, viz. Northern and Southern, by the river Potomack, and a due Weſt line drawn from the head of the main branch of that river, as far as his majeſty's dominions extended; and that a ſurveyor-general ſhould be appointed in each, to make general ſurveys of the ſea coaſts and the inland country, in order to facilitate the navigation, and promote the ſpeedy ſettlement of the new acquiſitions.

Commiſſioners were likewiſe appointed to ſettle the new ceded iſlands in the Weſt Indies, who received orders, firſt to divide each iſland into pariſhes and diſtricts; then in every pariſh to trace out a town, its ſtreets, market-place, and other public places; after which they were to parcel out the ground into proper allotments to build on, with a ſmall field annexed to each. It was alſo ordered, that where the land was cleared, the purchaſers, beſides the purchaſe money, ſhould pay a quit-rent of one penny per foot in front of each town lot, and ſix-pence for every acre of the field that accompanied it. On the other hand, if the land was uncleared, it ſhould be granted by the governor, upon ſecurity given to build on, encloſe, and fence it, in a reaſonable time, and to pay the ſame quit-rent.

Mr. John Williams, bookſeller, was, on the fourteenth of this month, brought, purſuant to a former ſentence, from the King's Bench priſon, to ſtand in the pillory, in New-palace-yard, Weſtminſter, for re-publiſhing the North Briton in volumes. A few minutes after twelve he mounted amidſt the repeated acclamations of upwards of ten thouſand people, who maintained an inceſſant ſhout during the hour of ſtanding. Oppoſite to the pillory were erected four ladders, with cords running from each other, on which were hung a jack boot, an ax, and a Scotch bonnet. The two latter, after remaining there ſome time, were burnt, and the boot beheaded. During his ſtand alſo, a purple purſe, ornamented with orange coloured ribbons, was produced by a gentleman tleman eminent for his patriotiſm, who began a collection for the benefit of the culprit, after which, the purſe being carried round, every one contributed according to pleaſure, to the amount in the whole, as was ſuppoſed, of upwards of two hundred guineas. He had a ſprig of laurel in his hand all the time; and received, on this occaſion, greater and louder marks of the public applauſe, than would, perhaps, have been given to a ſovereign prince, at the head of a victorious army.

Many people in different parts of the kingdom ſuſtained great loſſes by high winds and exceſſive floods, during this month, and ſuch was the forlorn ſituation of ſix or ſeven thouſand people ſtarving for want of employment in the weaving branch, that the public compaſſion being excited, a ſubſcription was generouſly ſet on foot for their relief, and, in a very ſhort time, conſiderable ſums were raiſed.

In the month of April, William, lord Byron, was tried by his peers in Weſtminſter-hall, for an unhappy affair, which took place between his lordſhip and Mr. Chaworth a member of the lower houſe, when, after a learned diſcuſſion of the caſe, the peers adjourned to their own houſe, and, after ſome conſideration, returned, when they found his lordſhip guilty of manſlaughter; and as, by an old ſtatute, peers are, in all caſes where benefit of clergy is allowed, to be diſmiſſed without burning in the hand, loſs of inheritance, or corruption of blood, his lordſhip was immediately diſmiſſed on paying his fees.

His majeſty, who had been indiſpoſed for ſome time, went to the houſe of peers on the twelfth of this month, and in a ſpeech from the throne, informed the parliament, "that the tender concern he felt for his faithful ſubjects made him anxious to provide for every poſſible event, which might effect their future happineſs or ſecurity. That his late indiſpoſition, though not attended with danger, had led him to conſider the ſituation in which his kingdoms and family might be left, if it ſhould pleaſe God to put a period to his life, while his ſucceſſor was of tender years. That the high importance of this ſubject to the public ſafety, good order and tranquillity, the paternal affection which he bore to his children and to all his people, and his earneſt deſire that every precaution ſhould be taken, which might tend to preſerve the conſtitution of Great Britain undiſturbed, and the dignity and luſtre of his crown unimpaired, had determined him to lay this weighty buſineſs before his parliament; and as his health was now perfectly reſtored, he took the earlieſt opportunity of meeting them, and recommending to their moſt ſerious deliberation the making ſuch proviſion as would be neceſſary, in caſe any of his children ſhould ſucceed to his throne, before they ſhould reſpectively attain the age of eighteen years. That to this end he propoſed to their conſideration, whether, under the preſent circumſtances, it would not be expedient to veſt in him the power of appointing, from time to time, by inſtrument in writing under his ſign manual, either the queen, or any other perſon of his royal family, to be the guardian of the perſon of ſuch ſucceſſor, and the regent of theſe kingdoms, until ſuch ſucceſſor ſhould attain the age of eighteen years, ſubject to the like reſtrictions and regulations, as were ſpecified and contained in an act paſſed upon a ſimilar occaſion in the twenty-fourth year of the reign of the late king, his royal grandfather: the regent ſo appointed to be aſſiſted by a council compoſed of the ſeveral perſons, who, by reaſon of their dignities and offices, were conſtituted members of the council eſtabliſhed by that act, together with thoſe, whom they might think proper to leave to his nomination."

A joint addreſs was preſented by both houſes in anſwer to this ſpeech, and, in conſequence thereof, a bill was ordered to be brought into the houſe of lords, where it was paſſed and ſent to the commons. Here it met with ſome oppoſition, but an amendment being made, which was approved by the lords, it received the royal aſſent on the fifth of May, and on the twenty-fifth of the ſame month his majeſty thought proper to cloſe the ſeſſion.

The council for aſſiſting the regent was decreed to conſiſt of the dukes of York and Glouceſter, the princes Henry Frederic, and Frederic William, and the duke of Cumberland, and alſo of the perſons following, viz. The archbiſhop of Canterbury; the lord-chancellor, or lord-keeper, or firſt commiſſioner, named in any commiſſion for the cuſtody of the great ſeal of Great Britain for the time being; the lord treaſurer of Great Britain, or the firſt commiſſioner in that office for the time being; the lord preſident of the council for the time being; the lord-high-admiral of Great Britain, or the firſt commiſſioner for executing that office; the two principal ſecretaries of ſtate for the time being; and the lord chief juſtice of the king's bench for the time being. But if any of the king's brothers, or his uncle, die, during his majeſty's reign, or ſhould be nominated regent on his demiſe, his majeſty, by three inſtruments under his ſign manual, ſealed and depoſited, and revocable at pleaſure, might appoint ſome other perſon to be of the council, and ſuch inſtruments of nomination were to be produced unopened to the privy council.

Soon after the riſing of parliament, accounts were received of the ſucceſs of his majeſty's arms in conjunction with the company's troops in the Eaſt Indies; a complete victory having been obtained over the king and vizir Hindortan, by major Hector Monro. They had ſix thouſand men ſlain on the field of battle, and loſt, beſides ſtores of various kinds, one hundred and thirty pieces of cannon. The major went out, on the morning of the action, with ſome of the principal officers, to reconnoitre the ſituation of the enemy, intending to attack them the following day; but finding their whole army under arms, he returned to the camp, ordered in the advanced poſts and grand guard, the drums to beat to arms, and in leſs than twenty minutes, the line of battle was formed, having made the diſpoſition the preceding day. The enemy began to cannonade about nine in the morning, and the action became general in about half an hour after.

The moraſs in the front of our troops prevented their advancing for ſome time, through which means they were much galled by the enemy's cannon. The major then ordered a battalion of ſeapoys, from the right of the firſt line, to move forward in order to ſilence one of their batteries, which played upon his flank, and afterwards was forced to ſupport it by another battalion, which had the deſired effect. He then ordered both the lines to face to the right, and keep marching in order to clear the left wing of the moraſs; which done, to face face to the former front, the right wing wheeling up to the left, to clear a ſmall wood that was upon the right; the firſt line then moved forward, keeping a very briſk cannonade. Major Monro then ſent orders to major Pemble, who commanded the ſecond line, to face to the right about, and follow the firſt. Immediately after the fire with ſmall arms began, and both lines puſhed forwards with ſuch ardor and reſolution, that the enemy ſoon after began to give way, and five minutes before twelve their whole army was put to flight, leaving ſix thouſand men on the ſpot with one hundred and thirty pieces of cannon, a proportionable quantity of military ſtores, and all their tents ready pitched.

The loſs of the victors was comparatively ſmall, for they had only thirty-two Europeans, and two hundred and thirty-nine Indians killed, and fifty-ſeven Europeans, and four hundred and ſeventy-three Indians wounded. According to the account of the commander in chief, major Pemble and captain Charles Gordon ſignalized their valour in this action, having their horſes ſhot under them.

Subſcriptions were now opened for, and the public bounty moſt generouſly extended towards, a great number of unfortunate ſufferers, who had loſt all, or the greater part of their effects, by a dreadful fire at Rotherhithe; for ſuch was the extraordinary amount of the contribution, that every claimant was paid the full value of their loſs—a laudable example worthy of general imitation.

About two o'clock in the morning of the twenty-firſt day of Auguſt, the queen was ſafely delivered of a prince, who was afterwards baptized by the name of William Henry.

An account of ſeveral outrages, committed by the ſoldiers in Dublin, having been laid before the king, by his excellency the earl of Hertford, lord lieutenant of Ireland, his majeſty was thereupon pleaſed to order his excellency to ſignify his pleaſure to the lords juſtices, that it be given out in public orders in every quarter in Ireland; "that his majeſty had received, with the utmoſt ſurprize and diſpleaſure, the accounts of the late behaviour of the garriſon of Dublin, of ſuch dangerous tendency to the peace and ſafety of ſociety, and utterly ſubverſive of all military diſcipline; that his majeſty expects and requires from his army in Ireland, that they do, upon all occaſions, demean themſelves quietly and peaceably and in perfect obedience and ſubmiſſion to the laws; and that it is his majeſty's fixed reſolution to ſhew the higheſt marks of his diſpleaſure to all military perſons whatever, who ſhall, in any reſpect, act contrary thereto."

By ſeveral accounts received from New England, it appeared that the news of the ſtamp act having received the royal aſſent no ſooner reached that province, than a melancholy appeared on every countenance, and which having afterwards viſibly encreaſed on the arrival of intelligence that it had paſſed both houſes, at length turned to fury, and every where broke out into action. The ſhips in the harbour hung out their colours half maſt high, in token of the deepeſt mourning; the bells rang muffled; the act itſelf was printed with a death's head to it in the place where it is uſual to fix the ſtamps, and cried publicly about the ſtreets by the name of "The folly of England and ruin of America." Eſſays ſoon followed not only againſt the expediency, but even the equity of this obnoxious proceeding.

By the time the act itſelf, as printed at the king's printing-houſe, reached the colonies, the populace were every where exaſperated againſt it to ſuch a degree as to ſhew it the moſt public marks of contempt. In ſeveral places it was burnt, together with effigies of thoſe who were ſuppoſed to have voted, or otherwiſe had any hand in favour of it. It was agreed at the meetings of thoſe in higher rank, that thanks ſhould be given to general Conway and colonel Barré, whom they conſidered as the moſt ſtrenuous oppoſers of it in the Britiſh houſe of commons; that their ſpeeches againſt it, and their pictures ſhould be requeſted.

Thoſe perſons who went from Britain with commiſſions to act as diſtributors of the ſtamps met with the ſevereſt treatment. Many of them were compelled to renounce, now and for ever, publicly, and upon oath, all manner of concern in them: others thought it moſt prudent to return from whence they came; whilſt ſome, more reſolute and zealous, had their houſes burnt down, and their moſt valuable effects plundered or deſtroyed.

By degrees many of the better ſort joined the populace in thoſe tumults, ſetting the act openly at defiance, and declaring their reſolution to pay no taxes, but ſuch as were laid by their repreſentatives. Many governors connived at theſe proceedings. The juſtices of the peace for the diſtrict of Weſtmoreland in Virginia gave public notice under their hands, that they had declined acting in that capacity. Their example was followed by the practitioners of the law, who reſolved to give up their buſineſs rather than carry it on with ſtamped papers.

By the time the act took place (which was on the firſt of November) not a ſheet of ſtamped paper was to be had throughout the ſeveral colonies of New England, New York, New Jerſey, Penſylvania, Maryland, the two Carolinas, except a ſmall parcel which the governor of New-York, terrified by the threats of the enraged populace, had ſurrendered into the hands of the corporation of that place, on condition of their not being deſtroyed. The courts of juſtice were cloſed, and the ports ſhut up.

The merchants of all thoſe colonies, which ventured openly to oppoſe the act, now entered into the moſt ſolemn engagements with each other, not only not to order any more goods from Great Britain let the conſequences be what they would, and recall the orders they had already given, if not filled up by the firſt of January 1766; but even not to diſpoſe of any Britiſh goods ſent them on commiſſion that were not ſhipped before that day; or if they conſented to any relaxations in theſe engagements, it was not to take place till the ſtamp act was repealed. The people of Philadelphia alſo reſolved, though not unanimouſly, that, till ſuch repeal, no lawyer ſhould put in ſuit a demand for money owing by a reſident in America to one in England; nor any perſon in America, however indebted in England make any remittances. Theſe reſolutions were adopted by the retailers, who unanimouſly agreed not to buy or ſell any Britiſh goods ſhipped contrary to their expreſs tenor.

Ireland derived conſiderable advantages from theſe proceedings, as what goods the colonies could not poſſibly diſpenſe with, they took from that country in exchange for their hempſeed and flaxſeed, of which they grow yearly very large quantities. In the mean time they omitted no methods to free themſelves even from this dependance. A ſociety of arts, manufactures and commerce, on the plan of the London ſociety, was inſtituted at New York, and markets opened for the ſale of home-made goods; by which it ſoon appeared, that neither the natives, nor the manufacturers, whom the natives had for ſome time paſt been inviting from Great Britain by very large encouragements, had been idle. In ſhort, the ſpirit of induſtry and frugality took place of the ſpirit of idleneſs and profuſion. The moſt ſubſtantial and faſhionable people were the firſt in ſetting the example to their countrymen by contenting themſelves with homeſpun, or old cloaths, rather than make uſe of any thing Britiſh; and ſuch were the efforts of all ranks, and ſo ſteady their meaſures, that many now began to be convinced of what they had till then thought impoſſible, that the colonies would ſoon be able to ſupply themſelves with every neceſſary of life.

The commiſſioners of the longitude having, about this time, repreſented to the commiſſioners of the navy, that Mr. John Harriſon had aſſigned to them, for the uſe of the public, the property of three ſeveral time-keepers, and alſo explained to them the principle upon which they were conſtructed; the latter ordered this ingenious artiſt the reward to which, by previous contract, he was entitled, for ſo curious and uſeful a diſcovery.

To the great and ſincere grief of all lovers of virtue and their country, his royal highneſs William Auguſtus, duke of Cumberland, departed this life on the thirty-firſt of October. His death, which was ſudden, was ſuppoſed to have been occaſioned by the rupture of ſome blood-veſſel in the brain.

The many eminent public and private virtues which diſtinguiſhed this great and excellent prince cannot, in juſtice to his character or the cauſe of his country, be paſſed over unnoticed. A review of his life will afford a moſt ſhining example of patriotiſm, valour, juſtice, friendſhip, ſincerity and humanity. Inflexibly attached to the intereſt of his country, he braved every danger, nor indulged a thought of life, when called on his ſovereign's duty. Patriotic from principle, he gave ſanction to wiſe and conſtitutional meaſures; nor feared to diſcountenance the ſchemes of oppreſſion, ambition and avarice. Conſcientiouſly juſt, he rewarded merit irreſpective of rank, nor ſuffered the dignified minion to eſcape his reſentment. Refined in his friendſhip, he ſweetened life by a judicious ſelection of worthy men to partake at his hoſpitable board, and amuſe his leiſure hours with an unreſerved affability of converſe. Inviolably ſincere, he never promiſed without deliberation, or the moſt punctual performance of his engagements. Above all, ſympathetically humane, and extenſively generous, his royal heart never failed to feel, nor his royal hand to relieve, the diſtreſſes of his fellow-creatures of every age, ſex, and condition. Nay, he ſought opportunities for doing good, and ſtudied plans for the employment of the poor. With theſe virtues to preponderate, his foibles may be eaſily conſigned to oblivion, eſpecially when it is remembered, that to err is the lot of humanity, but to do good is the property of benevolence.

A moſt terrible fire broke out on the ſeventh of October, near the end of Biſhopſgate-ſtreet, next Cornhill, when the wind being weſterly, the flames ſoon ſpread, and the fire communicated itſelf to all the four corner houſes, which were burning at one time. On the whole, it was computed, that above an hundred houſes were conſumed. The flames were ſo rapid that the unhappy ſufferers had ſcarce time to ſave any of their effects; but a contribution being ſet on foot, conſiderable ſums were raiſed for the uſe of ſuch as choſe to accept the donations of the public.

The corpſe of his late royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland was, on the evening of the ninth of December, privately interred in the royal vault in king Henry the ſeventh's chapel at Weſtminſter, the body having been privately conveyed to the prince's chamber the night before.

So alarming were the tranſactions in America, that in conſequence thereof his majeſty thought proper to aſſemble the parliament on the 17th of December, and being ſeated on the throne with the uſual ſolemnity, he made the following ſpeech:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"The preſent general ſtate of tranquillity in Europe gave me hopes that it would not have been neceſſary to aſſemble my parliament ſooner than uſual in times of peace: but as matters of importance have lately occurred in ſome of my colonies in America, which will demand the moſt ſerious attention of parliament, and as further informations are daily expected from different parts of that country, of which I ſhall order the fulleſt accounts to be prepared for your conſideration; I have thought fit to call you now together, in order that the opportunity may be thereby given, to iſſue the neceſſary writs for the many vacancies that have happened in the houſe of commons ſince the laſt ſeſſion, ſo that the parliament may be full, to proceed immediately, after the uſual receſs, on the conſideration of ſuch weighty matters as will then come before you."

A. D. 1766. The parliament having adjourned for the holidays, met again on the fourteenth of January, when his majeſty addreſſed them in the following ſpeech:

"My lords and gentlemen,

When I met you laſt, I acquainted you, that matters of importance had happened in America, which would demand the moſt ſerious attention of parliament."

"That no information which could ſerve to direct your deliberations in ſo intereſting a concern might be wanting, I have ordered all the papers that give any light into the origin, the progreſs, or the tendency of the diſturbances which have of late prevailed in ſome of the northern colonies, to be immediately laid before you."

"No time has been loſt, on the firſt advice of theſe diſturbances, to iſſue orders to the governors of my provinces, and to the commanders of my forces in America, for the exertion of all the powers of government, in the ſuppreſſion of riots and tumults, and the effectual ſupport of lawful authority."

"Whatever remains to be done on this occaſion, I commit to your wiſdom; not doubting but your zeal for the honour of my crown, your attention to the juſt rights and authority of the Britiſh legiſlature, and your affection and concern for the welfare and proſperity of all my people, will guide you to ſuch ſound and prudent reſolutions, as may tend at once to preſerve thoſe conſtitutional rights over the colonies, and to reſtore to them that harmony and tranquillity, which have lately been interrupted by riots and diſorders of the moſt dangerous nature."

"If any alterations ſhould be wanting in the commercial œconomy of the plantations, which may may tend to enlarge and ſecure the mutual and beneficial intercourſe of my kingdoms and colonies, they will deſerve your moſt ſerious conſideration. In effectuating purpoſes ſo worthy of your wiſdom and public ſpirit, you may depend upon my moſt hearty concurrence and ſupport. The preſent happy tranquillity, now ſubſiſting in Europe, will enable you to purſue ſuch objects of your interior policy with a more uninterrupted attention."

"Gentlemen of the houſe of commons,

"I have ordered the proper eſtimates for the current ſervice of the year to be laid before you. Such ſupplies as you may grant ſhall be duly applied with the utmoſt fidelity, and ſhall be diſpenſed with the ſtricteſt œconomy.

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I earneſtly recommend to you to proceed in your deliberations with temper and unanimity. The time requires, and I doubt not but your inclinations will lead you to thoſe ſalutary diſpoſitions. I have nothing at heart but the aſſertion of legal authority, the preſervation of the liberties of all my ſubjects, the equity and good order of my government, and the concord and proſperity of all parts of my dominions."

The repeal, or continuance, of the ſtamp act, was in itſelf a matter of the higheſt importance; and perhaps there ſcarce ever was any affair debated in a Britiſh parliament, in which the public thought themſelves more deeply intereſted, or for the reſult of which they felt a more impatient anxiety; nor was the reſt of Europe, the commercial part eſpecially, inattentive to the event.

Petitions were preſented from the merchants of London, Briſtol, Liverpool, Lancaſter, Hull, Glaſgow, &c. and indeed from moſt of the trading and manufacturing towns and boroughs in the kingdom, ſetting forth the great decay of their trade, owing to the new laws and regulations made for America: the vaſt quantity of our manufactures, (beſides thoſe articles imported from abroad, which were purchaſed either with our own manufactures, or with the produce of our colonies) which the American trade formerly took off our hands: by all which, many thouſand manufacturers, ſeamen, and labourers had been employed, to the very great and increaſing benefit of the nation. That in return for theſe exports, the petitioners had received from the colonies, rice, indigo, tobacco, naval ſtores, oil, whale fins, furs, and pot-aſh, with other ſtaple commodities, beſides a large balance in remittances by bills of exchange and bullion, obtained by the coloniſts for articles of their produce, not required for the Britiſh market; and therefore exported to other places: "That from the nature of this trade, conſiſting of Britiſh manufactures exported, and of the import of raw materials from America, many of them uſed in our manufactures, and all of them tending to leſſen our dependence on neighbouring ſtates, it muſt be deemed of the higheſt importance in the commercial ſyſtem of this nation. That this commerce, ſo beneficial to the ſtate, and ſo neceſſary for the ſupport of multitudes, then lay under ſuch difficulties and diſcouragements, that nothing leſs than its utter ruin was apprehended, without the immediate interpoſition of parliament. That the colonies were then indebted to the merchants of Great Britain, to the amount of ſeveral millions ſterling: and that, when preſſed for payment, they appeal to paſt experience in proof of their willingneſs; but declare, it is not in their power at preſent to make good their engagements, alledging, that the taxes and reſtrictions laid upon them, and the extenſion of the juriſdiction of the vice-admiralty courts, eſtabliſhed by ſome late acts of parliament, particularly by an act paſſed in the fourth year of his preſent majeſty, for granting certain duties in the Britiſh colonies and plantations in America, and by an act paſſed in the fifth year of his majeſty, for granting and applying certain ſtamp duties, &c. in the ſaid colonies, &c. with ſeveral regulations and reſtraints, which, if founded in acts of parliament for defined purpoſes, they repreſent to have been extended in ſuch a manner, as to diſturb legal commerce, and to harraſs the fair trader; and to have ſo far interrupted the uſual and former moſt fruitful branches of their commerce, reſtrained the ſale of their produce, thrown the ſtate of the ſeveral provinces into confuſion, and brought on ſo great a number of actual bankruptcies, that the former opportunities and means of remittances and payments were utterly loſt and taken from them.

That the petitioners were, by theſe unhappy events, reduced to the neceſſity of applying to the houſe, in order to ſecure themſelves and their families from impending ruin; to prevent a multitude of manufacturers from becoming a burthen to the community, or elſe ſeeking their bread in other countries, to the irretrievable loſs of the kingdom; and to preſerve the ſtrength of this nation entire, its commerce flouriſhing, the revenues increaſing, our navigation, the bulwark of the kingdom, in a ſtate of growth and extenſion, and the colonies, from inclination, duty, and intereſt, firmly attached to the mother country.

Petitions from every part of the kingdom, replete with the like intereſting facts, ſtated and atteſted by ſuch numbers of people, whoſe lives had been entirely devoted to trade, and who muſt be naturally ſuppoſed to be competent judges of a ſubject, which they had ſo long and ſo cloſely attended to, could not fail of having great weight with the houſe, as had alſo a petition from the agent for the iſland of Jamaica, ſetting forth the ill conſequences that had attended a ſtamp-tax, which the aſſembly of that iſland had impoſed, and which was ſuffered to expire, it having been found unequal and burthenſome in a very high degree: and he gave it as his opinion that the preſent law for a ſtamp duty in the colonies would be attended with the ſame, if not greater inconveniencies. Petitions were likewiſe received from the agents for Virginia and Georgia, ſetting forth their inability to pay the ſtamp duty.

The party, however, who had reſolved on the ſupport of the ſtamp act at all events, could not be prevailed upon, either by the arguments or the facts contained in the petitions, to remit the leaſt of their ardor.

They repreſented the petitions as the effect of artifice; and they argued, that even if the diſtreſs of trade, from a due exertion of the authority of parliament, had been as real and as great as it was repreſented, yet it was better to ſubmit to this temporary inconvenience, than, by a repeal of the act, hazard the total loſs of the juſt ſuperiority of Great Britain over her colonies.

Thoſe who contended for the repeal were divided in opinion as to the right of taxation: the more numerous body (of whom were the miniſtry) inſiſted that the legiſlature of Great Britain had an undoubted right to tax the colonies; but founded their arguments on the inexpediency of the preſent tax, as ill adapted to the condition of the colonies, and built upon principles ruinous to the trade of Great Britain.

Thoſe who denied the right of taxation were not ſo numerous; but they conſiſted of ſome of the moſt diſtinguiſhed and popular names in the kingdom.

Though this affair was attended to by the houſe with the moſt unwearied application, yet the nature of their enquiries, the number of petitions they received, and the multitude of papers and witneſſes they had to examine, occaſioned a delay that could not be avoided.

In the interim, there were continual debates, and the oppoſition made the moſt ſtrenuous efforts to enforce the ſtamp act, and by every means to prevent the repeal. There were two queſtions aroſe in the courſe of this debate, upon which the whole turned. The firſt was, whether the legiſlature of Great Britain had a right of taxation over the colonies or not? The ſecond was confined to the expediency or inexpediency of the late law.

As to the right of taxation, the gentlemen who oppoſed it produced many learned authorities from Locke, Selden, Harrington, and Puffendorf, ſhewing, "that the very foundation and ultimate point "in view of all government is the good of ſo-"ciety."

They likewiſe urged, that by going up to Magna Charta, and referring to the ſeveral writs upon record, iſſued out for the purpoſe of raiſing taxes for the crown, and for ſending repreſentatives to parliament, as well as from the bill of rights, it appeared throughout the whole hiſtory of our conſtitution, that no Britiſh ſubject can be taxed, but per communem conſenſum parliamenti, that is to ſay, of himſelf, or his own repreſentative; and this is that firſt and general right, as Britiſh ſubjects, with which the firſt inhabitants of the colonies emigrated; for the right does not depend upon their charters: the charters were but the exterior modelling of the conſtitution of the colonies; but the great interior fundamental of their conſtitution is this general right of a Britiſh ſubject; which is the very firſt principle of liberty, "No man ſhall be taxed, but by himſelf, or by his repreſentative."

That the counties palatine of Cheſter, Durham, and Lancaſter, were not taxed but in their own aſſemblies or parliaments; till at different periods in our hiſtory, they were melted into our preſent form of parliamentary repreſentation. That the body of the clergy, till very lately, taxed themſelves, and granted benevolences to the king.

That the marches of Wales had a right of taxing themſelves till they ſent members to parliament, and from this circumſtance had continued the ſtyle of the king's proclamations, and of our acts of parliament to this day, although unneceſſarily, to name eſpecially the principality of Wales, and the towns of Monmouth and Berwick.

That many people carry the idea of a parliament too far, in ſuppoſing a parliament can do every thing; but that is not true, and if it were, it is not right conſtitutionally; for then there might be an arbitrary power in a parliament, as well as in one man.

There are many things a parliament cannot do. It cannot make itſelf executive, nor diſpoſe of offices that belong to the crown. It cannot take any man's property, even that of the meaneſt cottager, as in the caſes of incloſures, without his being heard. The lords cannot reject a money-bill from the commons, nor the commons erect themſelves into a court of juſtice. The parliament could not tax the clergy, till ſuch time as they were repreſented in parliament: nor can the parliament of England tax Ireland.

The charters of the colonies, which are derived from prerogative, and are in fact only ſo many grants from the crown, are not the only rights the colonies have to being repreſented before they are taxed: they, as Britiſh ſubjects, take up their rights and liberties from a higher origin than their charters only. They take them from the ſame origin and fountain, from whence they flow to all Engliſhmen, from Magna Charta and the natural right of the ſubject. By that rule of right, the charters of the colonies, like all other crown grants, are to be reſtricted and interpreted, for the benefit, not the prejudice of the ſubjects. Had the firſt inhabitants of the colonies renounced all connection with their mother country, they might have renounced their original right; but when they emigrated under the authority of the crown, and the national ſanction, they went out from hence at the hazard of their lives and fortunes, with all the firſt great privileges of Engliſhmen on their backs. But at the ſame time they were not, and could not be bound by penal laws of this country, from the ſeverity of which they fled, to climates remote from the heavy hand of power; and which they hoped to find more friendly to their principles of civil and religious liberty.

It is upon this ground, that it has been univerſally received as a law, that no acts of parliament made here, and particularly thoſe which enact any penalty, are binding upon the colonies, unleſs they are ſpecially named. The inhabitants of the colonies once removed from the domeſtic legiſlation of the mother country, are no more dependent upon it in the general ſyſtem, than the Iſle of Man is, or than, in the feudal ſyſtem of Europe, many ſubordinate principalities are dependent on the juriſdiction of the lord paramount; but owing only a limited obedience.

It is not meant by what has been ſaid, to affect the caſe of any external duties laid upon their ports; or of any reſtrictions which, by the act of navigation, or other acts, are laid upon their commerce; for they are in the ſame caſe, as all other colonies belonging to the reſt of the maritime powers in Europe, who have ſhut up their colonies from all intercourſe with foreign countries, in the very firſt eſtabliſhment. What is ſpoken of are internal taxes, to be levied on the body of the people: and that, before they can be liable to theſe internal taxes, they muſt firſt be repreſented.

Many other arguments were uſed, and inſtances were brought from ancient hiſtory, of the conduct of ſome of the moſt famous republics, with reſpect to their colonies, as well as of colonies which outgrew their mother countries, ſuch as Carthage, the northern emigrants, &c.

Precedents were quoted from what happened in the united Netherlands, and other places, which ſhould ſerve as a beacon, to warn us from purſuing ſuch meaſures as brought about thoſe revolutions.

In anſwer to theſe arguments, thoſe on the other ſide obſerved, that it was neceſſary to clear away from the queſtion all that maſs of diſſertation and learning, diſplayed in arguments which have been brought from ſpeculative men, who have written upon the ſubject of government. That the refinements upon that ſubject, and arguments of natural lawyers, as Locke, Selden, Puffendorf, and others, are little to the purpoſe in a queſtion of conſtitutional law. That it is abſurd to apply records from the the earlieſt times, to our preſent conſtitution; becauſe the conſtitution is not the ſame: and nobody knows what it was at ſome of the times that are quoted: that there are things, even in Magna Charta, which are not conſtitutional now, and that thoſe records are no proofs of our conſtitution as it now is.

Among many other arguments it was urged, that protection is the ground which gives a right to taxation. That the obligation between the colonies and the mother country is natural and reciprocal, conſiſting of defence on the one ſide, and obedience on the other; and that common ſenſe dictates, that they muſt be dependent in all points upon the mother country, or elſe not belong to it at all. That the queſtion is not, what was law, or what was the conſtitution? but the queſtion is, what is law now, and what is the conſtitution now? That if a matter of right has been generally exerciſed, and as generally held to be law, as hath been proved in numberleſs inſtances, without its ever having been queſtioned before, it is now the conſtitution. It was alſo obſerved, that the colonies had gone very great lengths; and it was even inſiſted, that by appointing deputies from their ſeveral aſſemblies to confer together, they had abſolutely forfeited their charters.

The debates being at an end, and the queſtion put, the power of the legiſlature of Great-Britain over her colonies, in all caſes whatſoever, and without any diſtinction in regard to taxation, was confirmed and aſcertained without a diviſion.

The grand committee who had paſſed the reſolutions on which the foregoing queſtion was debated, had alſo paſſed another for the total repeal of the ſtamp act: and two bills were accordingly brought in to anſwer theſe purpoſes. By the reſolutions on which the former was founded, it was declared, that tumults and inſurrections of the moſt dangerous nature had been raiſed and carried on in ſeveral of the colonies, in open defiance of government, and in manifeſt violation of the laws and legiſlative authority of this kingdom. That theſe tumults and inſurrections had been encouraged and inflamed, by ſeveral votes and reſolutions which had paſſed in the aſſemblies of the ſaid colonies, derogatory to the honour of government, and deſtructive to their legal and conſtitutional dependency on the crown and parliament, &c.

By the bill itſelf, all votes, reſolutions, or orders, which had been paſſed by any of the general aſſemblies in America, by which they aſſumed to themſelves the ſole and excluſive right of taxing his majeſty's ſubjects in the colonies, were annulled, and declared contrary to law, derogatory to the legiſlative authority of parliament, and inconſiſtent with their dependency upon the crown.

Far from being diſpirited, the oppoſition gained new vigour, and inſiſted on the repeal in every part of it's progreſs. So many inſtances of the inexpediency of the ſtamp-act had already occurred, that the queſtion was ſcarcely controvertible; therefore, inſtead of entering into the merits of that part of the controverſy, they reſted their principal defence upon the reſolutions on which the late bill for ſecuring the dependency of the colonies had been founded. On the queſtion being put, the bill paſſed by a majority of 275 to 167, and was carried up to the lords by above two hundred members of the houſe of commons. The eclat with which it was introduced in the upper houſe did not prevent its meeting with a ſtrong oppoſition there; thirty-three lords entered a proteſt againſt it at the ſecond reading, as did twenty-eight at the third; it was, however, carried by a majority of thirty-four.

On the 18th of March his majeſty went to the houſe of peers and gave the royal aſſent to the bill for repealing the American ſtamp-act; that for ſecuring the dependencies of the colonies on the Britiſh crown, and to ſeveral other bills. On this occaſion the American merchants made a moſt numerous appearance to expreſs their joy and gratitude; the ſhips in the river diſplayed their colours; great numbers of houſes in the city were illuminated, and every decent and orderly method obſerved, to demonſtrate the juſt ſenſe that was entertained of his majeſty's goodneſs, and the wiſdom of parliament, in conciliating the minds of the people on this critical occaſion.

His majeſty having, on the 14th of May, given the royal aſſent, among others, to "the bill to "prohibit the importation of foreign wrought ſilks "and velvets for a limited time," ſeveral thouſand weavers went to St. James's, with ſtreamers flying, drums beating, and muſick playing, and teſtified their gratitude by loud acclamations of joy.

In conſequence of petitions from ſeveral of the capital trading towns in England, a bill was paſſed this ſeſſion for opening free ports under certain reſtrictions in different parts of the Weſt-Indies.

The parliament continued ſitting till the ſixth of June, on wich day his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and put an end to the ſeſſion by a ſpeech from the throne, in which he ſaid that, "it was with "the utmoſt ſatisfaction he had obſerved the wiſ-"dom and moderation by which the parliament "had been uniformly guided, through the im-"portant deliberations in which they had been "engaged." His majeſty obſerved, that "the "many regulations which had been made for "extending and promoting the trade and manu-"factures of Great Britain, and for ſettling the "mutual intercourſe of his kingdoms and plantations, in ſuch a manner as to provide for the "improvement of the colonies, on a plan of due "ſubordination to the commercial intereſts of the "mother country, were the ſtrongeſt proofs of "their equitable and comprehenſive regard to the "welfare of all his dominions. He declared, that "it ſhould be his endeavour, that ſuch care be ta-"ken, as might tend to ſecure and improve the ad-"vantages which might be expected from ſuch wiſe "and ſalutary regulations."

On the 30th of July his majeſty was pleaſed to make the following changes in the miniſtry. The duke of Grafton was conſtituted firſt lord of the treaſury, in the room of the marquis of Rockingham; lord Cambden was created lord high-chancellor, in the room of the earl of Northington, made preſident of the council; the earl of Shelburne was made ſecretary of ſtate in the room of the duke of Richmond; Mr. Pitt was created earl of Chatham, and made lord privy ſeal; and Mr. Townſhend was appointed chancellor of the exchequer, in the room of Mr. Dowdeſwell.

On the firſt of October the princeſs Caroline Matilda, youngeſt daughter of the late prince of Wales, and ſiſter to his majeſty, was married by proxy at St. James's to the king of Denmark, and next day ſet out for Harwich. She was accompanied by her royal brother the duke of Glouceſter, and on the 18th of the ſame month ſhe arrived in ſafety at Altena, where ſhe was met by his Daniſh majeſty, and the nuptials were ſolemnized according to the form of the Lutheran church.

During the courſe of the ſummer, the poor in divers parts of the kingdom aſſembled in a riotous manner on account of the exceeding high price of proviſions. They deſtroyed the mills, ſeized on the corn and other proviſions which they ſold at a moderate price, and delivered the produce to the owners. At ſome places they were much more violent, for, inſtead of purſuing the above meaſures, they ripped open ſacks and ſcattered the corn about, ſeized various commodities in the ſhops which they threw into the ſtreets, and behaved in the moſt outrageous manner.

The parliament met on the 11th of November, and there having been great complaints concerning the high price of proviſions, and inſurrections in different parts of the country, his majeſty recommended the ſtate of the nation to both houſes, and deſired that they would, in their deliberations, fix on ſome plan for the relief of his diſtreſſed ſubjects.

He told them, that the diſcontents among the people had led them to commit many acts of violence on the reſt of their fellow-ſubjects, from miſtaken notions that they had been the voluntary cauſe of all their ſufferings. That, contrary to his own inclinations, but conſiſtent with the neceſſity he was under to ſupport the dignity of government, he had iſſued ſpecial commiſſions for the trials of the rioters, that the public peace might be preſerved, and the minds of the lower claſs of people ſo much intimidated, that they would be afraid to offend. He added, that he had concluded a commercial treaty with the empreſs of Ruſſia, which he hoped would be of great benefit to his ſubjects; and took notice of the marriage of his ſiſter to the king of Denmark, a circumſtance that would ſtrengthen the proteſtant intereſt. He concluded, by telling the commons that he confided in their wiſdom and fidelity for raiſing the ſupplies, and recommended unanimity to all the members.

After the moſt ſtrenuous oppoſitions from the diſcarded party, it was agreed upon, by a great majority in both houſes, that addreſſes of thanks ſhould be preſented to his majeſty, and then they adjourned till after the holidays.

A. D. 1767. The firſt object that attracted the notice of parliament this ſeſſions, was the ſtate of the Eaſt-India company, which was now become extremely rich, and actually exerciſed a ſovereign authority over their ſettlements. To the then miniſtry ſuch a circumſtance muſt have been very alarming; and therefore a committee was appointed to examine into the affair. The charter of the company was ordered to be produced, and that a perfect knowledge might be obtained of every thing relating to their tranſactions, they were obliged to deliver up to the houſe the originals of ſuch treaties as they had entered into with the princes in the Eaſt-Indies; and alſo an account of all the expences incurred by the government for the ſupport of the company.

That the public in general might form a judgment of the rectitude of theſe proceedings on the part of adminiſtration, all theſe papers were printed and publiſhed. The queſtion ſtated by them was, "What right had the Eaſt-India "company to territorial juriſdiction?"

Though by their charter they were even excluded from making any conqueſts, it appeared that they had ſubdued ſeveral princes in India, and annexed their dominions to their own ſettlements. It was urged further, that ſuch powers veſted in a corporate body of merchants was inconſiſtent with the nature of government, derogatory to the dignity of the crown, and injurious to the generality of the ſubjects. That if government was to ſupport them, then all thoſe acquiſitions of territory became the property of the crown, otherwiſe a principle would take place ſimilar to that in the feudal law, where regalities were eſtabliſhed, and the chief enjoyed a commutative juriſdiction with the ſovereign. That ſuch practices would contribute towards the promoting confuſion among all ranks of ſubjects, and might, in the end, lead us back to a ſtate of barbarity, equal to that in which our predeceſſors were many hundred years ago.

Thoſe who contended for the rights of the company advanced, that the words of the charter were general, and therefore the notion of acquiſitions was implied by inferences drawn from conſequences, without an aſſigned ſpecification. That by ſuch a chain of reaſoning, all the new ſettlements made in America, beyond thoſe that were ſpecified in the charters, might be claimed by the crown, although it was evident, that they were private property. That people who went to ſettle in foreign parts, eſpecially among uncultivated ſavages, were obliged, for their own ſafety, to extend the bounds of their territories; and if the government was at ſome trifling expence in ſupporting them, it was no more than what they owed to the ſubjects in general. It was further urged, that if the crown had any claim on the company, the courts of law were open, where there was not the leaſt doubt but juſtice would be done to all parties; and as the houſe of commons was not a court of judicature, ſo it had no right to meddle with points of law, nor could it decide on any legal privileges. That if ever ſuch an event ſhould take place, as that of the commons aſſuming a power to judge in matters of law, it would prove fatal to the ſubjects in general, who would chuſe that their reſpective properties ſhould be intruſted in other hands.

The diſputes were carried on with great warmth by both parties, and the reſult was, that the company ſhould, during the ſpace of two years enſuing, pay a certain ſum to government; and that no dividend of their ſtock ſhould be made without the conſent of a general court of proprietors.

On the 24th of June his majeſty put an end to the ſeſſions of parliament, and on the 17th of September following, his royal highneſs the duke of York, who had gone abroad in order to make the tour of Italy, died at Monaco, a ſmall diſtrict a little beyond Provence.

A very remarkable event this year took place on the continent. It is well known that Italy, once the ſeat of learning, has been for many ages the mother and nurſe of ſuperſtition; and from thence originated all thoſe ridiculous ceremonies that debaſed the chriſtian religion, and made it reſemble the groſſeſt paganiſm.

It is obſervable that, for ſome time, popery had been loſing ground in thoſe countries where it is by law eſtabliſhed, and increaſing where it was prohibited, owing to the diſgrace into which the jeſuits had brought themſelves. That ſociety had been eſtabliſhed above two hundred years, and in that time had ariſen to ſuch fame, that they became objects of jealouſy, and even reſentment to the other orders. It is true, they were become ſo affluent that even princes might have looked upon them as dangerous rivals; but that was not the ſole cauſe of their ruin. It had been a conſtant practice tice with princes, and other great men, to make them their confeſſors; and it is well known, that he who acts the part of a confeſſor to a prince may, with propriety, be conſidered as his prime miniſter. All ſecrets had been truſted with them, and as ſome of them were, at the ſame time, confeſſors to thoſe in oppoſite intereſts, jealouſies took place; and the king of Portugal, having been attacked in his carriage in conſequence of a plan laid by theſe fathers, reſolved to baniſh them out of his dominions. This happened ſome years before this period, and Spain now followed the example of Portugal, by baniſhing the jeſuits out of all their dominions, whether in Europe or America.

It was natural to ſuppoſe, that they would have found an aſylum in Italy, and they did ſo for ſome time; but during the former part of this year they were baniſhed from Naples and Parma, and all their eſtates confiſcated. Under various characters, ſuch as thoſe of tutors, clerks, ſurgeons, &c. many of them have ſettled in proteſtant countries; but it is to be hoped, that parents and guardians will take care to prevent youth from being ſeduced by their artful inſinuations.

This year the empreſs of Ruſſia had ſummoned all the learned men in her empire to aſſemble at Moſcow, in order to compile a code of laws, which was the more neceſſary, as many of the provinces conſiſted of ſubjects governed by different laws, and theſe frequently claſhing with each other, contributed towards injuring claimants to private property, and retarded the regular courſe of diſtributive juſtice.

In Poland, the diet once more aſſembled, but as it was impoſſible to bring the contending parties to an agreement, the nobles, who were at the head of the diſſidents, formed themſelves into a ſeparate body for their own preſervation.

The attention of all the people in Europe was, this year, directed to Corſica, an iſland in the Mediterranean, almoſt adjoining to the iſland of Sardinia. It is extremely fertile and populous, and, ſome centuries ago, had been given by the pope to the republic of Piſa; but the Genoeſe took it, and for many years treated the inhabitants in the moſt arbitrary and cruel manner. The ſpirit of liberty, however, was not extinct; it wanted only the breath of an hero to kindle it; and ſuch a one was found in the perſon of the famous Paoli, a native of the iſland, but who had travelled into other countries, where he had learned the art of war. The prudence and valour of that hero will be tranſmitted to the lateſt ages; but we ſhall ſee in the ſequel that, overpowered by numbers, he was obliged to abandon the iſland.

On the 24th of November the parliament was opened by his majeſty with a ſpeech, in which he told them, that he had aſſembled them at ſo early a period, that they might have time to deliberate with ſteadineſs and judgment; and, in particular, recommended to them the ſtate of the nation with reſpect to the price of proviſions.

The firſt, and indeed the principal ſubject that engaged the attention of both houſes was of ſuch a nature, that nothing equal to it had happened ſince the revolution. The dreadful hardſhips to which the poor had been reduced by the exorbitant price of proviſions became a matter of ſerious conſideration; and petitions having been preſented to his majeſty during the receſs of parliament, a proclamation was iſſued, prohibiting the exportation of corn for a limited time.

This proclamation, expedient as it was at ſo alarming a criſis, occaſioned violent debates; the miniſtry contending for an occaſional diſpenſing power in the crown, eſpecially on principles of humanity; the oppoſite party maintaining that the doctrine of neceſſity had, in various inſtances, been productive of the greateſt political evils, and aſſerting that as there was an act of parliament allowing the free exportation of corn while at or under a ſpecified price, the proclamation was conſequently unconſtitutional. Such was the ſubſtance of the arguments on this important point, from which the only inference that candour can draw, as juſtified by the laws of God and Nature, is, that to do a great right, men may do a little wrong.

A. D. 1768. The public buſineſs of this ſeſſion being brought to a concluſion, the king went to the houſe on the tenth of March, and having thanked the commons for their generouſly granting the ſupplies for the year, deſired them to preſerve peace among their neighbours in their counties and towns, eſpecially during the next general election. He then prorogued the parliament to the laſt day of March; but on the twelfth of April a proclamation was iſſued, whereby they were diſſolved.

On the 10th of May, (a period remarkable for the fatal cataſtrophe in St. George's Fields) the members of the new parliament were ſworn in, and the following day the commons having re-choſen Sir John Cuſt for their ſpeaker, the lord chancellor Cambden opened the ſeſſion by virtue of a commiſſion from his majeſty. Both houſes preſented loyal addreſſes to his majeſty, beſeeching him to put the laws in execution againſt all thoſe concerned in riots or tumults, as the growing price of proviſions had driven many of the lower claſſes of people to a ſtate of diſtraction, and ſeveral irregularities had been committed, eſpecially in Spital-fields; where many poor families not only ſtruggled under the dearth of proviſions, but were deſtitute of employment.

The other domeſtic tranſactions being not very intereſting, it may not be improper to advert to the affairs of the continent; and as there had long ſubſiſted a commercial intercourſe between Great Britain and Ruſſia, obſerve, that the czarina, compaſſionating the diſtreſſes of Poland, and exaſperated at the conduct of the French, in ſt rring up the Turks againſt that unhappy country, determined to eſpouſe its cauſe. This produced an open rupture between the Turks and Ruſſians, and engaged them in a war obſtinate, deſtructive, and bloody, which commanded the attention of all Europe.

During the month of Auguſt this year the French concluded a treaty with the republic of Genoa of a very extraordinary nature, and ſuch as ought to have been oppoſed by all the maritime ſtates in Europe. The brave Corſicans ſtill continued to defend thoſe rights which the Genoeſe ſought to deprive them of; and the latter, deſpairing of ever bringing them into ſubjection, agreed to give up that valuable iſland to the French king, upon condition of his ſending an army thither to ſubdue the people. It was deemed extremely impolitic in ſeveral ſtates to connive at the execution of ſuch a treaty, as if a war ſhould break out, the French would have an opportunity of ſending a ſwarm of privateers from Corſica, and to this iſland they could bring their prizes without being obliged to ſail to Marſeilles; ſo that the trade along the ſouth and weſt coaſt of Italy would be wholly their own.

The attention of the Engliſh miniſtry was now directed to America, where ſeveral diſturbances had had happened on account of ſome duties having been laid on glaſs, ſalt, and ſome other commodities imported from England. It was thought that the repeal of the ſtamp-act would have given ſome ſatisfaction to theſe people, but they ſtill inſiſted that it was their inherent privilege to tax themſelves.

At Boſton, the people met in a large body, and entered into ſeveral reſolutions not to import any goods of a ſuperfluous nature, but to attend to the ſtricteſt œconomy both in dreſs and furniture. A ſubſcription was opened for the encouragement of their own manufactures, and the eſtabliſhment of new ones. This was done to elude the payment of the duties upon ſuch articles as ſhould be ſent from England; and, at the ſame time, an aſſociation of perſons from all the old colonies was formed, in order to propoſe the moſt likely means to be uſed in preventing Engliſh acts of parliament from being put in force there, or in any other of the American provinces, or the Weſt-Indies.

The freeholders, and, in general, all the inhabitants of Maſſachuſet's Bay, had placed the greateſt confidence in their repreſentatives, and there was a continual conteſt between them and their governor. The earl of Shelburne had ſent over a letter to the governor, complaining of theſe abuſes, and it was read in the open aſſembly of the repreſentatives. This occaſioned moſt violent debates; and ſome of the members went ſo far as to declare, that the governor had miſrepreſented their conduct to the miniſtry. They denied the charges in the letter, and wrote to the earl of Shelburne on that ſubject, vindicating themſelves, and throwing the whole blame on the governor. At the ſame time, the merchants of Boſton ordered their agent to repreſent to the lords of the treaſury, that unleſs theſe duties, which had occaſioned ſo much miſchief, were taken off, the trade of the province would be deſtroyed, as they ſeemed to them contrary to the ſpirit of the conſtitution, and inconſiſtent with their charter. Theſe repreſentations occaſioned the eſtabliſhment of a new officer, who was to act as ſecretary of ſtate for the colonies in America; and the firſt perſon made choice of was the earl of Hilliſborough, at that time firſt lord of trade. His lordſhip, immediately on his appointment, ſent circular letters to the governors of the provinces, informing them, that his majeſty was highly diſpleaſed at the conduct of the people, as it was apt to create confuſion, and throw every thing into the utmoſt diſorder. He ſaid, that their conduct in oppoſing the legiſlative power of Great Britain was little better than an act of open rebellion; for, by giving encouragement to ſuch practices, the government would be overturned, and no regard paid to the laws. He concluded by recommending to them to preſerve the public peace, by puniſhing all diſorders of an evil tendency; but as to mere oppoſition in words, or in ſcandalous libels, they were to treat them with contempt.

Governor Barnard, in concurrence, doubtleſs, with inſtructions from the power under which he held his office, not only diſſolved the aſſembly of repreſentatives, but inſiſted that, by a public act, their ſucceſſors ſhould diſavow their conduct. This was deemed a flagrant violation of the rights of the people, as it tended to annul the proceedings of the repreſentatives, in conſequence of the will and mandate of the conſtituents. They deſired to ſee a copy of the governor's inſtructions, which was granted them, and, to their ſurprize, they found, that in caſe they refuſed to comply, they were to be diſſolved, and an account of their conduct ſent to England, in order to be laid before the houſe at the next ſeſſion of parliament.

This ſet the whole nation in a flame; and when the bill was brought in to paſs a cenſure on the conduct of the laſt aſſembly, ninety-two voted againſt it, and no more than ſeventeen for it. The reſt of the colonies took the alarm, and followed their example; while combinations were formed almoſt every where not to take any goods from England, except ſuch as were abſolutely neceſſary.

The diſcontents among the people of Boſton now broke out into open violence: for a ſhip having landed a cargo of wine, and taken on board another of oil, without paying any regard to the new laws by which the new cuſtoms were to be regulated, the officers made a ſignal to the Romney man of war, who ſent her boats; and having cut down the maſts of the trading veſſel, hawled her along-ſide of the king's ſhip. This was ſo ſeverely reſented by the populace, that they roſe in great numbers, demoliſhed the houſes of the cuſtom-houſe officers, and laying hold of the commiſſioner's boat, dragged it on ſhore, and then ſet it on fire.

While theſe diſorders continued in the town, the governor diſſolved the aſſembly; but that had not the deſired effect, for the diſturbances increaſed every day, ſo that two regiments were ſent over from Ireland to ſupport the civil power. Their place, of rendezvous was to be at Halifax, in Nova-Scotia; and no ſooner had the people of Boſton received news that they were landed at that place, than they met, and choſe a preſident among themſelves, who was deputed to wait on the governor, to know for what reaſon, or with what view, his majeſty's forces were to be ſent among them. They deſired, at the ſame time, that a general aſſembly might be ſummoned to meet; but he refuſed to give them any ſatisfactory anſwer, and only told them, that it was their duty to break up their tumultuous meetings, and ſubmit quietly to the laws. He added, that as they ſeemed ignorant of the offence they had committed, he muſt freely tell them, that unleſs they ſubmitted to the government, he ſhould be obliged to treat them as rebels. From this time he refuſed to receive any meſſages from them; upon which they ſent a long detail of their grievances to London, in order to be laid before the miniſtry. In the mean time, the tranſports, with the two regiments, and a train of artillery, arrived from Halifax, and were quartered in the houſes of townſmen; but as the military laws did not extend to America, any farther than providing barracks for them, it was ordered by the governor that they ſhould have barrack proviſions, ſo as to be as little burthenſome to the people as poſſible. This part of the governor's conduct gave general ſatisfaction to ſuch of the people as were moderate in their ſentiments; but notwithſtanding, a great majority were ſtill diſcontented. They could not behold without jealouſy an armed force quartered amongſt them in time of peace; for, with reſpect to their late combinations, they conſidered them as efforts to maintain their freedom.

The domeſtic peace of England, during this ſummer, induced the king of Denmark to viſit his royal brother-in-law, our moſt gracious ſovereign. He was attended by moſt of his great officers of ſtate, and the utmoſt reſpect was paid to him by all ranks of people. His Daniſh majeſty gave orders for a maſquerade, which was one of the moſt magnificent nificent ever ſeen in England; and while the preparations for it were going on, he viſited Cambridge, where he was elegantly entertained in the hall of Trinity College. From thence he proceeded to York, Leeds, and Mancheſter; and, on his return to London, coming through Oxford, he was met by the whole univerſity in proceſſion. When he came to the ſenate-houſe, the public orator complimented him in a moſt elegant Latin ſpeech, to which his majeſty replied in the ſame language. He was then preſented with a diploma, as doctor of the civil and canon laws, and walked in his honorary robes along with the doctors and regents. In the beginning of October his Daniſh majeſty left England; and, much about the ſame time, ſeveral changes took place in the Engliſh miniſtry; indeed, the political ſtate of this country had, for ſeveral years, been of a very fluctuating nature.

On a review of tranſactions in the Eaſt-Indies during the cloſe of the former, and commencement of the preſent, year, a revolution was apprehended in the affairs of the India-company, which was now in a flouriſhing condition. Hyder Ally, a perſon who had ſerved ſome time as a common ſoldier, having received ſome affront from his officers, left the army, and raiſed a choſen band of followers, with a view of driving the Engliſh out of all their ſettlements in that part of the world. Although brought up in the moſt humble ſtation, he had all the qualities of a great general, which were only obſcured for want of a proper opportunity of diſplaying them to public view.

Such was the character of the man with whom the Engliſh had now to contend; and it muſt be acknowledged, that it required the greateſt ſkill to oppoſe him. He had conquered ſeveral provinces on the coaſt of Malabar, and, upon the whole, was conſidered as one of the moſt formidable princes in the eaſt. He was ſenſible, however, that the Eaſt-India company would be ſo powerfully ſupported, that policy muſt be added to force, otherwiſe he ſhould never be able to accompliſh his ſchemes. Accordingly, he brought over the Nizam of the Decan to his intereſt; and having raiſed a large body of forces, prepared to take the field. Colonel Smith, in the company's ſervice, was ſent to oppoſe this formidable alliance; and a moſt deſperate engagement enſued, in which Hyder Ally diſcovered all the courage and conduct of the braveſt general. He made his diſpoſitions with ſo much prudence, that it was no eaſy matter to attack him; ſo that colonel Smith, in order to avoid the force of his cannon, which galled the company's troops on the right, marched to a riſing ground on the left, and ſo turned his lines. The Aſiatic general rode from one place to another, to encourage his men; but at laſt they gave way, and the Engliſh continued purſuing them with great ſlaughter. All their cannon and ammunition fell into the hands of the Engliſh, beſides a vaſt quantity of treaſure; and the Nizam, perceiving the danger he was in from his connections with Hyder Ally, made peace with the company. This, however, did not put an end to the war; for Hyder Ally, finding himſelf deſerted by the Nizam, transferred the ſeat of action into a mountainous part of the country, where it was extremely difficult to attack him, as he was well acquainted with all the paſſages and defiles, and could defend himſelf even againſt ſuperiority of numbers.

At the cloſe of the year, the brave Corſicans aſſerted their deareſt rights with a ſpirit and intrepidity that would reflect honor upon the moſt renowned heros, who have adorned the page of hiſtory; for though the French had landed there with a numerous army, they diſputed the ground with them inch by inch. Paoli had ſome hopes of aſſiſtance from England, and, for that purpoſe, ſent notice of his diſtreſs to our miniſtry by one Mr. Boſwell, a young gentleman with whom he had become acquainted while on his travels: but no aſſiſtance being given him, he had nothing to depend on beſides the juſtice of his cauſe, and the bravery of his countrymen. At firſt, the French obtained ſome conſiderable advantages; but the Corſicans killed ſuch vaſt numbers of them in ſtraggling parties, that had they not been continually reinforced by freſh ſuccours, the whole army that firſt landed would have been totally cut off. The Corſicans concealed themſelves in buſhes and caves near the roads where the enemy were to paſs, and galled them ſo much, that many deſerted, while ſuch as fell into the hands of the Corſicans, as priſoners, were inſtantly put to death. Some perſons may blame the conduct of the Corſicans on this occaſion, as inconſiſtent with the law of nations; but the peculiarity of their circumſtances muſt plead in their behalf. They had been ſo much oppreſſed by the Genoeſe, that they had, conſiſtent with the opinions of the beſt writers on natural law, aſſerted their own freedom; and when the republic of Genoa found that they could not again reduce them to a ſtate of ſubjection, they gave them up to the French, as if they had been a parcel of ſheep or oxen. The French, upon their landing in the iſland, commanded all the inhabitants to lay down their arms, and take an oath of allegiance to their ſovereign, otherwiſe they were to be treated as rebels. Thus theſe innocent people, knowing that no mercy was to be ſhewn to ſuch of themſelves as were taken priſoners, reſolved to treat the French in the ſame manner, and ſell their lives and liberty as dear as poſſible. Such was the ſtate of the Corſicans; and their putting the French priſoners to death was no more than an act of retaliation, which ſtands juſtified by the beſt authors on the law of nations.

Paoli, who ſtill hoped for aſſiſtance from England, as well as from ſome of the other European powers, called an aſſembly of the Corſican chiefs, and aſked their opinion concerning the moſt proper methods to be uſed in the proſecution of the war. He laid before them all the papers which the French had cauſed to be diſtributed throughout the iſland; but no ſooner did the chiefs perceive that they were looked upon as vaſſals to the crown of France, than they tore them into a thouſand pieces.

Although this campaign was but ſhort, yet ſo great was the loſs the French ſuſtained, that notwithſtanding the new reinforcements which were daily ſent them, they were on the point of being totally routed. Adjoining to Corſica are ſome ſmall iſlands; and as the harbours of them were ſafe and commodious, ſo the Corſican privateers prevented, in a great meaſure, the enemy from receiving ſuch ſupplies as had been ſent them from France. This induced the French, in the month of November this year, to embark a conſiderable body of forces on board thirteen tranſports, in order to attack theſe ſmall iſlands.

Their firſt attack was made on the iſland of Pietra; but although they made good their landing, they were repulſed with great loſs by a few Corſicans, who, animated by the love of liberty, fought moſt gallantly. From thence the French proceeded to Iſola Roſſa, another iſland, where the Corſicans kept their magazines, and attacked it with with great fury. At firſt the Corſicans were driven from their poſts; but no ſooner had recovered from their firſt ſurprize, than they faced about, and not only recovered the poſts they had loſt, but drove the enemy, with great ſlaughter, back to their ſhips. About nine hundred of the French were killed in this fruitleſs expedition, and their general began to deſpair of ever taking the iſland.

The Engliſh miniſtry had for a conſiderable time been rather in a ſtate of embarraſſment: unanimity was wanting in their councils and reſolution in their conduct. A ſecret but very prevalent influence rendered their ſchemes abortive, which detracted from their popularity and expoſed them to rigid cenſure. They now ſuſtained an important loſs in the death of —— Townſhend, Eſq. chancellor of the exchequer, a ſtateſman of great ability and approved integrity. It pleaſed his majeſty, however, to make ſeveral changes: for lord North having ſucceeded the late chancellor of the exchequer, Mr. Thomas Townſhend was made paymaſter of the forces, earl Gower preſident of the council, lord Weymouth one of the ſecretaries of ſtate, and Mr. Rigby was appointed one of the vice-treaſurers of Ireland.

On the twenty-fourth of November the parliament met, and his majeſty opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech, in which he obſerved that his reaſons for calling the members together at ſo early a period, was to give them time for their public deliberations; and, in particular, it was recommended to them to promote our commercial intereſts in America, and other parts of the world, as the ſole baſis of all our riches. He told them, that it gave him no ſmall concern to conſider that the other powers in Europe had not attended to the articles of peace ſo ſtrictly as was conſiſtent with the faith of treaties. His majeſty laid great ſtreſs on the conduct of the Americans; and it was even ſaid that Boſton was in an actual ſtate of diſobedience to all manner of government; that they had proceeded to meaſures ſubverſive of the conſtitution, and attended with circumſtances which manifeſted a diſpoſition to throw off their dependence on Great-Britain. He concluded by recommending harmony among the members, as the only ſure way of promoting the national intereſt, both at home and abroad.

A bill was brought in to prevent the exportation of coin for a limited time, which, after long debates, paſſed into an act, to the honour of humanity and the relief of the poor.

A. D. 1769. On the nineteenth of January the parliament met, after their adjournment during the holidays; and the firſt thing taken into conſideration was the ſtate of public affairs in America. A petition was preſented, ſigned by Mr. Darnforth, preſident of the council at Boſton, praying that the revenue acts might be repealed. The petition was penned in the moſt modeſt manner, with a promiſe, that if theſe acts were repealed, the people would make an ample compenſation, by taxing themſelves. Great debates aroſe in both houſes concerning the petition, thoſe of the anti-miniſterial party making uſe of the ſame arguments which had been urged in the debate concerning the ſtamp-act.

The lords agreed to addreſs his majeſty on the American affairs; and their reſolution being adhered to by the commons, became the joint act of both. By theſe reſolutions it was declared, that all the acts made in the different colonies, which tended towards throwing off the ſovereignty of the Britiſh parliament, were illegal, unconſtitutional, and derogatory to the crown and dignity of his majeſty. It was farther reſolved, that the town of Boſton was in a ſtate of the utmoſt diſorder and confuſion, diſturbed by riots and tumults of a dangerous nature, in which the officers of the revenue had been obſtructed in the diſcharge of their duty, and their lives endangered: that neither the council of the province, nor the ordinary magiſtrates, had exerted their authority for ſuppreſſing theſe riots and tumults; and that the execution of the laws would be rendered abortive, without the aſſiſtance of a military force to ſupport the civil power, and protect the officers of the cuſtoms: that the reſolutions of the town meetings in Boſton were unconſtitutional, and calculated to excite ſedition and inſurrection againſt the government. It was alſo agreed to by both houſes, that all thoſe who had written circular letters to the other colonies were guilty of an high indignity to the crown, and that they had committed a daring inſult on the legiſlative powers of Great-Britain. In the end, his majeſty was deſired to iſſue a ſpecial commiſſion, to enquire into the cauſes of theſe diſorders, according to the ſtatute 30th of Henry VIII. The debates on this occaſion, with reſpect to his majeſty granting writs of habeas corpus, to bring over the perſons concerned in the riots, to be tried in England by virtue of ſpecial commiſſions, was ſtrongly and learnedly oppoſed in both houſes. It was ſaid by thoſe who oppoſed the bill, that the laws already made for the preſervation of the Britiſh rights over the colonies were ſo complete, that there was no reaſon for an amendment: that the miniſtry, having loſt all credit with the people, wanted to make the cauſe of the Americans their own, by eſtabliſhing their authority on the ruin of the colonies: that, with reſpect to bringing priſoners over from America, to be tried here for crimes ſuppoſed to have been committed there, was contrary to the ſpirit of the Engliſh conſtitution. A man charged with a crime in England, is uſually tried in the county where it is ſaid to have been committed; for this reaſon, that thoſe who carry on the proſecution may have it in their power to produce proper evidence, and that the accuſed perſon may likewiſe be able to vindicate himſelf, if innocent. But if an American was brought over here to be tried, it would be next to impoſſible for him to produce one ſingle witneſs, although he might be entirely innocent. If an American has committed any breach of the laws, let him be tried there, where juſtice can be done to both parties. It was farther urged, and repreſented as a ſtrange meaſure on this occaſion, to drag out of obſcurity an obſolete law, which was a diſhonour to the ſtatute-books: that it was made during the reign of a tyrant, to ſerve the moſt arbitrary purpoſes, becauſe our conſtitution of government had not then arrived at a ſtate of perfection: that when the above act was made, we had not one colony in America, for it had then only been recently diſcovered; and that it would be much to the honour of the legiſlative power, to expunge from the records all ſuch iniquitous ſtatutes as that already mentioned: that it was the duty of all thoſe in power to promote the intereſts of the people, both at home and abroad; but if the above meaſure was carried into execution, it would increaſe the ſeditions complained of in the colonies, and, conſequently, injure the trade of the mother-mother-country. They concluded by calling upon the miniſtry to produce the perſon who had adviſed his majeſty to put the above act in force.

Such were the arguments made uſe of by thoſe who oppoſed adminiſtration, and it was preſumed they were very rational, and conſiſtent with the ſpirit of our moſt excellent conſtitution. The miniſtry were ſo ſenſible of the error they had committed, that they became weak and languid in their anſwers. They referred back to the repeal of the ſtamp-act, and imputed all the troubles which had happened in America to the ill-judged lenity ſhewn on that occaſion: they urged that nothing but the vigorous uſe of coercive authority could ever reduce them to obedience, and convince them of the neceſſity of their dependence on the mother-country: that unleſs this meaſure was adopted, the moſt flagrant acts of treaſon and rebellion, with all other public crimes, might be committed with impunity: that ſuch crimes had already been committed, and being attended with ſeveral circumſtances of an aggravating nature, the perpetrators were not objects of compaſſion: that, with reſpect to there being no colonies in America when the act of Henry VIII. was made, it did not in the leaſt apply to the argument in hand, for the act was made for the trial of all his majeſty's ſubjects who ſhould happen to commit crimes in any part of the world. For example; ſuppoſing a ſhip lying at anchor near an iſland not belonging to Britain, and two perſons go on ſhore, fight, and one of them is killed; then, by the above act, a ſpecial commiſſion is granted by the king for the trial of the offender, in whatever country he pleaſes. And, in proof of this doctrine, they mentioned an inſtance of a man of war lying at anchor in the Baltic, in 1720; and a quarrel happening between the lieutenant and the ſurgeon, they went on ſhore, fought, and the former was killed. Upon the ſhip's arrival in England, a ſpecial commiſſion was granted for the trial of the ſurgeon, who, being found guilty, was executed at Tyburn. They concluded by taking notice, that the revival of the act was not to promote puniſhment, but to preſerve peace; and that the coloniſts, ſeeing the vigorous meaſures which the government intended to purſue, might be brought back to a ſenſe of their duty. Such were the hopes of adminiſtration at that time; but experience, as will appear in the ſequel, has convinced us, that they were wrong in their conjectures.

While the parliament were debating on the affairs of America, Mr. Wilkes publiſhed a letter written by lord Barrington, ſecretary at war, to the chairman of the bench of juſtices for the county of Surry, to which he prefixed an introduction, that gave great offence to the upper-houſe, who voted it a ſcandalous and ſeditious libel.

Mr. Wilkes was brought to the bar of the houſe of commons, where he freely acknowledged that he had cauſed the letter to be publiſhed; upon which he was expelled the houſe, and a new writ iſſued for the election of a member to repreſent the county of Middleſex in his room. Mr. Wilkes was however unanimouſly rechoſen, and again expelled by the commons, who at the ſame time declared him incapable of being a member of that houſe.

On the 27th of February the great cauſe depending in the houſe of peers by way of appeal from the ſentence of the lords of ſeſſion in Scotland between the houſes of Hamilton and Douglas was finally determined in favour of the latter.

On the 13th of April a new election for the county of Middleſex came on at Brentford; when although Mr. Wilkes had a majority of 847 votes, he was rejected by the houſe of commons, and colonel Luttrell declared duly elected. This proceeding occaſioned violent debates, and was repreſented by the anti-miniſterial party as ſubverſive of the conſtitution: indeed, ſuch was the general opinion of the public, as appeared from a number of maſterly productions, as well as ſome ſingular efforts in vindication of their deareſt rights and privileges thus flagrantly invaded.

On the ninth of May his majeſty prorogued the parliament; and, in his ſpeech, told them, that every part of their conduct gave him the greateſt ſatisfaction. He applauded them in the warmeſt manner for having attended with ſo much care to the intereſts of the people, and the ſuppreſſion of riots and tumults, which had been ſo frequent, not only in London, but in many parts of the country. He added, that he had done all he could to bring about a negotiation between the Turks and Ruſſians, to no purpoſe; but he hoped the calamities of war would not extend to any other parts of Europe. He thanked the commons for having ſo generouſly contributed towards ſupporting the dignity of government; and promiſed, that, in the whole of his conduct, he would attend to the moſt regular œconomy. Finally, he concluded by recommending them to promote peace among their neighbours ſo that public juſtice might not be obſtructed, and that a proper regard might be paid to the laws.

On the 24th of May the freeholders of Middleſex, who thought themſelves particularly injured by the deciſion of the houſe of commons in favour of Mr. Luttrell, preſented the following petition to his majeſty:

" Moſt gracious ſovereign,

" We your majeſty's dutiful, and loyal ſubjects, " the freeholders of the county of Middleſex, beg " leave, with all affectionate ſubmiſſion and humility, to throw ourſelves at your royal feet, and " humbly to implore your paternal attention to " thoſe grievances of which this county and the " whole nation complain, and thoſe fearful ap- " prehenſions with which the whole Britiſh empire " is moſt juſtly alarmed.

" With great grief and ſorrow, we have long " beheld the endeavours of certain evil-minded " perſons, who attempt to infuſe into your royal " mind, notions and opinions of the moſt dange- " rous and pernicious tendency, and who promote " and council ſuch meaſures as cannot fail to de- " ſtroy that harmony and confidence, which ſhould " ever ſubſiſt between a juſt and virtuous prince " and a free and loyal people.

" For this diſſaffected purpoſe, they have intro- " duced into every part of the adminiſtration of " our happy legal conſtitution, a certain, unli- " mitted and indefinite diſcretionary power; to " prevent which is the ſole aim of all our laws, " and was the ſole cauſe of all thoſe diſturbances " and revolutions which formerly diſtracted this " unhappy country; for our anceſtors, by their " own fatal experience, well knew, that in a ſtate " where diſcretion begins, law, liberty, and ſafety " end. " to the lateſt poſterity."

The city of London and moſt of the counties in England followed the example of Middleſex, and preſented petitions and remonſtrances to the throne, but the only anſwer they all received was, that his majeſty would do nothing without the conſent of his parliament.

This year the pope died at Rome in a very advanced age, and was ſucceeded by cardinal Gangenelli, who aſſumed the name of Clement XIV. He had been brought up, from his moſt early youth, for the church; and, to an univerſal acquaintance with learning in general, he had added moderation in his conduct; and was an enemy to all combinations among princes, which tend to prolong civil diſturbances. He endeared himſelf to the people of Rome, by iſſuing orders for lowering the prices of proviſions; and he ſuppreſſed the cuſtom, ſo long in uſe with his predeceſſors, to oblige all foreign ambaſſadors to kiſs his toe.

A. D. 1770. The parliament met on the 9th of January, and the ſeſſion was opened with a ſpeech from the throne, in which not the leaſt notice was taken of the petitions and remonſtrances from the different counties relative to the Middleſex election. The principal things pointed out were, the diſtracted ſtate of America, and the diſtemper which had broke out among the horned cattle. The former was, in the ſtrongeſt terms, recommended to their ſerious attention, as a thing of the utmoſt importance to the dignity of government. The other was mentioned as a moſt dreadful calamity to the nation in general; and it was recommended to every one to exert themſelves in endeavouring to put a ſtop to the infection, before it ſhould ſpread any farther.

This ſpeech was ſeverely handled by the public in general, who thought that nothing ſhould have been ſo much touched on as the petitions and remonſtrances. Ridicule was circulated with great freedom, eſpecially as the exiſtence of the diſtemper among the horned cattle was not believed to be of ſo univerſal a nature as had been inſinuated and repreſented.

It was immediately moved by the miniſtry, that an addreſs ſhould be preſented to the throne; upon which a moſt violent debate aroſe, but it was carried by a very conſiderable majority.

Before any buſineſs of importance was undertaken, ſome very remarkable changes took place in the miniſtry. Lord Camden reſigned the ſeals, and the honourable Charles York was created chancellor in his room, but he died within three days afterwards; and then the chancery was put into commiſſion, the ſeals being delivered to baron Smythe, and the juſtices Bathurſt and Aſton. The marquis of Granby reſigned all his places, except the royal regiment of blues, and was ſucceeded as maſter of the ordinance by general Conway. The duke of Beaufort reſigned the place of maſter of the horſe to the queen; the earl of Huntingdon his place of groom of the ſtole; and the duke of Mancheſter, with the earl of Coventry, their places of lords of the bed-chamber. The earl of Briſtol ſucceeded lord Chatham as lord privy ſeal. Mr. Dunning, the ſolicitor-general, and Mr. Grenville, one of the vice-treaſurers of Ireland, reſigned at the ſame time. Sir John Cuſt, ſpeaker of the houſe of commons alſo reſigned; but that was owing to his age and infirm ſtate of health. In his room was elected Sir Fletcher Norton, a gentleman who had made a very diſtinguiſhing figure at the bar.

Within a week after theſe changes had taken place, the duke of Grafton reſigned the place of firſt lord of the treaſury, and was ſucceeded by lord North, who had been ſome time chancellor of the exchequer.

The firſt thing that came before the commons was an enquiry into the validity of the Middleſex election; but after warm debates it was held, that no court of law was to meddle with any of their rules and orders. This meaſure aſtoniſhed the whole nation, and many perſons began to look upon the houſe of commons as a ſtanding council for the crown. Nor was this important ſubject agitated with leſs heat in the houſe of lords. The earl of Chatham with lord Camden, and many other peers, oppoſed it with great ſtrength of argument, and produced proofs from many of our law books, and parliamentary journals, that no ſuch ſtep had ever been taken, not even in the moſt deſpotic reigns. But notwithſtanding the force of theſe arguments, miniſterial intereſt prevailed, and the proceedings of the houſe of commons, in the affair of the Middleſex election, were all voted juſt and equitable.

A motion was made to bring in a bill to diſqualify certain officers of the revenues from voting for members of parliament. It was ſaid by thoſe who ſupported the motion, that at the revolution the produce of the cuſtoms and exciſe were both extremely ſmall, nor was there at that time any probability that they would ever amount to the enormous ſum of ſix millions ſterling, as they then actually did. To this they attributed the inattention of the ſenators of that age, who, if they had foreſeen the unconſtitutional weight that muſt have been thrown into the ſcale on the ſide of the crown, by the appointment of officers to collect ſo vaſt a revenue, they would undoubtedly have taken proper and effectual meaſures to prevent the dangerous influence which it muſt afford, in the election of repreſentatives of the people.

On the other ſide it was urged, that the bill was altogether unneceſſary, and in its own nature extremely cruel. That it was no leſs than the diſfranchiſing a great number of men who had long enjoyed that privilege; and as the motion then ſtood, it might extend to all the officers under the crown. It was added, that no evidence had been

ſo much as ſuggeſted of any undue influence uſed by the crown, and therefore the motion was rejected by a very great majority.

The popular party, having loſt this motion, deſired that all the papers, containing a liſt of the expences of government, ſhould be laid before them. It was ſaid in ſupport of the motion, that the civil-liſt revenue if miſapplied, inſtead of maintaining the dignity of the crown, ſerved only to beſiege it with paraſites; and in the place of promoting arts and induſtry, to ſubvert the liberties of the people. That though the funds allotted for this purpoſe were fully adequate, not only to every neceſſary, but to every liberal expence, that was neceſſary to ſupport the dignity of the regal character; yet neither the greatneſs of the fund, nor the confeſſed œconomy of the times, were ſufficient to prevent an enormous debt from being contracted, and the people from being applied to for more money, at a time when many men in the kingdom were of opinion that too much had been granted already.

That neceſſary expences had been much more conſiderable in the latter reign than the preſent, becauſe the branches of the royal family were then grown up, and conſequently demanded larger allowances. The journies to the continent, however expedient, were frequent, and at times expenſive; and none would pretend to ſay, that magnificence was not as well underſtood, and perhaps better ſupported, than at preſent; yet his late majeſty not only lived within the bounds of the civil-liſt, but the ſum of one hundred and ſeventy thouſand pounds was wholly ſaved from that revenue.

That it was neither intended nor wiſhed, to limit the crown to a ſalary inadequate to its real dignity and greatneſs; for if it ſhould appear that the money had been ſpent in promoting uſeful purpoſes, thoſe who made the motion would be the firſt to give their approbation. But if on the contrary, it ſhould appear that the money had been ſquandered away among time-ſerving wretches, who ſought to ruin their country, then thoſe who adviſed ſuch meaſures ſhould be called to a ſevere account.

To this it was anſwered by thoſe who ſtood up for the miniſtry, that if an application had been now made for an additional ſum to make good any deficiency in the civil-liſt eſtabliſhment, an enquiry into the cauſes of it would be natural and juſtifiable; and it would be but reaſonable, that the miniſtry, in ſuch a circumſtance, ſhould give the utmoſt ſatisfaction to the people; nay, that it was even their duty to do ſo, and ſhew the reaſons why the proviſion already made was not ſufficient; but till ſuch a requiſition was made, it would be improper and very diſreſpectful to the crown, to ſcrutinize into the manner in which the money for the ſupport of the royal family had been expended. It was urged farther, that a certain ſum of money was allowed annually for the ſupport of the civil-liſt, and while the expences do not exceed that ſum, there can be no reaſon for making any enquiry. They concluded by taking notice, that as the civil liſt was the property of the crown, his majeſty had a right to diſpoſe of it in whatever manner he pleaſed. At laſt, the vote being put, the motion, like all others oppoſed by the miniſtry, was rejected by a great majority.

This affair being ended, the next thing was to take into conſideration the ſtate of the colonies in America. A petition had been preſented by the merchants trading to North-America, ſetting forth the great hardſhips they laboured under in conſequence of an act, by which a duty had been laid on ſome trifling articles exported from Great-Britain; and this had ſo much enraged the people, that they refuſed to purchaſe the goods, after they had been ſent there at a conſiderable expence. This affair being of a very ſerious nature, the houſe took it into conſideration, and repealed every part of it, except what related to tea, which was ſtill continued. The debates concerning this bill were managed with great force of argument on both ſides, for the popular party ſought a repeal of the whole, while the miniſtry inſiſted, that the Americans, inſtead of deſerving any ſuch indulgence, ought to have had more ſevere laws binding upon them.

While the greateſt part of the nation was agitated by reflecting on the conſequences that would reſult from theſe meaſures; while individuals were ſeeking to promote their private intereſts, and the government to eſtabliſh its authority, a bill was brought into the houſe of commons by one of the leading men in the oppoſition, for regulating the proceedings on controverted elections; a bill equally juſt and popular, and in which all the ſubjects of Great-Britain were more or leſs concerned. It will be proper to ſtate the nature of this bill, that the reader may be the better able to judge of its utility, and how far ſuch a law was, in a manner, abſolutely neceſſary.

It had been the cuſtom formerly in all conteſted elections, to refer the matter to a ſelect committee of the moſt learned and upright members in the houſe; and, in general, their opinion was ſeldom called in queſtion; but in time the committees had been enlarged, and all who came in having votes, a ſhameful partiality prevailed, which in the end induced thoſe, who thought themſelves injured, to apply for remedy at the bar of the houſe.

This method, however, was found to be very defective, and attended with many inconveniences, owing principally to the vaſt number of thoſe who were to try the cauſe in diſpute; and who, beſides being biaſſed by the ties of private friendſhip to the contending parties, were not bound by any oath to prevent ſuch influence from operating on their minds.

At the ſame time, the method of trying theſe cauſes at the bar became an obſtacle to many branches of public buſineſs, eſpecially in the firſt ſeſſion of a new parliament, when there was ſcarce time to attend to any thing elſe. It was at the ſame time very diſagreeable to the members themſelves, who were continually teazed with applications in favour of both candidates, that they would give their attendance, and although it was not ſaid that they were to vote contrary to truth and equity, yet their attendance was conſidered as equivalent to their approbation. To all this it might be added, that as the miniſtry had always a majority on their ſide to ſupport them in all their meaſures, ſo if they choſe to ſtand up in defence of any one of the candidates, they could, by promiſes and threats, get a ſufficient number to vote him the ſitting member.

To remedy theſe defects this bill was brought in, and the plan of it was conſiſtent with the firſt principles of the conſtitution. When a petition was to be preſented, a day was to be fixed for hearing both parties, who were to attend with their witneſſes and council; and if one hundred members were not preſent, then they were to wait till ſuch time as ſo many were preſent; when the names of the whole, although they ſhould exceed that number, were to be put into ſix boxes or glaſſes, to be drawn alter-alternately and read by the ſpeaker, till forty-nine are choſen; the ſitting member and the petitioner being allowed to chuſe one each. Liſts were then to be given to the ſitting member, the petitioner, councils, witneſſes, &c. who, with the clerk, were to withdraw, and ſtrike off one alternately till the number ſhould be reduced to thirteen; who, with the two named by the parties, were to make a committee to determine the affair in diſpute. Such was the nature of this new bill, and it muſt be acknowledged that nothing could be more juſt or equitable for the freedom of elections; and every meaſure uſed to prevent corruption and bribery muſt, at all times, be the life of the Britiſh conſtitution.

While the houſe of commons were engaged on this grand ſubject, the city of London met in their common-hall, and agreed upon another petition, addreſs and remonſtrance, for redreſs of their grievances in the affair of the Middleſex election. In this addreſs it was expreſsly declared, that the houſe of commons had acted in the moſt unconſtitutional manner, and therefore they prayed that they might be diſſolved; that the people might be left at liberty to make a free choice. In anſwer to this, his majeſty told them, that he had never done any thing but by the advice and conſent of his parliament, and therefore he could not comply with their requeſt.

Violent diſputes aroſe in parliament on this affair, and many opprobrious expreſſions were made uſe of on both ſides. It was ſaid that the citizens of London were the ſupport of the government on every occaſion; that it had been the cuſtom, time immemorial, to conſult them on the moſt important matters; to which the miniſtry anſwered, that no affront had been offered to the citizens of London, nor any thing denied them, except ſuch as was in its own nature improper to be granted.

Near the cloſe of this ſeſſion of parliament, ſeveral propoſals were made in the houſe of lords relating to the ſtate of affairs in America; which were chiefly ſupported by the duke of Richmond. Theſe were introduced by ſome ſevere ſtrictures on the conduct of adminiſtration. He ſaid, that the ſtate of America had been recommended from the throne in a ſpeech at the opening of the ſeſſion, and yet the ſeſſion was near ſpent without any thing being done, though the buſineſs was of the utmoſt importance. The miniſtry were now ſenſible that they had been too raſh in recommending the care of America before any ſettled plan had been laid down; and therefore, perplexed to the utmoſt, they ſaw no other method left, but that of adjourning the debate till a future day, well knowing that the parliament would be prorogued.

On the nineteenth of May his majeſty went to the houſe, and cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he applauded them for the zeal they had ſhewn in ſupporting the intereſt and honour of the nation. He aſſured them, that he ſhould, on all occaſions, ſeek the happineſs of his people; and that it ſhould be the ſole object of his care, to watch over their intereſts. He concluded, by recommending to them the preſervation of public peace, and the diſcountenancing of tumultuous meetings of the people, which, if encouraged, muſt end in general confuſion.

Soon after the riſing of parliament, advices were received from America of a violent tumult at Boſton, in which ſome of the inhabitants were unfortunately killed, and others wounded by the ſoldiers. This tranſaction was beſt authenticated by captain Preſton, who happened to be officer of the guard on the very day it occurred. It appeared from captain Preſton's account, that the arrival of Britiſh ſoldiers in Boſton being extremely obnoxious to the inhabitants, they firſt uſed every means to promote deſertion, and afterwards had recourſe to the moſt palpable inſults. Several ſkirmiſhes then enſued between the ſoldiers and towns-people aided by the militia who came from the country to join their friends. At length captain Preſton received information of a determined attack on the troops, and as he was repairing to the main guard, he ſaw a number of people going towards the cuſtom-houſe. To prevent plundering, he ſent a non-commiſſioned officer and twelve men, and followed himſelf. The mob dared the ſoldiers to fire, which occaſioned ſome well behaved perſons to aſk the captain, if he intended to fire? He replied in the negative, but at that inſtant a ſoldier, exaſperated by a blow, fired. Repeated provocations cauſed others to follow the example; the mob then diſperſed after three had been killed on the ſpot, and ſeven or eight wounded. The captain was ſome time after tried at Boſton and honourably acquitted.

On the 22d of July, about four o'clock in the morning a moſt dreadful fire was diſcovered in the great dock-yard at Portſmouth. It burnt with the moſt rapid fury, and communicating itſelf with the hemp-houſe, and other offices, conſumed every thing before it. Whether this was an accident, or the work of ſome vile wretch and incendiary, has not yet been diſcovered, and perhaps never will. Some impoſtors, indeed, pretended to have been concerned in it, particularly one Dudley, who has ſince that time been tranſported for perjury; and the other, whoſe name was Britain, has been ſince executed for forgery. The moſt remarkable circumſtance attending this fatal affair was, the fire was diſcovered in five different places at once, which gave ſtrong ſuſpicions that more than one perſon muſt have been concerned; for accidental fires generally break out in one place only. Had this accident, or whatever it was, happened during the heat of the war, it might have proved fatal to the nation in general; for the whole loſs, amounting to one hundred and forty-nine thouſand, eight hundred and eighty-eight pounds, could not have been made good without great difficulty, till ſuch time as the parliament met. But even ſuppoſing one individual could have advanced it, yet the time neceſſary for replacing ſtores, might have given the enemy an opportunity of doing great injury to the place.

It is neceſſary here to obſerve, with reſpect to the fate of the war between the Ruſſians and the Turks, that the once famous city of Smyrna being in a very critical ſituation, and the inhabitants apprehending an attack from the Ruſſians every day; an Engliſh merchant was ſent to count Orlow the Ruſſian admiral, whom he found engaged in the ſiege of Lemnos, and by whom he was told, that he had ſtrict orders to protect the Chriſtians of all nations, but more particularly the Engliſh; becauſe there was a treaty of peace and commerce at that time ſubſiſting between them and the Engliſh. He diſmiſſed him with marks of the greateſt politeneſs, and told him, that he and the other gentlemen in the factories might make themſelves quite eaſy, as no harm ſhould happen to them.

In Corſica, during this year, the wretched inhabitants felt all the ſeverity of a French deſpotic government. Many of them ſtill refuſed to ſubmit, and ſuch of thoſe unhappy people as were taken, were inſtantly put to death. Some of them were tranſported to France; but this was little more than ſhifting the ſcene: for as in Corſica they beheld the ruin of their country, ſo in France they ſaw a whole nation of people ruined. But here their ſufferings did not end; for ſuch as were brought to France, after a journey of ſix hundred miles on foot from Marſeilles to Breſt, were put on board ſeveral veſſels and ſent as ſlaves to the Weſt-Indies.

This year a war was like to have broke out between Great Britain and Spain, on account of the following affair:

In the year 1592 captain Davies, who commanded an Engliſh man of war, ſailed to the South Seas, where he diſcovered ſome iſlands, ſince called Falklands; but little notice was taken of them for more than a century, till commodore Anſon, in his voyage round the world, diſcovered the importance they would be of to us, if properly cultivated. Accordingly, ſoon after the late peace, when lord Anſon was at the head of the admiralty, he mentioned the affair in council, and it was propoſed to ſend out ſome frigates to viſit them. This ſcheme, however, was not ſo well conducted, but the Spaniards got notice of it before it could be carried into execution; and ſuch remonſtrances were made by their ambaſſador at our court, that it was laid aſide.

It was again revived, however, in 1764, when commodore Byron was ſent out with a ſmall ſquadron to make diſcoveries, and, if poſſible, eſtabliſh a ſettlement on the coaſt of Patagonia. During that voyage, he took poſſeſſion of Falklands Iſlands in the name of his Britannic majeſty, with all the forms uſed on ſuch occaſions.

Much about this time the French, ſtimulated by their loſſes during the war, undertook an expedition of a ſimilar nature, namely, to make diſcoveries in the South Seas; and the care of it was committed to one M. de Bouganville, colonel of a regiment of foot. Having fitted out a frigate of twenty guns, with a ſloop to carry proviſions, he took on board one hundred ſeamen, and about one hundred and fifty people, who choſe to try their fortunes in that part of the world. The French ſhips ſet ſail from St. Malo, and arrived at the Canaries, where they were kindly received by the Spaniards, who gave them every ſort of aſſiſtance. From thence they proceeded to the river Plata, and took in freſh proviſions, the Spaniards ſtill continuing to treat them with every mark of reſpect. At length, they came to Falklands Iſlands, where they formed an eſtabliſhment, and built a ſmall fort.

Theſe French adventurers had formed the moſt ſanguine hopes from the diſcovery of theſe iſlands, but they did not anſwer their expectations; for it coſt them more money to ſupport their ſettlement than the profits ariſing from it could afford; ſo that they gave it up to the Spaniards in the moſt formal manner.

Theſe iſlands are ſituated in latitude 51 ſouth, and about one hundred leagues on this ſide the ſtreights of Magellan. The ſettlement, which had been given up by the French to the Spaniards, was on one of the iſlands that lay to the weſt, and was called Port Soliſad; and Port Egmont, belonging to the Engliſh, was one of the iſlands to the eaſtward. In the year 1769, we had a frigate and a ſloop upon that ſtation, and captain Hunt, in the Tartar frigate, being on a cruize, fell in with a Spaniſh ſchooner belonging to Port Soliſad, and, according to his orders, commanded the Spaniſh captain to depart, becauſe thoſe iſlands were the property of Great-Britain. Two days afterwards, the captain came on board the Tartar frigate with a letter to captain Hunt, written by the governor of Port Soliſad, telling him, that if he had been driven in there by ſtreſs of weather, he was ready to give him every aſſiſtance; but if he came there in violation of the faith of the moſt ſolemn treaties, he had far better depart immediately. Captain Hunt, not in the leaſt intimidated by theſe threatenings, aſſerted the right of his Britannic majeſty to theſe iſlands, and warned him to depart from them, giving him a fixed time for that purpoſe. The Spaniſh officer entered a formal proteſt againſt captain Hunt, and declared, that if he offered any inſult to the ſettlement at Port Soliſad, he ſhould conſider it as a breach of the peace, and tranſmit an account thereof to Spain. Soon after this affair, two Spaniſh frigates of conſiderable force arrived at Port Egmont, under pretence that they wanted freſh water; and the commander in chief ſent notice to captain Hunt, that he was aſtoniſhed to ſee the Engliſh flag hoiſted in an iſland that belonged to his maſter the king of Spain. He charged captain Hunt with violating the peace; declaring, at the ſame time, that he would ſend an account thereof to Spain, that his maſter might aſſert his right to thoſe iſlands which had been made over to him by treaty.

Captain Hunt ſtill continued to found his poſſeſſion on the claim of right, juſtified his conduct by the orders of his ſovereign, and again warned the Spaniards to depart from theſe iſlands. The frigates continued eight days at Port Egmont, and were ſupplied by our people with water: the captain and officers behaved with great civility, but they declined going on ſhore though they were ſeveral times invited. As theſe tranſactions ſeemed to indicate an approaching rupture, captain Hunt ſet ſail for England, and arriving at Plymouth on the third of June, ſent an expreſs to the lords of the admiralty. The Swift and Favourite ſloops of war, each bearing ſixteen guns, were left to take care of the ſettlement; but the Swift having ſailed as far as the ſtreights of Magellan, was overſet, and ſuch of the crew as could get into the boat, undertook a voyage of three weeks, which brought them to Port Egmont, after experiencing an innumerable variety of hardſhips. Five Spaniſh frigates arrived at Port Egmont, and captain Farmer, not doubting but they came with hoſtile intentions, reſolved to be upon his guard. He accordingly hoiſted his flag, which the Spaniſh commodore ſeeing, fired two ſhots, and being aſked what were his reaſons for ſo doing, he ſaid they were only by way of ſignals.

In the mean time captain Farmer wrote to the Spaniſh commodore, that as he had received the refreſhments he wanted, he was obliged in the name, and by the authority of his maſter, to command him to depart, and totally evacuate all thoſe iſlands known by the name of Falklands. In anſwer to this letter, the commodore put captain Farmer in mind of his great power, and how eaſy it was for him to deſtroy their defenceleſs ſettlement. He begged that he and the other Engliſh officers would not force him to any extremities, but depart quietly from the place, as the iſlands belonged to his maſter the king of Spain. Next day he wrote again, both to captain Farmer and captain Maltby, Maltby, telling them, that if they would depart peaceably they ſhould have leave to take all they had along with them from the ſettlement, and what they could not take, he ſhould give them a receipt for, that the whole affair might be ſettled by their reſpective courts. But on the other hand, if they refuſed to comply, he ſhould, contrary to his inclinations, be obliged to obey his orders, by attacking the ſettlement both by ſea and land; and that he would ſpread deſolation every where before him; for he had, under his command, a large body of marines, beſides a train of heavy artillery.

He concluded by aſſuring them, that if they did not, in fifteen minutes after the receipt of his letter, give him a plain and favourable anſwer, he would immediately commence hoſtilities; and, at the ſame time, deſired them to think of the dreadful conſequences which their obſtinacy would be productive of to the ſubjects of his Britannic majeſty.

To theſe, and all his other menaces, the Engliſh captains returned for anſwer, that words were not always conſidered as acts of hoſtilities; and that they could not believe that he would, in a time of profound peace, when the greateſt harmony ſubſiſted between the two nations, put his threats in execution: that he did not doubt but he was thoroughly convinced, that the king of Great-Britain, their maſter, was capable of demanding ſatisfaction throughout every part of the globe where any inſult was offered to his flag; and therefore they were, in conſequence of their orders, obliged to defend the place to the laſt extremity. Accordingly the Spaniſh commodore ordered the frigates to row cloſe to the ſhore, directly oppoſite the Block-houſe, where there was only a ſmall battery; and at night captain Maltby brought fifty ſeamen, belonging to the Favourite, on ſhore, with two ſix pounders, ten ſwivels, and a quantity of ſmall-arms and ammunition. Next morning, part of the Spaniſh troops and artillery landed about a mile to the northward of the Block-houſe; and when they had advanced about half a mile, the reſt of the boats, with the troops and artillery, put off from one of the Spaniſh frigates, and rowed right in for the cove, being covered by the fire from the frigates, whoſe ſhot went over the Block-houſe. The Engliſh ſeamen, who were then on ſhore, fired ſome ſmall ſhot; but ſeeing the utter impoſſibility of defending the ſettlement, and the Spaniards having broke through all the limits of peace, even to the actual commencement of hoſtilities, ſo that their conduct could neither be denied nor explained away, our officers, as they had judiciouſly led them to this open avowal of their conduct, and had, at the ſame time, ſupported the honour of their own country, as far as the means in their power would admit of, with the ſame propriety preferred ſaving the valuable lives of their people; and leaving the injury to be redreſſed by thoſe in power, they thought it moſt prudent to hang out a flag of truce, in order to know what terms of capitulation the Spaniſh commodore would grant.

All the conditions which he would grant were, that the Engliſh ſhould immediately, or as ſoon as poſſible, ſo as it did not exceed forty days, remove from the ſettlement, and what ſtores they left behind them ſhould be produced as ſoon as orders for that purpoſe arrived from Spain. This was one of the greateſt inſults, perhaps, that had ever been offered to the Britiſh flag; but the Engliſh, who had not ſtrength ſufficient to defend themſelves, were obliged to comply, and in September arrived at Portſmouth.

The miniſtry ſeemed to have taken the alarm at this intelligence, and, as if conſcious of their remiſſneſs in keeping the navy on a reſpectable footing, as the only bulwark of the nation, affected at leaſt a degree of diligence in that important purſuit. Preſs warrants were accordingly iſſued out, but their legality was oppoſed in the city by Mr. Croſby, the lord mayor, who refuſed to ſign the warrants, and Mr. Alderman Wilkes, who, without the leaſt heſitation, diſcharged a man that had been impreſſed, as wholly repugnant to the conſtitution, and a violation of the charter of the city of London.

The inſult thus offered to the Britiſh flag abroad was not without reaſon imputed by the diſintereſted and impartial part of the public to the very inadequate and inglorious peace to which miniſters had been induced to accede from principles neither popular nor plauſible. In a word, a general murmuring prevailed againſt paſt and preſent meaſures; however, ſuch was the power of miniſterial influence, as to bear down all oppoſition before it, notwithſtanding the united efforts of what were called the Rockingham and Shelburne parties.

On the 30th of November both houſes of parliament met at Weſtminſter, and the ſeſſion was opened by his majeſty with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he told them, that the Spaniſh governor of Buenos Ayres had acted in ſuch a manner as was inconſiſtent with the honour of Great-Britain, and demanded the utmoſt ſatisfaction: that, under theſe circumſtances, an immediate demand had been made for proper ſatisfaction, in conſequence of the injury received: that the neceſſary preparations had been made, without loſs of time, in order to be enabled to obtain juſtice, in caſe the requiſition to the the court of Spain ſhould fail in procuring it. An aſſurance was given, that theſe preparations ſhould not be diſcontinued, until proper reparation had been made; and that ſufficient proofs ſhould be given, that all other powers on the continent diſapproved of ſuch proceedings.

He ſaid he had called them together ſo early, that they might be ready to aſſiſt him with the beſt of their advice, and provide for the honour and ſecurity of the nation. With reſpect to the colonies in America, it was obſerved, that many of the factious people had deſiſted from thoſe combinations into which they had inadvertently entered, and which had been attended with many fatal conſequences to their peaceable fellow ſubjects: that the people of Boſton, and, in general, the inhabitants of the province of Maſſachuſet's Bay, could not yet be brought into a proper ſtate of obedience, but continued in carrying on the ſame violent and unwarrantable practices as before. He added, that the eſtimates for the preſent year would naturally exceed the former; and that it would be neither conſulting the inclinations nor the intereſts of his people, if they ſhould decline any expence that ſhould ſeem neceſſary towards promoting the national honour: that as to foreign meaſures, no doubt was held, that there could be any other conteſt, than who ſhould appear moſt forward in ſupport of the common cauſe, in upholding the reputation, and promoting the proſperity of the kingdom. He concluded by telling them, that the crown had no intereſt ſeparate from that of the people; that they were all members of the ſame body, and, conconſiſtent with the order of nature and the laws of ſociety, they muſt ſtand or fall together.

The addreſſes were the moſt ſpirited that had been preſented for ſome years; and the moſt unreſerved aſſurances were given, that every degree of requiſite ſupport ſhould be chearfully granted. The moſt unreſerved confidence was placed in his majeſty, that he would never be induced, by a miſtaken tenderneſs for the preſent eaſe of the people, to ſacrifice their moſt eſſential and laſting intereſts. The commons concluded by a declaration, that if any hopes had been conceived, or it ſhould have been any where ſurmiſed, that there were any ſuch differences ſubſiſting among the people, as could, in the leaſt degree, abate the ardour of their affectionate attachment to his majeſty, or prevent their joining, as one man, in maintaining unſullied the luſtre of the crown, and preſerving undiminiſhed the rights of the people, they would, by their proceedings, convince the world how falſe and ſcandalous all ſuch ſurmiſes were; and make it manifeſt, that whenever they were called upon in the cauſe of their king and country, there would be but one heart and one voice among them.

Although theſe addreſſes were carried by a vaſt majority, there aroſe conſiderable debates upon them. It was ſaid by thoſe in oppoſition, that as one inſult is always the fore-runner of others, ſo the preſent outrage offered by Spain was a natural conſequence of our paſſive and ſhameful conduct with regard to Corſica: that the ſpeech was an oſtentatious diſplay of miniſterial conduct, and the addreſs an approbation of it: that before ſuch a public approbation was given, it was neceſſary to know what that conduct had been, which merited ſuch applauſes: that it was neceſſary to know what the Spaniards had done, and what previous information our miniſtry had received of their deſigns: that by our conduct for twelve months paſt, it ſeemed as if we had not an enemy in the world; and yet, by the ſpeech, it was evident that a war was apprehended: the bad ſtate of our navy, and the defenceleſs manner in which the valuable iſland of Jamaica was left, were much inſiſted on, and with great force of argument: that, independent of any private intelligence, the accounts publicly avowed to have been received on the 3d of June, that the Spaniards had warned our people to depart from their ſettlement on Falklands Iſlands, was, in itſelf, a ſufficient indication of their ill deſigns, and of what was naturally to follow; but between that and the twenty-ſecond of September, when our people brought the account of the inſult on our flag, what had been done to put us in a ſtate of ſecurity at home, or enable us to protect our dominions abroad? Were the regiments completed, or was the navy manned and put in a proper condition? None of all theſe things were done, and yet we were to return thanks to the miniſtry, not for any thing, but only becauſe they had not done ſomething worſe than we were yet acquainted with.

It was farther inſiſted, that while the rights of the people were violated at home, it was abſurd to expect ſuch unanimity among them as was neceſſary to ſupport the honour of the nation againſt any foreign power. That part of the ſpeech which mentioned the governor of Buenos Ayres, was moſt ſeverely cenſured, and even ridiculed, both without and within doors. It was ſaid, Why ſhould an officer, who acted only under command, be conſidered, inſtead of the king his maſter, as the principal in an injury offered to this great nation? The anſwer is evident; the ſame temporizing, mean and cowardly policy prevails, which beheld the ſeizure of Corſica, in defiance of faith and of treaties; and now hopes, under this ſubterfuge, to find ſome means of prolonging its exiſtence, though at the price of the national honour and dignity.

Upon the whole, it was aſſerted, in poſitive terms, that the conduct of our miniſtry had neither been honeſt in the deſign, nor able in the execution; they had loſt the confidence of the people, and yet imagined they would ſupport them: that they had threatened the colonies with unrelenting ſeverity, in purſuit of an unconſtitutional meaſure, and yet ſuppoſe that we ſhall ſuffer nothing from an alienation of their affection: that Ireland was ruled with a rod of iron, and yet they conſtantly declared, that they were not making ſtrides towards arbitrary power. Laſtly, that, with reſpect to the deſigns of our enemies, they had been totally blind and improvident, and yet we were in danger.

In anſwer to this, it was ſaid by thoſe who ſtood up in defence of the miniſtry, that all Europe, friends as well as enemies, were attentive to, and would found much of their opinion upon the iſſue of the preſent day: that the ſentiments contained in the addreſs would ſerve nearly as much as our military preparations, to intimidate Spain, by convincing them, that whatever differences in opinion, or even tranſient animoſities, might occaſionally ſubſiſt among us, yet we have but one heart and one hand againſt the common enemy: that an addreſs was a compliment to the throne, and not the approbation of a miniſter; and that if a miniſter had acted amiſs, there were other methods of enquiry and cenſure well known, and which would involve no other character; but that the preſent objections were meant as an invidious attack on the crown: that nothing could be more abſurd than the idea, that any private differences, diſcontents, or political ſquabbles among ourſelves, could operate in ſuch a manner upon the minds of the people, as to prevent their defending their own rights and intereſts, as well as the dignity of the crown, againſt any confederacy of our enemies: that no man would ſit ſtill, while his eſtate was ravaged, or his houſe burned, through his diſlike to the manner in which public affairs were conducted: that therefore, if any domeſtic quarrels ſtill exiſted, it would be time enough to adjuſt them when the common danger was removed: that the charge of alienating the colonies was ſo far from being well founded, that the reverſe was the fact; and, except a part of one inconſiderable province, they had been brought back to a ſenſe of their duty, by a ſpirit and prudence which did equal honour to adminiſtration. The charge of not arming ſooner, and of making it a crime that ſome of our Weſt-India iſlands were liable to danger, would, upon examination, it was ſaid, appear equally groundleſs: that the truth was, the nation could not have been armed ſooner; our fleets could not be fitted out, except when our trade was at home, or juſt coming home, as ſailors were not to be had at any othertime; and that it was well known, that the trade was not at home, nor near coming home, in the preſent inſtance. As the miniſtry, therefore, could not arm effectually, it was an act of the greateſt prudence not to excite a general alarm by attempting it, which would have been a ſignal to our enemies to have done the ſame, as they were not under the ſame diſadvantages, to have effected that, which we could only have attempted; whereas now we were upon an equal footing, if not before them.

As

As to the other charge, it was only to aſk, Whether there can be a poſſibility of undertaking to ſecure every part of the Britiſh dominions, in their whole extent, from every ſudden blow that might be given in caſe of a war; and if there was, what given number of troops would be required to anſwer ſuch an undertaking? It was ſaid, that our character for courage was too well, and too generally eſtabliſhed, to leave any room for our being concerned about it; and as war was never deſirable while peace could be preſerved with ſecurity and honour, therefore it was right to leave an opening, whereby the king of Spain might, if he choſe it, withdraw himſelf with honour, and, by diſavowing the act of his ſervant, avoid the alternative of a war, of making diſagreeable conceſſions, or of acknowledging himſelf the author of a raſh and haſty meaſure.

Addreſſes being carried and preſented by both houſes, a motion was made in the upper houſe by the duke of Richmond, "That an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, that he will "be graciouſly pleaſed to give directions that there "be laid before that aſſembly copies or extracts of "all letters, and other papers, containing any intelligence received by any of his majeſty's principal ſecretaries of ſtate, the commiſſioners for "executing the office of lord high admiral of "Great Britain, or any other of his majeſty's miniſters, between the twelfth of September 1769, "and the twelfth of September 1770, touching "any hoſtilities commenced, or deſigned to be "commenced, by the crown of Spain, or any of "its officers, againſt any part of his majeſty's dominions, expreſſing the times at which ſuch intelligence was received."

This motion was oppoſed by lord Weymouth, as very improper, while the affair remained unſettled and in negotiation. The duke of Richmond then urged the neceſſity of it, as the miniſtry ought to have the ſanction of parliament to decide ſo critical a point as peace or war, which at preſent was very doubtful. To this lord Hilſborough replied, that it would be highly imprudent to produce the papers, before they had received the Spaniſh miniſter's anſwer, which could not at that time be obtained, as there were ſome points in what he had received from his court that required conſideration, being ſo expreſſed as not to be perfectly clear. Lord Chatham then made a long ſpeech, in which he clearly proved that the miniſtry had not taken ſuch precaution as they ought; that we were then in a moſt deplorable ſituation, having but one ſhip of the line at Jamaica, two in the Mediterranean, and not able to ſend twelve men of war out, was it to ſave the nation. He ſaid, he wiſhed the Spaniards were not at that time in poſſeſſion of Jamaica and Gibraltar, as he knew of nothing that could prevent them. He ſtrongly urged the weakneſs of the then miniſtry, and of all their meaſures; and obſerved, that they might palliate as much as they pleaſed, but that he did aver from facts, that we were at preſent at war, and that war was inevitable. His lordſhip was anſwered by the duke of Grafton, who found great fault with him for expoſing the weakneſs of the nation, as it might tend to prevent the Spaniſh ambaſſador coming into terms ſo eaſily as he otherways would have done: he alſo inſiſted, that we were in a good ſtate, both as to navy and men. In this laſt aſſertion, however, he was entirely confuted by lord Shelburne. Lord Sandwich then obſerved, that the miniſtry had done all they could, and that he doubted not, notwithſtanding the inſinuations to the contrary, they could find proper officers to conduct the approaching war.

Much more was ſaid on this ſubject, by the duke of Mancheſter, the marquis of Rockingham, and lord Lyttleton, who all ſupported what lord Chatham had advanced. The queſtion was then called for; when twenty-one were for the motion, and ſixty-five againſt it.

The next motion, which was looked upon conſiſtent with the fundamental principles of our conſtitution, was alſo made in the houſe of lords, to enquire into the legality of the Middleſex election; and the debates on that important ſubject were carried on in the moſt learned and eloquent manner. In particular lord Camden ſpoke in the moſt forcible manner, in defence of the rights of the people; but notwithſtanding all his arguments, the motion was rejected.

As ſome proſecutions had been carried on by the attorney-general againſt ſeveral bookſellers and printers, a motion was made to enquire into the legal power of that law officer, and a long debate enſued. The principal queſtion to be diſcuſſed was, whether juries were judges of the law as well as the fact; or whether they were judges of the fact only.

After a variety of long and learned arguments made uſe of by both parties, the houſe divided upon this important queſtion; but when the votes came to be taken, it was rejected by a very great majority. But although the motion was rejected, a noble lord, whoſe conduct had been ſeverely cenſured, could not reſt eaſy under the aſperſions which had been thrown out againſt him by the moſt reſpectable members of ſo awful an aſſembly, eſpecially as ſome of them were lawyers who had made the moſt diſtinguiſhed figure at the bar. This nobleman had lately delivered a charge to the jury, which the popular party complained much of, becauſe it contained ſentiments coinciding with the charges already mentioned. His lordſhip, therefore, left a paper with the clerk, containing his opinion; and deſired it might be read in the hearing of all the peers then preſent, they having been ſummoned for that purpoſe. Each of the members were permitted to take a copy of this paper; and then a queſtion was propoſed, whether it was meant that the paper ſhould be entered on the journals? which was anſwered in the negative. A violent debate then aroſe concerning the ſubject matter of the paper.

Lord Camden took notice, that he had gone through every department of the law, and therefore conſidered himſelf as able to judge of ſuch matters, excluſive of his title of peerage. He offered to maintain, that the doctrine laid down as the judgment of the court, was not the law of England; declared, that he was ready at any time to enter into the debate, and preſſed his antagoniſt to appoint an early day for that purpoſe. He propoſed ſeveral queſtions from the ſubject matter of the paper, evidently tending to bring it before the houſe, but all to no purpoſe, for his motion was over-ruled, and nothing farther was done in an affair of the utmoſt importance to the community. This occaſioned much cenſure, becauſe, had the lords decided what was law on this motion, it would have ſaved many diſputes and litigations, which might hereafter ariſe. By ſuch a deciſion, we ſhould have known what power our law has given to juries, and how far they are judges either of the law itſelf, or of ſuch collateral evidence as ariſes out of the given fact.

During the receſs of parliament, Sir Edward Hawke reſigned the place of firſt lord of the admiralty, and was ſucceeded in that important office by the earl of Sandwich. About the ſame time, ſome of thoſe gentlemen who had been particularly attached to the late Mr. Grenville, and had, both as to acts and declarations, been among the moſt violent of thoſe in oppoſing, now came over to the ſide of adminiſtration. The earl of Suffolk was appointed keeper of the privy ſeal, in the room of the earl of Halifax, who ſucceeded the earl of Sandwich as ſecretary of ſtate for the northern department. Several other changes took place: Mr. Juſtice Bathurſt received the great ſeal as high-chancellor of Great Britain, and was created a peer of England under the title of lord Apſley: Mr. De Grey, at that time attorney-general, was made chief juſtice of the common pleas, in the room of Sir John Wilmot, who reſigned: Mr. Thurlow was advanced to be attorney-general, and Mr. Wedderburne ſucceeded him as ſolicitor, being, at the ſame time, appointed cofferer to the queen. Such other changes as took place were all ſubordinate to theſe, and ſo connected with them, that it is needleſs to mention them in this place.

A. D. 1771. On the twenty-ſecond of January the parliament met, after a month's receſs; and the ſame day prince Maſerano, the Spaniſh ambaſſador, ſigned the declaration, with the earl of Rochford, ſecretary of ſtate for the ſouthern department. By this declaration, the Spaniſh ambaſſador, in the name of the king his maſter, diſavowed the violences offered at Port Egmont; and ſtipulated, that every thing ſhould be reſtored there, in the ſame manner in which they were before the reduction took place. But, at the ſame time, he declared, that this reſtoration was not in any wiſe to affect the queſtion, of the prior right of his Catholic majeſty to the ſovereignty of theſe iſlands; and, by the acceptance, the performance of theſe ſtipulations was to be conſidered as a ſatisfaction for the injury done to the court of Great Britain.

This tranſaction was immediately announced to both houſes of parliament, and copies thereof were laid before them. It was then moved, that all the papers relating to the convention ſhould be laid before the houſe, which was complied with, except in one inſtance, namely, that of keeping back ſuch papers as contained the Spaniſh claims to Falklands Iſlands. This occaſioned a warm debate, but the miniſtry ſcreened themſelves under pretence that all the offices had been ſearched, but no more papers could be found. It was, at the ſame time, charged upon the miniſtry, that the interference of France was a diſhonour to Great Britain; but the miniſtry denied the charge, by aſſerting that France had never been employed to act as a mediator; but they would neither acknowledge or deny that ſhe had acted in that character. It was then propoſed to preſent an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty for ordering the papers to be laid before them, but this was objected to by the minority, who denied that all the papers had been laid before them. Warm debates enſued in both houſes; but the miniſterial party prevailed, and the addreſs was preſented without any amendment whatever.

A moſt remarkable ſcene of corruption was, about this time, brought to light, by the committee appointed to determine conteſted elections; and, in particular, that of New Shoreham in Suſſex. The matter of conteſt was, that the returning officer for that borough had returned a candidate with only thirty-ſeven votes, in preference to one who had eighty-ſeven, of which he doubted ſeventy-ſix, and ſo made his return without examining, as he ought to have done, whether they were legal voters or not.

In the courſe of the examination of witneſſes it appeared, that a great number of the freemen had formed themſelves into a ſociety, which they called the Chriſtian Club; the apparent ends of which inſtitution were to promote acts of charity and benevolence, and to anſwer all ſuch purpoſes as were any ways conſiſtent with the doctrines of our holy religion. But notwithſtanding all theſe pretenſions, they profaned the ſacred name they had aſſumed, by carrying on the worſt of purpoſes, and making a traffic of the oaths and conſciences, and ſetting their borough to ſale to the higheſt bidder; while the reſt of the freemen were deprived of the privilege of giving their legal votes.

The returning officer had belonged to this ſociety, but having taken ſome diſguſt at his companions in iniquity, he had, in conſequence thereof, left their party. Being called before the committee he declared that his reaſon for making ſuch an unequal return was, that he knew, from his own experience, that the majority of voters had taken bribes: nay, that they had even agreed to ſell their borough to any one who would bid moſt for it.

As this combination at Shoreham was of too flagrant a nature to be overlooked, and the ſelect committee not having powers to proceed any further, they reported the whole matter to the houſe, and moved that they would make a further enquiry into it. All thoſe who wiſhed well to the conſtitution were glad of this opportunity of diſplaying their eloquence, and an act paſſed, by which eighty-one freemen of the borough of Shoreham were rendered incapable of voting at any election, and the attorney-general was ordered to proſecute all the members of the Club.

The next thing that came before parliament was of a very important nature to the ſubjects in general, namely, the manner in which the crown lands could be given away by the ſovereign to any of his ſubjects; and how ſoon he could again ſeize on them, or whether he could ſeize them at all.

Mr. Bentinck, the great favourite of king William, had been naturalized, and the king made him a grant of ſome lands in Cumberland, which gave great offence to ſome of the Engliſh nobility. Accordingly, a bill was brought in during the reign of queen Anne, and paſſed into a law, ordaining, that for the future, no grants ſhould be made of crown-lands, without reſerving one fourth of the rent to the crown. Nothing, however, material happened in conſequence of this act, till the year 1768, when the duke of Grafton, then at the head of the treaſury, made a grant of the duke of Portland's eſtates in Cumberland to Sir James Lowther, without conforming to the act of queen Anne, by reſerving one fourth to the crown.

This was a moſt alarming circumſtance, becauſe many of the principal eſtates of our nobility and gentry were held by grants of crown-lands; and that if Sir James Lowther's claim ſhould be ſuſtained, no perſon could look upon himſelf in peaceable poſſeſſion of any thing that had originally belonged to the crown. It was the general opinion at that time, that this grant might be made to ſerve ſome election purpoſes; but theſe being now over, it was ſuppoſed the matter would drop of courſe. In this, however, they were diſappointed; for an expenſive law-ſuit was commenced, the whole county of Cumberland was in an uproar, four hundred ejectments being ſerved in one day. A motion was then made for bringing in a bill to quiet the ſubjects in the peaceable poſſeſſion of their eſtates; and that it ſhould extend to the proprietors of land throughout every part of the kingdom, according to the ſtatutes already made.

This is what is called the Nullum Tempus bill, and at firſt it paſſed through the houſe by a conſiderable majority; on the ſecond reading it likewiſe paſſed, though with a ſmall majority; but when it came to the third reading, it was rejected by a majority of nine votes, the whole miniſterial influence having been thrown in to defeat it. This conduct of the miniſtry was much cenſured by the people in general, eſpecially as it was matter of diſpute concerning private property, with which they had no right to interfere.

About this time an affair happened which it was greatly feared would have been attended with the moſt alarming conſequences. The ſpeeches ſaid to have been made in the houſe of commons had, for a conſiderable time, been publiſhed by ſome bookſellers, who being cited before the houſe, refuſed to appear; upon which a proclamation was publiſhed with a reward for apprehending them. This produced the intended effect. J. Wheble, one of theſe perſons, was apprehended and taken before John Wilkes, eſq; the ſitting alderman at Guildhall: but he finding that the perſon who had apprehended Mr. Wheble had no accuſation againſt him, and only apprehended him on the authority of the proclamation, and at the ſame time Mr. Wheble declaring that the apprehender had forcibly detained him, and brought him there, the alderman immediately diſcharged him, and bound him over to proſecute his accuſer.

Mr. Miller, printer of a public paper, was likewiſe taken into cuſtody, by a meſſenger from the houſe of commons; who, on his refuſing to go with him, took him by the arm, upon which a conſtable was ſent for, and Mr. Miller gave him charge of the meſſenger for aſſaulting him in his own houſe; whereupon he was carried to the Manſion-houſe, and a hearing came on before the lord-mayor and aldermen Wilkes and Oliver. In the mean time the ſerjeant at arms being informed of this tranſaction, came to demand the bodies of the meſſenger and of Mr. Miller; upon which the lord-mayor aſked the meſſenger if he had applied to a magiſtrate to back the warrant, or to any peace officer of the city to aſſiſt him; and on his replying in the negative, his lordſhip declared, that no power had a right to ſeize a citizen of London, without an authority from him or ſome other magiſtrate; and that he was of opinion, the ſeizing of Mr. Miller and the warrant were both illegal; he therefore declared Miller to be at liberty, and proceeded to examine witneſſes to prove the aſſault on him by the meſſenger, which being done, his lordſhip aſked the latter if he would give bail. This he at firſt refuſed to do; but his commitment being actually made out, he thought proper to comply, when himſelf was bound in forty pounds, and two ſureties in twenty pounds each, for his appearance at the next ſeſſions at Guildhall.

After many and long debates the houſe of commons having reſolved, "That the proceedings of "the lord-mayor and Mr. Oliver were a breach of "the privilege of that houſe," committed them both to the tower, where they continued till the prorogation of parliament, which happened on the eighth of May, when his majeſty put an end to the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he obſerved, that the pacific diſpoſition of the kings of France and Spain furniſhed an opportunity for diſbanding ſome of the forces both by ſea and land. The commons were thanked for the generous manner in which they had granted the ſupplies, and that was conſidered as the ſtrongeſt mark of their attachment to his majeſty's perſon, family and government. His ſpeech concluded with recommending to their ſerious attention the ſuppreſſion of all riots and tumults, which had been ſo frequent in moſt parts of the kingdom.

During the continuance of the lord-mayor and Mr. alderman Oliver in the Tower, they were addreſſed and thanked for their ſpirited conduct in maintaining the authority of the laws of their country, by every ward in London, and by ſeveral towns and boroughs in England. Great preparations were made for conducting the two patriots from the Tower; but the parliament being prorogued one day ſooner than was expected, a few only of the aldermen, &c. could attend; the proceſſion was, however, magnificent, and they were conducted to the manſion-houſe amidſt thouſands of applauding ſpectators.

DURING the courſe of the year 1771 the events on the continent, and particularly the war between the Turks and Ruſſians, not only engaged the attention, but in ſome meaſure affected the political intereſts of all the ſtates in Europe. The ſeat of war the preceeding year was on the Danube, and the Ruſſians were in general victors; but their conqueſts were not obtained without great loſs as well by ſickneſs as the ſword.

The two grand objects the Ruſſians had in view at the opening of this campaign, were the ſecuring the conqueſts they had obtained in the former, and the penetrating into Crim Tartary, known by the ancient Greeks under the name of Tawrica Cherſoneſus. This ſpot joins little Tartary by a ſmall iſthmus, not more than ſix miles broad. On this iſthmus ſtood the ancient city of Precop, but the Turks have changed the names of thoſe once celebrated places, which were formerly the ſeats of the liberal arts. The whole peninſula is one of the moſt fertile ſpots in the world, abounding with many town and cities; and the entrance, near where Precop ſtood, is fortified by ſtrong lines, with a trench forty-two feet deep, ſeventy-two broad, and from the bottom of the ditch to the creſt of the parapet, was ſeventy feet. Strong towers had been erected at proper diſtances from each other, and ſtrong cannon were placed upon them.

Prince Dolgorucki was the Ruſſian general appointed to attack this place, and when he arrived before the lines, he found it defended by the chan Selim Guery in perſon, with an army of fifty thouſand Tartars, and ſeven thouſand Turks. But notwithſtanding the difference of numbers, the prince attacked the place on the twenty-fifth of June, two days after their arrival. The Tartar prince behaved with great bravery: for finding it impoſſible to rally his right wing, he went and charged gallantly at the head of his left. All his efforts, however, were in vain; for in four hours his whole army was routed, and the lines forced in every place. The Turkiſh garriſon ſurrendered priſoners of war the next day; and their whole army, cannon, amunition, and baggage, fell into the hands of the conquerors.

The Ruſſians, having made themſelves maſters of this important paſs, over-ran the whole of the peninſula; the Turkiſh garriſon deſerted Koſtoff, and having deſtroyed the fortifications, embarked on board ſome ſhips that lay in the harbour, and ſet ſail for their own country. The governor of Arabat made ſome defence; but the place was taken by ſtorm, and the garriſon put to the ſword. From thence the prince continued his march to Caffa, the capital city of the Crimea, which was immediately ſurrendered to him, and a thouſand men, the remains of the garriſon, were made priſoners of war.

This torrent of ſucceſs ſpread ſo general a conſternation, that the Turks, without waiting for the arrival of the enemy, abandoned the important fortreſſes of Taman, Jenicola, and Kertſch, which commanded the ſtreights between the Black Sea and the town of Azoph, which now fell into the hands of the Ruſſians, without ſtriking a ſingle blow. The Tartars ſubmitted to the conquerors, who took them under their immediate protection; while their unfortunate leader retired to Conſtantinople, where he ſoon after died, not without ſtrong ſuſpicion that he had been put to death in a private manner.

In the mean time the Turks, under the command of Mouſſon Oglou, croſſed the Danube in three diviſions, in order to attempt to relieve the fort of Torre, ſituated on the north of that river oppoſite to the antient city of Nicopolis. The attempt, however, did not ſucceed; but a detachment of them, under the command of a baſhaw, attacked the ſtrong fort of Guirgewo, in which was a Ruſſian garriſon, and in three days the governor agreed to capitulate, upon being allowed to march out with all the honours of war. As this place was very ſtrong, and had coſt the Ruſſians much trouble and loſs before they took it, ſo the conduct of the governor filled the minds of the army with indignation, and prince Repin ordered all the officers to be put under arreſt.

A detachment of the Turks, on the 17th of Auguſt came up with a body of Ruſſians, and the latter were, after a moſt obſtinate defence, put to flight; but they retreated in very excellent order, taking along with them their wounded men. This was the only field action in which the Turks had hitherto reaped any advantage, and it was magnified at Conſtantinople as a complete victory.

The main object with the Turks was to eſtabliſh winter quarters in Walachia, and with this view they continued croſſing the Danube in detached parties. But their motions could not eſcape the notice of a general ſo vigilant and penetrating as Romanzow, who no ſooner perceived their deſigns, than he made ſuch a number of maſterly diſpoſitions as not only overthrew their ſchemes, but were conducted with ſuch ability, that every one of them took place at the inſtant of time, and was productive of the intended effect.

Inſtead of waiting for the enemy, the Ruſſians boldly croſſed the Danube, and attacked them on their own ſide, a manœuvre not ſo much as ſuſpected. Two great bodies of Turks, one entrenched at Tulcza, and the other at Maczin, were attacked at the ſame time by the Ruſſian generals Weiſman and Miboradowits, and the event was the ſame in both places. The entrenchments were ſtormed, the Turks totally routed, and the towns taken, in which were large magazines of arms and proviſions.

The night following general Weiſman marched to attack the grand vizier's camp, which was ſtrongly fortified, at a place called Babadagh; in which was the flower of the Turkiſh army, covered with a ſtrong train of artillery. Victory, however, was obtained here by the Ruſſians as eaſily as before; the Turks were routed with great ſlaughter, the entrenchments and artillery taken, with the caſtle of Babadagh; while the vizier and his ruined army fled thirty miles, to ſeek refuge in mount Hemnus.

Soon after theſe important conqueſts, general Eſſen attacked a large body of Turks, and totally routed them, after having killed two thouſand, and taken four thouſand priſoners, beſides all their baggage, tents, artillery, waggons, ammunition and proviſions. By theſe rapid ſucceſſes, the Turks were driven out of Walachia, while the Ruſſians remained maſters of that province. When the news arrived at Conſtantinople, the people became quite outrageous, and would have proceeded to great extremities, had they not been made to believe, that the loſs was owing to a mutiny which had taken place in the army.

The naval operations of the Ruſſians, however, were not this year crowned with ſucceſs equal to thoſe of the military; indeed nothing of importance was atchieved in that line. Their fleet in the Mediterranean was greatly diſtreſſed for want of proviſions; and ſome of their ſhips having been ſent to the Italian ports, to purchaſe ſuch things as were wanting, they were refuſed admittance, under pretence that they were infected with the plague. But ſtill under all theſe diſadvantages, and many others, the Ruſſians, by falling in with a puſillanimous enemy, ſtruck unſpeakable terror in the Levant, and made even the Grand Seignior tremble on his throne. A moſt ſevere blow was given to the Levant trade; and throughout all the iſlands of the Archipelago, the coaſts of Greece and Aſia, nothing was to be ſeen but ruin and deſolation: the Ruſſians, however, reaped but few advantages, as the climate killed many more of their men than thoſe who fell by the ſword.

Such were the ravages of war added to the noxious effects of a moſt intemperate clime; but to add to the calamities of the contending parties, who were proſecuting hoſtilities at an immenſe effuſion of human blood, the peſtilence poured forth its reſiſtleſs bane, and ſwept from this ſcene of exiſtence numbers who had eſcaped the ſword. When we conſider the havock made by this dreadful diſorder in the Turkiſh army, and that all the provinces near the Black Sea were more or leſs infected with it, it will appear little leſs than a miracle that the Ruſſian army ſhould have eſcaped the fatal contagion. But if their army was ſo fortunate as to eſcape, it was not ſo happy with the interior part of their empire. It firſt diſcovered itſelf in the imperial city of Moſcow; but as it was many hundred miles from the theatres of the war, and from the countries infected, it could not be reaſonably ſuppoſed that it had been communicated from thence. It raged during the ſummer under the appearance of a malignant fever, but in autumn it aſſumed its true form, and ſwept away many thouſands before it.

Shocking were the effects produced by theſe ravages on the minds of this barbarous people. The ſeverity of government had been, in ſome meaſure, relaxed, and the moſt horrid licentiouſneſs took place. A wild enthuſiaſt pretended that he had a revelation from heaven, by which he was informed, that a certain image of a ſaint was endowed with efficacy ſufficient to cure thoſe who were infected, and to preſerve thoſe who were not. This drew innumerable crowds together, ſo that many thouſands were trampled to death, and the ſick dropped down dead in the midſt of ſuch as were healthy. Thus the contagion was communicated in ſuch a manner, that no attempts could reſtrain its progreſs; while the populace, aſſembling in ſuch numerous bodies, broke out into the moſt violent outrages.

The artful impoſtor, who contrived the fraud, had placed a cheſt before the image of the ſaint, to receive ſuch money as the people gave; but the archbiſhop of Moſcow, who ſeems to have been a prudent man, ordered the cheſt to be ſealed up, and both it and the image of the ſaint removed out of the church. This act, which deſerved the higheſt commendation, had quite a different effect on the ignorant and ſuperſtitious multitude, for they ran to the archbiſhop's houſe, and utterly demoliſhed it. The good prelate had eſcaped, through a back door, to one of the monaſteries, where he hoped to be protected; but thither the enraged multitude followed him, and dragging the venerable old man into the ſtreets, put him to death in the moſt horrid and barbarous manner.

A body of troops having been ſent to quell the rioters, they refuſed to diſperſe; upon which the ſoldiers fired upon them, and many hundreds were killed. Many priſoners were taken, and being brought to their trials, were puniſhed according to the cuſtom of the country. The moſt remarkable circumſtance attending this tragical affair, was the murder of the good old archbiſhop, for the Ruſſians regard their clergy in a more ſacred manner than any other nation in Europe; but who can check the progreſs of enthuſiaſm inflamed by ignorance and ſuperſtition?

While the ſword and the peſtilence were thus exterminating as it were the human ſpecies in theſe quarters of the globe, the great kingdom of Poland felt the dire effects of ariſtocratical influence, and was indeed involved in one general ſcene of ſlaughter. The confederates became more and more inveterate againſt each other, and yet the fertility of the ſoil furniſhed the means of ſubſiſtence. Indeed, it may be juſtly ſaid, that the Ruſſian ambaſſador was the ſovereign of Poland, for all orders iſſued from him were ſanctified with the name of the king.

In the mean time, the king of Poland, who had been raiſed to the throne from a private ſtation, ſupported himſelf under his misfortunes with the moſt heroic fortitude. He did not even ſuſpect that his enemies had the leaſt intention to do him any injury; but he was moſt fatally miſtaken, for about ten o'clock in the evening of the third of November, having been on a viſit to a nobleman in the country, and returning to the palace at Warſaw, his coach was beſet by ſeveral armed men on horſeback, the chief of whom was Koczinſki, an officer among the confederates. Theſe deſperadoes having fired their piſtols into the coach, dragged out the king, and carried him off between two horſemen. The domeſtics who attended the coach did all they could to reſcue him, but in vain, for one was killed on the ſpot, and the reſt deſperately wounded.

The Ruſſian ſoldiers ran to arms, and found the coach covered with blood, but could learn no accounts of the king; upon which they ſallied forth, and alarmed the detached parties which were on the roads leading to the capital. The aſſaſſins had been joined by ſome of their accomplices at one of the gates, and, without ſtopping, rode off with the king till they came to the village of Willanow, about ſeven Engliſh miles diſtant from Warſaw. The Ruſſians continued purſuing; upon which Koczinſki, with four others, ſeparated from the reſt of his companions, carrying the king with them. When he had proceeded a few miles, he ſent his four companions to procure intelligence, whether any of the Ruſſian forces were advancing; and no ſooner were they gone, than he fell at the king's feet, imploring his pardon, and, at the ſame time, offering to ſave his life. They then proceeded to a hut about a mile diſtant, from whence the king diſpatched a meſſenger to the Ruſſian general, who ſent proper perſons to attend him, and conduct him home. The king had received two wounds on his head, the one from a ſword, and the other from a ball; and his eſcaping with life may be conſidered as one of the moſt extraordinary incidents we meet with in hiſtory.

The aſſaſſin Koczinſki produced a paper, by which it appeared that he and his confederates were bound by the moſt ſolemn oaths to deliver the king, dead or alive, to the confederacy at Czenſtochau; but, as he ſaid, his heart failed him, and he was ſeized with remorſe as ſoon as he ſaw the bleeding wounds of his ſovereign. From attending to the tranſaction, this miſcreant, it muſt be evident, could not have been actuated by the motives he alledged in vindication of his conduct, which were doubtleſs extorted to extenuate his guilt and plead for his life. And it may be obſerved from this and many ſimilar inſtances, that traitors will ever ſhrink back appalled at the immediate view of condign puniſhment.

On the twelfth of February this year, the king of Sweden died ſuddenly, and was ſucceeded by his ſon, then at Paris on his travels.

During the receſs of the Engliſh parliament, ſeveral changes gradually took place. Many of the oppoſite party had gone over to the court, ſo that the miniſtry acquired a conſiderable degree of ſtrength, while many others relinquiſhed their attachment to any parties whatever.

One event took place during this receſs, which ſurprized the whole nation, and made way for an act, the next ſeſſions, of a moſt extraordinary nature. The event alluded to was the marriage of his royal highneſs the duke of Cumberland with Mrs. Horton, a widow lady, and daughter to lord Irnham, of the kingdom of Ireland. This ſtep gave great offence at court, eſpecially as it had been openly acknowledged by the parties, and not concealed in the ſame manner as the marriage of the duke of Glouceſter with the counteſs dowager of Waldgrave.

A. D. 1772. On the twenty-firſt of January the parliament met; and his majeſty, in his ſpeech, expreſſed much ſatisfaction, that neither the foreign or domeſtic ſtate of affairs required their more early attendance: that, now they were aſſembled, they would, no doubt, attend to the intereſts of the nation, and regulate its internal policy, as well as its foreign commerce. They were likewiſe informed, that the king of Spain had given up Fort Egmont, and that we were on the beſt terms with that court. It was, however, recommended to them, to keep the navy on the moſt reſpectable footing, to be ready in caſe of any neceſſity for the future.

The addreſſes were preſented in the uſual form; and then the public buſineſs was opened, by making proper inquiries into the ſtate of the navy; and the miniſtry propoſed, that twenty-five thouſand ſeamen ſhould be voted for the ſervice of the current year. It was urged by the miniſtry, that the French had ſent a conſiderable fleet to the Eaſt-Indies, and that we were, on that account, obliged to ſupport a more conſiderable naval force there than before: that a large ſquadron was employed in the protection of our Weſt-India iſlands; for ſhould any miſunderſtanding ariſe between us and the Spaniards, thoſe valuable acquiſitions, if not properly ſecured, would fall into the hands of our enemies: that the war between the Ruſſians and Turks made it alſo neceſſary to employ a greater number of ſhips for the protection of our commerce in the Mediterranean and the Archipelago, than had been cuſtomary in times of general peace: that by keeping up a reputable body of ſeamen, we ſhould not be under the cruel neceſſity of granting preſs-warrants in caſe of the breaking out of a new war; and although the expencce might be more than common in times of peace, the advantages would amply repay it.

To theſe arguments it was anſwered by thoſe in oppoſition, that the nation was already groaning under a load of taxes; and, inſtead of doing or propoſing any thing for paying off the national debt, here was a propoſal made to increaſe it in a time of profound peace: that, allowing the exigencies of the times required it, yet it did not appear but that on every future occaſion, the ſame pretence might be made, whether there was any neceſſity for it or not.

Two of our greateſt naval commanders ſtrongly oppoſed the motion, and condemned the then preſent arrangement of the fleet. They obſerved, that the force already in the Eaſt-Indies was either too great or too little: that if the appearances of a permanent peace, as held out in the ſpeech, were to be relied on, it was too great, and, in caſe of war, it was inſufficient: that the ſame objections lay to the arrangement at Jamaica, where the ſquadron conſiſted only of about four ſhips, and was altogether unable to protect it, ſuppoſing any danger of an attack. Many ſevere ſarcaſms were levelled at the miniſtry for the futility of their conduct, becauſe they accompanied a ſpeech which breathed nothing but ſentiments of peace, with all the actual preparations for war. At laſt, the queſtion being put, the motion was carried by a great majority.

The moſt important parliamentary tranſaction that engroſſed attention both within and without doors, was in conſequence of a meſſage ſent by his majeſty to the houſe of lords, in which it was obſerved, that his majeſty being deſirous, from paternal affection to his own family, an anxious concern for the future welfare of his people, and the honour and dignity of his crown, that the right of approving all marriages in the royal family, as a matter of public concern, had always belonged to the princes of this realm; he therefore recommended to both houſes to take it into their ſerious conſideration, whether it might not be wiſe and expedient to ſupply the defects of the laws then in being, and, by ſome new proviſion, more effectually guard the deſcendants of his late majeſty, except ſuch as were already married to foreign princes, from marrying without the approbation of his majeſty, his heirs and ſucceſſors, firſt had and obtained.

In conſequence of this meſſage, a bill was brought into the houſe of lords, which fully anſwered all the purpoſes intended. This bill was oppoſed, with great ſtrength of argument, by ſome of the moſt reſpectable peers in the nation. All the judges were ſent for to give their opinion, which was, that the marriages of the immediate branches of the royal family muſt be approved of by the king, but how far that power extended over collateral branches, they could not determine. At laſt the motion was carried, though not till fourteen lords entered a proteſt againſt it, as being inconſiſtent with the law of nature.

In the houſe of commons the bill met with a much ſtronger oppoſition; and the opponents boldly declared, that it had been brought in at a time when moſt of the gentlemen of the law, whoſe opinions would have been of great weight, were gone on the circuits. But, notwithſtanding all the ſtrength of argument, it paſſed, and ſoon after received the royal aſſent.

The attention of parliament was now directed to the affairs of the Eaſt India company, which were in a very diſtracted ſituation. On the 30th of March, the deputy chairman moved the houſe for leave to bring in a bill for the better regulation of the ſervants belonging to the company in India. The grand object in view was, to reſtrain the governor's council; and, indeed, all the ſervants belonging to the company from carrying on any ſort of trade, and to give the directors of the company a ſovereign power over their own ſervants.

It was urged in ſupport of the motion, that the bad ſtate of affairs in India, was owing to the ſmall power the court of directors had over their ſervants, as they could not puniſh them in any other manner than by diſmiſſing them. That nothing was more inconſiſtent with true policy, than to ſuffer governors of provinces at a great diſtance to become traders and merchants; and that the court of Bengal was not able to adminiſter juſtice to all the other ſettlements.

In anſwer to this it was ſaid, that it was an unparliamentary thing to propoſe bringing in a bill to redreſs a grievance without producing ſufficient proof that the grievance exiſted That the houſe ought firſt to enter into an enquiry concerning our preſent ſituation of affairs in India, and the cauſes that led to it; that it was to be feared the enquiry would ſhew, that the evils lay too deep to be remedied by the propoſed bill; that it would be almoſt impoſſible to prevent the company's ſervants from trading either directly or indirectly; and that the ſending out ſome gentlemen learned in the laws as judges, was very inadequate to the purpoſe of adminiſtering juſtice to the people, in ſuch a vaſt extended track of land; and that the meaſure was premature, becauſe we had not yet determined by what code of laws the people were to be governed.

The motion, however, was carried, and this led to an enquiry into the ſtate of affairs in India. All the papers belonging to the company were ordered to be laid before a ſelect committee of the houſe, and from the peruſal of them, many important diſcoveries were made. Indeed, it was found that the mode of government in India was in every reſpect arbitrary, unconſtitutional, and no way fit for preſerving the rights of the people, nor adminiſtering juſtice to individuals. This committee, finding the buſineſs encreaſing faſt, and the ſeaſon far advanced, deſired leave to continue ſitting during the receſs of parliament, or, at leaſt, till ſuch time as they could go through with the intended enquiry.

In the mean time, the ill temper which had ſo unaccountably taken place between the two houſes during the preceding ſeſſion, ſtill continued during the preſent; and, except in tranſmitting of bills from the one to the other, there was no more communication between them, than if they had been the jealous councils of two rival ſtates.

In this ſtate of affairs, the lords having ſent a bill to the commons by a maſter in chancery, and a clerk aſſiſtant, the whole houſe conſidered it as an indignity, and would not accept the meſſage till they had examined the journals, to know if there were any precedents of ſending bills in that manner. In the courſe of an haſty and paſſionate debate, which enſued upon this occaſion, ſeveral gentlemen mentioned, that, on the firſt day of the then ſeſſions, they had been rudely turned out of the houſe of lords, even before the ſpeaker could get out of the door. A motion was then made to appoint a committee to ſearch for precedents, of the manner of bills being ſent from the lords, and alſo of the improper behaviour of the lords to the commons. Exceptions, however, were taken to the word improper, as if it had carried an appearance of prejudging the caſe; and after a warm debate, the word was left out.

The report of the committee was, that the lords had behaved in a very improper manner, and that the bill, which ſtill lay on the table, ſhould be ſent back. This was oppoſed by adminiſtration, who ſaid it would lay a foundation for a quarrel, which might not be eaſily accommodated; and accordingly the motion was over-ruled.

A motion was then made for a conference with the lords, but over-ruled in the ſame manner as the other; and after long debates, and ſeveral propoſed amendments, the matter ended in a meſſage to the lords in which the impropriety of the meſſengers was the only complaint ſtated, which, it was hoped, would not be drawn into a precedent. This produced an anſwer, that the bill had been ordered in the uſual manner, and that the matter of complaint was occaſioned by the indiſpoſition of one of the perſons who ſhould have preſented it; that a good correſpondence was wiſhed for, and that it was not meant to introduce any precedent contrary to eſtabliſhed uſage. While the parliament was employed in the diſcuſſion of theſe reſpective matters, her royal highneſs the princeſs dowager of Wales Wales departed this life at Carlton-houſe on the 8th of February, in the fifty-third year of her age, to the great regret of his majeſty.

On the ninth of June his majeſty came to the houſe of peers, and cloſed the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in which he took notice of the laudable conduct of his parliament, who had conducted the affairs of the public with ſuch ſpirit and prudence. He thanked them for the care they had taken of his family, in making the act relating to the royal family; and they were informed of the pacific diſpoſition of thoſe powers with whom we had any concern. That there was great reaſon to believe, that the public tranquillity would not be diſturbed. As for the ſupplies granted by the commons, they were thanked in the moſt cordial manner; and great joy was expreſſed, that there were ſtill ſome hopes of being able to reduce the national debt. No doubt was made but they would carry to their reſpective countries, the ſame principles and the ſame zeal for the public good, which they had already manifeſted; and that they would cultivate a ſpirit of harmony and confidence among all ranks of the people; to convince them, that without a due reverence for the laws, neither their civil or religious rights could be enjoyed in comfort or ſecurity; and to aſſure them, that their intereſts were conſidered as inſeparably connected with thoſe of the crown; and that his majeſty is, and ever was perſuaded, that the proſperity and glory of his reign muſt depend on his poſſeſſing the affections, and maintaining the happineſs of his people.

Theſe being the moſt important domeſtic occurrences of the year, we are neceſſarily led to take notice of a moſt extraordinary revolution that took place in the government of Sweden. It is remarked by hiſtorians that no ſtate ever enjoyed more liberty than that of Sweden. Though governed by kings, theſe kings were originally elected by the people, and their power circumſcribed within very narrow limits. The ſenate, in a manner, exerciſed the whole executive power; and the general diets were compoſed of repreſentatives from the nobility, clergy, burgeſſes, and peaſants. It was not, however, without its defects; for the power of the diet being great, ſuch as compoſed it often played the tyrant over their dependents or tenants, which made the people wiſh for a change of government.

About the time of the reformation, the popiſh clergy in Sweden had become ſo odious to the people, that they embraced the doctrines of Luther, and the proteſtant religion was eſtabliſhed among them. From that time forward, Sweden began to emerge from obſcurity; and ſeveral worthy princes having, for about a century, conducted the affairs of government, it became at laſt a flouriſhing nation. But good princes are not of continual ſucceſſion. Charles XI. was a bold, domineering tyrant, and joining cunning to the natural cruelty of his diſpoſition, he ſoon aboliſhed the power of the ſenate by aſſuming it to himſelf, while the ſtates were forced, by a military power, to give up all pretence to legiſlation. By the ſame, or ſimilar methods, he greatly enlarged the dominions of Sweden, by new conqueſts; and, at his death in 1696, left it one of the moſt powerful kingdoms in Europe. He was ſucceeded by his ſon Charles XII. who inherited the intrepidity, obſtinacy, harſhneſs, and violence of his father, without any of his diſſimulation. He carried deſpotiſm to a ſtill greater height; for he threw by all the forms of law, and decided peremptorily in every thing, without admitting of any diſcuſſion. The events of this prince's life are recited at large; ſuffice it to obſerve that he found his nation when he aſcended the throne, at the higheſt pitch of glory; but he left it reduced to a ſtate of miſery.

He was ſucceeded by his ſiſter, who, regardleſs of the example of her father and brothers, founded her conduct upon the principles of thoſe worthy anceſtors who had contributed to the aggrandizement of their country. Things had been conducted with great prudence, till the death of the late king; and his preſent majeſty when he aſcended the throne, ſeemed to coaleſce ſo entirely with the prevailing maxims of government, as to conciliate the minds of the people in general. Every neceſſary preparation being made, the coronation was conducted in the moſt magnificent manner, and every demonſtration of joy was diſplayed on that occaſion. He was next day waited on by the ſenate and the four orders of the diet, and the ſpeech made to them by the king, was one of the moſt lively and animated that we meet with in hiſtory. There was, however, ſomething of ambiguity in it; for ſpeaking of the articles he had previouſly ſigned, he ſaid, "Unhappy is that king who wants the tie of oaths to ſecure himſelf on the throne, and who, not aſſured of the hearts of his ſubjects, is conſtrained to reign by the laws, when he cannot by the love of his people." Such was the manner in which this prince began his reign.

The diet ſtill continued ſitting, when thoſe ſchemes that had been hatching began to reveal themſelves. As it was neceſſary the experiment ſhould be made at a conſiderable diſtance from the capital, in order that it might, in ſome degree, operate before the ſenate or diet ſhould receive information of it, as well as acquire a conſiderable degree of ſtrength, before their attempt to cruſh it could take place, it was reſolved that it ſhould break out where ſuch of the military were quartered as the court could confide in.

Scania, a province in the ſouth-weſt extremity of Sweden, and about two hundred and fifty miles from Stockholm, was the place pitched upon; for as that province is only ſeparated from Denmark by the Sound, great numbers of the military are conſtantly quartered in it. It was agreed, that the king ſhould remain in Stockholm; that his brother, prince Charles, ſhould ſet out for Chriſtian-ſtadt, under pretence of meeting his mother, who had been on a viſit to the court of Berlin; and prince Frederick Adolphus went into the neighbouring province of Oſtragothia, which lies in the way from Stockholm, under pretence of drinking the mineral waters.

Theſe neceſſary precautions being taken, one Hellichins, a captain of foot, having brought over his company to join him, the magazines and arms were ſeized on, and then he cauſed a manifeſto to be publiſhed and diſtributed among the people to the following purport: that thoſe perſons who called themſelves the ſtates of Sweden, had not only uſurped that power, but had likewiſe, by their arbitrary proceedings, brought the nation to a ſtate of ruin: that they had entered into foreign connections without the conſent of either the king or the people; and although the people were in a manner ſtarving, yet no corn had been brought into the country to relieve their preſſing neceſſities: that under pretence of promoting the good of the ſubjects, they had made the moſt oppreſſive taxes: that they had ſtripped the king of the regal power, and left him no more than an empty title; ſo that however willing he might be to redreſs their grievances, yet it was not in his power. For theſe reaſons, and for many others that might be mentioned, they renounced all allegiance to this pretended diet, and exhorted all faithful Swedes to join with them in ſuppreſſing an order that had brought ſuch evils upon the kingdom. They concluded, in the uſual ſtrain, with an appeal to heaven, of the rectitude of their motives and intentions; at the ſame time, begging for the divine bleſſing upon their undertakings. The whole garriſon of Chriſtianſtadt declared in favour of the manifeſto, and they were ſoon joined by vaſt numbers of peaſants from different parts of the country.

The plan being thus ſet in motion, and ſo far promiſing ſucceſs, was immediately ſeconded by the two princes Charles, and Frederic Adolphus. The former, who was then at Carelſcroon, no ſooner received advice of the ſucceſs of Hellichins, than he aſſembled the troops in the neighbourhood, and having taken upon him the command of the garriſon, which was well ſupplied with arms and ammunition, cauſed a kind of ambiguous manifeſto to be publiſhed, and then leaving a ſufficient force in the garriſon, headed the remaining troops, and began his march to Chriſtianſtadt, with ſeveral pieces of cannon. The latter taking the ſame advantage of the inſurrection, put himſelf at the head of the troops in Oſtragothia, before any news had reached Stockholm. In the mean time general Rudbeck, who happened to be then in Oſtragothia, ſet out for Stockholm, and having informed the ſenate of theſe proceedings, and ſhewn them prince Charles's manifeſto, there remained no doubt what were the real intentions of the court.

As the guards were firmly attached to the king, the ſenate did not chuſe to truſt them, nor did they conſult the king upon any thing. They ordered the burghers to put themſelves under arms, and take their ſtations in different parts of the city, under the command of count Halling; who was alſo conſidered as prime miniſter.

The king affected a degree of unconcern at theſe proceedings of the ſenate; nay, he even connived at their affixing his name and ſeal to an order for recalling his brother, after he had peremptorily refuſed to ſign it; but notwithſtanding this ſeeming inactivity, he was taking the moſt effectual meaſures to accompliſh the great deſign he had in view; to the ſucceſs of which nothing contributed ſo much as the ſecrecy and ſilence with which they were conducted. The Senate had ſent for two regiments from Upland, and, upon their arrival, the king demanded to know why they had ſent for troops without his conſent. In conſequence of this they, in a manner, commanded him to ſhew them ſome letters that had been ſent him by his brothers; but this he refuſed in the moſt poſitive manner. The altercation between the king and the ſenate grew warm; and one of them proceeded ſo far as to attempt to ſeize his ſword, upon which he boldly drew it; and the ſenators were ſo much alarmed, that he had an opportunity of getting out at the door, which he locked behind him, and put the key in his pocket.

Having thus ſecured the ſenators, he went to the guard-room, where he aſſembled the officers, and made a long ſpeech to them, complaining of the miſeries the people groaned under from the abuſe of power in the ſenators, and that this cruel tyranny became every day more and more intolerable.

He told them further, that he was determined to run all hazards to diſplace them, and aſked the officers whether they would not aſſiſt their king in ſhaking off ſo ignominious a yoke, and reſtoring the nation to its antient liberty. To this propoſal the officers in general aſſented with great readineſs, as well as the ſoldiers; upon which the king aſked them, if they would take an oath of allegiance to him, with which they as readily complied.

Every thing being thus far conducted, the king, in conſequence of a previous conſultation with his friends, had a white handkerchief round his arm, as a ſignal; upon which many of the nobility and gentry flocked to him. He then put himſelf at the head of the guards, and ſeized on all the magazines, without the leaſt oppoſition.

The whole garriſon of Stockholm, although commanded by baron Rudbeck, an enemy to royalty, deſerted their leader, and followed the king's ſtandard. The old baron ran with his ſword drawn thro' the ſtreets, calling out to the people to take arms in defence of their liberties; but it was too late, for they were perſuaded they might live as happily under one governor, as under five hundred.

Thus, in a large nation, a revolution was brought about without bloodſhed, or any oppoſition; while the people flocked together without the leaſt riot or tumult. The king then repaired to the caſtle, where having aſſembled the foreign miniſters, he told them, that it was with the utmoſt reluctance he had been obliged to take ſuch a ſtep, as would ſurprize all Europe; but the ſafety of his own perſon, and the ſecurity of the ſtate, rendered it abſolutely neceſſary. He entreated them to inform their reſpective courts, that his motives, when made known, would juſtify him; and that this affair ſhould not make the leaſt alteration in his conduct with reſpect to the other European powers. The next morning all the magiſtrates took an oath to obey none but the king, and ſuch of the ſenators or deputies who refuſed to take it, were committed to priſon, and told, that unleſs they complied within one month, they muſt for ever depart the kingdom.

The following day being appointed for aboliſhing the old form of government, and eſtabliſhing the new, the king ordered the ſtates to be aſſembled for that purpoſe. Previous to this, guards had been placed round the hall of the palace, ſo that there was not the leaſt doubt but his orders would be punctually obeyed. The king entered the hall in his regalia, and having made a long ſpeech, complained of the ſenate for having preſumed to act as if in a legiſlative capacity, without power from the diet. He added, that the diet on the one hand, and the ſenate on the other, ſeemed to claim each a ſeparate power, while he himſelf, though honoured with the title of king, enjoyed no more than the ſhadow of royalty; and concluded with aſſuring them, that the ſenate had actually preſumed to receive ſubſidies from foreign powers, whoſe councils governed Sweden; but that he would now aſſert the honour of his crown, and promote the intereſts of all his loyal and peaceable ſubjects.

The king then took a moſt ſolemn oath, by which he renounced all claim to arbitrary power; after which he cauſed the new form of government to be read. It conſiſted of fifty-ſeven articles, but they may be all comprized in the following: That the king ſhall, for the future, chuſe the ſenate, or, in other words, he ſhall appoint to that office ſuch as he may approve: that he ſhall aſſemble the ſtates when he pleaſes, and likewiſe, when he pleaſes, diſſolve their meeting, ſo as they have ſat at one time full three months: that the taxes ſhall be granted by the ſtates; but if not granted within three months after their meeting, then the old ones ſhall be levied. In caſe of any ſudden exigence, ſuch as the fear of invaſion, the king ſhall impoſe taxes till ſuch time as the ſtates can be called together: that when the ſtates are aſſembled, they are not to deliberate on any thing but what the king ſhould cauſe to be laid before them: that the king ſhall have full power to diſpoſe of the army and navy in whatever manner he pleaſes, and likewiſe to give away all places, either in the civil or military departments.

When all the articles were read, the king ſtood up, and aſked the ſtates, Whether they would give their oath to obſerve this form of government? As they knew that it was in vain to diſpute, they unanimouſly conſented; after which they were immediately ſworn in the king's preſence, and the ſpeakers of each order ſigned a bond in the name of the reſt.

The great work being thus finally accompliſhed, the king ſtood up, and told them, that it was neceſſary they ſhould return thanks to God for bringing about ſo happy an event, without the effuſion of human blood; and then taking a book out of his pocket, the whole aſſembly joined with him in ſinging Te Deum, according to the cuſtom of the Lutherans. They were then permitted to kiſs his hand; after which the king departed, and the ſtates ſeparated, without knowing whether they were ever to meet again.

Next day, all the old ſenators were diſmiſſed, and, in their room, fifteen noblemen were appointed, on whoſe attachment to him he could, with the moſt unſhaken confidence, rely.

As the diſtreſſes of the poor were then much aggravated by a dearth of proviſions, nothing could ſo effectually tend to the popularity of the king and odium of the ſenators as the royal interference in ſo intereſting a particular. With this view he cauſed ten thouſand meaſures of meal to be diſtributed among them, each meaſure weighing twenty pounds; which, although far from being ſufficient to relieve all their wants, had the deſired effect. He alſo cauſed the diet of the ſtates to be aſſembled. Every thing now ſeemed totally changed; for, inſtead of enquiring into the conduct of the king, as had been cuſtomary on former occaſions, each order of the ſtates ſtrove who ſhould be the firſt to flatter him, and every thing he aſked was granted, without one diſſenting voice. The ſupplies were granted in the moſt laviſh manner; and a ſecret committee being choſen from each order of the ſtates, to aſſiſt the ſenate, the king diſmiſſed them, and they returned to their reſpective habitations with as much complacency as if he had been conferring with them on the moſt valuable privileges.

The revolution thus effected in this extenſive kingdom reflects the higheſt honour on the young prince, who accompliſhed it at a time when ariſtocracy, under the ſpecious appearance of an equitable repreſentation, ſeemed ready to trample on the rights of the people, after having wreſted from the king every prerogative of royalty, but an empty name. There is an inherent attachment in mankind to their natural rights, for which they will ever contend when opportunity offers. Theſe people nobly concurred with their ſovereign in aſſerting the honour of his crown and promoting their own beſt intereſts; their efforts ſucceeded to their moſt ſanguine wiſhes, and they ſtand upon record to warn ſenators in general from ſuch daring as well as dangerous attempts.

While the king of Sweden was diſplaying the greateſt abilities in ſetting up a new form of government, the ſtate of public affairs in Denmark aſſumed a new face. The king had, for ſome time, made choice of one favourite after another; but ſcarcely had any of them gained a ſhare of his friendſhip and confidence, than they were diſcarded with peculiar marks of diſgrace.

Among others who, like needy adventurers, came to ſettle in Copenhagen, was one Struenſee, the ſon of a Lutheran miniſter in Holſtein. He was a young man of the moſt inſinuating addreſs, with very good abilities, but profligate in his manners, and abandoned to every vice, not paying the leaſt regard to any obligations, civil or ſacred.

The rapid progreſs which this adventurer, and one Brandt, his companion, made by their inſinuating addreſs, was moſt extraordinary. They were both raiſed to the dignity of noblemen; and Struenſee was made prime miniſter, a circumſtance which could not fail of raiſing an indignation in the minds of the Daniſh nobility. By his advice, accompanied with that of his friend Brandt, all the old counſellors were diſgraced and baniſhed; till at laſt the two favourites, intoxicated with power, could ſet no bounds to their madneſs, but even treated the king with contempt.

Such glaring inſolence and preſumption in two foreigners, who could claim no pre-eminence in rank, could not fail to inflame the minds of the ſubjects of every degree; nor can it be wondered that their downfall was meditated and effected. To this end a conſpiracy was formed, and, to give it the greater ſanction, the queen-dowager, ſecond wife of the late king, was at the head of it. Every thing being ripe for execution, a maſked ball was given at court on the ſixteenth of January, and, as ſoon as it was over, the king, who ſeemed to labour under great weakneſs of mind, retired to reſt. He had not, however, been long in bed, when the principal conſpirators came into his chamber, and told him, that the reigning queen, with Struenſee and Brandt, were that inſtant employed in drawing up a paper, which they would force him to ſign; the contents of which were, that he was to renounce the crown. The queen-dowager told him, that there was no way of ſaving himſelf, but by ſigning an order to take into cuſtody the reigning queen, with the two odious favourites; and the king, much alarmed, readily complied. The warrant was immediately executed, and the queen, with the two favourites, were committed to different priſons. The queen was afterwards ſent to the caſtle of Cronenburg, where ſhe remained ſome time very cloſely confined, but, by the interpoſition of her royal brother, the king of Great-Britain, ſhe was ſet at liberty, and ſuffered to reſide at Zell, in the electorate of Hanover, with a penſion equal to her dignity, where ſhe languiſhed for ſome time and then died with grief.

But the fate of the two favourites was otherwiſe determined. They were confined in cloſe dungeons, and not allowed any thing to ſubſiſt on but bread and water, nor were their beards ſuffered to be ſhaved. They were examined from time to time during the ſpace of two months, and threatened with being put to the torture, unleſs they made an open confeſſion. At laſt ſentence of death was paſſed upon them, that they ſhould have their right hands cut off, and then their heads; and that, after their quarters had been expoſed on the wheel, they ſhould be placed on the moſt conſpicuous parts in the city. Accordingly this ſentence was executed, in all its rigour, on the twenty-eighth day of April, on a ſcaffold near the city, in the midſt of a vaſt concourſe of people. They both behaved with great decency and reſignation.

On the twenty-ſixth day of November the parliament met; and his majeſty, in his ſpeech from the throne, informed the members, that his reaſon for calling them ſo ſoon, was to take into their conſideration ſome things of the utmoſt importance. He told them, that he had been informed, from the moſt undoubted authority, that the Eaſt-India Company was in a moſt diſtreſſed condition; and that, as many of his good ſubjects had their fortunes depending on the credit of that company, therefore its ſecurity was now become a national concern. He deſired them to take it into their immediate conſideration, and, if poſſible, lay down ſome rational plan, by which the intereſt and honour of the company might be reſtored, and every thing ſettled on the moſt permanent footing. He took notice, that he had the ſtrongeſt aſſurances from the powers on the continent, that the peace of Europe would not be any farther diſturbed than ſo far as the war was carried on between the Turks and Ruſſians. He concluded by recommending to them the moſt prudent methods that could be made uſe of, in order to reduce the price of proviſions, as the diſtreſſes of the poor were not imaginary, but real; and that nothing would give him greater pleaſure, than to hear that thoſe diſtreſſes were alleviated.

As ſoon as the commons returned to their houſe, Mr. Fitzpatrick, brother to the earl of Oſſory, moved, that a loyal addreſs ſhould be preſented to his majeſty, and introduced the motion with the following remarks. He ſaid, that the affairs of the Eaſt-India Company were in the moſt alarming and ruinous condition: that the immediate interpoſition of parliament was become highly indiſpenſable to their preſervation: that in 1769, the company had agreed with the government to pay the ſum of four thouſand pounds at every time when their dividend amounted to twelve per cent. and ſo on in proportion till it fell to ſix, when that payment was to ceaſe: that this being the caſe, and the preſent diſtreſſed ſtate of the company ſo notorious, it would be neceſſary to make ſome proviſion adequate to the deficiency: that, ſo far from the company's being able to make a dividend of either twelve or ſix per cent. at the end of the next half year, it would be an act of the higheſt fraud in the directors to divide a ſingle ſhilling. Some of the members oppoſed the addreſs; but the vote being put, it was carried in the affirmative by a very great majority, and preſented accordingly.

The firſt thing of importance which came under the conſideration of the houſe of commons, was the ſtate of the navy, and this occaſioned very warm debates. The objections made by thoſe in oppoſition were to the following import. They ſaid, that the number of ſeamen was too great to be kept up in time of profound peace; and that we were at peace with all our neighbours was declared in the ſpeech from the throne. It was further urged, that the miniſtry had not given in an account in what manner the ſupplies granted laſt year had been uſed, ſo that the houſe was left quite in the dark.

The miniſtry, on the other hand, had but little to ſay; only that they urged the neceſſity of keeping our navy on the moſt reſpectable footing; and ſet forth, that our fleet in the Eaſt-Indies was much greater than formerly. Thoſe in oppoſition ſaid, that when the public granted money, they had a right to enquire in what manner it was to be laid out: that the utmoſt ſatisfaction ought to be given to thoſe who contributed towards ſupporting the dignity of government: that ſome of thoſe employed in the building of ſhips for the royal navy had added to them ſome very extraordinary decorations, which, although wholly unneceſſary, had been attended with great expence. It was added, that the ſlow payment of the navy bills was a great hardſhip to thoſe who advanced money on the credit of them; that ſuch an abuſe ought to be redreſſed before any farther ſupplies were granted: that it was very ſurpriſing, that, after the declaration from the throne, that we were in the moſt profound ſtate of peace, as many men ſhould be aſked for as if we were at war with the moſt formidable power in Europe.

Upon the whole, the arguments were carried on with great force by thoſe in oppoſition. It was aſked, if a naval force muſt be kept up in the Eaſt-Indies, what end it was to anſwer? had we any enemy to oppoſe in that part of the world; and if ſo, who was that enemy? what armament had been ſent into thoſe ſeas to diſturb our ſettlements, or haraſs our trade? It was further aſked, in an ironical manner, whether the Chineſe had fitted out a fleet, whether we had any pirates to contend with, and whether the ghoſt of the famous Angria had made its appearance on the theatre of this world? if no anſwer could be made to theſe queſtions, if no reaſon could be aſſigned for keeping up ſuch a ſtrong naval force, then the motion ought to be rejected, and no money granted for that purpoſe, ſeeing there was no reaſon for it, unleſs it was to burthen the people with unneceſſary taxes. But, notwithſtanding the force of theſe arguments, no ſooner was the queſtion put, than it was carried for the miniſtry by a great majority, and the ſupplies were granted.

A motion was then made to enquire into the nature of thoſe cauſes which occaſioned the dearth of all ſorts of proviſions. Several regulations were made with reſpect to bread, and ſome reſtrictions laid upon the bakers, but without the deſired effect, for unleſs the rents of landed eſtates and farms can be lowered, by the retrenchment of different ſpecies of luxury, the legiſlature itſelf will never be able to remedy the evils complained of. To redreſs any grievances, nothing can be more proper, nothing more ſalutary, than to begin with the effects, and to trace them up to the original cauſes from whence they ſpring. In vain does the legiſlative power lay the inferior order of tradeſmen under ſome ſort of reſtrictions, when, at the ſame time, it is well known, that unleſs the cauſes are removed, the effects muſt remain in the ſame ſtate as before. Moſt of thoſe who compoſe our houſes of parliament are landholders; and if they know that the rents of their farms are double to what they were were twenty years ago, conſequently, the prices of all ſorts of proviſions muſt riſe in proportion. Such was and is the real cauſe of complaint.

A ſecret committee having been appointed to enquire into the ſtate of the Eaſt-India company's affairs, it was found, by their report, that the affairs of the company were both perplexed, and very much diſtreſſed. It was therefore propoſed, that ſupervifors ſhould be ſent to the Eaſt-Indies, to make a proper enquiry how far the officers and ſervants belonging to the company had abuſed the truſt repoſed in them, and to have power to grant redreſs to all thoſe who appeared to be in the leaſt injured. Some of the members, whoſe fortunes lay in the Eaſt-India ſtock, made ſtrong objections to this bill, while thoſe who ſupported it retorted upon them, by declaring, that nothing but oppreſſion had been carried on in that part of the world; and as the company had, either directly or indirectly, encouraged ſuch practices, it was now high time to call them to an account for their conduct, and prevent them, for the future, from acting in ſuch a manner as could ſerve no other end beſides that of diſgracing themſelves, and bringing a real diſhonour upon the nation. At laſt the motion was carried in the uſual manner; and ſupervifors were appointed, with plenary powers to make a proper enquiry into all the abuſes complained of, and to rectify them as far as lay in their power.

A motion was next made to enquire into the ſtate of the army, and particularly, whether it was neceſſary that we ſhould, in times of peace, keep up ſuch a ſtrong military force as ſeemed of no other uſe but to impoveriſh the nation, and to be ready at all times to ſupport the arbitrary dictates of a miniſter. It was ſaid by thoſe who promoted the motion, that the national militia was at all times able to preſerve us from our enemies at home; and as for ſuch ſettlements as we had abroad, a very ſmall force was ſufficient, eſpecially as we were not engaged in a war with any of the powers on the continent. In anſwer to this, the miniſtry ſaid, that all other European nations kept up ſtanding armies, and therefore it was, in a manner, neceſſary that we ſhould do the ſame, otherwiſe, if a war was to break out, we ſhould be utterly unprepared, and, conſequently, we ſhould be expoſed to many unforeſeen dangers. The queſtion being then put, it was negatived by a great majority: indeed, at that time the weight of miniſterial influence bore down all oppoſition.

A. D. 1773. The parliament met purſuant to their laſt adjournment, and took into conſideration the acts relating to penalties inflicted on thoſe who infringed the laws reſpecting the preſervation of the game. This ſubject is of the utmoſt importance to the inhabitants of a free country, and therefore it was diſcuſſed both upon natural and municipal principles. Thoſe who oppoſed the act argued upon thoſe principles by which mankind muſt have been actuated when conſidered in a ſtate of nature. Thus a wild beaſt in the fields had been, time immemorial, conſidered as the property of the public; and if either its fleſh or ſkin were of any value, then the perſon who took or killed it was to conſider it as his own. In proof of this, it may be added, that ſome of the Anglo-Saxon kings remitted the tax which the Welſh uſed to pay, upon condition that they produced a certain number of wolves heads, by which means that deſtructive ſpecies of animals was eradicated out of the country.

On the other hand, it was urged, that whatever might be the privileges belonging to men in a ſtate of nature, they were all cancelled as ſoon as civil ſociety took place: that all municipal laws were made for the good of ſociety, and in the preamble to every act, reaſons were aſſigned for the conduct of the legiſlative power. One reaſon, indeed, was declared to be unanſwerable, and that was, that in a commercial nation, where every perſon is ſuppoſed to get his living by honeſt induſtry, gaming in general ought to be laid under the ſevereſt reſtrictions: that poaching, or killing of game, led the lower order of people away from their lawful employment: and while they were ſpending their time in taking a hare or a fox, their families were left to ſtarve: that though the laws made for the preſervation of the game might ſeem to interfere with private property, yet they were ſuch as would ſtand warranted by good ſenſe and ſober reaſon. Nothing, however, was done on this ſubject. The miniſtry promoted the bill to acquire ſome ſhare of popularity; the other party oppoſed it for the ſake of oppoſition.

A bill was then brought in for ſhortening the duration of parliaments, and many learned arguments were adduced in its favour, nevertheleſs there was a powerful majority againſt it, and, to the ſurprize of many, it was thrown out. It was afterwards moved in the houſe, that a bill ſhould be brought in to enable foreigners to lend money on the credit of ſome of our Weſt-India ſettlements; and the reaſon for this motion was, that many foreigners who had money to lend on real ſecurity, would be glad to lay it out in that manner, if they could only have it in their power to recover their debts according to the common law of England. It was further urged, that ſuch a practice would, in a great meaſure, reduce the price of ſugar, and, at the ſame time, our colonies would become more reſpectable than ever. That the intereſt of the colonies and the mother-country were reciprocal; there was no line to be drawn between them, becauſe they muſt ſtand or fall together; they were links of the ſame chain, wheels of the ſame machine; and no ſooner was one diſcompoſed, than all the reſt went into a ſtate of confuſion.

In conſequence of what had been urged upon this occaſion, a motion was made, that the houſe ſhould reſolve itſelf into a committee, to enquire into the propriety of foreigners being connected in our trade to any parts of the world, excluſive of Europe. This motion took its riſe from the following cauſe, namely, the power granted to the lords of the admiralty to ſtop all ſhips which were not wholly the property of Britiſh ſubjects. It was proved, by the evidence of ſeveral witneſſes, that ſome ſhips had been detained at Graveſend a whole month, for no other reaſon, but becauſe part of the cargoes belonged to foreign merchants. The reſult of all this was, that leave was given to bring in a bill to remedy the evil complained of, which having paſſed both houſes, received the royal aſſent.

The attention of parliament in the courſe of this long and very important ſeſſion, was directed to an object that will ever do honor to their memory. As no proviſion had been made in favour of perſons acquitted on trial by verdict of jury, many innocent ſubjects had been aggrieved by being detained in goal for want of money to pay their fees; nay, ſome unfortunate wretches had remained in durance a whole year on that account. Long, indeed, had this practice been a diſgrace to the nation, till, about forty years ago the city of London don, at the inſtance of baron Thompſon, their recorder, ſet the example of diſcharging every priſoner, without fees, as ſoon as he was acquitted by the jury. The noble generoſity of the citizens of London was not, however, adopted by thoſe who lived in more diſtant counties. To remedy an evil of ſo glaring a nature, a bill was at length brought in to oblige every county to make good all the deficiencies due to gaolers by keeping the priſoners. In conſequence of this humane reſolution, the priſoner who is now acquitted muſt be diſcharged without paying any fees. The verdict of the jury ſhall make him as free as if he had never been in priſon; he may go from the bar to his own family without being called in queſtion, or detained for any fees whatever; his impriſonment being conſidered as a great puniſhment after his innocence has been proved.

A great variety of buſineſs being thus finiſhed, his majeſty on the 21ſt of July went to the houſe of peers, and after ſigning ſuch bills as were ready, prorogued the parliament.

In the month of June the king made an excurſion to Portſmouth, in order to inſpect the ſtate of the dock-yard, forts, &c. at that place, as alſo to review the fleet aſſembled at Spithead for that purpoſe. The ſhores both on Portſmouth and Goſport ſides, were lined by the populace, who expreſſed their loyalty by ſaluting his majeſty with guns, acclamations and other demonſtrations of joy. The king expreſſed the higheſt approbation of the good order and diſcipline of his fleet, and the regularity with which every different marine department was conducted, and diſcovered the utmoſt ſatisfaction at the demonſtrations of loyalty he received from his people. He was pleaſed to make many liberal diſtributions, and to releaſe the priſoners confined in Portſmouth gaol.

With reſpect to the ſtate of affairs on the continent, particularly in Poland, and near the Danube, nothing deciſive happened during the whole of this year. Many different engagements happened, indeed, between the Turks and the Ruſſians, but both parties continued ſtill in ſuch an uncertain ſtate, that they were obliged to act on the defenſive. Some propoſals, indeed, were made by both parties, towards bringing about a laſting peace, but nothing was done, for the Ruſſians were high in their demands, and the Turks were too proud to comply. The king of Pruſſia, that great politician and general, propoſed, that the wretched kingdom of Poland ſhould be divided into three parts, in the following manner. That vaſt, extenſive track of land, reaching from the Boriſthenes to Muſcovy, was to be ceded to the empreſs of Ruſſia; the emperor of Germany was to have the ſouthern parts of Great Poland from Warſaw to Cracovia, and from thence to the confines of Hungary. All that part of Poland which reaches from Warſaw along the Oder and Viſtula to Dantzick, and afterwards along the coaſt of the Baltic Sea, were to be given to the king of Pruſſia. Thus a nation, one of the moſt fertile in Europe, after being torne in pieces by inteſtine diviſions, was to become the property of three mighty ſovereigns who had no right to it beſides that of lawleſs power. The great object the king of Pruſſia had in view, was to ſeize the opulent town of Dantzick, in order to open a trade to Peterſburgh through the Sound, and to all the other mercantile ſtates in Europe. This was one of the boldeſt ſtrokes that could have been ſtruck: but in all things the king of Pruſſia is ſuch a maſter in politics, as well as the art of war, that no taſk appears to him too arduous to undertake.

During the whole of this year, vaſt numbers of people emigrated from Scotland, and the north of England, to ſettle in America. To an ingenuous perſon, this emigration of the people from the mother-country to the colonies, muſt have the moſt alarming aſpect. The cauſes, however, ought to be attended to by thoſe who are proprietors of landed eſtates; for if the uſeful working people are driven out of the country, where are hands to be found to cultivate the ground? This may, in the end, render their eſtates of no manner of ſervice, and that ground which might have been cultivated at a moderate price will become a deſart.

In France, nothing of importance happened this year. The Spaniards continued to go on in their uſual indolent manner, while the Dutch continued to be the drudges of all thoſe who would employ them.

In Italy, the pope put a final end to the order of the Jeſuits; and thoſe fathers, who had been ſo long reſpected by the people, are now become of ſo little conſideration, that all nations have refuſed them an aſylum, except the king of Pruſſia, who has, at all times, made religion ſubſervient to politics.

A. D. 1774. The parliament met on the twenty-fifth of January, and the king, in his ſpeech from the throne, recommended to them to take into their ſerious conſideration the ſtate of the colonies, who ſeemed to be attempting to throw off all ſubjection to the Britiſh government. He told them that the moſt ſalutary laws had been treated with contempt, and public acts of parliament had been deſpiſed, as if they had been the mandates of ſingle perſons: that the colonies were little better than in a ſtate of rebellion: and that, unleſs ſome vigorous meaſures were uſed to force them to obedience, all laws would be trampled under foot, and the regularity which took place among the different ranks of beings would once more return to its original ſtate of confuſion. He concluded by recommending to them the ſtate of the gold coin, which had ſuffered much by the illicit practices of wicked perſons, and hoped they would put it on a ſolid foundation.

When the commons had returned to their own houſe, ſtrong debates enſued upon the words of the addreſs, which ſhould be preſented to his majeſty. Thoſe in the intereſt of the court inſiſted, that an implicit acknowledgment ſhould be made, thanking his majeſty for his paternal care of the nation and to promiſe that every reaſonable meaſure ſhould be complied with. On the other hand, it was urged by thoſe in oppoſition, that the colonies, ſo far from being in a ſtate of rebellion, were only contending for the enjoyment of thoſe rights and privileges which belong to all men in common as members of ſociety: that the mother-country had no right to tax thoſe emigrants, unleſs a conſent to that meaſure was firſt had and obtained from their own repreſentatives: that the colonies were not regularly, nor in any ſenſe whatever repreſented in the Britiſh parliament; and therefore, till ſuch time as that legal repreſentation took place, no taxes could, in juſtice, be impoſed upon them. As to the affair of the gold coin, it was (ſaid they) a great hardſhip to the honeſt, induſtrious trading part of the nation; and that the miniſtry ought, before any thing of that nature had been propoſed, to have laid down ſome national plan by which the public would have been indemnified. Such were the outlines of the arguments made uſe of by both parties; but the queſtion being put to the vote, it was carried by a great majority in favour of the court.

The grand object which the government had in view, was to reduce the colonies to a ſtate of obedience, and convince them of the neceſſity they were under of being ſubject to the mother-country; and therefore a bill was brought in of a very coercive nature. Some perſons in Boſton had plundered three ſhips which were ſent from England with tea; and as this was an act which infringed on private property, it called aloud for an exertion of the regal power. Accordingly an act paſſed to remove the cuſtoms from the town of Boſton, to quarter a military force upon the people, and to block up their harbour by ſeveral ſhips of war.

Many important affairs were diſcuſſed during this ſeſſion of parliament; particularly one for the regulation of all acts by which foreigners were to be naturalized. The freedom of this country is ſo great and uncircumſcribed, that many bad uſes had been made of it by deſigning perſons. To remedy an evil attended with ſo many deſtructive conſequences, a new law was eſtabliſhed, by which no foreigner who is naturalized can enjoy the privileges of a Britiſh ſubject, unleſs he reſides in the country.

Among the bills which paſſed this ſeſſion was one that produced an univerſal clamour among the people. It was entitled, "An act for the future government of Quebec;" in which were two clauſes that gave great offence. The firſt allowed the Romiſh clergy the free exerciſe of their religion as eſtabliſhed by the 1ſt of Queen Elizabeth, and the enjoyment of the accuſtomed dues and rights from perſons profeſſing that religion. The ſecond referred all controverſies reſpecting property and civil rights to the deciſion of the Canada laws then in being, or ſuch as might be afterwards enacted by the governor, lieutenant-governor, and legiſlative council.

The parliamentary buſineſs being concluded, his majeſty, on the 22d of June, went to the houſe of peers, and, after ſigning ſuch bills as were then ready, prorogued the parliament.

The French, ever willing to take part with the enemies of Great Britain, and, at the ſame time, fearful leſt, in conſequence of the Turks being driven out of Europe, the houſe of Auſtria would become too formidable, and Ruſſia would penetrate into the German empire, ſent ſeveral of their moſt experienced officers to inſtruct the Turks in the art of war. Continual oppoſition made theſe barbarians wiſer than before; they ſaw the abſolute neceſſity they were under of having recourſe to military diſcipline, and the regular order of the Ruſſians enabled them to take the field in a much better manner than they had hitherto done. From this circumſtance it was naturally inferred, that the longer the war continued between thoſe contending powers, the more able the Turks would be to oppoſe the Ruſſians. Indeed, this climate bore hard againſt the latter; for it could not be ſuppoſed, that men brought up in the cold deſarts of Ruſſia could reliſh the ſweets of a warmer climate, without being reduced to a ſtate of effeminacy. Thus we find, that the climate of antient Greece, then the ſeat of war, fought more ſtrongly againſt the Ruſſians than the army of the Turks.

Nor was it better with the Ruſſian fleet; for although the ſailors were kept under the ſtricteſt diſcipline, and had been inured to many hardſhips, yet no ſooner did they come into the Mediterranean ſea, than they were ſeized with many diſeaſes to which they had hitherto been ſtrangers. Reinforcements, indeed, had been ſent them from time to time; but ſtill they had never done any thing of real importance, nor had they been able to ſecond the operations of the army by land.

Such, for ſome time, had been the ſtate of affairs between the Turks and Ruſſians, and the fate of their very reſolute and vigorous conteſt ſtill continued to excite the attention, and raiſe the expectation of all Europe.

The Britiſh miniſtry were at this time particularly engaged in providing for the ſafety of their fellow-ſubjects in the Eaſt Indies. It had been long complained of, that the ſervants of the company, at their principal ſettlements, had acted in a very oppreſſive and illegal manner, nor indeed had any code of laws been made for their ſecurity. The vaſt diſtance from England rendered it difficult, and almoſt impoſſible, for any perſon to obtain redreſs. It was therefore reſolved on in council, that four gentlemen learned in the laws, and of the moſt approved integrity, ſhould be ſent over to Aſia, where we have ſettlements, and act there as judges. They were to hold pleas of the crown, determine in real, mixed and perſonal actions, to give judgment in all caſes of equity, in every thing relating to the revenue, ſo that their power included all that was lodged in the courts of Weſtminſter-hall; but as the ſettlements were diſtant from each other, ſo the courts were not to be fixed, but to move from one place to another, that juſtice might be equally diſtributed to all ranks of people.

It is, perhaps, impoſſible to prevent abuſes, unleſs nature herſelf could be changed; but certainly government could not have done any more for the good of our ſubjects in India, than that of ſending over judges. It muſt ſerve to give ſome reſpect to the laws, and impreſs mens minds with a reverence for juſtice. The ſalaries of the judges being very large, they were placed above temptation to corrupt actions; and their authority extending over all ranks of people, the rich could not have it in their power to oppreſs the poor.

The death of the emperor Muſtapha III. together with the ſucceſſes of the Ruſſians in various engagements, and the diſorder, mutiny and deſertion which prevailed among the Turkiſh troops, threw the whole Ottoman empire into confuſion; ſo that at length the Porte thought proper to agree to, and ratify, articles of peace propoſed by the Ruſſians.

On the tenth of May the French king departed this life, and was ſucceeded by his grandſon, Lewis XVI. a young prince about twenty years of age, married to one of the ſiſters of the emperor of Germany. Lewis XV. was one of the moſt brilliant ſovereigns that has appeared in Europe during the preſent century; and although ſome of his acts to his ſubjects were of a very arbitrary and oppreſſive nature, yet he was beloved by them in general.

The encouragement given to the fine arts by his majeſty king George III. has brought to light many new diſcoveries. An attempt had been made to diſcover a paſſage by the north pole; but the prodigious ſhoals and mountains of ice in thoſe ſeas rendered the ſcheme abortive. In 1768 Mr. Banks, an ingenious young gentleman, and Dr. Solander, Solander, a native of Sweden, who had ſtudied under the great Linneus, undertook a voyage to the South Seas, under the protection of government. They traverſed ſeas and viſited iſlands almoſt unknown before, and though nothing very beneficial has yet reſulted from their diſcoveries, there is no doubt but others will improve upon them. The ſame gentlemen afterwards made a voyage to the North Seas, and viſited Iceland, a place though belonging to the king of Denmark, yet but very little known.

The literary world now ſuſtained a great loſs in the deaths of lord Lyttleton, Dr. Goldſmith, and Dr. Gregory.

The Engliſh parliament having been diſſolved by proclamation and the writs for calling a new one made returnable on the 29th of November, his majeſty, the following day, went to the houſe of peers, and having approved of the re-election of Sir Fletcher Norton as ſpeaker, opened the ſeſſion with the following ſpeech from the throne:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"It gives me much concern, that I am obliged at the opening of this parliament, to inform you, that a moſt daring ſpirit of reſiſtance and diſobedience to the law ſtill unhappily prevails in the province of Maſſachuſet's Bay, and has, in divers parts of it, broke forth in freſh violences of a very criminal nature. Theſe proceedings have been countenanced and encouraged in others of my colonies, and unwarrantable attempts have been made to obſtruct the commerce of this kingdom, by unlawful combinations. I have taken ſuch meaſures and given ſuch orders, as I judged moſt proper and effectual for carrying into execution the laws which were paſt in the laſt ſeſſion of the late parliament for the protection and ſecurity of rhe commerce of my ſubjects, and for the reſtoring and preſerving peace, order and good government, in the province of Maſſachuſet's Bay; and you may depend upon my firm and ſtedfaſt reſolution to withſtand every attempt to weaken or impair the ſupreme authority of this legiſlature over all the dominions of my crown; the maintenance of which I conſider as eſſential to the dignity, the ſafety, and the welfare of the Britiſh empire; aſſuring myſelf, that, while I act upon theſe principles, I ſhall never fail to receive your aſſiſtance and ſupport.

"I have the greateſt ſatisfaction in being able to inform you, that a treaty of peace is concluded between Ruſſia and the Porte. By this happy event, the troubles which have ſo long prevailed in one part of Europe are compoſed and the general tranquillity rendered complete. It ſhall be my conſtant aim and endeavour to prevent the breaking out of freſh diſturbances; and I cannot but flatter myſelf I ſhall ſucceed, as I continue to receive the ſtrongeſt aſſurances from other powers of their being equally diſpoſed to preſerve the peace.

"Gentlemen of the houſe of Commons,

"I have ordered the proper eſtimates for the ſervice of the enſuing year to be laid before you; and I doubt not but that, in this Houſe of Commons, I ſhall meet with the ſame affectionate confidence, and the ſame proofs of zeal and attachment to my perſon and government, which I have always, during the courſe of my reign, received from my faithful Commons.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"Let me particularly recommend to you, at this time, to proceed with temper in your deliberations, and with unanimity in your reſolutions. Let my people, in every part of my dominions, be taught, by your example, to have a due reverence for the laws, and a juſt ſenſe of the bleſſings of our excellent conſtitution. They may be aſſured that, on my part, I have nothing ſo much at heart as the real proſperity and laſting happineſs of all my ſubjects."

To this ſpeech both houſes preſented very loyal and affectionate addreſſes; to each of which his majeſty was pleaſed to return a moſt gracious anſwer.

As this was the firſt ſeſſion of a new parliament, the ſwearing in of the members and other trifling matters incident on ſuch occaſions, engaged their attention for ſome days. This being over, they proceeded to buſineſs, which was begun by the houſe reſolving itſelf into a committee of ſupply to his majeſty; when divers reſolutions were entered into and agreed upon with reſpect to enlarging and maintaining naval and military forces to be employed in America.

The committee of ways and means levied the land-tax at 3s. in the pound. This occaſioned great debates in the houſe, but at length the queſtion being put, the houſe agreed with the committee, and a bill was ordered to be brought in accordingly.

On the 22d of December his majeſty went again to the houſe of peers and gave the royal aſſent to divers bills that were ready, after which he adjourned the parliament to the 19th of January.

A. D. 1775. The parliament met purſuant to adjournment, when lord North preſented to the houſe, by his majeſty's command, ſeveral parcels of American papers, the titles of which, being read by the clerk, appeared to be extracts of letters from the ſeveral governors of Boſton, New-York, New-Hampſhire, Rhode Iſland, Virginia, Penſylvania, and South-Carolina: the proceedings of the Continental and Provincial Congreſs, the firſt held at Philadelphia, and the latter at Cambridge near Boſton: inſtructions given at Provincial meetings of the ſeveral delegates appointed to aſſemble at the congreſs; copies of hand-bills; anonymous letters; reſolutions of different aſſemblies; proteſts of ſeveral diſtricts in the province of Georgia; meſſages between general Gage and the houſe of repreſentatives, with extracts of the ſeveral letters that paſſed between general Gage, lord Dartmouth, the ſecretary and board of admiralty, and the commander of the ſhips on the Boſton ſtation.

As ſoon as the clerk had finiſhed reading the titles of theſe papers, a motion was made that they ſhould lie on the table for inſpection, and that a future day ſhould be appointed for the whole houſe to go into a committee to conſider of the ſame; which, after ſome debates, was agreed to.

In the mean time petitions were preſented to the houſe from the merchants of London, Glaſgow, Briſtol, Liverpool, and other places, complaining of the great decay of trade, occaſioned by the unhappy differences between Great Britain and her colonies. Some of theſe petitions were referred to the committee appointed to take into conſideration the American papers; and others were referred to private committees appointed for the purpoſe.

The corporation of London alſo preſented an addreſs, remonſtrance and petition to the king; in which they complained of the meaſures that had been purſued, and were ſtill purſuing, againſt their fellow ſubjects in America; and earneſtly beſeeching his majeſty to diſcharge thoſe miniſters from his councils who had been the means of promoting them, as the firſt ſtep towards a full redreſs of the grievances ſo univerſally complained of by the people.

To this addreſs and petition his majeſty was pleaſed to return the following anſwer:

"It is with the utmoſt aſtoniſhment that I find any of my ſubjects capable of encouraging the rebellious diſpoſition which unhappily exiſts in ſome of my colonies in North America. Having entire confidence in the wiſdom of my parliament, the great council of the nation, I will ſteadily purſue thoſe meaſures which they have recommended for the ſupport of the conſtitutional rights of Great Britain, and the protection of the commercial intereſts of my kingdom."

Divers papers to the ſame import as thoſe laid before the lower, having at length been preſented to the upper houſe; lord Chatham roſe, and, after complaining much of the delay of adminiſtration in detaining the papers ſo long after their arrival, and alſo the error of their proceedings reſpecting America, his lordſhip made the following motion: "That an addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, praying that he would be graciouſly pleaſed to ſend orders to general Gage to withdraw his troops from Boſton, as the beſt means of eſtabliſhing a laſting concord with America." Great debates aroſe on this motion, but the queſtion being at length put, it was rejected by a conſiderable majority.

A few days after this, the ſame patriotic and able ſtateſman brought in a bill for reconciling the then differences between Great Britain and America. This alſo met with great oppoſition; and the queſtion being put, it ſhared the ſame fate with the preceding motion.

The papers relative to America were now taken into conſideration in the Lower Houſe. Among them were two official letters from lord Dartmouth to general Gage, and the general's letter to his lordſhip. From the tenour of theſe letters it appeared that the rage and diſcontents were greatly augmented on account of the laſt American acts paſſed by the parliament; and that they were working up into a kind of phrenzy by the gradual augmentation of the troops, and by the works and defences raiſed on Boſton Neck. General Gage drew, in ſome places, the moſt lamentable picture of the ſtate of that province, deſtitute at once of all legiſlative authority; and repreſented the whole as one general ſcene of anarchy and confuſion.

On the laſt day that the houſe went into a committe to examine the American papers, lord North began the buſineſs with a very accurate detail of every particular information laid before the committee, diſcriminating, in a very maſterly manner, the diſpoſition of the reſpective colonies, marked the leading characters of each, pointed out thoſe whoſe moderation prevailed, thoſe whoſe violence and unconſtitutional views were concealed under the appearance of duty and ſubmiſſion, and particularly directed to ſuch as he thought were in a ſtate of actual rebellion. He next adverted to the means employed to raiſe this ſeditious ſpirit on both ſides the water, entered minutely into a compariſon of the burthens borne by the people of both countries, ſtated the trade and commerce carried on between them, the advantages ariſing from that commerce, the moſt probable way of ſecuring them, and the very great diſparity there was between the ability and real ſupport which America afforded to this country, every perſon in Britain contributing at the rate of 25s. per head, whereas the Americans did not contribute 6d. His lordſhip then pointed out the meaſures intended to be purſued. He ſaid he ſhould propoſe a temporary act, to put a ſtop to all the foreign trade of New England, and particularly to their fiſhery on the banks of Newfoundland, till they returned to their duty. His lordſhip concluded by propoſing a conference with the houſe of lords, that a joint addreſs might be carried up to the throne, "To return thanks to his majeſty for communicating to the houſe the American papers, and that he would be pleaſed to take ſuch meaſures as might be ſuitable to his wiſdom for enforcing the laws againſt America; and promiſing to ſupport him, in a full and vigorous exertion of the ſame with their lives and fortunes."

Lord North's motion for the addreſs met with great oppoſition; but the queſtion being at length put, it was carried by a conſiderable majority.

When the reſolution of the committee for preſenting the addreſs was reported to the houſe, the ſpeaker was proceeding to the queſtion to agree with the report; but was interrupted by lord John Cavendiſh, who moved that the conſideration of the American papers ſhould be re-committed. In his ſpeech on the ſubject he ſtated very clearly and juſtly our domeſtic ſituation, our ſtate with the colonies and with foreign powers. He called the attention of the houſe to the unequal balance of our loſs and our gain in the event; in which we might find our revenue deſtroyed, our trade annihilated, and our empire itſelf overturned. And, if we ſucceeded in ſubduing America, we ſhould not gain any thing.

He was ſeconded by lord Irnham, who, after having, in a long ſpeech, agitated the queſtion on the ground propoſed by adminiſtration in a conſtitutional as well as in a political light, concluded with aſſerting that it appeared, in both thoſe views, formidable and deſtructive; and that it became abſolutely neceſſary to retract the unconſtitutional and impolitic ſteps which adminiſtration had hitherto taken.

The right hon. John Wilkes, Eſq. then lord-mayor of London, oppoſed the motion of the premier with great ability and force of argument. He adverted to the original ground and cauſe of the unhappy diſputes then ſubſiſting between Great Britain and her colonies, and inferred, from a variety of poſitions, that they aroſe from an aſſumed right of taxation, in oppoſition to the fundamental laws of human nature and the principles of the Engliſh conſtitution. He recommended the adoption of the plan of reconciliation propoſed by a noble lord in the other houſe. He pointed out the futility of the very means then purſued for the ſubjugation of America, and preſaged that very ſtate of independence to which it has ſince arrived; and ſpiritedly concluded with expreſſing a hope that the juſt vengeance of the people might overtake the authors of thoſe pernicious counſels, and that the loſs of the firſt province to the empire might be followed by the loſs of the heads of thoſe miniſters who adviſed ſuch weak and fatal meaſures.

Several other ſpeakers expatiated on the juſtneſs and propriety of the noble lord's motion; when at length the queſtion being put, it was rejected by a great majority.

An addreſs was then drawn up, and agreed to without a diviſion.

The next day the Commons ſent a meſſage to the the Lords, desiring a conference on the subject of the address to his majesty. In consequence of this several of the lords attended, and, after some debates, it was agreed that the address should be jointly presented by both houses to the king; which was accordingly done on the 9th of February. The answer his majesty returned was as follows:

"My lords and gentlemen,

"I thank you for this very dutiful and loyal address, and for the affectionate, solemn assurances you give me of your support in maintaining the just rights of my crown, and of the two Houses of Parliament; and you may depend on my taking the most speedy and effectual measures for enforcing due obedience to the laws and authority of the supreme legislature.

"Whenever any of my colonies shall make a proper and dutiful application, I shall be ready to concur with you in affording them every just and reasonable indulgence; and it is my ardent wish that this disposition may have a happy effect on the temper and conduct of my subjects in America."

The day after the address was presented, lord North acquainted the house, that he had a message from his majesty, which he read in his place, and then delivered it in at the table. It was as follows:

G. R.

"His majesty being determined, in consequence of the address of both houses of parliament, to take the most speedy and effectual measures for supporting the just rights of the crown and the two houses of parliament, thinks proper to acquaint this house, that some addition to his forces by sea and land will be necessary for that purpose; and does not doubt but his faithful commons, on whose zeal and affection he entirely relies, will enable him to make such an augmentation to his forces as shall be thought proper."

This message was referred to the committee of supply; after which the house took into consideration the American papers, when a motion was made by lord North, "that the chairman be directed to move the house, that leave be given to bring in a bill to restrain the trade and commerce of the provinces of Massachusetts Bay, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Providence, and Rhode-Island Colonies in North America, to Great Britain, Ireland and the West Indies; and to prohibit such provinces and colonies from carrying on any fishery on the banks of Newfoundland, or other parts therein mentioned, under certain conditions, and for a time to be limited."

This motion was productive of great debates, which continued for several hours; when the question being put, it was carried by a very considerable majority; and a bill ordered to be brought in pursuant thereto.

A few days after this a petition was presented to the house of commons from the corporation of London against the bill then depending in the house for restraining the trade of New England, and the fisheries of that colony on the banks of Newfoundland. This petition represented the bill as being unjust, cruel, partial and oppressive; injurious to the trade of Great Britain, and tending to increase the wealth and strength of her professed enemies.

The same corporation presented another petition of the like nature to the house of lords; as did also the American merchants; and another to the king. But all these solicitations proved abortive; for the bill passed both houses, and on the 30th of March received the royal assent.

On the 13th of April his majesty again went to the house of peers, and, among other bills, gave the royal assent to "A bill to restrain the trade and commerce of the colonies of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, and South Carolina, to any part of Great Britain, Ireland, and the West India islands."

Soon after the passing of these acts the generals Burgoyne, Clinton and Howe, were sent to take on them the command of the troops destined for endeavouring to bring the Americans to obedience; for which expedition they embarked on board the Cerberus man of war on the 21st of April.

The parliamentary business being finished, on the 26th of May his majesty went to the house of peers, and, after signing such bills as were ready, prorogued the parliament.

Hostilities, which eventually produced the most destructive and ruinous effects to the mutual interests of Great Britain and her colonies, now took place between the king's troops and the Americans. General Gage, the commander of the English forces, being informed that a great quantity of military stores were in the possession of the Provincial troops, at the town of Concord, sent a detachment under the command of lieutenant colonel Smith, and major Pitcairn, supported by another body, commanded by lord Percy, in order to seize or destroy them. This service, after some skirmishes, was effectually performed; but, some time after, the king's troops were attacked at Lexington, on their return towards Boston: several were killed and wounded on both sides; the Americans firing from behind stone walls, hedges, &c.

The Provincials now invested the town of Boston; and the people of New York, hearing of the action at Lexington, and the affair of Concord, rose in a tumultuous manner, entered the townhouse, seized many stands of arms, appropriated to their own use the cargoes of two ships laden with military stores for general Gage, and then marched to the assistance of the Bostonians. They not only continued to block up the town of Boston, but began to raise batteries on the heights of the peninsula of Charles Town, in order to canonade his majesty's troops. This brought on an action at Bunker's Hill; for on the 17th of June a considerable body of troops, under the command of major-general Howe, and brigadier-general Pigot, were sent to dislodge the Provincials. This body of forces, with proportional artillery, made good their landing near Bunker's-hill, under the protection of the ships of war, armed vessels, floating batteries, &c. and being soon reinforced by another detachment, a desperate action commenced, in which the British troops were victorious, the provincial lines being forced, and themselves compelled to retreat, leaving behind several pieces of cannon and other military stores. The loss of the Provincials in killed and wounded was very great; of the British troops, according to the return of general Gage, two hundred and twenty-six were killed, and eight hundred and twenty wounded, some of the latter dying soon after; and more than a proportional number of officers were included in both lists.

On the night of the 23d of August the cannon were seized upon by order of the congress, though the Asia man of war, which lay in the harbour, tried to prevent it by cannonading the town.

At the same time general Carleton was indefatigable in putting the province of Canada into a proper ſtate of defence; and the earl of Dunmore, governor of Virginia, having thought proper to take refuge on board a ſhip of war, haraſſed the coaſt, and made frequent deſcents on the laſt mentioned province; laying waſte the country, carrying off or ſpiking up a great number of cannon, and deſtroying vaſt quantities of military ſtores belonging to the Provincials. But on the other ſide, Fort St. John ſurrendered to the Provincial forces on the 3d of November, and the garriſon became priſoners.

On the 18th of the ſame month the regulars and provincials had a ſmart engagement near Savannah in Georgia, in which the latter were defeated; and on the 31ſt of December the Provincial general Montgomery, who had for ſome time laid ſiege to the city of Quebec, attempted to take it by ſtorm. In this attempt, however, he was defeated and ſlain, with ſeveral of his officers, and about 60 private men, and 300 were taken priſoners.—But to return to affairs at home.

The parliament met on the 26th of October, and the ſeſſion was opened by his majeſty with a ſpeech from the throne.

A ſhort time before the opening of the ſeſſion, a petition from the general congreſs in America, ſigned by the heads of the reſpective colonies, was preſented to his majeſty, humbly ſoliciting that ſuch meaſures might be taken as were likely to quell the diſturbances in thoſe colonies, and bring about a laſting and happy reconciliation.

The attention of the parliament, previous to the holidays, was engaged in adjuſting the neceſſary ſupplies for the enſuing year, and concerning the proper meaſures for raiſing them. Several uſual acts were alſo framed, which having paſſed both houſes received the royal aſſent, and the parliament was prorogued to the 25th of January.

A. D. 1776. The parliament met purſuant to adjournment; on which day the following hand-bill was delivered to the members of both houſes:

"To the parliament:---A ſuffering and afflicted people moſt humbly and ſolemnly beſeech and implore every member of parliament to put a ſpeedy ſtop to the further effuſion of the blood of our American brethren; that peace and tranquillity may be reſtored to the royal breaſt, and glory, commerce and felicity, to the whole empire."

Nothing material paſſed in the lower houſe this ſeſſion; except the framing of ſome uſeful acts, ſeveral of which were of a public, and the reſt of a private nature.

In the courſe of the ſeſſion the attention of the Upper Aſſembly was engaged on the trial of the ducheſs of Kingſton, who was accuſed of bigamy, in having married the duke of Kingſton, while her firſt huſband, the honourable Mr. Hervey (afterwards earl of Briſtol) was living. The trial laſted five days, at the cloſe of which, the priſoner being called to the bar, was informed by the lord-high-ſteward, that the lords had pronounced her Guilty. In conſequence of this ſhe claimed her privilege of peerage, which occaſioned the lords to adjourn to the Chamber of Parliament to debate on the matter. On their return the priſoner was again called to the bar, and the lord-high-ſteward pronounced it to be the ſenſe of the houſe, "that the ducheſs ſhould be allowed the privilege ſhe claimed." By conſequence, as a peereſs, ſhe was not ſubject to any kind of corporal puniſhment, and was therefore diſcharged on paying her fees.

The parliamentary buſineſs being finiſhed, on the 23d of May his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and, after ſigning ſuch bills as were ready, cloſed the ſeſſion.

During theſe tranſactions in England, hoſtilities were carrying on with great vehemence in America. General Gage having been recalled, the command in chief of the army at Boſton devolved on general Howe, who ſoon after iſſued a proclamation, by which ſuch of the inhabitants as attempted to quit the town without licence were condemned to military execution, if detected and taken; and if they eſcaped, to be proceeded againſt as traitors, by the forfeiture of their effects. By another proclamation, ſuch as obtained permiſſion to quit the town were reſtrained, by ſevere penalties, from carrying more than a ſmall ſpecified ſum of money with them. He alſo enjoined the ſigning and entering into an aſſociation, by which the remaining inhabitants offered their perſons for the defence of the town, and ſuch of them as he approved were to be armed, formed into companies, and inſtructed in military exerciſes and diſcipline, the remainder being obliged to pay their quotas in money towards the common defence.

General Howe thought proper to evacuate the town of Boſton on the 17th of March; a ſhort time after which he made good his landing, and effected the capture of New York. In June, a battle was fought in Canada, between the regulars, under general Carleton, and the provincials, at a place called Three Rivers, when the latter were defeated, many of them being killed and wounded, and about 200 taken priſoners. In the ſame month an attempt was made on Charles-Town, South Carolina, by Sir Peter Parker, at the head of a fleet of ſhips of war, and general Clinton, with a body of land forces, but it failed of ſucceſs; and on the 4th of July following the congreſs declared the colonies independent.

On the 19th of September the following Declaration was publiſhed by the Britiſh naval and military commanders in chief.

By Richard Viſcount Howe, of the kingdom of Ireland, and William Howe, Eſq. General of his majeſty's forces in America, the king's commiſſioners for reſtoring peace to his majeſty's Colonies and Plantations in North-America.

DECLARATION.

"Although the Congreſs, whom the miſguided Americans ſuffer to direct their oppoſition to a re-eſtabliſhment of the conſtitutional government of their provinces, have diſavowed every purpoſe of reconciliation not conſonant with their extravagant, inadmiſſible claim of independency, the king's commiſſioners think fit to declare, that they are equally deſirous to confer with his majeſty's well-affected ſubjects upon the means of reſtoring the public tranquillity, and eſtabliſhing a permanent union with every colony as a part of the Britiſh empire; the king being moſt graciouſly diſpoſed to direct a reviſion of ſuch of his royal inſtructions as may be conſtrued to lay an improper reſtraint upon the freedom of legiſlation in any of his colonies, and to concur in the reviſal of all acts by which his ſubjects there may think themſelves aggrieved: it is recommended to the inhabitants at large to reflect ſeriouſly on their preſent condition, and to judge for themſelves, whether it be more conſiſtent with their honour and happineſs to offer up their lives as a ſacrifice to the unjuſt and precarious cauſe in which they are engaged, or return to their allegiance, accept the bleſſings of peace, peace, and to be ſecured in a free enjoyment of their liberty and properties, upon the true principles of the conſtitution."

Given at New-York, Sept. 19, 1776. HOWE. W. HOWE.

But the cauſes of diſſention were aggravated to ſuch a degree, by ſome tranſactions both in England and America, that the provincials ſeemed not only to reject every conciliatory propoſal, but determined to aſſert that independence which they had avowed

On the 30th of September general Howe iſſued another proclamation, which was as follows:

"Whereas there are many deſerters from his majeſty's ſervice, now in arms in America, againſt their rightful ſovereign, and engaged with the declared enemies of Great Britain, in a moſt cruel and unnatural rebellion, to ſhake off all obedience to the conſtitutional authority of the ſtate; and whereas the heinouſneſs of their crime not admitting any palliative conſiderations, will neceſſarily exclude them from the ſmalleſt claim to mercy, if they fall into the hands of his majeſty's troops; the commander in chief, being anxiouſly deſirous to warn them of their danger to withdraw them from their preſent deſperate and criminal ſituation, whereby they may eſcape the ignominious death of traitors to their king and country, hereby offers a full pardon to all deſerters, who ſhall ſurrender themſelves at the head quarters, or to any diviſion of the king's army, on or before the 31ſt day of October 1776.

Given at the Head Quarters on York Iſland, the 30th day of September 1776. W. HOWE.

After this many ſkirmiſhes happened between the king's troops and the provincials; but nothing deciſive was done till the end of October, when the latter were defeated in an action which, from the place where it was fought, was termed the Battle of the White Plains.

In the diſpatches from general Howe, dated November 30, beſides an account of a variety of ſkirmiſhes, information was given of the taking of Fort Waſhington, and Fort Lee, by the Britiſh forces, together with a great variety of military ſtores, and many priſoners. In December Rhode Iſland was taken by general Clinton; about the ſame time lord Cornwallis took poſſeſſion of Eaſt Jerſey, and general Lee was taken priſoner by a patrole of Britiſh dragoons, commanded by lieutenant-colonel (afterwards lord) Harcourt.

The parliament met on the laſt day of October, and the firſt buſineſs entered on was, the conſideration of the ſupplies, when a motion was made that 45,000 ſeamen, including 10,129 marines, be employed for the ſervice of the enſuing year. This motion produced ſome debates, but was at length carried by a great majority. At the ſame time a reſolution paſſed for allowing 4l. per man per month for the maintenance and wages of every ſeaman.

The committee of Ways and Means, after a motion made for the purpoſe, reſolved, that the land-tax for 1777 ſhould be 4s. in the pound.

On the 2d of November a proclamation was iſſued by his majeſty for a general faſt to be kept throughout England on the 13th of December following. It was alſo appointed to be held on the ſame day in Ireland; and on the 12th in Scotland.

Another proclamation was iſſued a few days after for recalling and prohibiting ſeamen from ſerving foreign princes and ſtates, and for granting rewards for diſcovering ſuch ſeamen as ſhould conceal themſelves, in a gratuity of Two Pounds for every able, and Thirty Shillings for every ordinary ſeaman, to be paid to any perſon who ſhould make any ſuch diſcoveries, that ſuch men might be taken into his majeſty's ſervice, by any of his majeſty's ſea officers for raiſing men on or before the 31ſt day of December next.

The money granted by the parliament (previous to the holidays) for defraying the expences of the navy, including the ordinary at 400,005l. and the building and repairing of ſhips, which was voted at 465,500l. amounted to no leſs than 3,205,505l. Excluſive of 4,000l. which was afterwards voted to Greenwich Hoſpital, and a million granted towards the cloſe of the ſeſſion, to be applied towards the diſcharge of the debt of the navy.

But if the naval expences were thus large, the ſupplies for the land ſervice were not leſs ſo, falling little ſhort of three millions, although the extraordinaries of the land-ſervice for the preceding year, which exceeded the amount of 1,200,000l. with ſome new contracts for additional German forces, and the heavy expences of half-pay and Chelſea, were not yet provided for.

The ſupplies being ſo far granted, and no public buſineſs of any moment in the way, an early and long receſs took place, the houſe adjourning on the 2d of December, to the 21ſt of January following.

This year terminated with an event, which, for ſome time, occaſioned great confuſion, apprehenſion and ſuſpicion. On the 9th of December advice was received at the admiralty-office by expreſs, that a fire broke out in the rope houſe of his majeſty's yard at Portſmouth, about half an hour after four o'clock on Saturday afternoon, which burnt with great violence, and conſumed the ſame, except the outer walls; but by the timely aſſiſtance and vigorous efforts of the workmen of the yard, the ſeamen of his majeſty's ſhips, the marines quartered at Portſmouth, and the men belonging to the ordnance with their reſpective officers, it was happily prevented from extending to any other of the buildings in the yard, and was at length totally extinguiſhed. The principal loſs ſuſtained by this accident conſiſted chiefly of the rigging of two ſhips, the implements belonging to the rope-makers and rigging-houſe, a ſmall quantity of cordage, and ſome toppings of hemp.

The alarm occaſioned by this accident was greatly increaſed by another of the like nature that happened a ſhort time after at Briſtol, which deſtroyed a large range of warehouſes, beſides many private dwellings, and, had it not been for the quick diſcovery, and alacrity of the people in ſuppreſſing it, would have been productive of the moſt fatal conſequences.

The cauſe of this conflagration was for ſome time a myſtery; but at length it was diſcovered that it took place through the machinations of a wretched enthuſiaſt and incendiary, afterwards known by the appellation of John the Painter, but whoſe real name was James Aitken. When he was taken up and examined, he refuſed anſwering any queſtions, and in other inſtances behaved in a very daring and reſolute manner. However, there appearing ſufficient reaſon to ſuppoſe him the guilty perſon, he was committed to Wincheſter Jail. At the next aſſizes he was brought to trial, and being found guilty, was ſoon after executed at Portſmouth.

A. D.

A. D. 1777. On the 21ſt of January the parliament met purſuant to adjournment, and immediately proceeded on the buſineſs of the nation. The firſt thing that engaged particular notice was, a bill brought into the lower houſe for granting commiſſions, or letters of marque and repriſal, as they are uſually called, to the owners or captains of private merchant ſhips, authoriſing them to take and make prizes of veſſels with their effects, belonging to any of the inhabitants of the thirteen ſpecified revolted American colonies. This bill paſſed the commons without the leaſt oppoſition; nor did it produce much debate among the lords with whom it only underwent the trifling alteration of inſerting the words "letters of permiſſion," in the place of "letters of marque," the latter being thought only applicable to repriſals on a foreign enemy.

On the ſame day this bill paſſed the lords, a motion was made in the houſe of commons, for leave to bring in a bill to enable his majeſty to ſecure and detain perſons charged with, or ſuſpected of, the crime of high treaſon committed in America, or on the high ſeas, or the crime of piracy. The bill being admitted was, after great debates, read the firſt time; and a motion being made for the ſecond reading, it was carried by a great majority.

This bill occaſioned much murmuring among the people, and during the ſhort time it was in agitation, the following petition againſt it was preſented to the commons from the city of London:

The humble petition of the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen and Commons, of the city of London, in Common Council aſſembled,

Sheweth,

"That your petitioners have ſeen a bill depending in this honourable houſe, to empower his majeſty to ſecure and detain perſons charged with, or ſuſpected of the crime of High Treaſon committed in North America, or on the High Seas, or the crime of piracy.

"That if the ſaid bill ſhould paſs into a law, your petitioners are apprehenſive, it will create the greateſt uneaſineſs in the minds of many of his majeſty's good ſubjects, and tend to excite the moſt alarming diſturbances: All perſons being indiſcriminately liable upon the grounds of ſuſpicion alone, without any oath made, and without convening the parties, or hearing what they can alledge in their own juſtification, to be committed to a remote priſon in any corner of the realm, there to remain without bail or mainprize.

"That your petitioners are deeply affected with what they conceive will be the dangerous conſequences of ſuch a law, as from little motives of reſentment, and various other inducements, there may be perſons competent to commit, who may be tempted to exerciſe that power in its utmoſt latitude and extent.

"That meaſures ſo violent and unconſtitutional, ſo ſubverſive of the ſacred and fundamental rights of the people, and ſubjecting them to the moſt cruel oppreſſion and bondage, will, in the judgement of your petitioners, be introductive of every ſpecies of miſchief and confuſion; and thereby precipitate the impending ruin of this country.

"Your petitioners therefore earneſtly beſeech this honourable houſe, That the ſaid bill may not paſs into a law, or at leaſt to take ſuch care, as in their wiſdom may ſeem meet, to prevent it from its being extended in its operations to any of his majeſty's ſubjects reſident in theſe kingdoms."

This petition, after being read, was ordered to lie on the table. At the very next meeting of the members, the bill petitioned againſt was read the third time, and, after ſome few debates, paſſed the houſe.

It met with more oppoſition in the upper than the lower houſe, till the queſtion was put for reading it the third time, when (among others who objected to it) lord Abingdon roſe, and declared himſelf totally againſt the bill, as repugnant to the law of nations, and to the dictates of humanity. His lordſhip particularly dwelt upon the word "ſuſpected," as a term of ſuch latitude, that it was liable to be conſtrued to the moſt unconſtitutional meanings, and the conſequences of the bill might prove fatal to the liberties of this country: he therefore could not give his conſent to paſſing the bill.

Notwithſtanding the arguments made uſe of by this nobleman, which were of the moſt nervous and forcible nature, on putting the queſtion again for paſſing it, it was carried without further debate; and on the 3d of March received the royal aſſent. Among others which received the royal ſignet at the ſame time was, the "Bill for enabling the lords of the admiralty to grant letters of marque to private ſhips of war, or merchant ſhips belonging to the American colonies, that were then in actual rebellion againſt Great Britain."

The next thing that materially engaged the attention of the commons was, the following meſſage from his majeſty, which was read to the houſe by lord North.

"G. REX.

"It gives his majeſty much concern to find himſelf obliged to acquaint the houſe of commons with the difficulties he labours under, by reaſon of debts incurred by the expences of his houſhold, and of the civil government, which being computed on the 5th of January laſt, do amount to more than 600,000l. His majeſty relies on the loyalty and affection of his faithful Commons, of which he has received ſo many ſignal proofs, for enabling him to diſcharge this debt; and that they will at the ſame time make ſome further proviſion for the better ſupport of his majeſty's houſhold, and of the honour and dignity of his crown.

G. R."

As ſoon as this meſſage was read, a motion was made for referring it to the Committee of Supply on that day ſe'nnight. One member in particular ſtrongly oppoſed this motion as unuſual, if not unprecedented, it having at all times been cuſtomary to take royal meſſages into immediate conſideration. This produced a very warm debate, at the cloſe of which, however, the motion was carried.

On the day appointed for taking this matter into conſideration, the Houſe went into a Committee of Supply; and, after ſome debates, came to the following reſolutions:

Reſolved, that it is the opinion of this committee, that the ſum of 618,240l. 6s. be granted to his majeſty to diſcharge the arrears and debts due and owing on account of the Civil Liſt on the 5th of January 1777.

Reſolved, that it is the opinion of this Committee, that the ſum of 100,000l. per annum be granted to his majeſty over and above the yearly ſum of 800,000l. granted by an act made in the firſt year of his reign.

When theſe reſolutions were reported from the Committee

Committee of Supply to the Whole Houſe, the firſt was agreed to without any oppoſition; but the ſecond produced debates that continued for ſeveral hours, at the cloſe of which, however, it was agreed to by a great majority.

In conſequence of theſe reſolutions a bill was immediately framed, which ſoon paſſed both houſes, and on the 7th of May received the royal aſſent.

This gratuity on the part of the commons to the ſovereign was accompanied by an addreſs from the ſpeaker, which ſeemed very ingeniouſly adapted to reconcile ſo extraordinary a meaſure, at ſuch a criſis, to the minds of the people, under the idea of loyalty; while it recommended a practice of which the political manœuvres of the time could not boaſt in an eminent degree. Indeed, it appeared to the diſcerning and impartial, an admirable ſpecimen of ſtate fineſſe.

While this bill was in agitation, a motion was made by Sir James Lowther "that an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty for an augmentation of the annual incomes of their royal highneſſes the dukes of Glouceſter and Cumberland." This motion was productive of many warm and learned debates; but at length, on the queſtion being put, it was negatived by a great majority.

No other material matter occurred during the remainder of this ſeſſion. The national buſineſs being, therefore, finiſhed, on the 6th of June his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and after ſigning ſuch bills as were ready, prorogued the parliament.

Having thus mentioned the moſt material domeſtic tranſactions of this year, let us now take a view of affairs in America, where the war was ſtill proſecuted with the utmoſt vigour.

In the beginning of this year, ſeveral ſkirmiſhes happened in the Jerſeys with various ſucceſs. On the 23d and 24th of March a great quantity of proviſions, ſtores, &c. with barracks and ſtore-houſes belonging to the Provincials, were deſtroyed by the king's troops, at Peck's Hill, upon the North River. The cruizers belonging to lord Howe and commodore Hotham's fleet continued to take many prizes. In Connecticut, on the 27th of April, the king's troops deſtroyed a great quantity of ſtores at Danbury.

General Burgoyne, with the northern army, proceeded to Ticonderago and Fort Independence, which he took poſſeſſion of on the 6th of July, and found in them great quantities of ſtores and proviſions, beſides what he deſtroyed at Skeneſborough. Soon after this he took poſſeſſion of Fort Edward, which the Provincials abandoned, and then proceeded to Saratoga, where they were ſtrongly poſted.

On the 11th of September the troops under the command of general Howe had an engagement with the Provincials on the heights of Bradywine, in which many were killed and wounded on both ſides, and 400 Provincials were taken priſoners. But though the action at firſt ſeemed indeciſive yet it eventually occaſioned Philadelphia to fall into the hands of the Britiſh troops.

While general Howe was thus employed, an attack was made by the Provincials on Staten Iſland; but they were repulſed with ſome ſlaughter. And much about the ſame time general Clinton ſtormed and took Fort Clinton and Fort Montgomery.

On the 16th of October the Provincials, under the command of general Gates, having ſurrounded general Burgoyne's army at Saratoga, the latter thought proper to enter into articles of capitulation; by which himſelf and his troops, after laying down their arms, were to have a free paſſage to Great Britain.

Towards the cloſe of the year ſeveral forts were taken by the troops and ſhipping; and many ſkirmiſhes happened on the banks of the Delaware, in order to keep up the communication with the army at Philadelphia. The Provincials likewiſe evacuated their entrenchments at Red Bank.

Great diſturbances happened this year in the Eaſt-Indies, where lord Pigot, governor of Madraſs, was depoſed, put in confinement, and ſoon after died. His death was imputed to various cauſes, but as it happened in a region where the moſt palpable crimes have not only been repeatedly connivedat, but rewarded by a venal junto, it eſcaped that minute inveſtigation which it juſtly demanded.

On the 20th of November the parliament aſſembled, when his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne, in return to which an addreſs was preſented by each houſe, and moſt graciouſly received.

This buſineſs being over, the houſe reſolved itſelf into a committee of ſupply, when a ſhort ſtate of the navy, both as to the number of ſhips and men employed, and where ſtationed, being given, a motion was made, That it is the reſolution of this committee, that 60,000 ſeamen be employed for the ſervice of the year 1778. This motion produced very long and intereſting debates, at the cloſe of which it was carried without a diviſion.

The ſupplies being granted, and ſeveral bills ready (among which was that for ſuſpending the Habeas Corpus) on the 10th of December his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and after ſigning the reſpective bills, adjourned the parliament.

A. D. 1778. On the 23d of January the parliament re-aſſembled, when, after the papers on the ſtate of the nation were delivered in, the earl of Abingdon gave notice in the houſe of lords of an intention to make an intereſting motion on ſome future day. Accordingly on the 4th of February, after the ordinary buſineſs of the day was over, his lordſhip roſe to propoſe his motion, which was as follows: "That this houſe, taking into conſideration the legality of the preſent mode of benevolences, or of raiſing forces by ſubſcription, do look upon this practice as contrary to law, and the principles of the Conſtitution." This motion produced conſiderable debates, which were carried on with great ſpirit of argument on both ſides, but the motion was at length rejected by a conſiderable majority.

On the 6th of February the houſe of lords reſolved itſelf into a committee, to conſider of the ſtate of the nation, lord Scarſdale in the chair. As ſoon as the committee was formed, the duke of Richmond roſe, and obſerved, that it would be impoſſible to decide upon the good or bad policy of the war carrying on in America, without an enquiry into the conſequences it had been productive of in reſpect of our trade, commerce and finances. For this purpoſe, he had moved for the attendance of ſeveral eminent and intelligent merchants, acquainted with the general principles of trade and commerce, and well informed of the points on which they were to be examined. His grace then moved, that Mr. Wooldridge, an American merchant, might be called in; this was agreed to, when

Mr. Wooldridge pointed out, in a number of inſtances, the great injuries ariſing from the Americans being prohibited from trading to any part of Great Britain, Ireland or the Weſt-India iſlands; and his obſervations were coroborated by many other gentlemen in the mercantile line.

The 2d of February was appointed for an enquiry into the ſtate of the nation, when a vaſt multitude aſſembled in the lobby and environs of the houſe, but not being able to gain admiſſion either by intreaty or intereſt, they forced their way into the gallery in ſpite of the door keepers. The houſe conſidered the intruſion in a heinous light, and orders were immediately given for clearing the gallery.

After the excluſion of the auditors in the gallery, a motion was made, that an addreſs ſhould be preſented to his majeſty, requeſting that he would be graciouſly pleaſed to order the proper officers to lay before the houſe the accounts received from the admiral on the Jamaica ſtation, relative to the ſhipping under his command. The queſtion was carried without a diviſion.

Mr. Pultney then took the chair: having gone into a committee of the whole houſe to take into conſideration the ſtate of the nation, Mr. Charles Fox, on whoſe motion the committee was formed, opened the debate. He took a retroſpective view of the American war: he followed it in all its ſtages; pointed out the events as well fortunate as unfortunate, of each year; demonſtrated from them the incapacity of adminiſtration to conduct the war; their ignorance of men, meaſures, and the country of America; and all the errors and blunders into which this unpardonable ignorance had hurried them.

His ſpeech was maſterly, and afforded, in the courſe of near three hours which it laſted, the moſt ſtriking proofs of judgment, ſound reaſoning, and aſtoniſhing memory. He pointed out the defenceleſs ſtate of the Britiſh empire in Europe, from the abſence of the troops and navy; and concluded his ſpeech with moving, that as it would be impoſſible to compleat the propoſed levies time enough to replace the regiments that might in the interim be ſent away, the houſe, conſidering the ſtate to which ſuch a meaſure would reduce the nation, would not ſuffer any troops from Great Britain, Ireland, Minorca, or Gibraltar, to be ſent to America.

This important reſolution was not oppoſed by arguments, but by votes. The queſtion was called for, and upon a diviſion it was rejected. The numbers for the reſolution were 165; againſt it, 259.

On the 4th of February the buſineſs of the new levies came on, which was oppoſed by ſome of the minority members, but the houſe having entered fully into the debate, continued ſitting till near twelve o'clock, when the queſtion was put for voting a ſum of money to be granted to his majeſty for the pay and maintenance of the new corps, and upon a diviſion the numbers were, Ayes, 223. Noes, 130.

On the 5th of February, Mr. Bamber Gaſcoyne was called upon by the ſpeaker to make his report from the committee of ſupply; this was oppoſed by ſome of the members, but after a ſhort debate the queſtion was put and carried without a diviſion.

The next day the houſe was full to hear Mr. Burke's motion; and the hon. member began with an awful ſolemnity to prepare their minds, and incline them to adopt his ſentiments, and join him in his endeavours to make the houſe as ſenſible as he was, of the many barbarities which he ſaid had been committed during the war in America. He deſcribed the ſavage ungovernable rage of the Indians let looſe upon the unarmed, the aged, the infant, and the helpleſs female; he painted them rioting in murder, luſt and rapine; he drew, in the moſt moving terms, the ſufferings of the unhappy victims whom they devoted to death; a death which his pathetic eloquence made wear an aſpect horrid almoſt beyond conception. Raiſed by his own pictures to a high degree of indignation, he inveighed moſt bitterly on thoſe who, by ordering a treaty with the barbarians, might be juſtly deemed the authors of all the calamities which attended the inhuman meaſure. Adminiſtration, and ſeveral principal commanders, were placed upon the carpet; and the ſhare they had in the barbarities complained of, held up to view. The whole ſpeech, though it laſted three hours, was no more than a preface to his motion. When he thought he had ſaid ſufficient for the purpoſe, he moved, that copies of the treaties entered into with the Indians ſhould be laid before the houſe.

The motion was warmly oppoſed by adminiſtration, and as vigorouſly defended by the minority. The arguments of the latter differed but little from thoſe of Mr. Burke; they all ſhaped their's after his model; the difference lay only in the colouring and fancy.

The oppoſite ſide vindicated the Indians from the reflections thrown on them; inſtances of their humanity, and the ſtrict difcipline they were forced to ſubmit to, were adduced, and which being contrary to their way of carrying on the war by ſurprize and in flying parties, was alledged as the identical cauſe which made them quit our camps and abandon us. The facts urged as proofs of the untameable and ungovernable rage of the Indians, it was ſaid, were by much exaggerated; owed a great deal of their horror to the fancy of the orator: and ſuch as they were, ought to be deemed the acts of a few lawleſs banditti of their body, who equally diſclaimed obedience to our commanders and their own; and not to be attributed to the nation, who to the knowledge of many members of the houſe, had often acted with a degree of humanity which might make even chriſtians bluſh.

The freeing the negroes, by lord Dunmore, was juſtified on the ground of neceſſity: it was impoſſible to raiſe men otherwiſe to recover our juſt rights; every private conſideration ſhould give way to promote the public good.

The debate was warm, intereſting, and laſted near ſeven hours. The queſtion being put, the motion was rejected by a majority of 86; the numbers for it being 137, againſt it 223.

During this month [February] motion ſucceeded motion in the houſe of lords, to enter into a diſquiſition of affairs in America, their nature and tendency, both as to the colonies and the mother country, but all enquiry proved fruitleſs, every queſtion being carried in favour of adminiſtration.

On the 19th of February lord North preſented to the houſe, "A bill to enable his majeſty to appoint commiſſioners to treat, conſent, and agree on the means of quieting the diſorders then ſubſiſting in certain of the colonies, plantations, and provinces of America." As alſo, "A bill for declaring the intention of the parliament of Great Britain, concerning the exerciſe of the right of impoſing taxes on the colonies, plantations, and provinces of America," which, after ſeveral days days debate, and ſome amendments, were carried.

On the 22d of March the French having laid an embargo on all ſhipping in their ports, and having previouſly fitted out a large fleet, it was thought neceſſary to call out the militia of England, and encamp them, in order to oppoſe any deſigned invaſion; and on the 27th of March an order was iſſued for detaining in the ports of England all French ſhips.

His majeſty having taken a reſolution to view ſome of the principal dock-yards, he accordingly repaired to Chatham and Sheerneſs, and having ſurveyed every thing worthy of obſervation at thoſe places, he, together with the queen, &c. viſited Portſmouth on the ſecond of May, and after reviewing the fleet, returned on the ninth to London.

On the 12th of May the nation ſuſtained a moſt important loſs in the death of the great earl of Chatham, a ſtateſman unrivalled in the annals of hiſtory. To aggrandize his country appears throughout the whole of his political conduct to have been his ſole and ultimate view. He was not only eminent for the diſplay of eloquence in the ſenate, but the formation and execution of plans which at once ſurprized and terrified the common enemy, and rendered the Britiſh arms the dread and admiration of an aſtoniſhed world. In a word, he raiſed Great Britain to its ſummit of glory, and had not his ſchemes been fruſtrated by the low inſidious arts of rancorous envy, and fell ambition, it is more than probable they would have effectually obviated thoſe evils both abroad and at home which will entail a curſe on the memory of their authors, till time ſhall be no more.

On the 28th of May the royal aſſent was given to a bill for the relief of the Roman catholics, and about the ſame time an embargo was laid on all foreign veſſels, in the ports of England.

On the 2d of June his majeſty went in ſtate to the houſe of peers, when, having given the royal aſſent to ſeveral bills, particularly one for ſettling an annuity on the deſcendants of the late earl of Chatham, he prorogued the parliament.

Admiral Keppel having ſailed with a fleet, not ſufficient in point of force, for the purpoſe of attacking the French, returned to England for reinforcement, which having obtained, he again put to ſea. On the 27th of July, the two grand fleets met, and came to an engagement off Uſhant; the iſſue of which (in conſequence of an accuſation laid by Sir Hugh Palliſer, vice-admiral, againſt the chief commander) produced great diſſentions.

The engagement was repreſented in ſuch a light by Sir Hugh Palliſer, as to ſtigmatize the reputation of the admiral. Mr. Keppel, however, vindicated his character in parliament on the 2d of December, notwithſtanding which, Sir Hugh Palliſer exhibited his charge againſt him on the 17th of the ſame month at the admiralty. The bill for his trial on land received the royal aſſent on the 24th enſuing; his trial accordingly began on the 1ſt of February, when he was unanimouſly acquitted with the greateſt honour, and the proſecution pronounced to be malicious.

On the acquittal of admiral Keppel the moſt general demonſtrations of joy took place, and the greateſt illuminations perhaps ever known enſued in moſt of the cities, towns &c. throughout the kingdom. He likewiſe received the united thanks of the houſe of lords, houſe of commons, the lord-mayor and common-council of the city of London (who preſented him with the freedom of the city in a box made of heart of oak, and richly ornamented with gold) and of many other cities, towns, corporations, &c.

During theſe commotions at home, hoſtilities were proſecuted with vigour in America. On the 18th of June, general Clinton evacuated Philadelphia. He was attacked on his march by the provincials, whoſe object appeared to be the gaining poſſeſſion of the Britiſh baggage; but in this they were diſappointed, and every where repulſed by means of the judicious manner in which general Clinton had diſpoſed his troops.

In conſequence of the bill to enable his majeſty to appoint commiſſioners to treat of a pacification with America; the earl of Carliſle, Mr. Eden and governor Johnſtone, went over officially for that purpoſe. But ſo far from accompliſhing the much deſired object, the meaſures purſued tended to widen the unhappy breach. Indeed the bill for declaring the intention of the Britiſh parliament of impoſing the taxes on the colonies could not poſſibly fail of producing ſuch effect, as it ſtruck at the original and primary cauſe of the rupture.

About this time the iſlands of St. Pierre and Miquelon were taken from the French, by admiral Montague's fleet; in oppoſition to which, the iſland of Dominica was captured by an armament of French and Americans from Martinico.

On the 11th of December, admiral Barrington, (who ſucceeded lord Howe in the command of the Britiſh fleet) and a body of forces under general Grant, ſeized on the iſland of St. Lucia, one of the Antilles belonging to the French. It was attempted to be retaken by count d'Eſtaing, but he was repulſed both by ſea and land with conſiderable loſs.

A. D. 1779. On the 4th of January Georgia ſurrendered to a detachment of Britiſh troops, and many inhabitants of that colony and of the Carolinas came in and joined the royaliſts.

Among the domeſtic occurrences which took place during the courſe of the latter, and at the commencement of the preſent year, may be enumerated the following:

The proviſion made for the younger branches of the royal family by parliament on the 16th of April 1778.—His majeſty went to the dock-yards of Chatham and Sheerneſs on the 28th of the ſame month.—The royal viſit to Portſmouth May 2.—To Wincheſter, September 29.—To Warley Common, October 20.—And to Coxheath, Nov. 8.—The fire in King's College, Oxford, which deſtroyed one wing of that building on December 18.—The fire at Greenwich Hoſpital, which deſtroyed the whole of the ſouth-eaſt quarter, conſiſting of the chapel, &c. on January 2, 1779.—And the death of David Garrick, eſq. the celebrated Engliſh Roſcius. This gentleman died on the 20th of January 1779, and was buried with great ſtate in Weſtminſter-abbey on the firſt of February enſuing.

During the courſe of this year the war in America was proſecuted with great vigour. On the 3d of March general Provoſt ſurprized and gained a complete victory over the Americans under general Aſhe.

In the beginning of May Sir Henry Clinton concerted with Sir George Collier (who then commanded the marine at New York) an expedition to the Cheſepeak, and a deſcent upon Virginia, as meaſures measures which more than any other that could be undertaken would contribute to the embarraſsment and diſtreſs of the enemy. A ſufficient naval and land force for the intended purpoſes was accordingly diſpatched from New York under the conduct of Sir George Collier and major general Mathew. The fleet, having ſucceſsfully paſſed between the capes of Virginia, the Raiſonable man of war, with ſome armed tenders, were left in Hampton Road to block up that port, and to intercept the navigation of the river James, whilſt Sir George Collier, having ſhifted his pendant to a frigate, proceeded with the ſmaller ſhips of war and tranſports up Elizabeth river. The town of Portſmouth being their immediate object, and the fleet delayed by ſome circumſtances of wind or tide in its paſſage, the general and troops, impatient of delay, and apprehenſive that the enemy might have time either to ſtrengthen their works, or receive ſuccours, were landed at ſome diſtance, and marched directly towards that place.

The town was open and defenceleſs, but the paſſage to it by water was covered by Fort Nelſon, which had been conſtructed at about half a mile diſtance for that purpoſe. But the garriſon of the fort, knowing that no ſuccour was at hand, and that the fort was incapable of any effectual defence, to avoid being ſurrounded and made priſoners, abandoned it at the approach of the army, which, of courſe, took poſſeſſion of that and the town. The town, or remains of Norfolk, on the oppoſite ſide of the river, fell likewiſe into their hands. Upon the approach of the fleet and army, the enemy burned ſeveral of the veſſels in theſe ports, among which were two large French ſhips loaded with a thouſand hogſheads of tobacco; the celerity of the invaders having, however, checked the deſtruction pretty early, ſeveral others were ſaved, and fell accordingly into their hands.

In the mean time the Britiſh guards, having marched eighteen miles by night to the town of Suffolk on the Nanſemonde river, arrived there at day-break. They found the place had been haſtily abandoned at their approach; and they immediately proceeded to the deſtruction of a very large magazine of proviſions, together with the veſſels and naval ſtores which were found there. Within a fortnight that the fleet and army continued upon the coaſt, the loſs ſuſtained by the Americans in proviſions and ſtores was prodigious. Above 130 ſhips and veſſels of all ſorts were deſtroyed or taken. All thoſe upon the ſtocks were burned, and every thing relative to the building or fitting of ſhips, that was not portable, was deſtroyed.

When theſe circumſtances were made known to Sir Henry Clinton by Sir George Collier's letter, the general ſent an immediate order for their return; and the fleet and army, with their prizes and booty, arrived ſafe at New York before the expiration of the month.

The provincials had, for ſome time, been engaged and at great labour and expence, in conſtructing very ſtrong works at the two important poſts of Verplanks Neck and Stoney Fort in the Highlands. As theſe works were nearly compleated, but not yet defenſible, the general thought it the proper ſeaſon to avail himſelf of the induſtry of the enemy, and to reap the fruits of their toil.

The troops deſtined for this ſervice under the command of major-general Vaughan were only newly embarked, when they were joined by the force returned from Cheſapeak, and proceeded all together up the north river, the naval department being under the conduct of Sir George Collier. On the following morning general Vaughan, with the greater part of the army, landed on the eaſt ſide of the river, about eight miles ſhort of Verplanks, whilſt the remainder, under the conduct of general Patiſon, and accompanied by Sir Henry Clinton, advancing farther up, landed within three miles of Stoney Point. On the appearance of the ſhips the enemy abandoned their works, but took care to ſet fire to a large block-houſe. Upon the approach of the troops to take poſſeſſion of Stoney Point, they, however, made ſome ſhew of reſiſtance by drawing up on the hills, but did not think proper to hazard a conteſt.

The Americans had finiſhed a ſmall but ſtrong and compleat work on the oppoſite ſide of the river, which they called Fort la Fayette. This was defended by four pieces of artillery and a ſmall garriſon of between 70 and 80 men. But this little redoubt, though ſtrong in itſelf, was effectually commanded by Stoney Point, which lay at about a thouſand yards diſtance on the oppoſite ſhore: and it being exceedingly difficult of approach from its own ſide, the attack was accordingly intended from the other. For this purpoſe general Patiſon with great fatigue and labour, and the moſt indefatigable perſeverance during the night, overcame the difficulties of dragging the heavy artillery from a very bad landing-place to the top of the hill; and his exertions and arrangements were ſo effectual and judicious, that by five on the following morning he had opened a battery of cannon, and another of mortars, on the ſummit of the difficult rocks of Stoney Point, which poured a ſtorm of fire over Fort la Fayette.

The attack was ſupported by Sir George Collier, who advanced with the gallies and gun-boats within reach of the fort. The cannonade was continued on all ſides during the day, and as ſoon as it was dark, Sir George ordered two of the gallies to paſs the fort and anchor above it, in order to prevent the eſcape of the garriſon by water. In the mean time general Vaughan with his diviſion, having made a long circuit through the hills was at length arrived and had cloſely inveſted the fort on the land ſide. The garriſon ſeeing that all poſſibility of eſcape was now cut off, and that their fire was totally overpowered, ſurrendered their little fortreſs on the following morning and themſelves priſoners of war without any other ſtipulation than that of humane treatment.

The general gave immediate direction for finiſhing and compleating the works of both poſts, and for putting Stoney Point in particular in the ſtrongeſt ſtate of defence. By the loſs of theſe poſts the enemy in the Jerſeys were under a neceſſity of making a detour of above ninety miles through the mountains to communicate with the country eaſt of Hudſon's river.

The ſtate of the hoſtile armies on both ſides with reſpect to actual force, together with the want of money and the ſcarcity of military proviſions on one ſide, neceſſarily limited the views of the oppoſite commanders, and prevented their undertaking any deciſive or expenſive operations. The campaign upon the whole was accordingly languid, and rather confined to the ſurprizing of poſts and to deſultory excurſions. While the greater part of the Britiſh army, however, were engaged in the operations of moving from one iſland to another, and of eſtabliſhing different poſts, general Lincoln, the American commander, thought it a proper opportunity to attack lieutenant-colonel Maitland, who who was ſtrongly poſted at the paſs of Stoney Ferry. The colonel's force, it is ſaid, amounted only to about 800, while the American force is repreſented as amounting to 5000 men and eight pieces of cannon. The attack was made and ſupported with ſpirit for about an hour, but the aſſailants were received with ſuch coolneſs and firmneſs and ſo much galled by the fire of an armed flat, which covered the left flank of the port, that they were then obliged to retire with conſiderable loſs. The royal forces loſt ſome officers as well as men, and above an hundred of both were wounded. The Americans loſt ſome officers of note, and it cannot be doubted that their loſs in general was conſiderably greater.

As no induſtry had been wanting in compleating or repairing the works at Stoney Point, which the time of poſſeſſion would admit of, that port was now in a very ſtrong ſtate of defence, with a powerful garriſon under the command of lieutenant colonel Johnſon. General Wayne, on the part of the Americans, was appointed to the arduous taſk of ſurprizing and reducing Stoney Point, for which he was provided with a ſtrong detachment of the moſt active infantry in their army. The troops, having ſet out from Sandy Reach on the 15th of July about noon, after a march of fourteen miles through a rout almoſt impaſſable, the van, about eight in the evening, arrived within a mile and a half of their object, where they halted, and the troops were formed into two columns as faſt as they came up. While they where in this poſition, Wayne with moſt of his principal officers went to reconnoitre the works, and to obſerve the ſituation of the garriſon.

It was near midnight before the two columns approached the place; that on the right was led by general Wayne, the van, conſiſting of 150 picked men, led by the moſt adventurous officers, and commanded by lieutenant-colonel Fleury, advanced to the attack with loaded muſkets and fixed bayonets. The column on the left was led alſo by a choſen van with loaded muſkets and fixed bayonets, under the command of major Steward. The general iſſued the moſt pointed orders to both columns not to fire a ſhot on any account, but to place their whole reliance on the bayonet. Such was the aſtoniſhing reſolution of the Americans, that neither the deep moraſs, nor the ſtrong works in front and flank could damp the ardour of their troops, who, in the face of a moſt inceſſant and tremendous fire of muſquetry, and of cannon loaded with grape ſhot, forced their way at the point of the bayonets until the van of each column met in the center of the works, where they arrived at nearly the ſame inſtant.

General Wayne was wounded in the head by a muſket ball, but was gallantly ſupported and helped through the works by his two aid-decamps, Fiſhbourn and Archer, to whom he acknowledged the utmoſt gratitude in his public letter. Colonel Fleury, a French officer, was the perſon who ſtruck the Britiſh ſtandard with his own hand; major Steward and ſeveral other officers ſhewed great courage, as did in particular the two lieutenants Gibbons and Knox, one of whom led the avant-guard on the right as did the other on the left, and both of whom eſcaped unhurt, although the firſt loſt 17 men out of 20 in the attack. The vigour and ſpirit with which this enterprize was conducted was as remarkable as any action that had taken place during the courſe of this unhappy war. Gen. Waſhington, the congreſs, the general aſſembly, and the ſupreme executive council of Penſylvania, ſeemed emulous in their acknowledgement, and in the praiſes which they beſtowed upon general Wayne, his officers and troops.

The total number of priſoners amounted to 543, and the ſlain of the garriſon to 63. The trophies, artillery, and ſtores were as conſiderable as could be expected from the nature and extent of the poſt.

But however great the importance and value of Stoney Point might be, general Waſhington was by no means diſpoſed to hazard a general engagement on it's account; he informed congreſs in his letter, that it had been previouſly determined in council not to attempt keeping that poſt, and that nothing more was originally intended than the deſtruction of the works and the bringing off the artillery and ſtores. Sir Henry Clinton regained the poſt, after it had been three days in the poſſeſſion of the enemy, and placed in it a ſtrong garriſon.

Elated by theſe ſucceſſes, the Americans undertook an enterprize ſufficiently daring in the deſign, though it failed wretchedly in the execution. This was an attack on Paulus Hook, which lies almoſt oppoſite to the city of New York, on the Jerſey ſide. It ſeems that the ſtrength of the poſt had cauſed ſuch a remiſſneſs on the ſide of the garriſon, that the enemy ſurprized the place at three in the morning, and carried a block-houſe and two redoubts almoſt without any reſiſtance. In that critical moment of exigency, major Sutherland, the commander, threw himſelf, with forty Heſſians, into another redoubt, from which they kept ſo warm and inceſſant a fire, that the Americans deſerted their new poſts with as much expedition and as little difficulty as they had been attained.

Sir George Collier having ſailed from Sandy-hook on the 3d of Auguſt, arrived in Penobſcot bay on the 14th, when he ſurprized, routed, and deſtroyed the American fleet. One frigate of 20 guns and another of 18 were taken. The Warren, a new frigate of 32 guns, ſeven others of ſmaller force, ſix armed veſſels, and twenty-four tranſports were burnt or ſunk.

Through the ſudden and unexpected appearance of the French fleet, on the 14th of September, off Carolina and Georgia, the Experiment man of war of fifty guns, and three royal frigates, being totally unapprehenſive of danger, and upon ſeparate ſervices, had the misfortune of falling in with them, and thereby adding to their triumph and number. The firſt under the command of captain Wallace was on her paſſage from New York to the Savannah, and although ſhe had been already diſmaſted in a violent ſtorm, made a gallant and deſperate defence againſt an irreſiſtable ſuperiority of force in the view of an hoſtile fleet.

General Prevoſt was at this time at the town of Savannah, but the better if not the greater part of his force was ſtill on the iſland of Port Royal in South Carolina, where it had lately taken poſt. The intercepting of an expreſs to colonel Maitland from the general delayed the previous meaſures ſo long, that the enemy had time to ſeize the principal communications before they could take effect. This rendered the junction of colonel Maitland's corps with the garriſon (upon which only any hope of defending the Savannah could be founded) a matter of great doubt, difficulty, and danger. However, the addreſs of the colonel, the zeal of his troops, with the diſtinguiſhed ſervices of lieutenant Goldeſbrough, of the navy, overcame all obſtacles.

On the 9th of September the whole French fleet, amounting to above forty ſail, anchored off the bar of Tybee, at the mouth of the river Savannah. On the 15th, the French, with Polaſki's American light horſe, appeared ſo near the Britiſh lines as to ſkirmiſh with the picquets. The day following M. d'Eſtaing, in the haughtieſt ſtile, ſummoned the general in the name of the French king. Colonel Maitland's diviſion had not yet joined the garriſon: it was therefore thought prudent and neceſſary to gain all the time that was poſſible, and general Prevoſt had the addreſs to carry this point. Meſſages paſſed backwards and forwards, till at length a truce of 24 hours was agreed upon, to afford time for deliberation.

During this interval the fortunate arrival of colonel Maitland with the troops preſented a new face of affairs, and an anſwer was returned, that they were unanimouſly determined to defend themſelves to the laſt man. The French force amounted to 3,500 men, that of the Americans under general Lincoln, to 4,800.

The ſpirit, vigour and exertion of every individual of the garriſon merited the higheſt encomium. Nor were the enemy inactive, for at midnight, between the 3d and 4th of October, they began a heavy bombardment, and at day-light opened a vehement cannonade, which was continued for five days. On the 9th the allies attacked the Britiſh lines with their utmoſt force, and with great fury, a little before day-light. The grand attack was directed to the right, where d'Eſtaing in perſon led the flower of both armies, and was accompanied by all the principal officers of each. The attack was made with great ſpirit, and ſupported with an extraordinary degree of obſtinate perſeverance; till at length the enemy were broken, routed, and driven, in the greateſt diſorder and confuſion, into a ſwamp. At ten they requeſted a truce, with leave to bury their dead, and carry off their wounded: the firſt was granted, but a reſtriction laid in point of diſtance as to the reſt. Count Polaſki was mortally wounded in this action. Monſ. d'Eſtaing was wounded in two different places. The loſs on the ſide of the Britiſh was inconceivably ſmall. The French and Americans abandoned their camp on the night of the 17th, and about the firſt of November M. d'Eſtaing totally abandoned the coaſt of America; and thus ended the great deſigns he had formed, and the mighty hopes he had conceived.

In the beginning of October captain Farmer, of his majeſty's ſhip Quebec, being on a cruize off Uſhant in company with the Rambler Cutter, came up with, and cloſely engaged, a large French frigate called the Surveilleante, mounting 40 guns; while the Rambler was engaged with a French cutter as ſuperior in force as the French frigate was to the Quebec. The action on both ſides was warm and bloody, from ten in the morning till two in the afternoon, when the French cutter ſet all the ſail ſhe could croud and bore away, but the Rambler being ſo diſabled in her maſts and rigging, could not follow her with any hopes of coming up with her. The commander, therefore, ſeeing both the frigates diſmaſted, and the Quebec take fire, endeavoured to get as near the Quebec as poſſible, in hopes of ſaving ſome of her men; but there being but little wind, and a large ſwell, no other aſſiſtance could be afforded than by hoiſting out the boat, which picked up one maſter's mate, two young midſhipmen, and fourteen more of the Quebec's people, the enemy's frigate at the ſame time firing at the boat. The Quebec continued burning very fierce, with her colours flying till ſix o'clock, when ſhe blew up.

Words cannot deſcribe the gallantry and magnanimity diſplayed by captain Farmer on this occaſion, not only in the engagement, but the fatal cataſtrophe with which it was attended. Having his arm broken towards the cloſe of the engagement, he tied his handkerchief round the ſhattered part of the bone, and then addreſſed his men as follows: "My lads, this is warm work, and there-"fore keep up your fire with double ſpirit; we "will die or conquer."

When the ſhip took fire, he uſed every method to extinguiſh the flames; and in order that an exploſion might be prevented, ordered the pumps to play on the magazine. This order, by the event, appears not to have been properly effected: the captain, however, the lieutenant, and many of the crew imagined it was, and therefore remained to the laſt moment on board: but moſt of the men, thinking the water afforded a better chance of ſafety, jumped into the ſea, where numbers periſhed in ſight of thoſe on board the ſhip. The fire now raging with more violence, the captain was requeſted to attempt ſaving himſelf, but he refuſed every ſolicitation, and, with a magnanimity that will perpetuate his memory, declared he would not quit the ſhip whilſt there remained another man on board. By degrees his brave companions grew leſs and leſs, and as he ſaw inevitable deſtruction faſt approaching, he entreated the remainder to attempt to ſave their lives by the only effort remaining, namely, that of jumping into the ſea. His lieutenant ſtood mournfully by him, and exhibited a ſcene to which neither the pen nor the pencil can do juſtice.

The fate of the gallant captain Farmer will be lamented by every Engliſhman. In the awful hour of peril, when his fate was inevitable, it is ſaid he ſat on the fluke of the ſheet anchor, waiting, with heroic fortitude, the dreadful exploſion, which at laſt numbered him with departed heroes.—Perhaps there never was, in the annals of the world, exhibited a more ſtriking inſtance of true courage, undaunted reſolution, and ſtoical philoſophy; and it is not to be doubted but poſterity will pay that reſpect to his memory, which ſuch an illuſtrious character deſerves.

It appeared from various circumſtances that the Spaniſh commanders and governors in the Weſt-Indies, had been acquainted with the intended rupture between Spain and England long before the declaration preſented by their miniſter. Plans were accordingly laid, and preparations made, which afforded advantages on the commencement of hoſtilities.

It happened in the month of October, that the baymen on the Moſquito and bay of Honduras ſhores (as the logwood cutters are called) being hard preſſed, and in great danger from the Spaniards, the governor of Jamaica had diſpatched captain Dalrymple (commandant of a new corps raiſed in Ireland for the ſervice of that iſland) with a ſmall force and ſome arms to their relief. Admiral Sir Peter Parker had alſo detached a ſmall ſquadron of three frigates and a ſchooner, under the conduct of captain Luttrell, as commodore, to the bay of Honduras, in order to intercept ſome Spaniſh regiſter ſhips, which, however, eſcaped into the excellent harbour, and under the protection of the ſtrong fortreſs of St. Fernando de Omoa, where they were found too well ſecured for any attack by ſea, which their then ſmall ſquadron was capable of making.

In progreſs of time the commodore had the fortune to fall in at ſea with the Porcupine ſloop of war, and the detachment of the loyal Iriſh under convoy. The commanders immediately determined to unite their forces in an attack by ſea and land upon Omoa; a bold attempt with their force, but in which ſucceſs held out a proſpect of throwing the galleons (which were ſtill under its ſhelter) into their hands. The fortreſs of Omoa, indeed, could only be conſidered as a fort or caſtle, for the defence of the harbour, the town itſelf being entirely open. Its batteries ſhewed about forty pieces of artillery, but it ſeems to have been deficient in that reſpect as well as in point of garriſon. The land force of the aſſailants by the junction of the baymen, with the marines, which were allotted by the commodore to that ſervice, ſomewhat exceeded 500 men: the defenſive force, without including the run-away inhabitants, was not much inferior in number.

In advancing to the fort, the Engliſh were ſo much annoyed by the fire from the tower, that they found themſelves under a neceſſity of ſetting it on fire. The commander of the expedition, conſidering that a regular ſiege would by no means anſwer his deſign, determined to place his truſt in a coup de main, and to attempt the place by eſcalade.

Meaſures being accordingly concerted with the commodore, the Pomona frigate was towed in pretty cloſe to the fort during the night, and the heavier ſhips took their proper ſtations, ſo as to be able to commence the attack on their ſide about three in the morning, giving a ſignal twenty minutes before, which was to direct that from the land. In the meantime 150 men in four columns, in line, and carrying the ſcaling ladders were moved down the hill where they lay waiting for the ſignal. That being given, they ſuddenly advanced and with trailed arms under the fire of their own batteries, which with the heavy cannonade from the ſhips ſerved to deafen as well as to diſtract the enemy; ſo that they paſſed undiſcovered by the Spaniſh centries to the very entrance of the ditch.

On their being diſcovered the columns ſeemed for a moment to heſitate, but inſtantly recovered, and advanced to fix their ladders to the walls. Two ſeamen having mounted the wall, levelled their muſkets, without firing, at a body of above ſixty Spaniards, and ſuch was the panic and conſternation that prevailed, that they kept them, for ſome moments, in awe, and even motionleſs, while their friends were aſcending the ladders. The garriſon, notwithſtanding all the efforts of their officers, fled on all ſides. In theſe circumſtances, the governor and principal officers, making no requeſt but for their lives, preſented their ſwords and keys to the commandant, with a ſurrender of the fort, garriſon and ſhips. The treaſure had been removed from the caſtle on the approach of the Britiſh forces, but that on board the galleons with the cargoes of other veſſels in the harbour, and the value of the ſhips themſelves, were eſtimated at about three millions of piaſters, or pieces of eight.

We cannot diſmiſs this narrative without adverting to a ſingular inſtance of that genuine courage and magnanimity which has ever characterized the tars of Old England.

A common ſailor, who ſcrambled ſingly over the wall, had, for the better annoyance on all ſides of the enemy, armed himſelf with a cutlaſs in each hand. Thus equipped he fell in with a Spaniſh officer, juſt rouſed from ſleep, and who, in the hurry and confuſion, had forgotten his ſword. This circumſtance reſtrained the fury of the tar, who diſdaining to attack an unarmed foe, but unwilling to decline any opportunity of diſplaying his courage in ſingle combat, preſented one of the cutlaſſes to him, telling him, "I ſcorn any advantage, you are now upon a footing with me." The aſtoniſhment of the officer at ſuch an act of generoſity, when he expected nothing leſs than that of being cut inſtantly, and without pity or mercy, into pieces, could only be equalled by the admiration, which his relating the ſtory excited in his countrymen.

The Spaniards, however, on the 25th of November, made a ſucceſsful effort in inveſting the fortreſs of St. Fernando de Omoa, which the Britiſh troops were compelled to evacuate on the 28th.

A. D. 1780. The firſt remarkable tranſaction of this year was, a victory obtained on the 16th of February by admiral Rodney over the Spaniſh fleet commanded by Don Juan Langara, off Cape St. Vincent's; by means of which the fortreſs of Gibraltar, then beſieged by the Spaniards, and the people in great diſtreſs for want of proviſions, was happily relieved.

The admiral then proceeded on his deſtined voyage, and ſoon after his arrival a very ſmart engagement took place on the 17th of May, between the Engliſh fleet commanded by admiral Rodney, and the French under M. de Guichen, near Martinico. It laſted for ſome time, and in the end proved unfavourable to the French, though no ſhips were taken on either ſide.

On the 11th of May Charles-Town ſurrendered to Sir Henry Clinton; in which were taken ſeveral officers, a commodore, ſome continental regiments, and three battalions of artillery, with a great number of American and French ſeamen; in all upwards of 6000 men in arms, beſides ſeveral armed ſhips, and 400 pieces of cannon.

On the 16th of Auguſt a ſignal victory was obtained over the American army under general Gates, by the Britiſh army under lord Cornwallis. The loſs of the Americans was about 900 ſlain, among whom was brigadier-general Gregory; and about 1000 were taken priſoners. Soon after this action lieutenant-colonel Tarleton defeated general Sumpter's army, which was greatly ſuperior to his own, taking two pieces of cannon, and about 300 priſoners.

In the month of November general Arnold (one of the chief commanders of the American forces) quitted that ſervice, and joined the Britiſh ſtandard; and major André, a young Engliſh officer, concerted a plan for ſurprizing the American army. This ſcheme, however, failed, and André being apprehended as a ſpy, his caſe was referred to a board of general officers, held by an order of general Waſhington. When aſked by the board whether he confeſſed ſeveral particulars that were alledged againſt him, he replied in the moſt open and ingenuous manner, acknowledging, that the motive which actuated him was, the ſervice of his king, and declaring that with reſpect to the diſguiſe he aſſumed in name and habit, he was involuntarily an impoſtor. After his examination he was remanded into cuſtody. Divers letters paſſed on the occaſion between the commanders in chief of the reſpective armies and thoſe of inferior rank, but without effect as to the unfortunate priſoner, who was executed in purſuance of the ſentence of the board, and fell a victim to his zealous attachment to the cauſe he eſpouſed. His name is perpetuated by a monument erected to his memory, by order of his majeſty, in Weſtminſter-abbey.

In the month of October Mr. Henry Laurens, preſident of the American council, was taken by one of the king's frigates in his paſſage for Holland, where he was commiſſioned to conclude a treaty of peace with the Dutch. Being brought to London, and an accuſation laid againſt him for treaſonable practices, he was, with John Trumbull, Eſq. another of the American partiſans, committed cloſe priſoner to the Tower, where he remained for a conſiderable time, and was then diſcharged.

On the 10th of October a moſt dreadful hurricane happened in the Weſt-India iſlands, which did conſiderable damage to moſt of them, particularly Barbadoes, Jamaica, St. Chriſtopher's, Martinico, St. Vincent's, and Granada. In Barbadoes not a houſe in the iſland eſcaped receiving damage, the greater part of them were levelled with the ground, and the inhabitants buried in the ruins. A parliamentary grant, and liberal ſubſcriptions, were made for the ſufferers, but the loſs was ſo prodigious, and the deſolation ſo univerſal, that it was deemed almoſt impoſſible to reinſtate the ſufferers in their former ſituations.

Civil and inteſtine tumults prevailed this year in London in a moſt remarkable manner. A bill paſſed in the laſt ſeſſion of parliament for a relaxation of the penal laws againſt the Roman Catholics had excited the jealouſy and indignation of the more zealous but leſs moderate of the proteſtants. Theſe were headed by lord George Gordon, who pledged himſelf to bring in a bill for the repeal of that obnoxious act. On failure of this the multitude proceeded to acts of riot, rapine and depredation, pulling down and ſetting fire to all the Romiſh chapels, a great number of houſes, and ſeveral priſons. All buſineſs, for a time, ſubſided, and nothing but inebriation and anarchy prevailed among the outrageous multitude. At laſt, through the exertion of the military power, many of theſe deluded people were ſhot, others were taken, brought to trial, and, being found guilty in conſequence of the evidence produced, received ſentence of death. Nineteen were executed in London and Middleſex; and ſix in Southwark.

On Friday in the week wherein theſe diſturbances happened lord George Gordon (who was conſidered as the inſtigator of them) was taken into cuſtody, and, after a long examination before the privy-council, committed to the tower. On the fifth of February following, he was tried at the court of King's-bench, Weſtminſter, for high-treaſon, and levying war, inſurrection and rebellion, againſt the king, by aſſembling a great number of armed perſons on the 2d of June in the preceding year, and diſturbing the peace, &c. The trial laſted from half paſt eight on Monday morning till five o'clock the next morning, when the jury declared his lordſhip Not Guilty.

A. D. 1781. On the 6th of January, about two o'clock in the morning, the French made a deſcent on the iſland of Jerſey, but in their attempting to land, four of their tranſport veſſels were wrecked upon the rocks, and upwards of two hundred men periſhed. Thoſe, however, who did land made their way into the moſt interior part of the iſland, where they met with a warm repulſe from the garriſon, great numbers of them being killed, many taken priſoners, and the reſt obliged to ſave themſelves by a precipitate retreat.

In the begining of the month of February admiral Rodney, commander of the Britiſh fleet in the Weſt-Indies, in conjunction with general Vaughan, commander of the land forces, poſſeſſed themſelves of the iſland of St. Euſtatius, belonging to the Dutch, which ſurrendered at diſcretion; but upwards of twenty ſhips, laden with property captured there, were taken by the French fleet in their paſſage home. They likewiſe made themſelves maſters of the iſlands of St. Martin, Saba, and St. Bartholomew belonging to the French, together with the two valuable Dutch colonies of Demerary and Iſſaquibo, both ſituated on the Spaniſh main.

Notwithſtanding the Britiſh forces ſeemed to obtain a ſuperiority in America, there was no probability of putting a cloſe to that deſtructive war. The coloniſts were rather animated than deterred by the ſlaughter which overſpread their country, ſo that no effort was exerted againſt them without conſiderable loſs. In the month of March general Green's army at Guildford was defeated, but not till after a very ſharp battle, in which ſeveral Engliſh officers of rank, and a great number of privates, were killed and wounded.

At this time the affairs of the Engliſh in the Eaſt-Indies bore a very unfavourable aſpect. Diſpatches arrived from Madraſs with intelligence that Hyder Ally had obtained a complete victory over a detachment of Britiſh troops commanded by colonel Ballie, which being unſupported by the main army under general Sir Hector Monro, was obliged to retreat, leaving behind him his heavy cannon, camp equipage and baggage. The conqueror, puſhing his ſucceſſes, afterwards took Arcot and ſeveral other places, and it was then thought would have made himſelf maſter of Madraſs; but by the prudent management of general Coote, and the intrepidity of the Britiſh forces under his command, he was not only diſappointed in this, but likewiſe defeated in ſeveral engagements, and moſt of the places he had taken were recovered by the Engliſh.

On the 16th of April commodore Johnſtone's fleet, with a number of India ſhips under convoy, was attacked by the French fleet under M. de Suffrein off the iſland of St. Jago, which was attended with great loſs and damage on both ſides. Some of the India ſhips were taken by the French, but they not being able to retain the whole, ſeveral eſcaped, and, re-joining the Engliſh fleet, arrived ſafe in England.

War ſtill raged with unabated fury in America, where blood and treaſure were moſt profuſely laviſhed, but without effect as to the main deſign. The Britiſh troops having for ſome time had poſſeſſion of Camden, lord Rawdon, with colonel Weſton's detachment being near it, and cloſely purſued by the American general Greene, after the battle of Guildford, ſet fire to that beautiful town, and reduced it to aſhes, after which he retired for ſafety to within a ſmall diſtance of Charles-Town.

About this time an engagement took place between admiral Arbuthnot, commander of an Engliſh fleet in America, and a ſmall ſquadron of the French. The battle was very ſevere for ſome time, and great damage was done on both ſides, but at length a prodigious miſt ariſing the two fleets loſt ſight of each other, and conſequently ſeperated, nor did the French afterwards appear to renew the engagement.

On

On the 28th of April a ſmart engagement took place in the Weſt-Indies, between the Britiſh fleet under the command of Sir Samuel Hood, Bart. and a ſquadron of French ſhips under the command of M. de Graſſe. The action was continued for ſome time with great obſtinacy, till at length night ſeperated them, and the French fleet bore away. On the 30th they again met and renewed the engagement, which at length terminated without any material conqueſt, though the ſhips on both ſides received conſiderable damage, many were killed, and great numbers wounded.

On the 2d of June the iſland of Tobago in the Weſt Indies was taken from the Engliſh by a body of land forces, commanded by the French governor of St. Vincent's, under cover of a large fleet of ſhips of war commanded by M. de Graſſe.

In the month of July the attention of the public was engaged in the fate of Monſ. de la Motte, a Frenchman, who had been taken up, committed to the Tower for high-treaſon, and being tried and found guilty, was, on the 27th of July, executed at Tyburn, purſuant to his ſentence. His noble and manly figure won upon all the ſpectators, who, by their looks, teſtified that all admired, all pitied, a man, who ſeemed born for a better fate.

In the month of Auguſt advices were received that Penſacola, the capital of Weſt-Florida, had been beſieged by the Spaniards, and that the garriſon had ſurrendered at diſcretion; by which the whole province ſurrendered to the arms of Spain.

On the 5th of Auguſt a deſperate engagement took place off the Texel, between a fleet of Engliſh under the command of vice-admiral Parker, and a ſquadron belonging to the Dutch. The latter had eight ſhips of the line, and the former ſeven. The engagement was very hot for ſome time, and great damage was done on both ſides; but at length the Dutch thought proper to bear away for the Texel, and the Engliſh were too diſabled to follow them. One of the Dutch men of war of 74 guns was ſunk, and the whole crew periſhed.

On the 31ſt of Auguſt a ſmart engagement took place near Sandy Hook in North America, between the Engliſh fleet under the command of Sir Samuel Hood, and the French fleet commanded by Monſ. de Barras. The engagement continued from four o'clock in the afternoon till ſun-ſet, during which time great damage was done on both ſides, but no compleat victory obtained on either. The Terrible was ſo damaged, that it was thought neceſſary to deſtroy her, which was accordingly done, after taking out the water, proviſions, and other uſeful articles. Sir Samuel Hood was deſirous of renewing the engagement the following morning, but was prevented by the French ſheltering themſelves in the bay of the Cheſapeak.

In the month of September brigadier-general Arnold, with a conſiderable body of tranſports, and a detachment of troops, proceeded to New London, to which he laid ſiege, and, after ſome reſiſtance, made himſelf maſter of the place, with very inconſiderable loſs. Several of the Americans ſhips were deſtroyed, and a great part of the town of New London reduced to aſhes.

This victory was ſucceeded by a very material overthrow of the Engliſh. Colonel Tarleton was defeated at Glouceſter by the Sieur de Choiſy, after which the allied armies of France and America marched againſt the Britiſh forces commanded by Lord Cornwallis. The entrenchments were opened in two attacks, above and below York-River, in the night between the 6th and 7th of October, and different engagements took place till the 17th, when Lord Cornwallis, finding the enemy too powerful, was obliged to capitulate, and he, with his whole army, were made priſoners of war.

A. D. 1781. TOWARDS the cloſe of this year the affairs of the Engliſh in the Eaſt-Indies bore a very favourable aſpect. In the month of December Sir Eyre Coote engaged the army of Hyder Ally between Porto Novo and Moteapollam with great ſucceſs. The battle laſted eight hours, and was maintained with great obſtinacy on both ſides, till at length the forces under Sir Eyre Coote (though greatly inferior in number) became victors, and the enemy precipitately retreating, left them maſters of the field. The loſs of the enemy was 4,000 killed, among whom were many of their principal officers.

In the month of November the Spaniards made a very forcible attack on Gibraltar, but from the intrepidity of the troops under the command of general Elliot, the governor, the enemy were repulſed. The battle began at three o'clock on the morning of the 27th. The pioneers and artilleriſts made wonderful exertions, and ſpread their fire with ſuch amazing rapidity, that in half an hour two mortar batteries of ten inch mortars, and three batteries of ſix guns each, with all the lines of approach, communication, traverſes, &c. were in flames and reduced to aſhes. The mortars and cannon were ſpiked, and their beds, carriages and platforms deſtroyed. Their magazines blew up one after another as the fire approached them. Finding all oppoſition to be ineffectual, the enemy offered no farther annoyance than an ill-directed fire of round and grape ſhot from the forts of St. Barbara and St. Philip, and the batteries on the lines, and remained in their camp ſpectators of the conflagration. Great numbers of the enemy were killed upon the ſpot, but owing to the darkneſs of the morning, and other circumſtances, the exact number could not be aſcertained. The loſs on the part of the Engliſh was very inconſiderable.

About the ſame time St. Euſtatius, together with the iſland of St. Martin, was captured by the French, under the command of the marquis de Bouille. They were taken by ſurprize on the 26th of November, and by a mere handful of the enemy, the number not exceeding three hundred, who landed from three frigates, and ſome ſmall craft, at Jenkins's Bay, at the back of the iſland. They poſſeſſed themſelves of the place without the leaſt oppoſition from the garriſons, though that of St. Euſtatius conſiſted of 723, and that of St. Martin's of 63 effective men, including officers. Lieutenant-colonel Cockburne, of the 35th regiment, who commanded at St Euſtatius when it was taken by the French, declared that, beſides the money depoſited in that place by admiral Rodney and general Vaughan, there was a ſum of 264,000 livres, which was his property, and which he therefore demanded. The marquis de Bouille having aſſembled the ſuperior officers of his corps, to inform them of the demand made by lieutenant-colonel Cockburne, they were all of opinion, that the Engliſh governor's money ſhould be reſtored to him, which was accordingly done. The marquis de Bouille found in the governor's houſe the ſum of a million, which he reſtored to the Dutch, after receiving authentic proof that it was their property. He likewiſe found about 1,600,000 livres in colony money belonging to admiral Rodney, general Vaughan and other officers, ariſing from the ſale of their captures, which he divided between his land and naval forces.

A. D. 1782. The American war had been proſecuted with ſo little ſucceſs, and at ſuch an immenſe expence of blood and treaſure, as to raiſe the juſt indignation of every friend to humanity and the common intereſts of Britain and her colonies. Many reſpectable members of both houſes pointed out the glaring abſurdity and atrocious cruelty of maintaining ſo fruitleſs as well as injurious a conteſt, and inferred from thence the expediency of putting a ſtop to any farther proſecution of an offenſive war. Among theſe the perſon that moſt diſtinguiſhed himſelf was, the Rt. Hon. Henry Seymour Conway, who, on the 27th of February, made the following motion in the houſe of commons: "That the farther proſecution of an offenſive war on the continent of America, for the purpoſe of reducing the revolted colonies to obedience by force, will be the means of weakening the efforts of this country againſt her European enemies: that it greatly tends to encreaſe the mutual enmity ſo fatal to the intereſts both of Great Britain and America, and by preventing an happy reconciliation with that country, to fruſtrate the earneſt deſire graciouſly expreſſed by his majeſty, to reſtore the bleſſings of public tranquillity." This motion, after ſome debates, was carried; upon which general Conway moved, "That an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty thereupon." This was carried without a diviſion, and an addreſs was accordingly preſented, to which his majeſty was pleaſed to give a moſt gracious anſwer.

In the month of February the conjunctive forces of France and Spain laid ſiege to Minorca. The honourable general Murray, governor of the place, oppoſed them for ſeveral days with great reſolution, but his troops were ſo diſabled, from a ſcorbutic diſorder prevailing among them, that they were at length obliged to ſubmit to the ſuperior power of the enemy. General Murray propoſed articles of capitulation to the conquerors, which being agreed to, he ſurrendered the fort of St. Philip's to his catholic majeſty, and then, with his troops, left it, with all the honours of war.

About the ſame time the iſlands of St. Chriſtopher and Nevis were captured by the French, under the command of the marquis de Bouille. Major-general Shirley, governor of the place, held out, with the moſt diſtinguiſhed reſolution, for a conſiderable time; but at length, finding the enemy too powerful, was obliged to ſubmit, and, after a ſiege of more than five weeks, compelled to ſurrender to the French arms upon terms of capitulation.

In the month of April the ſquadron under vice-admiral Barrington fell in with a number of tranſports belonging to the French, under the protection of three men of war and two frigates. Captain Jervais of the Foudroyant came up with, and engaged, the French commodore's ſhip Le Pegaſe, of 74 guns, and, after a cloſe engagement of more than an hour, obliged her to ſtrike. In the mean time the reſt of the fleet were diligent in purſuing the tranſports, who made all the haſte they could to ſecure themſelves in Breſt water; but in this, however, they were diſappointed, and thirteen out of eighteen were captured. Some of them were full of troops, and the reſt laden with ſtores, ordnance, &c. the whole being deſtined for the relief of the French ſettlements in the Eaſt Indies.

While theſe things were tranſacting abroad, ſome very material revolutions took place at home. Great diſputes aroſe in the Britiſh ſenate relative to the ſuppreſſion, or farther proſecution of the war in America. The majority were for the former, but were ſtrongly oppoſed by miniſtry, and great debates took place on the occaſion. At laſt, after ſeveral reſolutions paſſed, Sir John Rous made a motion, which comprized the whole, adding theſe words: "Therefore this houſe can no longer repoſe confidence in thoſe who have the management of public affairs." In conſequence of this lord North, on his next appearance in the houſe, declared he was no longer miniſter. The reſt of the miniſtry, ſoon after, followed his example, and his majeſty was pleaſed to appoint a new adminiſtration in their ſtead, which was compoſed of ſuch characters as appeared to give univerſal ſatisfaction to the public.

On the 12th of April a moſt deſperate engagement took place between the Engliſh fleet under the command of Sir George Bridges Rodney, and the French fleet commanded by the count de Graſſe, in the Weſt Indies. The battle laſted with unremitting fury from ſeven o'clock in the morning ing till half paſt ſix in the evening, when victory declared in favour of the Britiſh flag. The Ville de Paris, a ſhip of 110 guns, commanded by count de Graſſe, with four others of the line, were captured, and another of the line ſunk in the action. The Cæſar, one of thoſe taken, was blown up, and the whole crew, among whom were fifty Engliſh ſeamen, periſhed. The engagement was ſuſtained with the greateſt reſolution on both ſides. The day after the battle the remainder of the French fleet diſperſed; but being purſued by a ſquadron under the command of Sir Samuel Hood, two others of their line of battle ſhips and two frigates were taken, by which the formidable power they had in the Weſt Indies was greatly reduced, and their deſign of poſſeſſing themſelves of the iſland of Jamaica (which they had long concerted) totally fruſtrated. Sir George Rodney, for his gallant behaviour, received the public thanks of the Britiſh ſenate, and was farther honoured, by being afterwards created a peer of the realm, as well as gratified with a very conſiderable penſion.

About this time a deſperate battle was fought in the Eaſt Indies, between the Britiſh forces under the command of Sir Eyre Coote, and thoſe under Hyder Ally, in which the former proved victorious. Hyder loſt his ſecond ſon, with many of his principal officers, and the whole number killed and wounded amounted to 18,000. After the battle Hyder retreated with great precipitation to Trincomale, in order to recruit, and gather together his ſcattered army.

By diſpatches received about this time from Sir Edward Hughes, it appeared that, on the 21ſt of October, in the preceding year, the company's troops, under the command of Sir Hector Monro, marched to Nagore on the ſea coaſt, in order to co-operate with his majeſty's fleet in the reduction of Negapatam. The marines, and the greater part of the ſeamen, with the heavy cannon, &c. being landed on the 29th, the ſtrong lines which the enemy had thrown up to defend the approach to the town were ſtormed and carried. On the 7th of November a battery of ten 18 pounders being ready to open, the admiral and general ſent a ſummons to the governor to ſurrender, who being indiſpoſed, his ſecond in command anſwered for him, that the place ſhould be defended. During the ſiege the enemy made two deſperate ſallies with the greateſt part of the garriſon, but were repulſed with conſiderable loſs. On the 10th, more batteries being ready, the enemy thought proper to demand a capitulation, which was granted, and being ſigned on the 12th, the town and citadel were then delivered up. The garriſon conſiſted of about 8,000 men, 2,300 of which were troops belonging to Hyder Ally. Among theſe were 1000 cavalry, who precipitately fled on the firſt charge at the attack on the enemy's lines. In conſequence of the fall of Negapatam, Hyder's troops immediately evacuated all the forts and ſtrong poſts they held in the Tanjore country; and the petty princes in various other provinces, who, at the inſtigation of Hyder, had rebelled againſt the nabob of the Carnatic, laid down their arms, and returned to their obedience. By the general's return it appeared that the forces under his command at the reduction of Negapatam amounted to 4,215, of which 133 were killed, wounded or miſſing.

The marquis of Rockingham, having been appointed firſt lord of the treaſury, lord Shelburne and the right honourable Charles James Fox, ſecretaries of ſtate, lord Camden, preſident of the council, &c. it was hoped that this adminiſtration was founded upon a permanent baſis, and as a memorable inſtance of the triumph of freedom over venality and oppreſſion; the reſolution declaring the expulſion of Mr. Wilkes and his incapacity of ſerving as a member of parliament, was expunged the houſe of commons, by vote of a very conſiderable majority.

But the general joy that aroſe from an arrangement of miniſtry ſo grateful to the people was ſoon damped by the univerſally lamented death of the marquis of Rockingham, a nobleman, whoſe whole conduct throughout life had evinced the moſt genuine patriotiſm and perfect philanthropy. This melancholy event was followed by the reſignation of Mr. Fox and other members of the new cabinet, in conſequence (as appeared from the ſequel) of the earl of Shelburne being appointed to the office of firſt lord of the treaſury. Various conjectures were formed of courſe from theſe ſudden reſignations, but the houſe of commons having been unexpectedly adjourned to the 9th of July, no authentic information could be obtained till that day, when under the idea that Mr. Fox would then give his reaſons for his reſignation, there was the greateſt concourſe of people at every avenue of the houſe that had ever been known at this time of the year. A converſation rather than a debate took place from a report of a penſion having been granted to colonel Barré, then treaſurer of the navy, amounting to 3200l. a year. In the courſe of this very intereſting and important converſation, thoſe of his majeſty's late adminiſtration gave their reaſons for their reſignation, whilſt ſuch as remained behind pledged themſelves for the continuance of thoſe principles for which they were firſt received into his majeſty's councils.

The following day this intereſting ſubject was diſcuſſed in the upper houſe. The duke of Richmond ſpoke with extreme candour and liberality, declaring his wiſh that the world ſhould know on what principles he came into office. He affirmed that the new government was formed on this triple foundation: the great baſis was, in a peace with thoſe againſt whom we waged war abroad; in retrenching expences at home, and in leſſening the undue influence of the crown. He very reſpectfully adverted to the character of the noble marquis lately deceaſed, lamented the reſignation of the ſecretary of ſtate and chancellor of the exchequer, but declared that the then miniſters ſhould have his ſupport ſo long as they adhered to the principles they at firſt poſſeſſed.

Lord Shelburne avowed thoſe principles to which the noble duke particularly referred, as his general ſprings of action; he maintained his undeviating adherence to thoſe principles; lamented the loſs ſuſtained by the late reſignations; ſpoke elaborately on the ſubject of American affairs and foreboded the happy events of the then councils. Several other members roſe in vindication of themſelves and friends, as to their reſpective conduct in the then juncture of affairs.

On the eleventh his majeſty came to the houſe of peers, and having in a ſpeech to parliament commended their unwearied zeal and induſtry with the plaineſt regard to its true intereſts, whether peace or a continuance of war ſhould be the event; thanked the commons for their liberal ſupplies, and declared his reliance on the ſpirits, affection and unanimity of his people in the ſupport of the honour of his crown, and the intereſt of his kingdoms: the lord chancellor by command of his majeſty jeſty prorogued the ſeſſion to the 3d day of September.

On the tenth of Auguſt one David Tyrie was indicted at the aſſizes held at Wincheſter for traiterouſly correſponding with his majeſty's enemies. After taking the depoſitions of the ſeveral evidences, and reading a variety of papers in court, tending to criminate the culprit; when the clerk of arraigns put the uſual queſtion, he made this very extraordinary reply, "It is in vain for me to ſay "any thing. Poverty has been the cauſe of my "conviction, becauſe I had not the means to bring "my witneſſes here. However, I have a hope "beyond the grave, and deſpiſe every thing that "has been done to me." The judge then pronounced ſentence of death, and he was accordingly executed, as uſual in caſes of high treaſon.

By accounts, dated from the Eaſt-India-houſe the 28th of this month, it appeared that there had been a deſperate engagement between our fleet under Sir Edward Hughes, and that of France under Monſ. Suffrein. The French, at length, after a warm conteſt of upwards of two hours, ceaſed firing and hauled off after the tranſports they had in convoy; much loſs was ſuſtained on both ſides, that of the enemy cannot be determined, but on our ſide fell two captains, ſeveral inferior officers and 32 private men, beſides near one hundred were wounded; Sir Edward after the action proceeded to Trincomale to repair his damages, and having refitted, ſailed for Fort St. George.

The policy of the American war, and the humiliating circumſtances with which it was attended to this country, may be gathered from the following reſolution in the houſe of delegates, tranſmitted in the South-Carolina Gazette.

Reſolved unanimouſly, "That this houſe will "exert the power of the ſtate, to enable congreſs "to proſecute the war, until Great Britain re-"nounce all claim of ſovereignty over the united "ſtates, or any part thereof, and until their inde-"pendence be formally or tacitly aſſured by the "treaty with Great Britain, France and the United "States, which ſhall terminate the war."

The loſs of his majeſty's ſhip the Royal George of 108 guns which happened at Spithead on the 29th of Auguſt, was deemed one of the greateſt misfortunes this country has experienced for many years paſt. This ſhip having, on her laſt cruize, made more water than uſual, it was reſolved to heave her down at Spithead, purſuant to which, the weather being moderate, that buſineſs was commenced at 6 o'clock in the morning, and the ſhip by ten was got to a proper ſituation for diſcovering the leak, but in order to take off ſome further ſheets of copper, to caulk the ſeams properly, ſhe was ordered to be lowered another ſtreak; during this buſineſs a great part of the crew were at dinner, when the ſhip by a ſudden guſt of wind fell on one ſide, and the lower deck ports being open, ſhe filled in about eight minutes and went to the bottom. Upon the whole, it is generally ſuppoſed that upwards of 900 people ſuffered upon this melancholy occaſion, including about 250 women and ſeveral children. The loſs of the brave admiral Kempenfelt was truly lamented; his abilities were known to all the naval powers, and he was juſtly eſteemed as brave and able a ſea-officer, as this or any other nation ever boaſted, and will therefore be remembered as long as the Britiſh navy exiſts.

To aggravate this late calamity, an expreſs ſoon after arrived at the admiralty from vice-admiral lord Shuldham, with an account received from the captain of a merchantman from Jamaica, of the loſs of his majeſty's ſhip the Ramillies. It appeared that admiral Greaves, who had the charge of the homeward bound Jamaica convoy, kept a very northward courſe, to avoid the enemies cruizers, whom he apprehended might be detached to intercept the tardy ſhips of the convoy. His flag was flying on board the Ramillies from his departure from Jamaica, to the moment it was neceſſary to quit her for the preſervation of the lives of the crew. She loſt her maſts on the tenth of September in a violent gale of wind, and continued ungovernable till the nineteenth when ſhe was abandoned and left ſinking.

From letters which arrived from Bengal about this time, the moſt pleaſing expectations were formed of an immediate and general peace, though our government in that quarter abounded in every ſpecies of reſource for carrying on the war, having been able for ſome months paſt to ſend monthly to Madras five lacks of rupees amounting to 62,500l. ſterling, beſides other requiſites. The Mahrattas, weary of an unſucceſsful war, had declared for pacific meaſures, and the late miſunderſtandings with the Nizam, and ſome others of the country powers were now ſo happily removed, that if Hyder Ally alone had proved refractory, they had all engaged to unite with the company's ſervants in bringing him to reaſon. Another favourable circumſtance was that neither of them ſhewed the leaſt inclination to ſee a French intereſt ever re-eſtabliſhed in their country. This favourable ſtate of affairs, ſo different from the late diſtracted and threatening proſpect of things was aſcribed entirely to the activity of the ſupreme council and that perfect harmony among themſelves, which gave them weight and conſequence with the native powers. But it appeared at the ſame time that while thoſe gentlemen had been ſo attentive to meaſures of peace and conciliation, they had not neglected the commercial concerns of their employers, their inveſtments having been already compleated, not only for this but the next year, a degree of forwardneſs in that buſineſs never known before.

Diſpatches were received ſoon after, that the ſquadron of a deſperate adventurer called Paul Jones, which ſurpriſed and took the forts and ſettlements in Hudſon's Bay, conſiſted of three frigates and three or four privateers. They got a conſiderable booty at Fort Charles and Fort Rupert factories, deſtroyed all the forts and veſſels on the bay, particularly Forts Nelſon and Churchill, and took away with them two very valuable loaded veſſels belonging to the company, which were ſent for Boſton prior to Paul Jones's bearing away for the North Seas. His booty excluſive of the damage he had done the forts and factories was ſuppoſed to amount to no leſs than 100,000l. This extraordinary adventurer ſome time before fell in with his majeſty's ſhips the Serapis, commanded by capt. Pearſon, and the Counteſs of Saliſbury, commanded by capt. Piercy, having under their convoy a large number of tranſports. A deſperate engagement took place, in which Paul Jones's ſquadron proved victorious, and the Serapis and Counteſs of Saliſbury were both captured; but the tranſports, during the engagement, fortunately made their eſcape. Towards the cloſe of this action, one of the crew on board Paul Jones's ſhip, thinking they muſt be inevitably conquered, or totally deſtroyed, attempted to ſtrike the colours, which ſo irritated his commander that he inſtantly ſhot him through the head, as an example to the reſt reſt of the crew that they had no other proſpect while in his ſervice than what was founded on the moſt daring and hazardous enterprizes.

The public were at this time moſt agreeably relieved from their apprehenſions relative to the fate of Gibraltar by the following important and moſt intereſting intelligence, communicated by general Elliot, the gallant defender of that fortreſs to Mr. ſecretary Townſhend. From the general's repreſentation it appeared, that the enemy had collected their whole force by ſea and land: the former conſiſted of forty-four ſail of the line, beſides three inferior two deckers, ten battering ſhips, five bomb ketches, ſeveral frigates and xebecques, a great number of gun and mortar boats, a large floating battery, many armed veſſels, and near three hundred boats purpoſely conſtructed for carrying troops. Their land batteries were mounted with above one hundred pieces of cannon, and an equal number of mortars and howitzers, and their army conſiſted of near forty thouſand men. On the 13th of September, at eight in the morning, all the battering ſhips commanded by don Buenventura Moreno, rear-admiral, were put in motion and came forward to their ſeveral ſtations, as previouſly appointed, the admiral being placed upon the capital of the king's baſtion, the other ſhips extending three to the ſouthward of the flag as far as the church battery, five to the northward about the heighth of the Old Mole, and one a very little to the weſtward of the admiral. By a quarter before ten they were anchored in line, at the diſtance of a thouſand to twelve hundred yards, immediately on which, a heavy cannonade began from all the ſhips, which was ſtrongly ſupported by the cannon and mortars in the enemy's lines and approaches.

At the ſame inſtant our batteries opened with hot and cold ſhot from the guns, and ſhells from the howitzers and mortars. This firing continued without intermiſſion on both ſides till noon, when that of the enemy from their ſhips ſeemed to ſlacken, although but little. About two o'clock the admiral's ſhip was obſerved to ſmoke as if on fire, and a few men buſy on the roof, ſearching the cauſe. Our batteries never diſcontinued. The enemy's fire from the ſhips gradually decreaſed. About ſeven in the evening they fired from a few guns and that only at intervals. At midnight the admiral's ſhip was plainly diſcovered beginning to burn, and in an hour after it was completely in flames; eight more of the ſhips took fire in ſucceſſion. Signals of diſtreſs being now made, the launches, feluccas and boats of the whole fleet, began to take out the men from on board the burning ſhips. Many ſhot were ſtill fired from thoſe in which the flames had yet made no conſiderable progreſs, and the fire from the enemy's batteries on ſhore did not in the leaſt diminiſh.

Captain Curtis of his majeſty's ſhip Brilliant, who was appointed to the command of the marine brigade, and with his ſquadron of gun boats lay ready to take advantage of any favourable circumſtance, left the New Mole at two o'clock, and about three formed a line upon the enemy's flank, advancing and firing with great order and expedition, which ſo aſtoniſhed and diſconcerted them, that they fled precipitately with all their boats, abandoning the ſhips, in which ſome officers and numbers of their men, including many wounded, were left to periſh. This muſt unavoidably have been their wretched fate, had they not been dragged from amidſt the flames through the perſonal intrepidity of brigadier Curtis and his people, at the moſt imminent hazard of their own lives.

The general expreſſed the utmoſt anguiſh at ſeeing the brigadier's pinnace cloſe to one of the largeſt ſhips at the inſtant ſhe blew up, and ſpread her wrecks to a vaſt extent all around, till the black cloud of ſmoke being diſperſed, he was again revived by the ſight of the pinnace, little apprehending that the brigadier was in the utmoſt danger of ſinking, ſome pieces of timber having fallen into, and pierced the boat, killing the cockſwain, and wounding others of the men, ſo that ſcarce any hopes remained of reaching the ſhore: he was providentially ſaved by ſtopping the hole with the ſeamen's jackets until boats could arrive to their relief. One of our gun-boats was ſunk at the ſame moment.

In the courſe of the day the remaining eight ſhips ſeverally blew up with violent exploſions; one only eſcaped the effect of our fire, which it was thought proper to burn, there being no poſſibility of preſerving her. The admiral's flag remained flying on board his ſhip till ſhe was totally conſumed. The royal artillery, additional gunners and marine brigade only could be employed in this ſervice, which they executed with deliberate coolneſs and undaunted intrepidity. The fire was inceſſant, and the batteries abundantly ſupplied with ammunition; every ſoldier in the garriſon, not on duty, eagerly preſſing to ſhare in the honourable labours of the day. The enemy's daring attempt by ſea was effectually defeated by the well ſupported fire from our batteries; but the well-timed, judicious, and ſpirited attack made by brigadier Curtis rendered this ſucceſs a complete victory. The loſs in the brigade of ſeamen, conſidering the nature of the attack, was very trifling, only one being killed and five wounded. That of the enemy, in killed, burnt, drowned and wounded muſt have been great indeed. The ſincere gratitude all the priſoners of war expreſſed for their deliverance from the various horrors that ſurrounded them afforded the higheſt ſatisfaction to humanity.

The duke de Crillon, a general of great reputation, (having the chief command of the allied forces) princes of royal blood of France, dignified characters of Europe, firſt nobility of Spain and great military officers, being preſent with the beſieging army, an amazing concourſe of ſpectators that filled the camp and covered the adjacent hills on this occaſion, plainly proved that the combined powers had formed the moſt ſanguine expectations from their battering ſhips, deemed perfect in deſign, compleated by dint of prodigious labour and unlimitted profuſion of expence, and by common report pronounced invincible.

This agreeable intelligence was followed by diſpatches from lord Howe, equally encouraging. Theſe imported, that his lordſhip having received authentic intelligence that the combined fleets of fifty ſail of the three and two decked ſhips had taken a ſtation ſome time before in Gibraltar Bay, on the morning of the 11th of October our fleet entered the ſtraits, and the van arriving off Gibraltar Bay, a ſhort time after the cloſe of the day, a very favourable opportunity offered for the ſtore ſhips to have reached their deſtined anchorage without moleſtation from the enemy; but for want of timely attention to the circumſtances of the navigation pointed out in the inſtructions communicated by captain Curtis, only four of the thirty-one which had kept company with the fleet on the paſſage effected their purpoſe.

Very tempeſtuous weather on the night of the 10th had put two of the enemy's two decked ſhips on ſhore, a third loſt her foremaſt and bowſprit, and a fourth had been driven under the works of the garriſon and captured, and two more went out of the bay to the eaſtward. With the reſt of their force they put to ſea the evening of the 13th to interrupt the introduction of the remaining ſtore-ſhips, and having the wind in their favour they bore down upon the fleet then off Fangerolle, in order of battle. In the morning of the 14th the fleet being to the ſouthward of the enemy ſix or ſeven leagues, and the wind changing ſoon after, opportunity was taken to paſs ſuch of the ſtore-ſhips as were then with the fleet into the bay.

On the night of the 18th the reſt of the ſtore-ſhips which had been ordered to a ſpecial rendezvous with the Buffalo, (one only excepted) were likewiſe anchored in Roſſia bay. The troops being embarked in the ſhips of war, a large ſupply of powder being landed at the ſame time, and the wants of the garriſon amply provided for, lord Howe propoſed taking advantage of an eaſtwardly wind, which had prevailed the two or three preceding days, for returning through the ſtraits to the weſtward.

At break of day on the 19th the combined force of the enemy was ſeen at a little diſtance to the N. E. The fleet being at that time ſo nearly between Europa and Center points that there was not ſpace to form in order of battle on either tack, the admiral repaſſed the ſtraits followed by the enemy. The wind changing next morning to the northward, the combined fleets, conſiſting of forty-five or forty-ſix ſhips of the line, ſtill retained the ſame advantage. The Britiſh fleet being formed to leeward to receive them, they were left uninterruptedly to take the diſtance at which they ſhould think fit to engage. They began their cannonade at ſun ſet on the van and rear, ſeeming to point their chief attack on the latter, and continued their fire along their whole line, at a conſiderable diſtance, and with little effect until ten at night. It was returned occaſionally from the different ſhips of the fleet, as their nearer approach at times afforded a more favourable opportunity for making any impreſſion on them. The enemy hauling their wind, and the Britiſh fleet keeping on all night with their full ſail directed before the commencement of their fire, the fleets were much ſeparated, and the enemy ſheltered themſelves by running into Cadiz.

Lord Howe expreſſed much regret, that the little confidence the enemy ſhewed in their ſuperiority, by keeping always as near as they could haul to the wind, prevented the full effect of the animated exertions he was aſſured would have been made by every officer and ſeaman under his command, if they could have cloſed with their opponents; but added, that as he judged ſuch nearer approach could not then be ſeaſonably attempted, he made no change in the diſpoſition of the ſhips as formed at firſt to receive the enemy. By the fire of the combined fleets in this partial action, our loſs was 68 killed and 208 wounded.

Lord Howe, as ſoon as the maſts of the ſhips damaged by the enemy's fire were properly ſecured, took the firſt opportunity of ſtanding to the northward, under all the ſail poſſible, with requiſite care for keeping the fleet duly connected to get up again with the enemy. The wind continued in the ſame quarter to the 25th of October, but being more to the eaſt the three following days, the ſame preſſed ſail was carried as before; but as the enemy, who had perſiſted to avoid a renewal of the action of the 21ſt, could not (as the wind then was) be forced thereto, except by working in with the Barbary ſhore for an uncertain time, which the ſtate of the ſhips did not admit, his lordſhip brought the fleet to on the 28th to prepare the detachments directed by his inſtructions at that period.

Towards the cloſe of November, Mr. Secretary Townſhend ſent a letter to the Directors of the bank of England, of which the following is a copy:

"Whitehall, Nov. 22, 1782.

"Gentlemen,

"His majeſty's miniſters, anxious to prevent, "as early as poſſible, the miſchiefs too commonly "reſulting from ſpeculations in the funds, during "the uncertain ſtate of negociation for peace be"tween the powers at war, (and which it is to the "general honour and intereſt of all great powers "to avoid) have thought it their duty to aſk his "majeſty's permiſſion to communicate to you, for "the information of the public, that the negocia"tions now carrying on at Paris, are brought ſo "far to a point, as to promiſe a deciſive concluſion, either for peace or war before the meeting "of parliament, which will on that account be "prorogued from Tueſday the 26th inſtant to "Thurſday the 5th of December next.

"I have his majeſty's commands to aſſure you "that you will receive immediate notice of the iſſue.

"I am Gentlemen,
"Your moſt obedient
"humble Servant,
"T. Townshend."

Governor and Company of the Bank of England.

The lord-mayor of London likewiſe received a letter to the ſame purport with that addreſſed to the governor and company of the Bank of England.

After this notification the following letter was received by the lord-mayor:

"My lord,

"In conſequence of my letter to your lordſhip "of the 22d of laſt month, I take the earlieſt op"portunity of informing your lordſhip, that a "meſſenger is juſt arrived from Paris with an ac"count of proviſional articles being ſigned on the "30th of November, between his majeſty's com"miſſioners and the commiſſioners of the United "Sates of America, to be inſerted and conſtitute "a treaty of peace; hence peace ſhall be con"cluded between Great Britain and France. Your "lordſhip will pleaſe to make this as public as "poſſible.

"I am, &c.
"T. Townshend."

Dec. 3, 1782.

A copy of the above was alſo ſent to the Directors of the Bank.

On the 5th his majeſty went to the houſe of peers and opened the ſeſſion of parliament with a ſpeech from the throne, importing that in conſequence of the ſenſe of his parliament, he pointed all his views and meaſures, as well in Europe as in North America, to an entire and cordial reconciliation with the colonies, and expreſſive of his perfect reliance on their wiſdom in the further proſecution of the war, ſhould its continuance appear to be indiſpenſible. In his particular addreſs to the commons, he diſplayed a very œconomical diſpoſition, a generous feeling for the ſufferers in America, made the greater conceſſions on his part, and recommended commended ſuch meaſures as ſhould be deemed moſt ſalutary and patriotic.

After ſome debates as to certain particular parts of the ſpeech, an addreſs was unanimouſly agreed to in the houſe of lords; the ſame form paſſed in the lower houſe, and the addreſſes being reſpectively preſented met with moſt gracious anſwers from his majeſty.

About this time advice was received of the melancholy fate of his majeſty's ſhip the Centaur of 74 guns, commanded by captain Inglefield, which foundered near the Azores in the Atlantic ſea. At the time of her ſinking moſt of the crew were on board, there not being a ſingle ſhip in ſight to give them any aſſiſtance. A ſhort time previous to her going down, a part of the crew took to her remaining boats, which were three in number, her other boats being ſtove in the hurricane: but of theſe two were ſunk from being too much laden, and all on board them periſhed. The other, which was very ſmall, containing only twelve men, beſides the captain and a boy, fortunately reached Fyal, one of the Azores, after being expoſed to the greateſt diſtreſs for ſixteen days from the time they firſt took to the boat. When theſe wretched ſurvivors quitted the ſhip, they took with them only water ſufficient for three days, but which, by prudent management, was lengthened out ſo as to ſerve them nine; after which time they were reduced to the deplorable extremity of drinking their own urine.

On the 12th of December captain James Luttrell, commander of his majeſty's ſhip the Mediator of 44 guns, diſplayed an inſtance of ſingular proweſs in the attack of five ſail of French and American frigates laden with military ſtores off Ferrol, and the capture of the Alexander of 24 and the Managere of 30 guns armed en flute. On the 14th captain Stephen Gregory, of the Alexander, laid a plot to occaſion the priſoners to riſe, and hoped to have taken the command of the Mediator from captain Luttrell; but through the indefatigable attention of lieutenant Rankin of the marines, in the diſpoſal and regulation of centries as a guard, and the lucky precaution they had taken of faſtening down the gratings of all the hatches in the lower gun deck, leaving room for only one man at a time to come up abaft, the deſperate ſcheme of Gregory was prevented without bloodſhed. The alarm he fixed on was to fire an eighteen pounder in the gun room, where he lay, for he meſſed with the lieutenant, and had been paid every friendly attention. At ten at night the captain was alarmed by a terrible ſhock from ſome exploſion, and heard a cry of fire, ſoon after which he was informed that the lee port was blown away by the gun into the ſea, and the water making in. Having wore the ſhip on the other tack to get the port hole covered with tarpaulins and ſecured, the captain went down, found the gun-room on fire, and every thing ſhattered that was near the exploſion. Gregory and his accomplices were dreſſed, though they had pretended to go to bed; and in their cot was found ſome of the gunpowder, which they had provided to prime the gun: and, in ſhort, every proof neceſſary for a conviction of Gregory's having fired it for an alarm to make the priſoners riſe. He had alſo endeavoured to provide himſelf with a ſword, but being diſappointed in his project, begged his life. The cry of fire forward was heard among the priſoners when the ſignal gun was fired; but the plot being diſcovered and all things ſettled, Gregory, together with thoſe of his officers and men who were ſuſpected of being concerned in the plot, were ordered to be put in irons, and kept on bread and water. The Managere was conducted into Plymouth Sound, and the Alexander ſoon followed.

On the 23d of December his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and gave the royal aſſent to ſeveral bills that were ready, after which the lords unanimouſly voted their thanks to Sir Edward Hughes and Sir Eyre Coote, and then adjourned to the 21ſt of January, as did alſo the houſe of commons to the ſame day.

At the cloſe of this year the agreeable news arrived of the releaſe of captain Aſgill, (ſon of Sir Charles Aſgill, alderman of London) by virtue of an order of the United States of America in congreſs aſſembled on the 7th of November. This young officer, as brave as amiable, had been doomed, by lot, to ſuffer death, to retaliate for the murder of one captain Huddy, (an American officer) who had been executed as a traitor by the loyal refugees at New-York. Immediately on hearing of the fate of her unfortunate ſon, Lady Aſgill, his afflicted mother, applied, in the moſt melting and pathetic terms, to the count de Vergennes, prime miniſter of France. The count, with great humanity and politeneſs, wrote to general Waſhington on the intereſting ſubject; and that officer, warmly interfering in behalf of the unhappy young man, his life was ſpared. The following letters are adduced as the means by which this moſt deſirable event was brought about.

Copy of a letter from Count Vergennes to General Waſhington, dated at Verſailles July 29, 1782.

" Sir,

" It is not in quality of a king, the friend and ally of the United States, though with the knowledge and conſent of his majeſty, that I now have the honour to write to your Excellency. It is a man of ſenſibility, and a tender father, who feels all the force of paternal love, that I take the liberty to addreſs to your Excellency my earneſt ſolicitations in favour of a mother and family in tears. Her ſituation ſeems the more worthy of notice, on our part, as it is to the humanity of a nation at war with her own, that ſhe has recourſe for what ſhe ought to receive from the impartial juſtice of her own generals.

" I have the honour to incloſe your excellency a copy of a letter which Mrs. Aſgill has juſt wrote to me. I am not known to her, nor was I acquainted that her ſon was the unhappy victim deſtined by lot to expiate the odious crime that a formal denial of juſtice obliges you to revenge. Your Excellency will not read this letter without being extremely affected; it had that effect upon the king and queen, to whom I communicated it. The goodneſs of their majeſties hearts induces them to deſire that the inquietudes of an unfortunate mother may be calmed, and her tenderneſs reaſſured. I feel, Sir, that theſe are caſes where humanity itſelf exacts the moſt extreme rigour: perhaps the one now in queſtion may be of the number; but allowing reprizals to be juſt, it is not leſs horrid to thoſe who are the victims; and the character of your Excellency is too well known for me not to be perſuaded that you deſire nothing more than to avoid the diſagreeable neceſſity.

" There is one conſideration, Sir, which, though it is not deciſive, may have an influence upon your reſolution. Captain Aſgill is doubtleſs your priſoner, ſoner, but he is among thoſe whom the arms of the king contributed to put into your hands at York-Town. Although this circumſtance does not operate as a ſafeguard, it however juſtifies the intereſt I permit myſelf to take in this affair. If it is in your power, Sir, to conſider and have regard to it, you will do what is very agreeable to their majeſties; the danger of young Aſgill, the tears, the deſpair of his mother, affect them ſenſibly, and they will ſee with pleaſure the hope of conſolation ſhine out for thoſe unfortunate people.

" In ſeeking to deliver Mr. Aſgill from the fate which threatens him, I am far from engaging you to ſeek another victim; the pardon, to be perfectly ſatisfactory, muſt be entire. I do not imagine it can be productive of any bad conſequences. If the Engliſh General has not been able to puniſh the horrible crime you complain of, in ſo exemplary a manner as he ſhould, there is reaſon to think he will take the moſt efficacious meaſures to prevent the like in future.

" I ſincerely wiſh that my interceſſion may meet with ſucceſs; the ſentiment which dictates it, and which you have not ceaſed to manifeſt on every occaſion, aſſures me, that you will not be indifferent to the prayers and to the tears of a family, which has recourſe to your clemency through me. It is rendering homage to your virtue to implore it."

" I have the honour to be, with the moſt perfect conſideration, Sir, Your, &c.

(Signed) " De Vergennes."

Copy of a letter from Lady Aſgill to Count Vergennes, dated London, July 18, 1782.

" Sir,

" If the politeneſs of the French court will permit an application of a ſtranger, there can be no doubt but one in which all the tender feelings of an individual can be intereſted, will meet with a favourable reception from a nobleman, whoſe character does honour not only to his own country, but to human nature. The ſubject, Sir, on which I preſume to implore your aſſiſtance, is too heart-piercing for me to dwell on, and common fame has, moſt probably, informed you of it; it therefore renders the painful taſk unneceſſary. My ſon, and only ſon, as dear as he is brave, amiable as he is deſerving to be ſo, only nineteen, a priſoner under articles of capitulation of York-Town, is now confined in America an object of retaliation. Shall an innocent ſuffer for the guilty! Repreſent to yourſelf, Sir, the ſituation of a family under ſuch circumſtances, ſurrounded as I am by objects of diſtreſs; diſtracted with fear and grief; no words can expreſs my feeling, or paint the ſcene. My huſband given over by his phyſicians, a few hours before the news arrived, and not in a ſtate to be informed of the misfortune; my daughter ſeized with a fever and delirium, raving about her brother, and without one interval of reaſon, ſave to hear heart-alleviating circumſtances. Let your feelings, Sir, ſuggeſt and plead for my inexpreſſible miſery. A word from you, like a voice from heaven, will ſave us from diſtraction and wretchedneſs. I am well informed General Waſhington reveres your character; ſay but to him you wiſh my ſon to be releaſed, and he will reſtore him to his diſtracted family, and render him to happineſs. My ſon's virtue and bravery will juſtify the deed. His honour, Sir, carried him to America. He was born to affluence, independence, and the happieſt proſpects. Let me again ſupplicate your goodneſs; let me reſpectfully implore your high influence in behalf of innocence, in the cauſe of juſtice, of humanity; that you would, Sir, diſpatch a letter to General Waſhington, from France, and favour me with a copy of it, to be ſent from hence. I am ſenſible of the liberty I take in making this requeſt; but I am ſenſible, whether you comply with it or not, you will pity the diſtreſs that ſuggeſts it; your humanity will drop a tear on the fault, and efface it. I will pray that heaven may grant you may never want the comfort it is in your power to beſtow on Asgill."

Nor was the humanity or liberality of general Waſhington leſs conſpicuous on this joyful occaſion, as appeared from the following copy of a letter from the general to Mr. Aſgill, covering the reſolve of Congreſs to releaſe him.

" Head Quarters, Nov. 13.

" Sir,

" It affords me ſingular pleaſure to have it in my power to tranſmit you the incloſed copy of an act of Congreſs of the 7th inſtant, by which you are releaſed from the diſagreeable circumſtances in which you have ſo long been. Suppoſing you would wiſh to go into New-York as ſoon as poſſible, I alſo incloſe a paſſport for that purpoſe.

" Your letter of the 18th of October, came regularly to my hands; I beg you to believe, that my not anſwering it ſooner did not proceed from inattention to you, or a want of feeling for your ſituation. I daily expected a determination of your caſe; and I thought it better to await that, than to feed you with hopes that might in the end prove fruitleſs.

" I cannot take leave of you, Sir, without aſſuring you, that in whatever light my agency in this unpleaſing affair may be received, I never was influenced through the whole of it by ſanguinary motives, but by what I conceived a ſenſe of my duty, which loudly called upon me to take meaſures, however diſagreeable, to prevent a repetition of thoſe enormities which have been the ſubject of diſcuſſion; and that this important end is likely to be anſwered without the effuſion of the blood of an innocent perſon, is not a greater relief to you, than it is to, Sir, Your moſt obedient,

And humble Servant,

(Signed) G. Washington."

Thus by the interference of the count de Vergennes, and the interpoſition of general Waſhington in conſequence thereof, was the happy effect produced, and a moſt reſpectable character reſcued from an undeſerved fate, to the joy of his relatives in particular, and the friends of mankind in general.

During the courſe of this year ſeveral ſhips were taken at different periods between the contending powers, and others loſt by accidents, of which the following are the principal:

On the 17th of January the Hannibal, of 50 guns, was taken by the French fleet off the weſt coaſt of Sumatra.

On the 17th of February admiral Hughes took a valuable French ſtore-ſhip off Madras, retook five country ſhips, and with nine ſhips beat off Monſ. Suffrein with twelve.

On the 16th of March the Santa Catalina, a Spaniſh frigate of 42 guns, was taken and burnt by his majeſty's ſhip the Succeſs of 32, off Cape Spartal.

On the 19th of April the Caton and Jaſon of 64 guns, L'Aimiable of 32, and Ceres of 18, were taken taken from the French in the More Paſſage in the Weſt-Indies.

On the 24th of June a French frigate, called the Tartar, was taken by the Engliſh.

On the 5th of July, the Amazone, a French frigate of 36 guns, was taken by the Santa Margareta, in North America.

On the 10th of September the Hebe, a French frigate of 40 guns, was taken by his majeſty's ſhip the Rainbow off the iſle of Bas.

On the 15th the L'Aigle French frigate of 40 guns, with ſome money for congreſs, and the Sophie of 22, with a valuable cargo, were taken in the Delaware by the Warwick, &c.

On the 4th of October the Hector of 74 guns, one of lord Rodney's prizes, foundered near Halifax.

On the 10th of the ſame month the combined fleets of France and Spain were greatly damaged by a ſtorm in Algeſiras Bay, and the St. Michael, a Spaniſh ſhip of 74 guns, was driven on ſhore under the guns of Gibraltar, and taken by the garriſon of that fortreſs.

A. D. 1783. The expectations of the public were greatly raiſed on the commencement of this year from the apparent proſpect of the happy reſtoration of a general peace, and the bleſſings which it might be naturally apprehended would flow from ſo deſirable an event. But ſuch was the ſtate of the negotiations between the belligerent powers as to preclude all ground for certainty, affording room only for mere conjecture.

There appeared, indeed, about the latter end of November in the preceding year, great hopes of terminating a peace with the United States of Holland; but owing to unforeſeen incidents, or, probably, to the ſuggeſtions and interference of a power inimical to the intereſt of Great Britain, the negotiations were ſoon ſtopped, though the negotiators ſeemed to have no diſpoſition to ſeperate. At length, however, the plenipotentiaries for the United States having delivered a memorial to Mr. Fitzherbert, his Britannic majeſty's plenipotentiary, in which the language of the Britiſh cabinet was much excepted to, articles were in conſequence propoſed to the ſtates-general by order of the court of London to their miniſter, which, from the reception they met with, excluded every idea of a probability of accommodation. The negotiation was carried on alſo at Paris, where, on the delivery of a paper, containing the opinion of the United States as to the articles propoſed by the Britiſh cabinet, to Mr. Fitzherbert, Meſſrs. Leſtevenon and Brantſen gave him to underſtand, in a ſhort verbal converſation, the impoſſibility there was of their ever coming to a pacification in conſequence of the ſentiments manifeſted by his court: and thus, for a time, reſted the whole affair.

When at laſt the hope of peace could not be mentioned but with indeciſion and anxiety, the public had the ſatisfaction of anticipating at leaſt the effects of that invaluable bleſſing. The event was announced on the evening of the 23d of January, in a letter from lord Grantham, one of his majeſty's principal ſecretaries of ſtate, to the lord-mayor of London, wherein his lordſhip was acquainted, that a meſſenger had arrived from Paris with the preliminary articles between Great Britain and France, and between Great Britain and Spain, as ſigned at Verſailles, on the 20th, by the reſpective miniſters plenipotentiary of the aforeſaid courts. That the preliminaries with Holland were not yet ſigned, but a ceſſation of hoſtilities was agreed upon; and that his lordſhip was deſired immediately to publiſh the important event.

Without entering into a detail of the prolix, though expedient, forms uſed upon ſuch occaſions, it may be deemed neceſſary to ſpecify the moſt intereſting particulars of the preliminary articles.

It was agreed, between their Britannic and moſt Chriſtian majeſties, that the former ſhould preſerve, in full right, the iſland of Newfoundland and the adjacent iſlands, ceding in full right to the latter the iſlands of St. Pierre and Miquelon, reſtoring St. Lucia, and guarantying Tobago. That the moſt Chriſtian king ſhould reſtore to Great Britain the iſlands of Grenada and the Grenades, St. Vincent's, Dominica, St. Chriſtopher, Nevis and Montſerrat. That the king of Great Britain ſhould cede and guarantee in full right to his moſt Chriſtian majeſty the river of Senegal and its dependencies, reſtore the iſland of Goree, and be by him put in poſſeſſion of Fort James and the river Gambia.

With reſpect to the coaſts of Africa, it was ſtipulated, that all the eſtabliſhments ſhould be reſtored to the moſt Chriſtian king, which belonged to him at the commencement of the war on the coaſt of Orixa and in Bengal, and that his ſubjects ſhould be ſecured in their trade on the coaſts of Orixa, Coromandel and Malabar. That Pondicherry ſhould be reſtored, together with Mahe and the Comptoir at Surat, and that the French ſhould carry on commerce in that part of India, either as individuals, or as a company.

Between their Britannic and moſt Catholic majeſties it was agreed, that the latter ſhould retain the iſland of Minorca, that the former ſhould cede Eaſt Florida to the latter, who ſhould keep Weſt Florida upon certain conditions. That his Catholic majeſty ſhould reſtore to Great Britain the iſlands of Providence and the Bahamas without exception, in the ſame condition as when conquered by the arms of Spain. Finally, that all the countries and territories, which might have been conquered in any part of the world by the arms of either ſtate, and which were not included in theſe articles, ſhould be reſtored without requiring compenſations.

When the parliament met purſuant to adjournment, the preliminaries of peace being preſented to the houſe of commons, were ordered to lie on the table, and in the ſequel gave riſe to various deſultory altercations, rather than regular debates, as different circumſtances ſtruck different members. But theſe we ſhall paſs over, as all the arguments of moment are included in the grand debate that took place on the 17th of February, of which the following is a ſummary account.

In the upper houſe the leaders of the oppoſition conſidered the preliminaries as injurious to the intereſt and honour of Great Britain; accuſed the miniſtry of impolicy and improvidence in marking the boundaries between the territorial rights of Great Britain and the United States of America; cenſured them for ſending out an incompetent commiſſioner to negotiate with them, as appeared from the ſhameful ignorance, folly and abſurdity of the proviſional articles, condemned the ſeveral conceſſions both in America and the Eaſt Indies, and concluded, from the general tenor of the preliminaries, that the miniſtry had acceded implicitly to whatever terms might have been propoſed to them.

In anſwer to theſe charges, the friends of adminiſtration niſtration obſerved, that the peace was as good as we had reaſon to expect, conſidering the number of foes that aſſailed us in Europe, in America, in the Weſt Indies, and in the Eaſt. They remarked with great propriety, that the miniſtry who tranſacted the important matter alluded to had come into power at the moſt critical moment this nation had ever experienced; that they were ſenſible of the diſtreſſed ſituation of their country, and the arduous taſk they were about to undertake; but that, actuated by their duty, their attachment to the conſtitution, and their public ſpirit, they rather choſe to run all hazards than ſuffer ſuch deſtructive meaſures any longer to be purſued; that they had come into adminiſtration when the cry of the whole nation was, "Give us peace on any terms;" and that they had procured a peace on much better terms than could have been expected. They drew a diſtreſſed picture of the ſituation of this country, and inferred, from the reduced ſtate of the finances, the impoſſibility of continuing a war without the hazard of a national bankruptcy. With reſpect to what was particularly urged as to conceſſions, they obſerved, that France had, from the beginning of the negociations, inſiſted to be releaſed from ſome of the reſtrictions to which we had bound her; that our ſituation in the Weſt Indies, Tobago excepted, was the ſame we held at the peace of 1763, when we were victorious in every part of the globe; that our ſituation in the Weſt Indies was much worſe, from a variety of concomitant circumſtances, (as expatiated on) than was generally imagined. As to the boundaries in America ſo much objected to, they urged, that they were propoſed agreeable to the ſyſtem of moderation that now began to prevail in the moſt enlightened parts of Europe; and, in a word, preſumed that, all circumſtances conſidered, every diſpaſſionate and impartial man would be convinced that the miniſtry had done their duty, and made as good a peace as this kingdom had a right to expect.

At length the motion for an addreſs was carried by a majority of thirteen.

The members of the lower houſe, who ſpoke on this important occaſion both for and againſt the preliminaries, went over much the ſame ground in general with thoſe in the upper: we ſhall, therefore, only advert to ſuch arguments as had not been ſo explicitly urged by any of the noble ſpeakers in that houſe.

The ſupporters of the preliminaries obſerved, that at the concluſion of a glorious war it would have been difficult to perſuade the public, that the terms were ſufficiently adequate to their expectations, but at the period of an unfortunate war they could not be deemed humiliating: that at the cloſe of all wars, one of the powers would, moſt probably, have the aſcendancy, and to that power conceſſions muſt neceſſarily be made: but to decide on the merits of the intended peace, it was eſſential to take a view of our national finances, and that, on taking a comparative view of the preſent ſituation of this country with that previous to the war with America, the picture would be found truly deplorable. Having particularly adverted to the national debt, it was ſubmitted to the judgment of the houſe, if a continuance of the war could end in any thing leſs than certain ruin.

The oppoſers of the preliminaries went into a diſcuſſion of the particulars of each treaty, reprobated the ſeveral ceſſions made to France, cenſured the ceſſion of Minorca and Eaſt Florida to Spain, adverted to the boundaries in America, and the declaration of the independence of the United States, and concluded, from a variety of circumſtances reſpecting the terms in general, that there was no great probability of a laſting peace.

An addreſs having been moved by the member who ſpoke firſt on the part of adminiſtration, an amendment was moved by a noble lord, and carried by a majority of ſixteen againſt the miniſter.

In conſequence of the preliminary articles of peace ſigned by the reſpective belligerent powers, a bill was brought into the houſe of commons farther to open an intercourſe between Great Britain and the United States of America. This bill paſſed through ſome ſtages, and at various times between the 5th of March and the 9th of April, gave riſe to many converſations, all which we paſs over, as the bill was finally loſt on the appointment of a new miniſtry, and all the arguments that were urged for and againſt it, were, in fact, included in the debates that followed the bringing in of another bill, introduced by Mr. Secretary Fox, in order to accompliſh the ſame object.

In the courſe of theſe different debates, various obſervations were dropped on the national inconveniences that reſulted from the inter-regnum in adminiſtration, that was occaſioned by the unexpected coalition of the partizans of lord North and Mr. Fox, and the conſequent cenſure paſſed in the lower houſe on the negociators of the peace. Many members thought theſe inconveniences of ſuch ſerious conſequence, that, however it might ſeem to encroach on the royal prerogative, in which alone was the appointment of miniſters, it was highly neceſſary, in a moment ſo extremely critical, to addreſs his majeſty on this occaſion. Accordingly the following motion was made on the 24th of March, "That an humble addreſs be preſented to his majeſty, that he would be graciouſly pleaſed to take into conſideration the preſent calamitous condition of this country occaſioned by a long and ruinous war, and that he would appoint ſuch an adminiſtration, as would deſerve the confidence of the people and relieve them from the diſtractions under which they groaned."

This motion could not be expected to paſs without oppoſition, nor the famous coalition not to be ſeverely cenſured on the one hand, or remain unſupported on the other. A member whoſe parliamentary conduct had ever been graced by independence and integrity, (Mr. Martin) peremptorily declared, that from fixed principle he abhorred the coalition; that he had for many years heard the wiſeſt and beſt men in the houſe exclaim againſt the incompetence of the noble lord (North) to ſuſtain the vaſt cares of this mighty empire; that his ſomnolency, his blunders, his obſtinacy, &c. had been the continual theme of thoſe very men who were now elaborate in their encomiums on his character; and that therefore he ſhould feel himſelf a betrayer of the intereſts of his country if he gave his voice for an addreſs to countenance ſuch a coalition; but having an entire confidence in the wiſdom and firmneſs of his ſovereign, he ſhould vote for it, not doubting that his majeſty's choice would meet the moſt ſanguine wiſhes of his people.

The characters thus particularized in this ſpeech uſed the ſame principal arguments in favour of the coalition, the neceſſity of the times, and the poſſibility that HONEST men, though they differed in certain points, might ſo far unite as to ſerve the country with advantage. At length the addreſs was put, carried, and graciouſly received by his majeſty, who was pleaſed to ſay that it was his earneſt deſire to do every thing in his power to comply with the wiſhes expreſſed by his faithful commons.

On the 31ſt the country was ſtill without an adminiſtration and the chancellor of the exchequer announced his reſignation to the houſe. The ſuſpenſion of public buſineſs, unavoidably conſequent on this ſtate of affairs, afforded juſt ground for public murmur and parliamentary interference. Different forms of addreſſes were moved and ſubmitted to the conſideration of the houſe, but nothing was carried into reſolution; till at length an adminiſtration was formed, and on the 2d of April many of the conſequent new writs were moved for in the houſe.

On the 17th the royal aſſent was given by commiſſion to ſeveral public and private bills; likewiſe the bill to repeal the acts of the 16th and 17th of his preſent majeſty which prohibited the trade and intercourſe with America.—The bill for puniſhing mutiny and deſertion.—The bill to obviate all doubts which have ariſen or may ariſe, concerning the excluſive rights of the parliament and courts of Ireland in matters of legiſlature and judicature, and for preventing any writ of error or appeal from any of his majeſty's courts in the kingdom of Great Britain.

From the time when the new adminiſtration aſſumed the reins of government, no other ſubject of moment occurred except the ſtatement of the new loan, till the 7th of May, when Mr. Pitt opened the great buſineſs of parliamentary reform, and defended his motion with all the powers of eloquence; however, after ſome ingenious debates on both ſides the queſtion, there appeared a majority of 144 againſt it.

So ſtrenuous were the freeholders of the county of York for the effecting a more equal parliamentary repreſentation, that a petition was preſented by them on that account, ſigned by 10,124 names.

Among the taxes propoſed at the opening of the budget by lord John Cavendiſh, that on receipts appeared to be particularly unpopular, as it produced a general murmur among the commercial part of the community, followed by petitions from the city of London, and other parts, though without producing the deſired effect.

On the 23d of June the chancellor of the exchequer delivered to the houſe a written meſſage from the king, of which the following is a copy:

GEORGE R.

"His majeſty having taken into conſideration the propriety of making an immediate and ſeparate eſtabliſhment for his dearly beloved ſon the prince of Wales, relies on the experienced zeal and affection of the houſe for the concurrence and ſupport of ſuch meaſures as ſhall be moſt proper to aſſiſt his majeſty in this deſign."

After a few previous enquiries, the queſtion was put for referring the meſſage to the committee of ſupply, and carried unanimouſly; and on the 25th the order of the day for taking the ſame into conſideration being read, and the houſe having gone into a committee of ſupply, lord John Cavendiſh ſaid, that the committee muſt neceſſarily feel the moſt lively ſentiments of affection to his majeſty for the gracious manner in which he had determined to provide for the eſtabliſhment of the prince of Wales, without calling upon his people for any additional ſupply to his civil liſt on that account. The whole of the annual expence his majeſty was reſolved to take upon himſelf, and to allow his royal highneſs 50,000l. a year, but the committee could not be ignorant of the ſtate of the civil liſt. About 50,000l. had been ſet aſide towards paying debts, which would keep the civil liſt down to 850,000l. for about ſix years to come, and the allowance of 50,000l. a year to the prince would leave his majeſty's revenue ſo low, that it would be barely ſufficient to diſcharge the different claims upon it. In ſuch a ſituation, therefore, it was not ſurpriſing that his majeſty ſhould call upon his faithful commons for a temporary aid to equip his ſon at his outſet in life. The queſtion being put, was agreed to Nem. Con.

From this period no more buſineſs of moment was diſcuſſed in either houſe till the 16th of July, when his majeſty cloſed the ſeſſion with a moſt gracious ſpeech from the throne.

Having thus related the moſt important parliamentary tranſactions of this memorable period, we ſhall paſs on to ſuch other events as may be deemed worthy of hiſtorical record.

His majeſty having, on the 5th of February, been pleaſed to order letters patent to be paſſed under the great ſeal of the kingdom of Ireland, for creating a ſociety, or brotherhood, to be called Knights of the Illuſtrious Order of St. Patrick, (to conſiſt of the ſovereign and fifteen knights companions, of which his majeſty, his heirs and ſucceſſors ſhould perpetually be ſovereigns, and his majeſty's lieutenant-general, and general-governor of Ireland, or the lord-deputy or deputies, or lords juſtices, or other chief governors, ſhould officiate as grand maſters) fifteen knights companions of the ſaid illuſtrious order were accordingly conſtituted by appointment of his majeſty, and afterwards veſted with the inſignia in due form.

The court-martial on the trial of General Murray met, at the cloſe of the preceding month, at the Horſe Guards, to receive the deciſion of the court, after its reviſion by his majeſty. Both General Murray, and Sir William Draper who had exhibited the charges againſt him, being preſent, the Judge Advocate proceeded to read the deciſion, which was, "that twenty-ſeven of the charges were frivolous and groundleſs." Of the remaining two the court had found the priſoner guilty, and ſentenced him to receive ſuch reprehenſion as his majeſty might think proper, which his majeſty had been pleaſed to remit. The Judge Advocate then informed Sir William Draper, that it was the pleaſure of the court that he ſhould be required to make an apology to General Murray for having inſtituted the preſent trial againſt him. Sir William acquieſced, and apologized accordingly. When the like requiſition was made of General Murray to Sir William, for having wounded his feelings as a ſoldier, by his conduct to him during his command at Minorca, General Murray vehemently and peremptorily refuſed acquieſcence, declaring that he was the protector of his own honour, and would leave that of every other man to his own vindication. He was, therefore, put under arreſt; but on a meeting of the court-martial a few days after, the affair was accommodated, by changing a word in the propoſed apology, and the matter terminated in ſuch a manner as to leave no poſſible ground for apprehenſion that any future conſequence would take place between the two generals.

In the beginning of April the agreeable news arrived from the Eaſt-Indies, that the eſtabliſhment of peace with the Mahrattas was in the faireſt way of being accompliſhed, as articles of a treaty of peace and perpetual friendſhip and alliance between the Engliſh and the Mahrattas had been agreed upon and executed.

Some time after advices were received of the death of Hyder Ally, our moſt formidable opponent in that remote quarter of the globe, and that his ſucceſſor Tippo Saib appeared more pacifically inclined to the Engliſh than his father, having permitted ſuch as were priſoners in the towns taken by him to have a free communication with the preſidency at Madras, to be better ſupplied with neceſſaries, and to have free egreſs and regreſs.

On the 22d of May articles were agreed upon between Mr. Oſwald, his Britannic majeſty's commiſſioner, and the commiſſioners of the United States of America. Theſe articles particularly ſet forth the acknowledgment of the freedom, ſovereignty, and independence of the ſaid ſtates on the part of Great Britain, pointed out their boundaries in expreſs terms, and ſettled divers points relative to navigation, trade and commerce.

Sir Roger Curtis, who had ſo eminently diſtinguiſhed himſelf for his valour as an officer during the ſiege of Gibraltar by the combined armaments of France and Spain, renewed, on the 16th of June, as deputed from our court, the treaty of peace which had ſubſiſted between Great Britain and the emperor of Morocco.

On the 25th a ſumptuous edifice deſigned as a general bank being complety finiſhed in the city of Dublin, was opened for the tranſacting of public buſineſs.

On the 2d of September preliminary articles of peace, between his majeſty the king of Great Britain and their High Mightineſſes the States General of the United Provinces of Holland, were ſigned at Paris by the plenipotentiaries of the reſpective powers; as was, on the 3d, the definitive treaty with France, Spain and America: and on the 6th of the following month, by virtue of his majeſty's royal warrant, peace was proclaimed between Great Britain, France and Spain, at the uſual places, and with the accuſtomed ceremonies.

On the 11th of November the ſeſſion of parliament was opened by a ſpeech from his majeſty to both houſes, in which he informed them, that definitive treaties of peace had been concluded with the courts of France and Spain, and with the United States of America; and that preliminary articles had been alſo ratified with the States General of the United Provinces. He recommended the ſituation of the Eaſt India company, the improvement of the advantages derived from our Indian poſſeſſions, and the promotion and ſecurity of the happineſs of the native inhabitants of thoſe provinces; and concluded with aſſuring them, that he had no doubt of their maintaining that temper and moderation in their deliberations, which the importance of the objects before them ſo evidently demanded, or of their being unanimous in their deſire to direct all thoſe deliberations to the honour of his crown, the ſafety of his dominions, and the proſperity of his people.

When his majeſty had retired from the houſe, his royal highneſs the prince of Wales, who had been previouſly introduced with the uſual ceremonies, and taken his chair on the right hand of the throne, took the oaths of allegiance and ſupremacy, and made and ſubſcribed the declaration, and alſo took and ſubſcribed the oaths of abjuration.

In both houſes a motion for an addreſs was carried, which being preſented to his majeſty, were moſt graciouſly received.

On the 18th of November Mr. Secretary Fox, purſuant to previous notice, brought forward his motion reſpecting the future regulation of the Engliſh ſettlements in the Eaſt Indies, and after a number of pertinent obſervations, concluded his ſpeech with the following motions:

1. That leave be given to bring in a bill for veſting the affairs of the Eaſt India Company in the hands of certain commiſſioners, for the benefit of the proprietors and the public.

2. That leave be given to bring in a bill for the better government of territorial acquiſitions and dependencies in India.

Theſe motions, after a ſhort debate, were ſeverally put, and agreed to by the houſe.

When the firſt bill was brought in, it was read the firſt time, and ordered to be printed; and after ſome deſultory debates, a day was fixed for the ſecond reading.

Accordingly, at the ſtated time, the point was agitated with great vehemence by the reſpective parties. Mr. Secretary Fox vindicated the bill with his uſual force and energy. He argued upon principles of humanity, and painted, in the livelieſt colours, the ſhocking acts of barbarity committed by the Europeans on the natives of India. He repreſented the impropriety of ſupporting the ſervants of the company, who, in defiance of every thing ſacred, could be guilty of the moſt atrocious acts of cruelty and wantonneſs: urged the grand plea, neceſſity: and having declared, that in bringing it into parliament he had done his duty as a miniſter of this country, a friend to humanity, and an enemy to oppreſſion, therefore moved, that the bill might be committed.

Lord North, in a very able manner, defended the principles of the bill, reprobated the ſervants of the Company for engaging in the moſt wanton hoſtilities, which had nearly ruined the intereſts of the India Company in that part of the world; and concluded with averring, that the tendency of the bill was only to diminiſh their political, but not by any means their real, conſequence.

The opponents reaſoned againſt the bill upon general principles, as diſhoneſt, impolitic and arbitrary. They pointed out particularly the injuſtice of infringing the purchaſed rights of a chartered company, and the dangerous tendency of eſtabliſhing an influence which might end only with the exiſtence of the conſtitution.

Mr. W. Pitt, in particular, pledged himſelf to develope the deſtructive principles of the bill, and aſſerted, that its tendency was not more inimical to private property than it was to public freedom.

After a variety of arguments on both ſides the queſtion, the houſe divided on a motion for adjournment, which was carried in the negative by a majority of 109 voices. The queſtion, that the bill be committed, was then carried without a diviſion, and it was ordered to be committed for the 1ſt of December. On that day the principal opponents, Mr. Pitt and Mr. Fox, again diſplayed their eloquence, and went over much the ſame ground as upon the former occaſion: at length, however, the bill was again committed by a majority of 114.

But this meaſure of adminiſtration met with a very different fate in the houſe of lords, where, after ſome debates, the motion for the commitment of the bill was loſt by a majority of 19.

At

At 12 o'clock on Thurſday night, the 18th, a ſpecial meſſenger announced to lord North and Mr. Fox, that his majeſty had no further occaſion for their ſervices. At the ſame time they were commanded to ſend the ſeals by the under ſecretaries, as a perſonal interview would be diſagreeable. The next day the right honourable William Pitt was appointed firſt lord of the treaſury and chancellor of the Exchequer; earl Gower, preſident of the council; and earl Temple, ſecretary of ſtate: the latter immediately wrote letters of diſmiſſion to the remaining members of the cabinet, the conſequence of which was, a general and almoſt unexampled reſignation of their adherents.

But it appeared immediately that the ex-miniſtry ſtill retained a very powerful ſupport in the houſe of commons. One of their moſt ſtrenuous advocates exhorted the houſe not to loſe ſight of their own conſequence in the legiſlature of their country, and contended that in the preſent important criſis, the houſe ought not to accede to the wiſhes of the new adminiſtration, by adjourning only to the enſuing day, but that the adjournment ſhould be extended as uſual at the cloſe of the week, when the houſe had agreed to reſolve itſelf into a committee to conſider of the ſtate of the nation.

This occaſioned ſome debate, till at length the queſtion was called for, and the houſe was going into a diviſion; but the friends of the new miniſtry ſeeing the torrent ſo much againſt them, gave it up; and accordingly the houſe adjourned to Monday the 22d, when Mr. Grenville roſe and announced the reſignation of his noble relation, earl Temple, who, he ſaid, had taken this ſtep in order that he might not be ſuppoſed to ſhelter himſelf under the cover of authority againſt any charge that might be brought againſt him, but that he might meet it fairly and openly in his private capacity.—Mr. Fox hinted at ſome other reaſon for the reſignation; but the ſlight converſe on this ſubject gave way to a more important concern, the paſſing of the land-tax bill, with circumſtances of candour and good temper, that did honour to both ſides of the houſe.

This great object being ſettled, an addreſs to his majeſty was moved againſt the apprehended diſſolution of parliament. Lord North's ſpeech upon this occaſion was very ſingular, not only as it was his firſt profeſſed defence of a celebrated coalition, but as it threw a light on ſome important circumſtances in the government of this country, eſpecially that influence in the ſtate which the great ariſtocratical parties have been long known to poſſeſs.

At length the queſtion being put, that the houſe agree to the motion for the addreſs, it was carried with ſo great a ſtrength of ſhew, that the friends of the new miniſtry did not think proper to try the queſtion by a deciſion. When the addreſs was preſented to his majeſty, he was pleaſed to return a moſt gracious anſwer, and to aſſure the houſe, that he ſhould not interrupt their meeting by any exerciſe of his prerogative, either of prorogation or diſſolution. It was then finally agreed to by the houſe to adjourn to the 12th of January enſuing.

Notwithſtanding there appeared at firſt ſo much difficulty in forming a cabinet, an arrangement of miniſtry was completed in a few days. The duke of Rutland was appointed lord privy ſeal; the marquis of Caermarthen and lord Sydney, principal ſecretaries of ſtate; and lord Thurlow, lord high chancellor.

While the nation was agitated by political convulſions, diſpatches arrived from his excellency major-general James Stuart, commander in chief of his majeſty's and the Eaſt India company's forces on the coaſt of Coromandel, containing a particular account of a very ſignal victory obtained over the French and Tippo Sahib's auxiliaries, under his command.

The ſame diſpatches brought a letter from vice-admiral Sir Edward Hughes, wherein it appeared that he had had another action with the French ſquadron, under monſieur Suffrein. It began on the 20th of June, at 4 minutes paſt 4 P. M. when the enemy, having the advantage of the wind, hauled off. Several of his majeſty's ſhips were much diſabled in their hulls, maſts, and rigging, and ſickneſs prevailed throughout the whole fleet. The admiral on his return to Madraſs road received intelligence of the ratification of the preliminary articles of peace, as well as the ceſſation of hoſtilities agreed to between Great Britain and the States General of the United Provinces; and on the 27th diſpatched his majeſty's ſhip Medea on a flag of truce, with letters to monſieur Suffrein and the marquis de Buſſy.

On the 4th of July the Medea returned to Madraſs road, with anſwers from the French commanders in chief, in which they concurred in a ceſſation of hoſtilities by ſea and land, as well as immediate releaſe of priſoners on both ſides: and thus terminated a long and bloody conteſt in that quarter of the globe.

A. D. 1784. Slaughter and devaſtation having at length happily ſubſided in the different parts where they had too long and too violently raged, ſanguine hopes were entertained that they would be ſucceeded by the more pleaſing themes of humanity and peace. But, alas! a reconciliation was no ſooner brought about with foreign enemies, than domeſtic faction reared its baneful head, and involved our political ſyſtem in anarchy and confuſion. When the houſe of commons met purſuant to adjournment on the 12th of January, debates were maintained by the contending parties with the uſual zeal and ſpirit.

A retroſpect was had to the rumoured diſſolution of parliament, and the talents of the late miniſters were placed in a comparative view with thoſe of the preſent. The ſovereign's prerogative to appoint miniſters, and diſſolve parliaments, was univerſally admitted; but the propriety of ſuch meaſures, at a certain criſis, was called in queſtion by the advocates for the late adminiſtration.

After a diviſion of the houſe on the order of the day, upon which there appeared a majority of 39 againſt the miniſter, the houſe went into a committee on the ſtate of the nation; and Mr. Fox moved ſeveral reſolutions, of which the following were the ſum and ſubſtance.

That it is the opinion of this committee, that for any perſon or perſons in his majeſty's treaſury, exchequer, or navy offices, or the bank of England, or employed in paying public money, to iſſue any for ſervices already voted by the houſe of commons, unleſs the uſual bill for appropriating the ſums voted for ſervices, ſhould paſs into a law before any diſſolution or prorogation of parliament, would be a high miſdemeanor, derogatory to the dignity of the houſe, and ſubverſive of the conſtitution.

That there be laid before the houſe an account of all ſums iſſued for public ſervices, from the 19th of December 1783, to the 12th of January 1784.

That no more money be iſſued on the credit of a vote of the houſe, until the above account ſhall have been laid before the houſe, nor for three days after.

That the chairman be inſtructed to move the houſe that the mutiny bill be read a ſecond time on the 23d of February next.

Some objections having been made to the third of theſe reſolutions, the mover ſaid, that in order to take away every poſſible ground for accuſing him of any intention to withhold the ſupplies, he would not preſs that reſolution. The other three were then carried after ſome debate, but without any diviſion.

Several other reſolutions were moved reſpecting general and alarming reports, new appointments, &c. pointing upon the whole ſo directly againſt the new miniſtry, that their friends of courſe oppoſed them; however, they were carried by a conſiderable majority. The moſt material circumſtance, in the courſe of the debate was, that the miniſter would by no means conſent to give an explanation of the king's anſwer to the addreſs of the houſe againſt a diſſolution or prorogation of parliament; inſomuch, that after a variety of efforts in vain to procure an explicit declaration, the houſe, on the 19th, went into the ſtate of the nation; and it was moved, "That it is the opinion of this committe, that having reſolved that, in the preſent ſituation of the dominions of his majeſty, it is proper there ſhould be an adminiſtration that poſſeſſed the confidence of the houſe; and that certain new and extraordinary circumſtances had attended the appointment of his majeſty's miniſters, by no means calculated to conciliate the confidence of this houſe, and derogatory to parliament and the conſtitution, their continuance in places of high truſt is contrary to conſtitutional principles and ſubverſive of the public good." In the debates which this motion introduced, the former topics of diſcuſſion were repeated. On a diviſion there appeared a majority of 21 againſt the miniſter.

On the 23d Mr. Chancellor Pitt moved, that the India bill laid by him before the houſe, be read a ſecond time and committed. Mr. Fox immediately roſe, and adverted to the tendency of the right honourable gentleman's bill as totally inſufficient to eradicate the evils complained of, or emancipate the company from that ſlaviſh dependence on its ſervants abroad, which deprived it of it's energy, and rendered it the proſtituted object of foreign cabal; becauſe that bill, by continuing the influence and power of the proprietors and court of directors, rendered the latter dependent on the former, and left as much as poſſible the commerce of the company to it's own ſuperintendance. He then proceeded to point out that the intention of his bill was to remedy theſe encroachments, by excluding the proprietors, as far as was conſiſtent with neceſſity, from a participation in a government in which they had exhibited ſuch proſtitution of ſentiment, and ſo ſtrange an accommodation of meaſures to the corrupt influence and ſecret intrigues of their ſervants abroad. He affirmed that it was the object of his bill to erect a government, not in Calcutta, but in London, not to give exiſtence to a changeable mode of adminiſtration, but to eſtabliſh a permanent one; not to give an improper extenſion to prerogative, but to ſubject the various regulations to the inſpection of parliament; not to ſcreen culprits from judicial infliction, but to bring them to merited puniſhment. He concluded with obſerving, that the preſent bill tended to no reformation at home, to no correction of abuſe abroad, and in a word, if adopted, he did not heſitate to ſay, India is loſt for ever.

Mr. Chancellor Pitt aſſerted in reply, that notwithſtanding what had been ſaid about controul, the ſame objection which lay againſt his meaſure, was alſo againſt that of the right honourable gentleman, as his bill had no clauſe for abridging or ſuperſeding that of the executive power over every ſubordinate authority whatever. The extenſion of prerogative had been mentioned, and it had been obliquely imputed to his bill. He obſerved the fact was, that any influence it lent was unintended, and therefore could not operate ſo as to create any power of an alarming nature; for the officers abroad were directed to promote, both in the military and civil line, according to a regular ſucceſſion; and the nomination of the crown by this muſt of conſequence be not a little abridged. A great variety of other particulars no doubt demanded his attention; he only requeſted, however, that what he had produced with a ſincere intention of ſerving his country, the houſe might judge of with candour and impartiality.

Lord North concluded the debate, and in very ſtrong terms contended for the imbecility and dark patronage of the bill. He argued that it was not a ſyſtem of practical, ſound, or rational government. The houſe divided on the ſecond reading, when there appeared againſt the bill a majority of eight.

The bill being thus rejected, Mr. Fox moved for leave to bring in a bill for the better regulation and government of our affairs in the Eaſt Indies; the two principal objects of which were, the rendering the ſyſtem for the government of India permanent by authority of parliament; and the fixing the government at home. The other ſyſtem as ſecondary, might be modelled to meet the inclinations and opinions of the country. He then called upon the miniſter to declare explicitly whether the houſe was to rely on the promiſe made in anſwer to their late addreſs. No anſwer from the miniſter. He was called upon again and again; but remained ſilent. At length, as if urged by the pointed ſeverity of ſome remarks, he declared that he would not condeſcend to anſwer interrogatories which he did not think gentlemen entitled to put to him, and concluded with aſſigning his reaſons in an high and elevated ſtile of expreſſion.

As the affairs of the Eaſt India company have produced an event as memorable as any within the annals of our hiſtory, the origin and progreſs of the ſame may not be deemed unworthy of notice. The Engliſh Eaſt India company was originally commenced in the reign of queen Elizabeth, the firſt Aſiatic charter bearing date about the year 1598. The firſt was only for a ſhort term of years, the queen being a very determined enemy to monopolies of every kind. James the Iſt. renewed it, and Charles the IId. after the reſtoration, renewed it in 1662, and granted ſome other privileges. James II. confirmed it afreſh, and added largely to their privileges. The original capital ſtock was 365,000l. but by good ſucceſs it was in 1676 doubled, and in 1685 it was upwards of a million ſterling. In 1698, upon a diſagreement between government and the directors, a new company was eſtabliſhed four years before the old old charter was expired. The fund of the new company was near two millions, with which they ſent to ſea forty-three ſail of ſhips. From this ſucceſs, the creſts of the old company were brought down; and in 1704 they coaleſced into one company, and have ſo remained ever ſince.

The day following the members were engaged as before on the ſubject of diſſolution, and as undeciſively, till at length the queſtion for adjournment was put and carried. A right honourable member, after ſome exordium, moved, that the houſe do come to this reſolution, "That the houſe of commons expreſſed the firmeſt reliance on his majeſty's moſt gracious aſſurance, that he would not interrupt their proceeding in ſettling the affairs of the Eaſt India company, the ſtate of public credit, and of the revenue; objects which appeared of the greateſt magnitude to his majeſty, to this houſe, and to the public.

The miniſter appeared, from the tenour of his obſervations on this motion, to be much agitated by it at firſt: at length, however, he ſaid he was not averſe to declare, that he never had any intention of diſſolving the parliament; that the circumſtances of the public rendered it a meaſure which no friend to his country would adviſe; that he for one would not adviſe any ſuch meaſure, nor even act with a miniſtry by whom it was adviſed.

This declaration in ſome degree conciliated the minds of the oppoſite party; and a motion was made and paſſed unanimouſly for adjournment to Thurſday the 29th.

In this diſtracted ſtate of our councils, a meeting was held for the laudable purpoſe of recommending an union of parties. They were between fifty and ſixty in number, and, in point of property and conſideration in the country, truly reſpectable. The following requiſition, ſigned by ſeventy members of parliament, was preſented to Mr. Groſvenor, in conſequence of his propoſal in the houſe of commons for an union among the leaders of the contending parties.

"We whoſe names are hereunto ſigned, members of the houſe of commons, being fully perſuaded that the united efforts of thoſe in whoſe integrity, abilities and conſtitutional principles we have reaſon to confide, can alone reſcue the country from it's preſent diſtracted ſtate, do join in moſt earneſtly entreating them to communicate with each other on the arduous ſituation of public affairs; truſting that by a libera and unreſerved intercourſe between them, every impediment may be removed, to a cordial co-operation of great and reſpectable characters, acting on the ſame public principles, and entitled to the ſupport of independent and diſintereſted men.

"And we depute —— to preſent this repreſentation and requiſition to his grace the duke of Portland, the right honourable lord John Cavendiſh, the right honourable William Pitt, and the right honourable Charles James Fox, in our names." But all the efforts of this reſpectable body were fruſtrated; the one part making the reſignation of the miniſter the very baſis of the propoſed intercourſe, and the miniſter ſtating that his perſonal feelings would not ſuffer him to reſign his poſt for the purpoſe of negotiating: ſo that after divers meetings, and various letters had paſſed between the parties, the aſſembly carried a motion declaratory of their ſentiments, and agreed to adjourn SINE DIE.

The 16th of January the lord-mayor, attended by a great number of the aldermen, went from Guildhall to St. James's, and preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, expreſſing the ſatisfaction they felt at the diſmiſſion of his majeſty's late miniſters, and their earneſt aſſurances of maintaining their zeal and loyalty inviolate.

An addreſs of the like nature was alſo preſented by the merchants of London.

On the 29th, the houſe of commons met purſuant to adjournment; but nothing of importance occurred till the 2d of February, when Mr. Groſvenor, the chairman of the meeting of the country gentlemen aſſembled for the purpoſe of effecting an union of parties, after informing the houſe that the conciliatory efforts of that meeting were not likely to prove effectual, moved, "That in the preſent circumſtances of this country, ſo arduous and preſſing, it was neceſſary for that houſe to take ſuch meaſures as were moſt conducive to procure a ſtrong, permanent, extenſive and united adminiſtration, as ſhould carry the full confidence of the commons and the public."

The warm friends of adminiſtration oppoſed the motion, and reprobated the idea of an union between the parties mentioned, as a meer imitation of a recent coalition.

Mr. Fox, with his uſual energy, vindicated his meaſures and thoſe of his adherents; aſſerted the dignity and privileges of the houſe of commons, and maintained, that to ſet the ſenſe of that houſe at defiance, was to overturn its conſequence, and with it the conſtitution itſelf, and the liberties of the ſubject. At length, after a few words from ſome other members, the queſtion was carried without a diviſion.

Another motion was then made ſimilar to the former, both as to ſubſtance and effect, and carried by a majority againſt the miniſter.

But the preſent adminiſtration appeared to have had the ſanction and concurrence of the upper houſe, in which a noble lord on the 4th of February made two reſolutions reſpecting ſome late tranſactions, and then moved for an addreſs to the throne, founded on thoſe reſolutions, expreſſive of their entire ſatisfaction with his majeſty's appointment of miniſters, and aſſuring his majeſty that they would, upon all occaſions, ſupport him in the juſt exerciſe of a conſtitutional prerogative.

The ſame ſubject of altercation which had engroſſed the attention of the lower houſe for ſome time, continued to be debated from day to day, and every motion was carried againſt the miniſter, till on the 20th Mr. Fox moved for an addreſs to the king, which being alſo carried, was prepared and reported as follows:

TO THE KING'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY.

"We your majeſty's moſt faithful commons, impreſſed with the moſt dutiful ſenſe of your majeſty's paternal regard for the welfare of your people, approach your throne to expreſs our reliance on your majeſty's paternal wiſdom, that your majeſty will take ſuch meaſures, by removing any obſtacle to forming ſuch an adminiſtration as the houſe has declared to be requiſite in the preſent critical and arduous ſituation of affairs, as may tend to give effect to the wiſhes of your faithful commons, which have already been moſt humbly repreſented to your majeſty."

This addreſs being preſented on the 25th to his majeſty, majeſty, he was pleaſed to reply in words to the following purport:

"That he felt the peculiar neceſſity of a ſtrong, united, and extended adminiſtration, and ſuch as might poſſeſs the confidence of the public. That his endeavours to compoſe the preſent diſtractions by an union of the ableſt men upon a fair and equal footing had very recently been uſed, but without ſucceſs: that until ſuch an adminiſtration could be formed as his faithful commons deſired, he could not ſee how it could conduce to the public good to remove his preſent from all the ſituations of executive government; more eſpecially as no charge had been ſpecified againſt any one of them, and as the repreſentations of large and reſpectable bodies of his ſubjects had expreſſed a ſatisfaction in the late change which he had thought proper to make in his councils."

When the king's anſwer was read, Mr. Fox roſe and ſaid, he would not then enter into the conſideration of it, but would barely remark, that it appeared to him to be final on the part of his majeſty, and therefore the houſe could not well take more than one ſtep farther; and as this proceeding on the part of the houſe ought to be final alſo, there ought to be due time for gentlemen to turn the ſubject in their minds, what that meaſure ſhould be. He then moved that his majeſty's anſwer be taken into conſideration on Monday the 8th of March, which was agreed to without any debate.

Accordingly on that day Mr. Fox, after ſome exordium, moved a variety of reſolutions, tending on the whole to teſtify the ſurpriſe and affliction of the houſe on receiving the anſwer which his majeſty's miniſters had adviſed; to aſſure his majeſty that the houſe neither had diſputed, nor meant in any inſtance to diſpute, much leſs to deny his majeſty's undoubted prerogative of appointing to the executive offices of ſtate ſuch perſons as to his majeſty's wiſdom might ſeem meet; at the ſame time again ſubmitting to his majeſty's royal wiſdom, that no adminiſtration, however legally appointed, can ſerve his majeſty and the public with effect, which does not enjoy the confidence of that houſe; to expreſs a moſt unfeigned gratitude for his majeſty's royal aſſurances that he does not call in queſtion the right of the houſe to offer their advice to his majeſty on every proper occaſion, touching the exerciſe of any branch of royal prerogative; to repreſent that they know and are ſure that the proſperity of his majeſty's dominions in former times, has been, under Divine Providence, owing to the harmony which has for a century prevailed between the crown and that houſe; that they are convinced of the neceſſity of purſuing the ſame ſyſtem; and that they felt the continuance of the preſent adminiſtration to be an innovation upon it; to declare that they had done their duty to his majeſty, and their conſtituents, in pointing out the evil, and in humbly imploring redreſs; and that therefore the blame and reſponſibility muſt now lie wholly upon thoſe who had diſregarded the opinions, and neglected the admonitions of the repreſentatives of his majeſty's people, and attempted thereby to ſet up a new ſyſtem of executive adminiſtration, which, wanting the confidence of the houſe, and acting in defiance to their reſolution, muſt prove at once inadequate by it's inefficiency to the neceſſary objects of government, and dangerous by it's example to the liberties of the people.

But the opponents of adminiſtration in this inſtance loſt conſiderable ground, having, on a diviſion on Mr. Fox's motion, the majority only of an unit.

On the 10th, lord Hinchinbroke informed the houſe, that their repreſentation had been laid before his majeſty, and graciouſly received.

On the 25th, his majeſty went to the houſe of peers, and having given the royal aſſent to ſeveral bills then ready, made the following ſpeech from the throne:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"On a full conſideration of the preſent ſituation of affairs, and of the extraordinary circumſtances which have produced it, I am induced to put an end to this ſeſſion of parliament: I feel it a duty, which I owe to the conſtitution and to the country in ſuch a ſituation, to recur as ſpeedily as poſſible to the ſenſe of my people, by calling a new parliament.

"I truſt that this meaſure will tend to obviate the miſchiefs ariſing from the unhappy diviſions and diſtractions which have lately ſubſiſted; and that the various important objects which will require conſideration may be afterwards proceeded upon with leſs interruption and with happier effect.

"I can have no other object, but to preſerve the true principles of our free and happy conſtitution, and to employ the powers entruſted to me by law, for the only end for which they were given, the good of my people."

The next day the metropolis was thrown into a very great ferment, by an incident which from the criſis in which it happened was deemed the more extraordinary. Some robbers having burglariouſly entered the lord chancellor's houſe in Great Ormond ſtreet, carried off the Great Seal of England. As ſoon as his lordſhip was appriſed of the robbery, information was ſent to the reſpective offices of police, and perſons were diſpatched in queſt of the perpetrators of ſo daring a villainy, but without the deſired effect.

The ſame day a very important event was announced to the public; namely, a proclamation for diſſolving the then parliament, and declaring the calling another.

This tranſaction brings our hiſtory to a period, on which occaſion we truſt a retroſpect will neither condemn us in our own judgment, nor in that of the public. If it appears upon the whole, that we have not deviated from our impartial plan, nor ſwerved from the principles we primarily adopted, we ſhall ſtand acquitted at the bar of candour, as having fulfilled our engagement with the public, and our lucubrations may probably be thought not unworthy a place in the cabinets of thoſe who deem THE ANNALS OF ENGLAND their greateſt ornament.

May future hiſtorians poſſeſs ſuperior talents, and may the revival of all the bleſſings of agriculture, manufacture, and commerce, added to the enlightening reſearches of genius, the inveſtigations of philoſophy, and the cultivation and perfection of all the elegant arts, afford them ground for ſuch a diſplay of the glories of our country, as ſhall add to the renown it has ſo long and ſo juſtly acquired throughout the various parts of the known world.

SUPPLEMENT.

A. D. 1784. ON the 6th of April a magnificent monument was opened in Weſtminſter-Abbey to the memory of the earl of Chatham. It does equal honour to the artiſts and the conſummate patriot and ſtateſman, whoſe meritorious acts in the ſervice of his country it is deſigned to perpetuate.

To the general joy of all who had the love of their country at heart, the ratification on the part of the American congreſs of the definitive treaty between Great Britain and America arrived on the 9th, and a few days after official intimation was ſent by the ſecretary of ſtate, to the lord-mayor of London, of the arrival of that between Great Britain and the States-general of the United Provinces.

The new parliament met on the 16th of May, when the commons re-choſe Mr. Cornwall their ſpeaker, and on the 19th his majeſty went in the uſual ſtate to the upper houſe, and opened the ſeſſion of parliament.

The definitive treaty with Holland was ſigned at Paris, on the 20th, and in the beginning of July proclamation of peace between Great Britain and the United Provinces, and alſo with the United States of America, was read by the City Common Crier at the Royal Exchange, and other public places of the metropolis; and a day of thankſgiving was appointed for the 29th on that memorable occaſion.

Advices were ſoon after received of the peace being ſigned between the Eaſt India Company and Tippoo Saib, an event that was followed by the royal aſſent being given to Mr. Pitt's Eaſt India regulating bill, and the prorogation of the parliament.

A. D. 1785. On the 25th of January, being the day appointed for the commencement of the ſecond ſeſſion of the preſent parliament, his majeſty opened the ſame with a moſt gracious ſpeech. After ſome altercation, or rather converſation, a motion for an addreſs to his majeſty on the occaſion was carried in both houſes nem. con.

On the 3d of February three great points were ſubmitted by the miniſter to the conſideration of the commons this ſeſſion, viz. an arrangement of our commercial intercourſe with Ireland; a reform in the repreſentation of parliament; and the ſtate of the national finances. Theſe ſeveral ſubjects met with general approbation, and were ſet apart for future diſcuſſion.

The ſame day Mr. Fitzpatrick preſented a petition from certain of the electors of Weſtminſter, purporting a violation of their franchiſes through the high bailiff's delay in making a return of the members by them elected, and praying the houſe to grant them redreſs by compelling the high bailiff to give ſuch return. After ſome debates on a motion conſequent to the petition, the high bailiff was ordered by the houſe to make his return, when Mr. Fox was declared duly elected.

The next point of importance agitated in the lower houſe was, the great queſtion of a reform in the repreſentation of the people, brought not as heretofore by a member of the oppoſition, but by "the miniſter of the crown." The ſubject was introduced by Mr. Chancellor Pitt, in a very eloquent ſpeech to one of the fulleſt houſes that had ever been known.

The purport of Mr. Pitt's propoſition was, that of transferring from certain boroughs the power of election to counties and towns of greater conſequence, not by compulſatory means, but ſo as to make it an act of their own direction.

After ſtating the general principle and particular objects of his plan of reform, and enforcing his motion with a variety of arguments, he moved, "that leave be given to bring in a bill to amend "the repreſentation."

There were ſeveral very able ſpeakers, both for and againſt this motion; in particular Mr. Burke. After long debates the motion was rejected by a majority of 74.

On the 22d of June the toll, which had been paid at Blackfriars Bridge, from its being firſt opened, was taken off, and the gates, &c. ſold for 99 l. 15s.

The parliamentary buſineſs being concluded, on the 21ſt of October his majeſty went in ſtate to the houſe of peers, and, after ſigning the bills then ready, put an end to the ſeſſion.

A. D. 1786. The firſt material incident that occurred this year was that of the melancholy fate of the Halſewell Eaſt Indiaman, Richard Pierce, commander, outward bound to Madras and Bengal. She ſailed from the Downs on Sunday the firſt of January, and on the Tueſday morning following ſprung a leak, which, notwithſtanding an immediate application to the pumps, and a continued working them, ſoon encreaſed to the depth of five feet. She remained beating about the whole night, and the next morning ſhe had ſeven feet water in her hold. In this deplorable ſituation ſhe continued, expoſed to violent winds and a raging ſea, till two o'clock on Friday morning, when ſhe ſtruck on the rocks near Seacombe, on the iſland of Purbeck, between Peverel-Point and St. Alban's Head, and in two hours after, not an atom of her was to be ſeen: one hundred and ſeventy men were ſuppoſed to have got aſhore, but from the darkneſs of the morning, and ſurging of the ſea, the greateſt part of them were daſhed to pieces and drowned.

Beſides the captain, his two daughters, five other young ladies, and the firſt, fourth, and fifth mates, were all loſt, together with about 160 or 170 ſeamen and ſoldiers.

The loſs of the Haleſwell Indiaman was ſoon ſucceeded by that of the Trecothick, which was loſt in Talland Bay, on the 10th, when Captain Elder, his ſon, and eleven of the crew were drowned.

On the 24th of January his majeſty went in the uſual ſtate to the houſe of peers, and opened the third ſeſſion of the preſent parliament. Both houſes preſented an addreſs of thanks to his majeſty, which were graciouſly received.

The ſheriffs of London, on the 25th of March, preſented a petition to his Majeſty, for enforcing the execution of the laws reſpecting capital convicts.

On the 11th of April, lord Cornwallis was appointed governor general and commander in chief of of Bengal; as was on the 12th Sir Guy Carleton, commander in chief of Quebec, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland.

On the 20th of June the cauſe between the Right Hon. Mr. Fox and the High Bailiff of Weſtminſter, was determined againſt the latter, with 2000l. damages. Intelligence was received at the India Houſe, on the 28th, of the death of Tippoo Saib, a character well known to all who are converſant in the hiſtory of the Eaſtern world.

His Royal Highneſs the prince of Wales, in conſequence of the diſappointment of ſeeing an addition made to his revenue this Seſſion, by Parliament, on the 9th of July, dropt his eſtabliſhment, and appointed four gentlemen to arrange his affairs, and appropriate the greater part of his income to the payment of his debts.

On the 11th his Majeſty went to the Houſe of Peers, and prorogued the parliament with a ſpeech from the throne.

An attempt was made on the life of his Majeſty on the 2d of Auguſt, by one Margaret Nicholſon, as he was alighting from his carriage at the gate of St. James's Palace. This woman had been obſerved to wait the king's arrival for ſome time, and previous to the appearance of the carriage had taken her ſtation between two women that were unknown to her. On the ſight of the carriage, ſhe begged with ſome earneſtneſs that they would not impede her from delivering a memorial to his majeſty. As the king was alighting, ſhe puſhed forward, and preſented a paper, which his Majeſty received with great condeſcenſion. At that inſtant ſhe ſtruck a concealed knife at the King's breaſt, which his Majeſty happily avoided by bowing as he received the paper. As ſhe was making a ſecond thruſt, one of the yeomen caught her arm, and at the ſame inſtant one of the king's footmen wrenched the knife out of her hand. His majeſty, with amazing temper and fortitude, exclaimed, "I have received no injury! Do not hurt the woman; the poor creature appears inſane." — The woman was immediately taken into cuſtody, and upon examination appeared to be inſane.

On the 12th, the lord mayor and aldermen of the city of London preſented a loyal addreſs to his majeſty on the above occaſion, which his majeſty was pleaſed to receive very graciouſly.

On the 19th of September, a plan was ſet on foot for eſtabliſhing a Colony in New Holland, for the preſent convenience of tranſporting convicts thither, and with a future view of improving the ſoil, and cultivating the manners of the natives.

In the courſe of the ſame month, a commercial treaty with France was ſigned at Verſailles by Mr. Eden and Monſieur Vergennes, as miniſters plenipotentiary for their reſpective kings.

On the evening of the 31ſt of October her royal highneſs the princeſs Amelia Sophia Eleonora, aunt to his majeſty, departed this life; and on the 9th of November the lord mayor's day was obſerved in the city in a private manner, on account of the death of that princeſs.

On the 6th of December both houſes of parliament met, purſuant to their laſt prorogation, and were further prorogued to the 23d of January 1787.

Accordingly on that day they met, and his majeſty upon the occaſion delivered a ſpeech from the throne, in which he informed them, that having concluded a treaty of navigation and commerce with the moſt Chriſtian king, he recommended it to them to take ſuch meaſures as they ſhould judge proper for carrying it into effect, aſſuring them at the ſame time, that to promote a beneficial intercourſe between the reſpective ſubjects, and add permanence to the bleſſings of peace, ſhould be the grand object of all his negociations with foreign powers.

He further recommended to them to take ſuch meaſures as might appear neceſſary for carrying into execution a plan formed by his direction, for the tranſportation of convicts, and aſſured them of his reliance on the continuance of their exertions to improve the national reſources, and promote the welfare of his people.

His majeſty, in conſequence, was waited on with an addreſs from both houſes.

On the 7th of February, Mr. Sheridan, in the lower houſe, brought forward an important charge againſt Mr. Haſtings, late governor general of Bengal. He diſplayed in his ſpeech moſt aſtoniſhing powers of elocution, inſomuch that he fixed the attention of the whole houſe, and concluded, amidſt a torrent of applauſe till then unheard in the ſenate, with a motion that Warren Haſtings be impeached.

The chancellor of the exchequer, after a ſpeech that does him much honour, gave his vote for the motion, declaring that the national character, he was convinced had been debaſed and degraded, and it was only by this act of national juſtice it could be reſtored to its wonted brilliancy, excited by its ſacred attachments to honour, juſtice and humanity.

Mr. Sheridan's motion was carried by a majority of 107. The miniſter carried his motions with reſpect to the commercial treaty, by a conſiderable majority.

The ſeveral articles of impeachment having, by order of the houſe of commons, been taken by Mr. Burke, to the upper houſe, their lordſhips proceeded in due form thereupon on the 21ſt of May. Having held ſome debates on different points, Mr. Haſtings was admitted to bail, and, purſuant to the tenour of a petition, allowed a copy of the charge, and had counſel aſſigned him.

Mr. Alderman Newnham, having declared his intention of bringing forward a motion reſpecting the affairs of the prince of Wales, before the expiration of this month, perſiſted in his reſolution, notwithſtanding the perſuaſion of ſeveral members to the contrary.

The alderman's motion, however, was never made, for at the time he had intimated he roſe in his place, to declare that it was no longer neceſſary, being obviated by an occurrence that had juſt fallen out.

After a ſuſpenſe of ſome days, and various contradictory reports, his majeſty ſent a meſſage to the houſe of commons, ſtating to them divers particulars, and recurring to their liberality on ſo intereſting an occaſion.

The reſult was, that the affair terminated in ſuch a manner as was conſiſtent with the honour of the crown, and with the dignity of ſo diſtinguiſhed a branch of the royal family as the prince of Wales.

On the 30th of May his majeſty went in the uſual ſtate to the houſe of peers, and put an end to the ſeſſion of parliament, by a moſt gracious ſpeech from the throne.

Notwithſtanding the Publiſher gave two printed Notices for the Subſcribers to ſend in their Names, and delayed the Publication of the laſt Number ſome Weeks, in order to give thoſe who live at a great Diſtance the Opportunity of having their Names appear in this Liſt, he has not been able to procure the Names of near one half of the numerous Subſcribers. He hopes, therefore, that thoſe whoſe Names are omitted will not be offended; and begs that he may not be blamed if any printed in this Liſt are found wrong ſpelt, as he has taken great Care to have them all printed literally as they were delivered by the Newſmen, &c.
